A grave.

Hub.

He shall not live.

Hubert's impassive bearing through the scene makes John uncertain whether his meaning has really been understood, and this brief explanation is necessary and most forcible. But for some excessive clutching at Hubert's dress Mr. Tree's gesture in this scene was as good as his speech, and he made a most effective exit. Equally good in a different way was his defiance of the power of Rome—which, by the way, ought to have produced more effect than it did on the throng of soldiers and courtiers in whose presence it was uttered. Such a speech in those times would have made all around shrink in horror from him who made it. Mr. Tree was well supported in his best scenes by Mr. Fernandez as Hubert.

Next in interest to Mr. Tree's King John is undoubtedly the Arthur of Miss Norreys, whose success was complete. She looked the part to perfection, and spoke her lines admirably. In her scene with Hubert she showed true pathetic power, and produced a great effect upon her audience. Her fall from the castle window, by the way, was not well managed, and came dangerously near to provoking mirth. If Arthur must roll through a bush upon the stage, care should be taken that his tumble may not recall memories of last season's pantomime.

Mr. Macklin as Philip, the bastard, deserves to be spoken of with respect, if without enthusiasm. He has a manly presence and soldierlike bearing, and speaks his lines with vigour and distinctness, but his emphasis appears to us to be a little mechanical, and to be placed sometimes with regard rather for sound than for sense. Moreover, he does not quite succeed in hitting off the humorous side of the character. The part is one which makes great demands, physical and other, upon the actor. The bastard is at once adventurer, humourist, and resourceful man of action, and he has, moreover, to perform to some extent the functions of a Greek Chorus. Few actors could do all that the part requires; Mr. Macklin does a great deal. Miss Amy Roselle, too, deserves praise, but not unreserved praise, for her performance of Constance. She has force and passion, but she reminds one rather too frequently of the injured heroine of modern melodrama, and has certain tricks of style and gesture which jar on the spectator more in Shakspeare than in a modern play. Her earlier scenes were marred by a gasping utterance, which almost disappeared in the great scene of all, after Arthur's capture, with the King of France and the Cardinal. Here Miss Roselle was at her best. Her delivery of the speech to Pandulph affected the audience as nothing else in the whole play did, but she has not fully mastered the difficult art of speaking blank verse.

With regard to the remaining characters, it is only necessary to mention the admirable elocution and dignified bearing of Mr. Kemble as Pandulph, and Mr. Brookfield's clever little character-sketch of Robert Falconbridge. His make-up was excellent, and his stolid stare, awkward gait, and stooping shoulders, represented the loutish squire to the life. There was some defective elocution among the minor characters, one or two of whom were at times almost unintelligible, but the acoustic properties of the Crystal Palace Theatre probably leave something to be desired, and if Mr. Tree ever finds it advisable, as we hope he may, to produce King John at the Haymarket, these little shortcomings will, no doubt, be remedied.

A LAST ILLUSION.

[I will not vote for a separate Parliament for Ireland, and I will not vote for any measure or proposition or inquiry which could lead it to be supposed that this is an open question in my mind.—MR. JOHN MORLEY at Westminster in 1880.]

OH, hush thee! Mr. Ch-mb-rl-n, we cannot bear the blow,
The shock is too bewildering; oh, hush thee, and go slow,
Recall that strange quotation or explain it how you will,
But leave us, in Romance's name, one last illusion still.

It cannot! no, it cannot be that M-rl-y ever went
To such a length as this against a Home Rule Parliament,
That not a "measure" only, but "inquiry," he declined,
Lest that should seem to prove the question "open" in his mind.

O member for West Birmingham, you surely must have known
What idol-reputation by your speech was overthrown;
How desolate and desecrate now stands the shrine in which
The member for Newcastle filled a solitary niche.

You must have known—you could not fail to recognize the place
Which this philosopher has filled in this peculiar case,
How his uprightness seemer to rise columnar from the ground,
Contrasting picturesquely with the moral ruins round.

Where's now our foil to H-rc-rt? where that thoughtful, calm recluse,

Who never rashly had (we thought) denounced Parnellian juice,
But stewed in it and liked it too—or so our fancy ran—
Long ere Sir William tumbled into that unsavoury pan?

Where, where is the believer, of the ripe and reasoned creed,
Not sprung, like some foul fungus, from the spawn of party greed,

The steady burden of whose song rebuked the hurried tune
Of those who found salvation in a single afternoon?

Where is the man who symbolized to figurative taste
An island in the waters, an oasis in the waste,
The one green patch of living faith, 'mid wind-blown tracts of rant,
The one firm spot of principle in quaking bogs of cant?

Where are they? gone like mists that in a moment disappear,
Like dreams when one awakeneth, like snows of yesteryear;
With H-rc-rt he has had to learn of what that "juice" consists;
His faith is hardly better than the Scotch Salvationist's.

Nor skills it, Mr. Ch-mb-rl-n, to bid us recollect
How slowly causes acted here in yielding their effect,
And how, while many a weathercock at one day's notice veers,
Our M-rl-y's revolution was the work of several years.

Scant, scant the consolation, that while others scrupled not
To eat their newly-uttered words, their pledges hot-and-hot,
Our M-rl-y interposed a decent interval, at least,
Between the preparation and consumption of the feast.

Enough that he's consumed it now, enough that he has fed
On that ignoble diet, the Gladstonian's daily bread.
How long you keep, before you eat, your food is your concern;
Convictions are convictions, though you "hang" them till they "turn."

But no! it cannot, shall not, be; it is not—that is flat;
He never said those words, believe we anything but that.
Reporters madly jotting down a speech he never spoke,
A press in league to perpetrate a vile and heartless joke.

Yes, spare us, Mr. Ch-mb-rl-n, this last illusion, pray;
Leave us the M-rl-y of our dreams—those dreams of yesterday—
The patriot pure, whose record no apostasies bedim,
The one consistent Parnellite we thought we found in him.

REVIEWS.

THE HANSE TOWNS.*

ALTHOUGH this book certainly does not tell the story of a nation, it is a welcome addition to Mr. Fisher Unwin's series. It is, as its author claims, the only History of the Hanseatic towns which has been written in English, and it gives a picturesque and satisfactory account of the famous League of merchant cities, and the influence which it exercised on the material and social progress of Northern and Western Europe. Miss Zimmern has worked up her subject carefully, and has treated it in a bright and attractive manner. Her early pages are unworthy of the rest, and contain some ambitious and feeble writing. The "wretched state of Ireland" has nothing to do with the matter in hand; and as she does not say anything more valuable about it than that it is a product of a survival of the Feudal system, she might as well have left it alone. The effect of this system in England was, we are told, to hinder the rise of the "British"—by which, we apprehend, she does not mean Welshmen—by practically restricting commerce to the exportation of wool, skins, lead, and tin, and by preventing the existence of a middle class. Her acquaintance with German town-life and commercial history is, happily, far better than this will lead her readers to expect. It is a pity that she has thought it necessary to refer to the Germania; for as she says that Tacitus notes the "absence of rank" among the Germans, it is scarcely possible that she has read it. We will not, however, dwell further on the few blots which may be found in this part of her volume. When she gets fairly into her proper subject there is little room for fault-finding, and the somewhat unfavourable impression which we received from her opening pages was soon removed by those which follow.

No precise date can be assigned to the foundation of the Hanse; it came into existence gradually, and had its origin in the desire of German merchants to defend themselves and their trade. The Leagues of the towns on the Rhine and the Baltic prepared the way for the greatness of the more famous Hanse, which seems to have first been officially known by that title at the time of its war with Waldemar III. of Denmark. For a century and a half before that war the merchant cities of Northern Germany had been growing in power, and had inflicted more than one defeat on the Danes—who, by the way, are rather oddly said here to have been converted to Christianity "in the early times of our era." By the beginning of the fourteenth century the allied towns had attained great prosperity, though the Danes, "as masters of the Belt and the Sound, were able, if they chose, to harass the Hanseatic traders and fishermen." Waldemar, who wished to drive the strangers out of his dominions, laid heavy taxes on their fisheries in Scania, and, when the towns resisted, sacked Wisby, then one of the principal ports in Europe and the storehouse of all the wealth of the Baltic trade. A spirited account is given of the war. It ended in the humiliation of the Danes and in the establishment of the supremacy of the Hanse over Scandinavia. Chief of the League was Lübeck, which then "counted eighty thousand inhabitants, as against forty-eight thousand in 1870." There, for the most part, the towns held their Diets; her influence was undisputed down to the sixteenth century, and her laws "were reckoned the wisest ever framed by an autonomous community." Little appears to be known as to the organization of the League or the number of its members. Yet it is clear that order and obedience were strictly enforced, and as the punishment of un-hansing brought ruin on the offending town there were few cases of insubordination. Miss Zimmern writes pleasantly of the life of the merchant-class in these German towns, of the riches of the burghers, their sports, which were sometimes rough and barbarous, and their love of display, of the stately buildings which they raised, and of their encouragement of learning and art. Violence and selfishness were checked by the ordinances of their guilds, which bound them to fulfil religious and social obligations, and, above all, to relieve their poorer brethren. The trade of the League was widespread and various, for it carried and dealt in the produce of every land in Europe:—

* The Story of the Nations—The Hansa Towns. By Helen Zimmern. Author of "A Life of Lessing" &c. London: T. Fisher Unwin; New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1889.

What the German merchant obtained as produce from Russia, Scandinavia, and other parts of Europe, not to mention the special productions of his own towns, he distributed either at home or in the world-famed markets of Bruges and London, for the Hansa was then the only intermediary between East and West. For more than three hundred years Bruges maintained its place as the central market for the whole of Europe this side the Alps. Here could be met traders from all parts; the Lombard bankers and money-changers, the Florentine, Spanish, Portuguese, French, Basque, English, Scotch, North and South Germans. It was from Bruges that the Baltic merchant supplied his home and Northern Germany with the products of the East, which the South German had brought from Venice and over the Alpine passes along the Rhine. In Bruges he could buy the fruits of the Mediterranean, the silks of Florence, the oils of Provence, the wines of Spain and Italy.—P. 100.

Some interesting particulars are given about the factories of the League in different cities. At Bergen the Hanseatics held the entire control of the port and exercised a practical suzerainty over the town. Novgorod "the Great," where they treated the Russians with contempt, was one of the most important seats of their trade until their power in Russia was brought to a sudden end by Ivan the Terrible. In the Flemish cities they enjoyed extensive privileges and lived more securely and in greater luxury than they could among the less civilized peoples of the North. In Venice they were subject to many restrictions which they would not have endured if imposed by a Northern State; they had no regular factory there, and the graceful colonnade of the Fondaco dei Tedeschi still marks the place where the Venetians allowed them only at stated times to store their merchandise. Miss Zimmern has much to say that is well worth reading about the relations between England and the Easterlings, as the Hanseatic merchants were called here, and indeed in France also; the name, of course, survives in our phrase sterling money. The factory in London, the Steelyard, became, as she reminds us, a favourite resort of the citizens, who used to sit in the Germans' pleasant garden in Cosin's Lane and drink Rhenish wine at threepence a bottle. In the Steelyard, as in their other settlements, the Hanseatics lived as the members of a single household; they were governed by their own officers, were under strict discipline, and were forbidden to marry during their residence in the factory. Besides their establishment in London they had depôts in several other English cities. Their privileges were guaranteed in the reign of Edward IV. by the Treaty of Utrecht. This treaty was the result of a long war between England and the Hanse Towns, in the course of which the Easterlings did much damage to English trade, seized many ships, and even plundered some parts of the coast. Miss Zimmern omits to mention that they chased and nearly captured Edward IV. when he was fleeing from England in 1470.

As the rise of the League was gradual, so was its decay. Its fall cannot be referred to any single date, for Miss Zimmern rightly rejects the picturesque story of a formal dissolution decreed in the Lübeck Hansa Saal in 1630 by the representatives of all the members. The manifold causes of its decline are well brought out. The Hanse Towns had no manufactures; they devoted all their energies to carrying and trading, and their prosperity was founded on excluding all others from sharing in the sources of their wealth. When, therefore, the conditions of mediæval commerce gave way before the wider system of the sixteenth century, and the maritime States of Northern and Western Europe began to find out new routes for trade, and to send out their own ships into all waters, the fall of the League became certain. In England, for example, the overthrow of its factory was the direct consequence of the opening of trade with Russia by the White Sea, and of the foundation of the Company of Merchant Adventurers, which, in accordance with the suggestions of Sir Thomas Gresham, repeatedly urged the expulsion of the alien merchants. Special causes—first, the damage done to Bruges by Frederick III., and, later, the revolt of the Netherlands from Spain—hastened the decline of its trade in the Low Countries. Sweden and Denmark broke the yoke which the Hanseatics had so long imposed upon them, and the conquest and partition of Livonia destroyed their power in the Baltic. Internal jealousies also did much to ensure the downfall of the League. The interests of the maritime and the inland towns were not always the same, and the want of concord between the members of the Hanse was the chief cause of its ill success in its strife with the Danes and Swedes. The incidents of this war are told with much force. It followed shortly after a series of brilliant successes, during which the League drove Christian II. of Denmark from his kingdom, and set Frederick of Schleswig-Holstein and Gustavus Vasa on the thrones of Denmark and Sweden. The two Kings turned against their benefactors, and determined to deliver their lands from the oppression of the Hanse. Miss Zimmern records the gallant attempt of Jürgen Wullenweber of Lübeck, "the last great Hanseatic hero," to restore the power of the League in the North. His captain was Max Meyer, a blacksmith by trade, who had left his forge to become a soldier of fortune, had done some service in a war with the Spanish Netherlands, and had been knighted by Henry VIII. The forces of the League were defeated, and Wullenweber's fall was brought about by local, religious, and class jealousies. His plans were thwarted by Cologne and censured by the Diet, and his power in Lübeck was destroyed by a municipal revolution. As a Lutheran he was obnoxious to the Catholics, who accused him of being an Anabaptist; and, as a Democrat, he was hated by the burgher aristocracy. He fell into the hands of his enemies, and, after suffering a long imprisonment and many tortures, was put to death by his fellow-citizens. Miss Zimmern's volume is appropriately illustrated with views of some of the noblest municipal buildings in the ancient Hanseatic towns, and with some quaint drawings exhibiting the manners and occupations of the German trading class in the middle ages.

NOVELS.*

WILD DARRIE was a circus-rider of the greatest skill. She married a yeoman called Andrew Deering, and had a child called Ada. She then ran away with a thief called Tricky Bill; and, being concerned with him in a theft of banknotes, they both got penal servitude. The point of the book is how Mr. and Mrs. Deering are to be reconciled. Ada Deering has become engaged to one Griffith Broadhurst; but Tricky Bill, by chance having Mrs. Deering in his company, steals one of the wedding presents. Mrs. Deering assists in his capture; but her reappearance causes Ada's wedding to be postponed for a year, and causes Deering to emigrate to Kansas with Mrs. Deering, disguised under her maiden name as a poor relation, and Ada. Here a dashing cowboy proposes to Ada, but is refused. Griffith Broadhurst, appearing at the end of his year, is duly married, and immediately finds gold on his father-in-law's farm, but it is found on the next night by Tricky Bill, who has come with four desperate ruffians to find it. They, however, are detected finding it by Mrs. Deering, who heard Tricky Bill shouting in a wood, and came to look for him. She also sees a half-breed come up to the ruffians to say that the Indians are out, and that he is going to warn Deering. Tricky Bill shoots the half-breed to prevent him doing so, and Mrs. Deering sets the forest alight to stop the Indians. However, she all but burns herself and the cowboy, Abe Hooker, who has come to look for her, and eventually, in escaping from the flames, falls down a precipice and is supposed to have died. She does not go back to Deering because he has not forgiven her, but joins her old circus, which she meets on its way round the world. With the circus she at last arrives at the village in England where Deering is, with his daughter and son-in-law, entertaining Abe Hooker in a noble mansion bought with the gold. Here she casually meets her granddaughter, who shows her her own tombstone with a pathetic inscription. She faints, and soon dies of consumption, which she has had for a long time, in her husband's house, he having forgiven her. As may thus be seen, there are many thrilling incidents in the book, and they are all well told. Unfortunately the solemn part of the book is not only solemn, but of disproportionate length. We should well have liked to have heard more of the circus, of which there is a little, and of Abe Hooker, of whom there is more. As to Tricky Bill, he and his companions were caught by the Indians. One was shot, the others "lasted a month or two, and when it was plain they could not last any longer they were finished."

The Red Hill Mystery is an ingenuous, not to say a crude, work. When a young lady, who has had a sister called Madoline, who has disappeared in a mysterious way, comes to a house, in the garden of which there is a disused well, partly filled up, we hardly need a haunted room, and a ghost of the old-fashioned and orthodox kind, to make us sensible that the mystery is progressing as it should. When, too, there is a

* Wild Darrie. By Christie Murray and Henry Herman. London and New York: Longmans, Green, & Co. 1889.

The Red Hill Mystery. By Kate Wood. London: Digby & Long.

A Ruined Race. By Hester Sigerson. London: Ward & Downey. 1889.

Such is Life. By May Kendall. London and New York: Longmans, Green, & Co. 1889.

swarthy baronet with restless and furtive eyes, and a ghastly scar on his cheek, over whose countenance passes a look of "surprise, horror, and sickly fear," the terrible things which afterwards come to light may shock but can hardly surprise us. What the mystery actually is, wild horses could not tear from us. But it may be well to point out that halting English does not heighten its effect. To the question, "Am I brushing your hair too hard?" the sentence, "I assured her, 'No'; being so thick I hardly felt the brush," is not the right answer. A lady may be excused for not knowing the difference between oratio recta and oratio obliqua, under those names, but she should avoid mistakes with inverted commas, such as Mr. Stanley "asked in a low anxious voice, 'Could I forgive him?'" when really he said, "Can you forgive me?" The heroine should not have expected her hair to "lay" flat; and her sister's story, though very mysterious, cannot have been really "incredulous."

A Ruined Race is the tragic story of one Dan Macmanus. He was an Irish tenant, and was duly made the victim of every form of oppression ever imputed to landlordism. In the first place, his father, who brought up his family on a sixty-acre farm, naturally divided it between his two sons, so that Dan only got two fields which were flooded in wet weather, and two which he had reclaimed himself on the mountain side. On the strength of these possessions he married, but after three children had been born he had to part with the two reclaimed fields, and after three wet seasons with the flooded ones. After this, owing to the proceedings of a spendthrift landlord, a harsh agent, and a malignant bailiff, he was evicted from the cabin to which he had been forced to retire. Having assaulted the bailiff he got sent to gaol for nine months, and his wife went mad and died in the infirmary workhouse. He subsequently died miserably in Dublin. To make Dan's character complete, he was the descendant of a noble family, who owned all the property in the neighbourhood of his original farm, which they lost, indirectly owing to the Penal Laws and more directly to a flaw in a perpetual lease. This, however, is merely a detail, for which his landlord can only be held to have been remotely responsible. The story is told with a good deal of imaginative power, especially the death of Dan's last remaining daughter, though the agony is rather prolonged. It is, however, too much of a quasi-political tract to afford a proper scope for the literary powers of the author. It is to be observed that Macmanus lived and died before 1870. The author, however, seems to doubt whether legislation which has taken place since then will not produce changes "only of form, and not of fact." This is rather hard on Mrs. Gladstone, to whom the book is dedicated.

There were two families of Everards—Halbert, Jim, and Elsie in one family, and their cousin Ida in another. They were all "great souls," or wished to be. So they all turned Agnostics at about twelve, except Elsie, who thought that she need not have any opinions until she was sixteen. Halbert and Jim had warm tempers, and never concealed their thoughts. Halbert used to tell Jim that he hated him, and wished he was dead, to which Jim replied with an ego quoque. Halbert told his mother that he would not pray for his father, because he hated him, on which his mother let him off his prayers. But he made it up afterwards, saying, "Mother, I shall, perhaps, try to get over my dislike of father; I think it may be a prejudice." Ida was an idealist who "did not know, and probably never would, the difference between a passing thunder-cloud and nightfall." However, she had some indefinite "woes," on which she mused. These agreeable and intelligent young persons grew up without doing anything more exciting than going to parties which they disliked, and talking in an intelligent way. Then Jim married Lilian Rivers, an old schoolmistress of Ida's. Ida used to think she was "a great soul," but really "she was saving all to be a great soul in the next world," so Jim's relations were greatly disgusted at the match. Another objection was that he was in love with Nan Thomson, an old schoolfellow of Ida's, who had become a hospital nurse. However, he married Lilian, and we hear no more of Nan, which is a pity, as she is much the most amusing person in the book. As a poetic compensation Ida fell in love with Lionel Blake, an old schoolfellow of Jim's and an artist who soon became famous. However, she did not marry him either, because he found out that his real name was Evans, and that he was the son of a man who drew pictures on the pavement, and who died a natural death after a coroner's jury had found an inquisition against him for murder. Lionel was so much annoyed at this that he went off to America, but was drowned on the way, where he laid down his life "like a courteous English gentleman, and so went down with the captain on deck." The only amusing parts of the book are where Jim falls in love with Nan in the hospital, and where Lionel nearly dies of starvation because he is too proud to ask for money which a man owed him for a picture. Otherwise, the young persons concerned indulged freely in the habit which Ida imputes to Lilian of "saying things which sounded lovely, but that did not exactly mean anything."

TIMBER AND SOME OF ITS DISEASES.*

FORESTRY is a craft which is well worthy of far more attention than it has hitherto received. The combination of utility with beauty in the cultivation of trees is hardly to be matched by any other pursuit to which man has devoted himself. We were all foresters, more or less, in the earliest days, and must have both acquired and inherited a great love of trees from the beginning, however far off that may have been in point of time. The living tree was our protection and the harbour for our game when we were nothing but hunters, and the dead tree gave us the wood on which we first practised the arts. The beauty of the tree is one thing, and the beauty of the timber, from which so many beautiful works of art are made, is altogether another thing, and it is a mere platitude to say that without the beauty of the one the beauty of the other would be non-existent. The primeval forests throughout the world have afforded us timber of all sorts in almost unlimited quantity, and so far we have had nothing to do but to cut it down, and use each variety of wood for the purpose for which it appeared to us to be best adapted. But there must be an end to all this reckless way of going to work some day, and forestry must be pursued as an art and a science.

The book before us is a short work of the Nature Series, and, therefore, scientific, but scientific with a practical end in view. Mr. Ward, the author, is a professor of botany, and has directed his attention to the botany of trees, but more especially, in this instance, to the growth of timber in the first place, and the diseases of trees, which injuriously affect the timber, in the second place. It is a very useful and welcome contribution to an important branch of forestry in a handy form, and, as the author says in the preface, "it is an attempt at a popular exposition of a subject almost unknown in this country." That it should be almost unknown in this country, where so much planting has been done for purposes of ornament, or for covert for game, or to occupy waste land, where the English oak grows and flourishes, from which we used to build our renowned navy, is surprising. Mr. Ward quotes the Germans, and refers to the museum of forest botany at Munich, for his authorities, the study of the subject in this country having only just begun. The illustrations in the book are from drawings explanatory of the text, and fulfil that purpose clearly and accurately. The structure of timber is described in detail. The cortex is "more popularly the 'bark' (an unfortunate word, which has caused much trouble in its time)." Technical terms are used, and we must refer to the book for an explanation of the words cambium, tracheides, &c. The "so-called" annual rings in timber, to which Mr. Ward refers, are, in truth, annual rings caused by the year's growth; there is, therefore, no good reason why the fashionable participle so-called should be applied to them. They are formed from the cambium, the visible rings marking the periods of activity and inactivity in winter and summer. In some wood the rings are not visible, and in the tropics timber without the annual rings is most common, because the seasons of growth are not separated by seasons of rest. In this climate there is a difference in the formation of spring wood and autumn wood, of which the autumn wood is the superior in quality. "Very many woods, as is well known, exhibit marked peculiarities in their inner or 'heart-wood'—the duramen of botanists—which is harder, or heavier, or of some decided colour, and constitutes a true 'heart-wood,' as contrasted with the softer, lighter, non-coloured 'sap-wood' (alburnum): in other cases no obvious differences are to be noticed, and the tree is said to have no 'heart,' but to consist entirely of 'sap-wood.'"—P. 41. The weight of wood, as we all know, differs much. The seasoned timber of the Indian tree, Hardwickia binata, weighs about 80 lbs. the cubic foot, while a cubic foot of Bombax malabaricum may weigh less than 20 lbs. Generally speaking, wood may be said to weigh 30 lbs. to 60 lbs. the cubic foot. The principal timber trees are botanically classed as conifers and dicotyledons, and it is hardly necessary to point out which is which; the yew and the juniper are classed with the conifers. There has been a great controversy respecting the ascent of water in tall trees. How is it that water can rise from the roots to the top of trees 300 to 400 feet high? A long chapter, chapter iv., is devoted to this subject, and the author gives the explanation, which seems to him the only possible one. It may not occur to the ordinary observer that the ascent of water from the roots to the top shoot of a lofty tree has been a puzzle to learned men, but such is the case; and the various theories advanced to account for this phenomenon in the formation of wood are expounded, and refuted or supported as the case may be, in this chapter.

The latter half of the book treats of the diseases of trees, which, it is superfluous to say, damage the timber to a considerable extent, and cause much waste. These consist chiefly of fungus parasites, which attach themselves to a wound in the tree, and, under favourable conditions of moisture, &c., grow and spread. The principal destructive fungi mentioned are Trametes radiciperda, Agaricus melleus, Polyporus sulphureus, with some others. The second of these is a tawny yellow toadstool, very common in this country, and is often supposed to be simply springing from the dead, rotten wood, instead of being the cause of the fatal disease. The book itself must be consulted for full information on these subjects, so important to foresters, who in lopping off branches, or in examining the injuries caused by gales of wind or snow, will do well to take means to prevent the establishment of fungi in the injured parts. Many a goodly tree is found, when felled, to be rotten at the core from the insidious operations of a parasitic fungus. Dry rot is of two kinds, caused by fungi. The most common and well known is Merulius lacrymans, the other is the Polyporus vaporarius, common in forests, which is a wound parasite. Dry-rot has been so long a plague to builders or rather, perhaps, to the employers of builders, that it is wonderful the means of prevention here pointed out are not more universally employed. Mr. Ward says of dry-rot:—"The spores are developed in countless myriads from the fructifications described, and they are extremely minute and light; it has been proved that they can be carried from house to house on the clothes and tools &c. of workmen. . . . Hartig proved that the spores can be carried from the wood of one building to that of another by means of the saws of workmen" (p. 189).

* Timber and some of its Diseases. By H. Marshall Ward, M.A., F.R.S., F.L.S. With illustrations. Nature Series. London: Macmillan & Co.

"Canker" and the larch disease have a chapter, x., to themselves. Mr. Ward only just alludes to canker in apple-trees, which, as it is a plague to gardeners, is disappointing; but enlarges on the larch disease, "which has caused such costly devastations in plantations." The larch, a most valuable tree, in consequence of the unusual combinations of rapid growth and durability, is an Alpine tree, growing naturally at an elevation of from 3,000 to 6,000 feet and more, above sea level. And to its cultivation in lowland valleys is attributed the larch disease, which is a "canker" and a fungus readily communicated from tree to tree. Mr. Ward always writes "canker" thus, not approving of the name, which, he says, is derived by analogy from cancer with no warrant in fact.

There are interesting chapters on leaves and leaf diseases which every one knows must be of the greatest importance in the formation of timber. There are also chapters on the "damping off" of seedlings due to the ravages of fungi, a source of great vexation to the nurseryman. For these we must refer the reader to the book, which is a very good and instructive introduction to a branch of forestry, a pursuit which, we trust, has a great future before it. The book is small, compact, and businesslike, and is furnished with a good index.

OXFORD SCHOLARSHIP.*

WITHIN the last few months three volumes have been issued from the Clarendon Press at Oxford, each of which is in itself important, and each by itself sufficient to wipe away the reproach of sterility which has been so often and too justly charged against the refined taste and deep erudition of many Oxford scholars. Two of these volumes are entirely new, and the other is an old friend in a new shape. Before we discuss the works of Professor Henry Nettleship and Mr. Sydney Owen it will be pleasant and convenient to clear the ground before us by dealing shortly with the second edition of Mr. Robinson Ellis's Commentary on Catullus. More than twelve years have passed since the first edition saw the light, and more than thirty since the author first devoted himself to a department of Latin scholarship which to a less considerable scholar would have been the labour of a lifetime. But in the interval which has passed between the first and second editions Mr. Ellis has exercised his powers on other texts, and it might have been supposed that he had put Catullus aside as an author on whom he had spoken his last word. But a good many things have happened since 1876; a good many criticisms were passed, in England and on the Continent, most of them laudatory, but not all of them acquiescent, and one of them manifestly unfair. Of these the fairest and also the most important was the Criticisms and Elucidations of H. A. J. Munro, and at many places it has left its impress on the second edition of Mr. Ellis's Commentary; in every case Munro's views have been carefully considered, and sometimes adopted, although Mr. Ellis, in gently putting aside the emendations (which form "the least able portion" of Munro's volume), hints a mild surprise that he has so often dissented from Munro's conclusions, "even on points of syntax, where he might be expected to speak with absolute authority." Of the Commentary of Bährens Mr. Ellis evidently finds it difficult to write with the moderation which has characterized most of the disputes between modern scholars. "Any one [he says] who takes the trouble to examine this work will see how greatly the author is indebted to my pages, and how little acknowledgment he has made of his debts." Then he goes on:—"If he mentions my name, it is more often to depreciate than to praise. His own commentary is lengthy and not too attractive in style; crowded, too, with impossible emendations which waste many pages and much time." Of Riese Mr. Ellis speaks with considerable appreciation; so, again, of Eugène Benoist, whose edition (only half completed) "follows me so very closely that it might almost seem a reproduction of my own work in the French language." Some points of fresh interest were brought out last year in the Tauchnitz edition by Bernhard Schmitz. All these books, either in form or in effect, were partially at least criticisms of Mr. Robinson Ellis's original work, and in the second edition it has been necessary to take account of everything in them which was noteworthy. To enumerate even a small proportion of the changes introduced, the notes enlarged or revised, and the supplementary remarks, added would make a long article, nor would it be interesting except to one who was far advanced in Catullian scholarship. It is enough to say that anybody able to appreciate the first edition ought to buy the second. One special point in the new volume is mentioned in the preface; it recalls the attention of scholars to the earliest period of Catullian criticism, when so much was done that was ignored by later scholars, so much that has been restored to its proper place by the Catullian revival in which Mr. Ellis was himself a leader.

Not contented with these important and laborious Contributions to Latin Lexicography, Professor Henry Nettleship, in a melancholy preface, laments that he has not been able to make them much greater than they are. Indeed, he has some reason to feel aggrieved, not against anybody in particular, but against everybody in general—everybody, that is to say, who might have assisted him but has not done so. Some fourteen years ago he was invited by the delegates of the Oxford University Press and undertook (with a light heart, apparently) to compile a Latin-English Lexicon fit to stand alongside of Liddell and Scott. He has been working at his task for some twelve years, and has now completed not much more than a tenth part of it. He had counted, in his sanguine youth, upon receiving adequate assistance from other scholars; but he tells us that, except for "some isolated contributions from friends," the work has been left to him alone, and he could not carry it out by himself. Accordingly, he has now published as much as he has been able to finish—the whole of letter A and a number of articles and notes under the other letters, making altogether a bulky volume of some 600 pages, each of which represents an amount of tedious labour difficult to realize by anybody who has not taken a part in it. Professor Nettleship tells us that he made Lewis and Short the basis of his projected Lexicon, and has published nothing which he does not think to be "a necessary improvement upon that work." One great convenience, which we hope to see adopted by any scholars who may carry on Professor Nettleship's work, is his careful arrangement of the authors referred to under each head of interpretation according to their chronological order. That by itself is a great help towards grasping the gradual developments of usage, either towards extension or restriction. Other noticeable points in Professor Nettleship's Contributions are the number of Proper Names which he has collected from the Corpus Inscriptionum, and the care which he has taken to bring up all that was worth saving from the remains of the early Latin scholars, lexicographers, or commentators. A book like this can only be reviewed by sample, unless the reviewer is both willing and able to spend as much time in testing it as the author in writing it. But, so far as we have tried Professor Nettleship's arrangements of the articles under letter A, we have only found a single case of displacement or omission. On looking for arcesso at its natural place, on p. 264, next after arcessitor, we do not find it, or any reference to it. We have to go back to p. 17, where it is printed next after accerso, and next before accessa. Again, when so much in lexicography proper has been omitted which we should have been glad to see accomplished, it seems a pity that Professor Nettleship should have devoted ten of his learned pages, under the head of Jus Gentium, to an article which would have better found its place in a legal treatise. Professor Nettleship laments that he enjoys "but little time for keeping abreast with the advances in method made by the new school of comparative philologists." He fully recognizes the value of their work, but has not been able to avail himself of it in the etymologies which he has himself suggested. Indeed, as he tells us quite frankly, he has generally based any new hypothesis, not upon the "rigid laws" which govern the changes of sound and accent, but upon considerations affecting the meaning and usage of a word. Many of these new hypotheses are ingenious, and some are evidently sound; none of them are frivolous, although some are difficult to accept, even for those who have not been trained in the rigidities of the New School. We must content ourselves with shortly indicating a few of the new views which Professor Nettleship claims to have put forward. He dismisses, of course, s.v. Adulter, the absurd etymology from ad and altar; argues that the second syllable ul is verbal; proves that the different usages point to an idea of "corruption," and therefore conjectures as the origin a base ol or ul, "which perhaps meant originally to wet or spoil with moisture (comp. ab-ol-ere)." The form of the word, he adds, is "exactly like that of cul-ter, literally the striker." Under Armentum he first suggests the commonly accepted derivation from aro, but seems to prefer an alternative origin which connects it with words like ar-tis and ar-ma, as coming from ar-, to join or fit; in this sense armentum would mean a beast that can be fitted or joined either to a plough or another animal. Under Cærimonia he rejects the ancient derivations (cære, caritas, and carere); he does not favour the modern suggestions that it is connected with kar (to make), ceres, cerus, and creare; finally he prefers to connect it with the base kū (to think), kav-is (a wise man), κοῖν, cavere and cura. Thus he makes it to stand for cav-i-ri-mōnia, and like agri-monia it would then be an abstr. f. from a lost participle adj., caviri-mon = thoughtful or wise. Under Recens Professor Nettleship agrees with Darmesteter that the word is a present participle, but holds that the lost verb is not recere = to come back; but recere = to flow, "the base of which stands to rig- of rig-are as that of plec-sus does to that of pli-care. Thus, Cat. 63. 7 (recente sanguine)

* A Commentary on Catullus. By Robinson Ellis, M.A., LL.D., Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, University Reader in Latin Literature. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 1889.

Contributions to Latin Lexicography. By Henry Nettleship, M.A., Corpus Professor of Latin in the University of Oxford. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 1889.

P. Ovidi Nasonis Tristium Libri V. Recensuit S. G. Owen, A.M. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 1889.

is explained "flowing blood," and Virg. A. 6. 674 (prata recentia rivis) "as watered by streams," and 6. 450 (recens a vulnere Dido) "with the blood flowing from her wound." For the idea of freshness which seems to be attached to most of the uses of the word, Professor Nettleship accounts by deriving it from freshness in plants, "which implies moisture." That is hardly satisfactory. But there is more plausibility in the quotation from the scholia on Lucan, 2. 123 (festæ rorantia mensæ Imposuit) where rorantia is explained as recentia. These few specimens which we have quoted may give some idea of one aspect of one side of Professor Nettleship's recent work in Latin Lexicography. Really there is no fault to find with his Contributions, except that they are too few, although they are many for one man to have made in a dozen years. Is there any hope that the publication of this volume will arouse other scholars in Oxford or elsewhere to collaborate with Professor Nettleship in a work which is crying aloud for somebody to undertake it?

It is not easy to speak too highly of the acute and laborious work done by a young scholar like Mr. Owen in his edition of the text of the Tristia. But he has not only been acute and laborious; he has been exceptionally lucky, and has made haste to share his good fortune with his brother scholars. During his work in the Bodleian Library he lighted upon a codex of the highest value and he has made the fullest use of it. But let him tell his own tale in his own enthusiastic Latin:—"Sed ecce res præclara . . . ipsa editio Parmensis a. 1477 collationibus et adnotationibus ipsius Politiani manu instructa felici quodam casu mihi oblata est." The Bodleian copy turned out to be the very one which had been kept at the beginning of the century in the Laurentian Library—unde quomodo exulaverit incertum est. Let us not be too curious as to the adventures by which it found its way to the hands of Bodley's librarian. Let us be content that it fell into Mr. Owen's. Its history is unknown. "Illud autem solum constat hoc exemplar pretiosum a curatoribus bibliothecæ Bodleianæ a. 1833 emptum esse vendentibus bibliopolis Londiniensibus Paynio et Fossio septuaginta duobus et semissis aureis." It appears that Politian had by him two codices which have since been lost, one (Marcianus A), which Mr. Owen assigns to the eleventh century, and another (Mediceus δ), which was more recent, and which may be conjecturally attributed to the thirteenth century. Where Politian makes no remark, Mr. Owen assumes that these two codices were in agreement both with each other and with the printed text. It is not possible to indicate here the use which Mr. Owen has made of his exceptional advantages, or to state even in outline his theory of the relations between the different classes of codices. It is enough to say that he has done much, although he has left much more to be done by himself or his successors, towards establishing the text of the Tristia. By the liberality of the University Press he has been enabled to increase the value of his book by two beautiful reproductions—one of the first page of the Codex Laurentianus and the other of the first page of the Codex Tyronensis. It may be interesting to notice that with the conservatism of a true scholar Mr. Owen defends the traditional title of the work to which he has devoted so much labour. He states the objection candidly enough:—"Illud autem admirabile mihi semper visum est, adjectivum nude positum inscriptionis loco stare." He points out that "Tristia" is not analogous to such titles as the Greek ἑρωτικά and γεωργικά or the Latin Punica or ruralia. "Cum omnia sint adjectiva a substantivis derivata, substantivorum munere ultro funguntur." For an explanation of the difficult and perhaps doubtful title he goes to Callimachus, who was to Ovid as well as to Propertius both a model and a master. He recollects a familiar passage in Suidas, in which the works of Callimachus are enumerated, last in the list being Μέλη, Ἰβίς, κ.τ.λ.—an enumeration which has excited the wrath of Schneider (id quod Schneidero maximæ offensioni est). But Mr. Owen suggests "non μέλη sed μέλαι ἴτα legendum ut μέλαι Græce idem quod tristia Latine valeat." By this conjecture Mr. Owen is able at once to explain a familiar title which he would have been unwilling to give up, and to vindicate the reputation of Suidas—both of them laudable and pious objects.

NOVELS.*

MR. B. L. FARJEON is clever in describing crime, in leading his readers on from one palpitating horror to another. Murder creeps with cunning step through his pages; ghostly whispers, ghostly horrors strike terror to the imaginative mind;

* A Young Girl's Life. By B. L. Farjeon. 3 vols. London: Ward & Downey.

Roger Ferron. By Katharine S. Macquoid. 2 vols. London: Ward & Downey.

Feet of Clay. By Amelia E. Barr. London: James Clark & Co.

A Dash of Bitter. By Deane Hilton. London: Swan Sonnenschein & Co.

Pharaoh's Daughter: a Story of the Ages. By Edgar Lee. Bristol: Arrowsmith.

Trollope's Dilemma: a Story of a Cambridge Quad. By St. Aubyn. Bristol: Arrowsmith.

Miss Davis of Brooklyn. By Wenona Gilman. London: George Routledge & Sons.

the lights burn more dimly, and a throbbing fear of the "big dark" comes with the closing of the second volume. A gleam of hope is permitted, however, early in the third volume, and we do feel confident that the agony, though it is piled up high as Haman, will fall away at last and the lover and his lass will be happily married. But for this sure hope it would be impossible to endure the long chronicle of sickening cruelty to a child which we have before us in A Young Girl's Life. We are bound to say that it is a most unpleasant and unprofitable book, although fascinating with the fascination of horror. It deals with the fortunes of Evelina Durham, whose parents died when the said Evelina was ten years old. The little orphan was a considerable heiress, and was left by her father's will to the care of two guardians, who in their turn placed her in charge of her aunt, Mrs. Parker. This fiendish woman conceives the idea of driving the child mad that she may retain the charge of her and the consequent income, and through long years a system of cruel bullying is carried out. This part of the story, though disagreeable, is well told—the lighter, and what should be the sympathetic parts, are badly told. There is a marked inconsistency between the way in which the child writes and speaks. We cannot feel any great sympathy with a young lady of fourteen who has a mild flirtation with the butcher's boy, even though the butcher's boy eventually takes to literature and makes a success in penny-dreadfuls. The virtuous nurse and her worthy brother, the grocer, are suitable characters for the transpontine stage, and in our mind's eye we see the hat lifted for the gallery sentiment; but such people are not met with in real life, and in these days a so-called modern novel must be truthfully descriptive to be interesting. This is certainly not the best thing we have ever read from Mr. Farjeon's pen.

Roger Ferron; and other Stories, have been mostly, if not all, reprinted from various magazines. With one exception they are all mildly interesting, gracefully written little stories, very improving in their sentiments, and quite harmless. We said "with one exception," and we joyfully except the story of "The Ratcatcher of Hameln," under which title we recognize our old and well-beloved friend, the Pied Piper. Always new, though so old, always fascinating, though so familiar, comes the sound of that pipe; the children turn from their play to listen, and the hearts of the old dance to the wilful tempting tune. It is not possible to judge quite dispassionately of this story as written by Mrs. Macquoid. A stronger voice than hers has spoken, and the echo is still in our ears, so that we must needs love the new story for the old sake's sake! Roger Ferron is a faithful picture of the vie bourgeoise in a small town in Northern France, and as such must be valuable, however slight is the sketch. We know too little in England of the simple life of our French neighbours of the middle class, which nevertheless closely resembles our own in many respects, though possibly we have more pretension and less comfort. "Success" is the best of this collection of stories, and reminds us more of the author of Patty than anything else in the book; there is more of the old pathos, the fine touches which tell so much, and the individuality of character which we look for from her pen. Indeed, the German stories are throughout much the best, and all are good, if not powerful.

Let those who dislike a dialect avoid this book; for its principal charm lies in the quaint sayings and the native idiom of the fisher folk of the Isle of Man. To many people the independent "little island" is untrodden ground, and yet it must surely be a lovely land and well worth the visiting if, as Mrs. Barr tells us, "in the Isle of Man it is permitted that mortals shall find in reality the intensely green verdure, the wonderful flowers, the clear air, the charmed stillness of their visions—a stillness only intensified by the everlasting murmur of the ocean, which vibrates through them like the pulse of life." True, this was half a century ago, and so many places which were quiet and lovely then are so no longer. Cavalry officers nowadays do not walk about when on leave in the country in full uniform; but they did do it then, according to Mrs. Barr. Much more wonderful things happened then. Plover's eggs were to be found when the "laburnums were dropping flowers of gold and the fuchsia hedges were a glorious wonder of scarlet and purple bells; the subtle woody smell of wallflowers enthralled the senses; white lilies lighted up the pansy beds." It is a sweet picture, and it is sad to remember that plover's eggs are found in the early spring, and that laburnums and fuchsias are never in flower together nor at that time of year. We presume that George Pennington is the idol whose feet were clay, and we consider that he is most leniently treated in being so described, seeing that he has every vice, and no virtue except good looks. Mrs. Barr is at her best when she writes of the people, and one choice passage we must quote—Bella Clucas's father speaks:—

"Listen, Bella, my lass. You'll be givin' no encouragement to the like of Captain Pennington; a poor scamp he is. I'm thinkin' little of him, spite of his nice ways—bad at the core, and fond of sin, and takin' his full of it—and nothin' at all in him for you to be trustin' to—and a stranger, and nobody knowin' anythin' of the men afore him—and not religious, nor even the make-believe of it—aw, a bad lot, and plannin' and schemin', and never straight on all sides."

"Aw, then, who is straight on all sides, father?"

"I am plumb straight; and so is your brother Gale; allis sayin' the thing we mane and doing the thing that's right."

"Chut, father; I'm never seein' the man yet who hadn' a fault—"

'Ould David's son

The wise he was, and put in the Bible
For the wise he was; but unfortnit li'ble

To women, and that's the way it is
There isn't one of us hasn't a list
To port or starboard.

Aw, bless me, faults enough in all of us!"

Bella Clucas is a charming, well-drawn character, and there is nothing unusual in the fact that she is fascinated by a worthless scamp. The dénouement is well imagined, and not conventional. With many faults, the book has many virtues.

We are told that A Dash of Bitter is a temperance story, and it may be very satisfactory and comforting to the earnest votaries of the Blue Ribbon to read of the awful fate of the young man who mingled "bitter" with soda-water, and forthwith perished—morally! It is good also for the water-drinkers to hear and believe that a course of aqua pura will develop all the physical qualities, and that a young man so treated will, with little instruction and less practice, become perforce a splendid cricketer, runner, jumper, boxer, and cyclist, even if he cannot make a living by his pen, and proves himself to be in every other walk of life "nine distinct sorts of a born fool." We presume this book was written with the object of convincing erring mortals of the value of temperance, or rather of total abstinence, for there is nothing temperate in its pages; but no reasonable being is likely to be moved by a statement so entirely onesided and absurd. Every man who, in the refined language of the author, "tastes," is, or becomes, a drunkard and a scoundrel, and the only woman who so far forgets herself is depicted as a very unpleasant person. The description of her married life will serve as a specimen of the general style of Mr. Deane Hilton's composition:—

The gallant Fallow married Rosalind in due course, but they did not get on very well. He would devote himself to the turf, and associate with a loud, fast set—a set which his wife, who liked to mix with people of genius, despised, and this led to friction. Her temper did not improve, for she was disappointed in her marriage—it had not brought her half the social distinction she had expected. When she was sarcastic, her husband answered not again, but drank copiously till he made a beast of himself. Gradually they drifted apart, and led a miserable life, each having a contempt for the other's pursuits.

Nothing but disgust can be aroused by this miserable attempt at writing, and the Band of Hope must surely feel something akin to despair when their cause is pleaded by such a damaging advocate.

This is that Daughter of Pharaoh who picked Moses out of the bulrushes, although by the showing of her chronicler, Mr. Edgar Lee, she cannot possibly be the same illustrious lady who caused that son of Israel to be instructed in the wisdom of the Egyptians. We do not wish to be hypercritical, and will overlook this discrepancy. The name of this Princess was Zillah, and we are introduced to her in company with her husband Hilmy at the Derby, where the author makes their acquaintance and earns their eternal gratitude, love, and confidence by rescuing them from a band of infuriated "nigger minstrels." Hilmy does not speak English well, but is found to be quite at home in French. We are further convinced of this by hearing that he says he is "ennuyant," when he wishes to say he is bored, and by learning that he habitually sinks into a luxurious velvet rocking "fauteuil," and that he has been enclosed in "buttressed muraillements." In such a language, which is perhaps not exactly French, he held converse with the author, and eventually confided to him a manuscript which contains the history of his life and love. At this point we discovered for the first time that this book was intended to be serious, and quite seriously we are told that Zillah and Hilmy, having been unhappy in their loves in the days of Moses, drank deep of a certain drug known to an ancient Saga, and sank to sleep in the Catacombs. Proper means were adopted to have Hilmy awakened by the administering of other drugs when he had had a comfortable sleep for some hundreds of years, and from that time forward he played the part of a peripatetic Jack-in-the-box through the ages, waiting for a century good and pure enough to waken Zillah in. The early history of Zillah does not appear of a nature to necessitate such stringent precautions. She had no scruples about telling a useful lie, nor about taking all the jewels she could find to be buried with her in the Catacombs; where, by-the-bye, they throve wonderfully, for being planted jewels they grew into millions, and by their aid Hilmy created quite a sensation at the Court of Solomon, ransomed Christians in the days of Nero, and played the most important parts in the most thrilling scenes in the histories of all times and all countries. Eventually we take leave of these restless Orientals in the London season of 1885. They have made up their minds to try the twentieth century, as it is impossible that it can be worse than the nineteenth. Here the allusions to real persons and events are in the worst possible taste, and the description of the manners, customs, and conversation of "Society" out-Herods Herod; and all this stuff is dedicated, without an apology, to Mr. Rider Haggard!

There is very little to be said about Trollope's Dilemma, although it purports to be written about "a Cambridge Quad." A tearful young woman with two lovely blue eyes, hair of rich, tawny gold, and a creamy complexion, is widowed in the beginning of the book, distraught in the middle, and remarried at the end, all in the Quad, and Trollope's dilemma appears to have been how he, the senior tutor, was to induce her, the lovely weeping one, to leave that Quad. Of course, all the undergraduates fall victims to the lachrymose beauty, whose frequent weeping does not seem to have possessed the power of swelling her features and reddening her eyes, as is usually the case with less fortunate women. The whole story is improbable, and, we trust, impossible. There is a maudering religious sentiment throughout which in no way adds to the merit of this very stupid little book, and the only strong point to be discovered anywhere is the unconditional praise of the old '57 port!

Miss Davis, of Brooklyn, is represented as a beautiful young woman, with lovely clothes and many lovers. She has many friends, all beautiful young women, with lovely clothes and many lovers, and an illegitimate sister. All the young women are engaged to be married; some of them to the right men, in which case they break off the engagement and betroth themselves, from the highest possible motives, to the wrong men. Some are engaged to the wrong men, and then they take comfort by passionate love-scenes with the right men. It is a perpetual shuffle, cut, and deal again. There is a story certainly, an undercurrent of illegitimate sister, with a little transparent plot which serves as a groundwork for the "gowns" and "creations," the bouquets, bracelets, clasped hands, clinging arms, longing eyes, passionate lips, yielding forms, ridiculous misunderstandings, and meaningless reconciliations which fill nearly two hundred pages. We fail to see the object of this work in its present form, where none but a sentimental schoolgirl or the conscientious critic would read it, and would suggest that a fitting place should be found for it in some magazine of fashion, where the descriptions of the "gowns" at least would be intelligible to the initiated.

A VILLAGE PROPAGANDA.*

BETWEEN the Don and the Dee, in Aberdeenshire, there is a stream which bears the title of "Water," a designation which, as all Scotchmen and many Englishmen are aware, signifies something bigger than a burn, and not big enough to be styled a river. On this water is situated the village of Rhynie—a bleak spot, if the photograph on the title-page is to be trusted. Near it is the Hill or Tap o' Noth, of which minister and congregation, the village schoolmaster and his scholars, are justly proud. Indeed, when an envious neighbour thought proper to exalt the claims of another mountain known as the Buck of the Cabrach, and in the poetical columns of a county paper ventured to speak disrespectfully of the Tap o' Noth, he was so sternly and effectively rebuked for his presumption by a member of the respected local house of Troup and Smith that he was at once silenced, and his discomfiture is remembered to this day. It seems that about forty years ago the village of Rhynie was one of the quietest, not to say the dullest, abodes in the Highlands. There were certainly castles, Druidical circles, and sculptured stones in the neighbourhood to reward the curiosity of the antiquary and the scholar. But the more adventurous portion of the population had gone off to find employment in large towns. The remainder consisted of small tradesmen, crofters, farmers, and hired servants. The "merchants," as they are often termed, could put their hands to any "agricultural operation." Young men and women, the sons and daughters of the house, threshed out the corn and beat the hirelings and hinds at their own work. In the winter the parish school was well attended. There was very little to disturb order or enliven the monotony of existence. A few games on the village green in the fine summer evenings, the arrival of the Lord Forbes coach or the carrier, a raffle at the smithy, a shooting match at the Bridge of Bogie, and, pace the ministers of three kirks, a Christmas soir  e and a ball, were the only incidents to diversify the trivial round and the common task. In ecclesiastical circles this peaceful region was known as "the Dead Sea of Strathbogie." All of a sudden the district woke up. The first quickening was caused by the Kirk secession of 1843. Then came the formation of the Rhynie Mutual Instruction Class, originally consisting of twelve members, who were to decide on a list of subjects to be discussed. Each member out of the list so made was bound to select some one subject, and write an essay. And every member was to occupy the chair in turn. We own that we are slightly perplexed by some bye-law, engrafted on simple rules otherwise well calculated to preserve order and method, to the effect that, while discussions on religious subjects were not allowed, yet, by the special permission of the Society or Class, "religious essays of a non-controversial character might be read." What chairman or Pr  ses, in a meeting of hard-headed Scotchmen of the Established Kirk, the Free Kirk, and the United Presbyterian would guarantee that any theological essay whatever would be void of all occasion of strife? However, the difficulty may have been got over by the establishment of a separate theological class before which essays were read by young men "of similar religious opinions." We cannot undertake to follow the fortunes of this Mutual Instruction Class through all the stages of its development. It soon had its officials in the shape of a corresponding secretary, a local secretary, and a Censor. To the latter we can well believe that very peculiar and delicate duties were assigned, calling for the exercise of much discretion and tact. Then there were other Societies on the same model, and afterwards a Union for combined action and mutual aid. Libraries were formed. The twelve members of the original class swelled into more than eleven hundred. One hundred and twenty-six lectures were delivered in less than five years. More than ten thousand copies of periodicals and pamphlets were circulated by the various Societies. On the art of public speaking much stress was laid. And we are not surprised to hear that the young men's example was followed by the young women, who also formed a Female Mutual Instruction Class, and managed judiciously to combine practice in reading, writing, and arithmetic with the more ambitious delivery of essays. The formation of this branch must not be taken as a proof of previous female intellectual deficiency; for a rash speaker at one of the meetings was promptly and severely called to account by some indignant ladies for hinting that they were not as fully educated as the men.

* An Aberdeenshire Village Propaganda Forty Years Ago. By Robert Harvey Smith, M.A. With an Introduction by William Alexander, LL.D., Author of "Johnny Gibb of Gushetneuk." Edinburgh: David Douglas 1889.

We have no intention to depreciate the force and usefulness of Societies by which Scotchmen, in a dull and remote district of the Highlands, have been roused from torpor, and encouraged to pursue their studies at some one of the Scotch Universities and to become active colonists and journalists, and missionaries in the East. But we must remind the author that we have to take a good deal of this literary and social activity on trust. Beyond some rather indifferent poetry, and one or two extracts from the essays contributed by the speakers, we have few specimens, if any, of persuasive eloquence. Lists of office-bearers, summaries of societies, dates of meetings, titles of the subjects of discussion, are scattered through these pages, and it is almost superfluous to say that the speakers and writers must all have been Liberals of a somewhat advanced type. We question, however, whether a debate on the Divine Right of Kings was not rather a century behind its time. It might have furnished matter for controversy about the date of the Forty-five, but not later. And it is a curious instance of the secret conservatism of the Scottish character that, while the author notes with approval the career of Mr. McCombie, who declaimed against excessive game preservation in Aberdeen, and of Mr. Macdonell, who was on the staff of the Scotsman newspaper when edited by the late Mr. Russel, he takes an evident pride in narrating the achievements of the men of Rhynie after the battle of Culloden. A large portion of the Pretender's army came from Banff and Aberdeenshire. Rhynie itself was defended for Prince Charlie against the troops of the Duke of Cumberland by one Anderson of Mill Town, who removed the stepping-stones of a ford and blocked the road with farm implements, carts, and branches of trees. The dragoons of the House of Hanover ran off as fast as did the forces of Johnnie Cope, and, we regret to add, are credited by tradition with uttering the most horrible and profane oaths.

On the whole, although this little work is not without some positive merit, as showing what may be done in divers walks of life by energetic Scotchmen of humble origin and scanty means to achieve independence, it will hardly attract the English reader. The few specimens given of Scotch humour are not particularly striking. Very likely the father of the village, one Peter Smith, had a marked individuality, and in some hands would have enlivened many pages with some of the good stories attributed to him. But the author has not allowed us to judge of Peter's capacity. We may notice in conclusion that Mr. Alexander Allardyce was educated at the parish school of Rhynie and belonged to its Mutual Instruction Class. His novel of the City of Sunshine, founded entirely on his Indian knowledge and experience, was reviewed in these columns on its appearance, and we never met any one Anglo-Indian who did not admit that, as a picture of native life, it was full, graphic, and accurate. Minute acquaintance with Oriental character had been worked up into a novel, in its own line as good as Dustypore or the Ceruleans. So let Mr. Allardyce be carried to the credit of the "Village Propaganda."

MEMORABLE LONDON HOUSES.*

THERE are two principal points in which this book differs from the standard work on the subject, Mr. Laurence Hutton's Literary Landmarks. It is so small that it can be put into a pocket, and it is profusely illustrated with little vignettes from drawings by Mr. G. N. Martin. Besides these differences, the arrangement in routes is to be noted, and is convenient. Mr. Hutton's book is a treatise. Mr. Harrison's is a guide-book, in which the Literary Landmarks is of necessity very often quoted, but the Memorable Houses are not all those of literary celebrities. George Peabody and Sir Benjamin Brodie, Lord Clive and Lord Palmerston, Thomas Gainsborough and Daniel Maclise, all are included. Mr. Harrison, however, only points out houses which are still more or less as they were while occupied by the celebrities he names. To this rule there are many exceptions, but Byron's birthplace in Holles Street, which has been rebuilt, is left unmentioned; so is Mulready's in Linden Gardens, and Maurice's in Bolton Row, now Curzon Street. We also remark the omission, in the notice of Charles Reade's residence at Albert Gate, to remind the reader that this was the "Naboth's Vineyard" so often referred to by the novelist and his friends, that it has been completely altered by "restoration," and that the vine and fig-tree in the front garden have totally disappeared. We could mention some other omissions and a few errors, but no book dealing with so many names and dates can, especially at its first appearance, be absolutely faultless. The whole subject is of interest, not to the sightseer only, but to every intelligent person, whether Cockney or otherwise. By the way, Mr. Harrison has nothing to say about the City or the East End. Perhaps he thinks that the kind of eminence attained by a fortune made in business is below his notice; but some people would like to know where Peabody's office was, where Morrison and Thornton and others made their millions, and to have pointed to them the spot from which the Rothschilds control the finance of the world. London is a wide place, and it must be confessed that nearly all the old City houses have been removed or renewed in the past few years. On the whole we may find this neat, unpretending little book a very pleasant and useful pocket companion in the western portion of London.

A MODERN CHESS INSTRUCTOR.*

IT is some years since Mr. Steinitz undertook to write a new handbook of chess, and his superiority as a player over all his contemporaries accounts for the interest with which the appearance of this work has been looked for. It has been delayed, no doubt, by the various contests in which the author has been engaged, from the memorable Zukertort match to the fight with Tschigorin at the Havannah, early in the present year. Since the London Tournament of 1883 Mr. Steinitz has never been beaten in a set match. Though he did not play in the American Tournament, in which M. Tschigorin tied for first place with Herr Weiss, he took a large part in the arrangement of that contest, and is charged with the preparation of its permanent record. Mr. Steinitz rather grandiloquently announces his intentions with regard to The Book of the Sixth American Congress, which is to be of "extraordinary and rare value from the antiquarian point of view." All that is meant by this is that a limited edition of the book will be issued to subscribers only, the copies being consecutively numbered, and the name of each subscriber being printed on the title-page. The paper is to have an appropriate watermark, which "is sure to add a very rare bibliographical value to the book," but it is not accurate to say that such a device has never been employed before in order to give a special value to a special work or edition.

With so much on his hands at the same time, it is to the credit of Mr. Steinitz that he has been able to produce at any rate an instalment of his promised handbook. Though this first part is of necessity somewhat provisional and tentative, and the field of analysis is barely half covered, it probably displays nearly all the distinctive features which the author intends his Instructor to possess, and it may therefore be considered in some sense as though it were complete. We may say at once that Mr. Steinitz's handbook will be very serviceable to students and to every master of the game; but it is not likely to do for this generation all that Staunton's Handbook did for the last generation. Staunton was remarkably successful in his effort to give the average intelligent chess-player just what he needed about the theory and practice of chess, supplemented by a careful selection of examples from actual play. His work has been the companion and guide of all contemporary players, and its merits have been attested over and over again. Mr. Steinitz himself frequently quotes the Handbook, and never disputes its authority, though he, if any one, might fairly claim the right to do so. The fact is that, so far as Staunton goes, which is as far as the analysis of his day could carry him, his work was done once for all, and could not easily be improved upon. Mr. Steinitz thinks himself bound to begin at the beginning, with pictures of the pieces, and diagrams to show how they are to be moved. After this apparatus for young beginners there are a few chapters for dilettanti, "an essay on the principles of the game," and an excellent analysis of six of the more popular openings, with illustrative games to each opening. As the analysis marks the highest point hitherto attained in the practice of chess, it is manifest that Mr. Steinitz cannot be charged with any lack of comprehensiveness in his plan. Indeed, this comprehensiveness is carried so far that the author devotes one-sixth of his volume to a record of the games in his last-played match with Tschigorin—not, perhaps, because the games are exceptionally good, or useful for the purpose of illustration, but because they are his last, and deserve to be recorded somewhere. A more homogeneous character would have been secured for the Instructor if these games had been left enshrined in the International Chess Magazine, where, we are glad to see, Mr. Steinitz has been content to leave the matters of keen personal debate which have from time to time arisen between himself and a few of his contemporaries.

The distinction implied in the use of the term "modern chess" by Mr. Steinitz and other recent writers is one of considerable importance, and is clear enough to be stated in a few words. According to the best theory of the game, as now understood by its most able exponents, the object to be kept in view in a contest between two masters is very much the same as the object of two skilful duellists armed with the rapier. The players have to maintain positions which, assuming the best play on either side, are exactly equal, White having no appreciable or no necessary advantage as a result of the first move. They cross blades, thrust and parry, on true scientific principles, watching carefully all the time for an opportunity of delivering an effective attack. Coolness in the long run is a greater virtue than dash; an impatient onslaught is rarely successful, and brilliancy is of little avail against soundness. Theoretically, the best moves on both sides lead inevitably to a draw, and the first mistake, if not counterbalanced by a mistake on the other side, loses the game. "Among first-class masters," says Mr. Steinitz, "the capture of the King is the ultimate, but not the first, object"—that is to say, there is no headlong rush for the mate, but a marshalling of the whole combined force, and a steady pressure at every point, until a bolder attack is invited by a manifestation of weakness. Mr. Steinitz adds other maxims as characteristic of the modern school, and notably recommends a more liberal use of the King as "a strong piece, both for attack and defence." His critics deny the soundness of some of his views in this particular, and we are not inclined to decide where such learned doctors disagree. But there can be no question as to the soundness of the general principles adopted by the leading masters of the present day. The author quotes a calculation made by Mr. Edwyn Anthony, to the effect that "the number of ways of playing the first ten moves on each side is 169518,829100,544000,000000,000000." It will readily be admitted that there can be no such thing in the theory of the game as a beaten track to victory through this countless multiplicity of moves.

* Memorable London Houses. By Wilmot Harrison. Illustrated. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1889.

* The Modern Chess Instructor. By W. Steinitz. Part I. New York: Putnam's Sons. 1889.

The openings (of which Mr. Steinitz analyses and illustrates the Ruy Lopez, the Knights' Games, and the Scotch Gambit, with Petroff's, Philidor's, and the Two Knights' Defences) should not be considered, though they often are considered, as royal roads to success. They are simply tracks through the forest, leading easily with weaker antagonists to a winning superiority, but just as easily blocked by the best play of an equal foe. They are familiar, and therefore popular; they have been explored, surveyed, and mapped out, so that any one who will be at the pains of studying them may travel safely where there was once no route. They open up extremely interesting positions; but other positions quite as interesting may be found by any wayfarer who chooses to cut a path for himself, without guide or chart. The most that can be said for the recognized openings and defences is that they are proved and tested methods of initiating a game, up to the points where thorough analysis has been able to follow them, and that, for the first three or four moves on either side, they probably comprise the soundest methods which could be adopted. But, whilst players of the standing of Mr. Steinitz or the late Dr. Zukertort continue to recommend new variations on old lines of attack and defence, or even new second moves, it is impossible to say that the art of chess is stereotyped so far as the earlier moves are concerned.

The form in which Mr. Steinitz has seen good to cast his illustrative and analysed games is not without its advantages, though it is complicated, and on first acquaintance obscure. He arranges five or six games in columns, with references to the analysis printed on the opposite page. For the diagrams, when there are any, we have frequently to turn over a leaf, so that the analysis of a single game is often on three, and occasionally on four pages. But the exposition is admirably clear and systematic, and the preliminary tables of variations on each opening, with the author's notes thereon, are especially valuable. Another feature worthy of mention is the constant comparison of analogous positions, to which the arrangement of the games in parallel columns readily lends itself. The book has one serious blemish in common with most chess-books. It abounds in typographical errors, on which subject Mr. Steinitz may have a crow to pluck with the learned Professor whom he thanks in his preface for correcting the proofs. No demur need be made to such expressions as mens sana in corpora sana, for it is quite time that we exacted some show of originality in the use of over-quoted phrases. But mis-named pieces and wrongly applied symbols and directions should have been entirely eliminated from a handbook of so much importance as the Modern Chess Instructor.

THE BLAMELESS ETHIOPIANS.*

IT was remarked some months ago in these pages that Mr. Froude not only wrote many books himself, but was the cause of many books being written. Certainly the latter process will be repeated as long as Mr. Froude chooses to go about the world and, after a visit of a few days, or even hours, airily dispose of problems which have cost local authorities and the home Government anxious thought, it may be, for generations. In distant regions it is too much to expect that a proper estimate should be placed upon his works. The inhabitants of Australia, New Zealand, or the West Indies see palpable errors in his statements; they know that those statements are widely circulated and read with interest; and their soul burns within them to refute the errors which concern themselves. They do not consider that in England men turn to a book by Mr. Froude for pleasant reading; but that no serious person would dream of founding an argument upon a statement contained in it, much less of initiating a policy. We do not, therefore, blame Mr. Thomas—a negro himself, as we gather from the book—for taking up the cudgels on behalf of his African brethren, whom he believes Mr. Froude has grievously wronged in his English in the West Indies; but we see no reason why, on account of Mr. Froude's alleged misdeeds, we should have a barbarous word forced on the English language, and we prefer to head our notice with another title, of which we will make a present to Mr. Thomas. By "Froudacity" we conclude Mr. Thomas means to imply the "mendacity" of Mr. Froude; but it might just as well mean his "sagacity," or "audacity," or anything else of a similar termination.

Mr. Thomas first of all addresses himself to the easy and now familiar task of controverting Mr. Froude's optical and aural delusions; he saw a place at Grenada surrounded by forest trees, which coloured the water with a violet tint, when every one knows there are no forest trees within two miles of it; he heard Barbadians "speak pure English, the voices being without the smallest Transatlantic intonation," while Mr. Anthony Trollope is a witness that they all speak with a drawl and a strong nasal twang. Mr. Thomas might have added that his author had the power of seeing fire-flies glancing among the orange-trees of Barbadoes, when it is the unhappy peculiarity of that island that fire-flies cannot be induced to live there. These are minor points, however; the main purport of the book is to oppose Mr. Froude's forecast that, should an epoch arise when the blacks were allowed to assume the governing powers of the West India Islands, a relapse into barbarism would be the result. Here Mr. Thomas's argument becomes a little confused. He asserts, on the one hand, that there has never been any hard-and-fast white-master and black-slave theory; that for two hundred years before the negro emancipation of 1838 there had existed in those then British colonies no prohibition on the ground of race or colour against the owning of slaves; and that as a consequence numbers of blacks, half-breeds, and other non-Europeans constituted a very considerable portion of the slave-holding sections of those communities. On the other hand, he points to alleged instances of injustice on the part of petty magistrates and maladministration of the Governors of Trinidad to show that the negro population is systematically kept under by the colonial authorities, and prevented from exercising its legitimate influence. But from his statement above it would seem that a "considerable section," at all events, started on equal terms with their white neighbours as to social and material advantages, and a much larger proportion ought now to be at the top than the few exceptions we know of so well. After the manner of his race Mr. Thomas has plenty of words at his command, but the residuum of practical conclusions is small indeed. From the chapters on "Social Revolution" and "West Indian Confederation" we derive no help towards the solution of those problems; but we rejoice to see that, as to the "Religion for Negroes," Mr. Thomas believes that the old Christian faith is making its way, and scoffs at any return to obeahism or devil-worship. So far as we are aware, notwithstanding the title of his book, the English in the West Indies have never acknowledged that Mr. Froude represented their views, and we do not know why Mr. Thomas assumes that he does. In the last fifty years the African race has made great progress, and the result is seen in the various positions of trust and authority which are held by men of colour. But progress to be permanent must be gradual, and it is no use arguing from the fitness of certain men for certain places that the whole race, which has suffered from admitted disadvantages, should suddenly be deemed qualified for any and every position; nor is it any kindness to flatter them with inflated language of this kind. The author quotes with delight the following panegyric of the Rev. P. H. Doughlin, Rector of St. Clement's, Trinidad, who, we learn, is also "a brilliant star among the sons of Ham." He says:—

Who could, without seeming to insult the intelligence of men, have predicted on the day of emancipation that the negroes, then released from the blight and withering influence of ten generations of cruel bondage, so weakened and half-destroyed, so denationalized and demoralized, so despoiled and naked, would be in the position they are now? In spite of the proud, supercilious, and dictatorial bearing of their teachers, in spite of the hampering of unsympathetic alien oversight, in spite of the spirit of dependence and servility engendered by slavery, not only have individual members of the race entered into all the offices of dignity in Church and State, as subalterns, as hewers of wood and drawers of water, but they have attained to the very highest places. Here, in the West Indies and on the West Coast of Africa, are to be found surgeons of the negro race, solicitors, barristers, mayors, councillors, principals and founders of High schools and colleges, editors and proprietors of newspapers, archdeacons, bishops, judges, and authors—men who not only teach those immediately around them, but also teach the world. Members of the race have even been entrusted with the administration of Governments. And it is not mere commonplace men that the negro race has produced. Not only have the British Universities thought them worthy of their honorary degrees, and conferred them on them, but members of the race have won these University degrees. A few years back a full-blooded negro took the highest degree Oxford has to give to a young man. The European world is looking with wonder and admiration at the progress made by the negro race—a progress unparalleled in the annals of the history of any race.

This is "tall talk," reminding us of Mr. Jefferson Brick, and might be subjected to a considerable amount of criticism if it were worth while; but Mr. Thomas himself is not to be outdone by his friend:—

Leaving aside the writings of men of such high calibre as F. Douglas, Dr. Hyland Garnet, Professor Crummell, Professor E. Blyden, Dr. Tanner, and others, it is gratifying to be able to chronicle the Éthiopie women of North America as moving shoulder to shoulder with the men in the highest spheres of literary activity. Among a brilliant band of these our sisters, conspicuous no less in poetry than in prose, we single out but a solitary name, for the double purpose of preserving brevity, and of giving in one embodiment the ideal Afro-American woman of letters. The allusion here can scarcely fail to point to Mrs. S. Harper. This lady's philosophical subtlety of reasoning on grave questions finds effective expression in a prose of singular precision and vigour. But it is as a poet that posterity will hail her in the coming ages of our Race. For pathos, depth of spiritual insight, and magical exercise of a rare power of self-utterance, it will hardly be questioned that she has surpassed every competitor among females—white or black—save and except Elizabeth Barrett Browning, with whom the gifted African stands on much the same plane of poetic excellence.

* Froudacity. West Indian Fables by James Anthony Froude explained by J. J. Thomas. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 1889.

We are glad to say that Mr. Thomas's final words of advice to those whom he describes as having the same "pigment under the epidermis" as himself are "Work, hope, and wait." This is sensible enough, and is far more wholesome than fulsome periods like the above. The laws of the West Indies, as a whole, are equitably and firmly administered, and education is extending and is doing its work. There is, on their own showing, no real bar to the advancement of a black man to the highest offices, and if he obtains them it will be by hard work and merit. He will find himself neither hindered by the sombre prognostications of Mr. Froude nor assisted by the flattering verbiages of Mr. Thomas.

CLAVERS.*

IT was practically certain, according to one of the most mysterious laws of life and literature, that when Mr. Mowbray Morris wrote upon Claverhouse, some short time ago, it would turn out that other people were also writing about him. That the "Southern," whoever he may be, has worked independently is proved by his not mentioning (so far as we have noticed) Mr. Morris's book, and it is all the more satisfactory to find that the researches of the two inquirers, both of whom appear to have taken great trouble, not merely with Mr. Napier's collections, but with other sources of information, old and new, come to pretty nearly the same conclusion. That conclusion, of course, is that the horns-and-tail "Clavers" of legend is a creation of sectarian spite carefully kept alive by political unscrupulousness. The "Southern" is a very careful, but not a very judicious, inquirer. His book is undigested, his style awkward, and his method not easy to follow; but there is hardly a point of Clavers's life, disputed or undisputed, on which the reader will fail to find some light. We shall ourselves only note one or two points on which his discretion seems to have waited with but a halting foot on his good-will. We do not dwell on "The Despot's Champion"—that is a mere quotation, and it seems to be the "Southern's" chief attempt to prove that Claverhouse never championed despotism in any other sense than that in which a good soldier and good subject "champions" the lawful and reasonable commands of his superiors and his sovereign.

Yet surely it is a very silly thing to say "Nothing Sir Walter Scott ever wrote is more censurable than his attributing to Balfour of Burley the crime of firing upon a flag of truce." No doubt, as Sir Walter rarely if ever wrote anything that is in this sense "censurable," the stricture is not severe; but apparently the "Southern" means it to be so. Now surely there is nothing very atrocious in attributing to a man who is already described as guilty of the brutal, cold-blooded murder of an old man—a non-combatant, a priest, in time of peace—the technical guilt of firing on a flag of truce. But, as a matter of fact, Scott does nothing of the kind. He represents Burley as giving Cornet Grahame fair warning that, by addressing the insurgents instead of their officers, he would forfeit the advantages of his flag of truce—a warning grounded, we believe, on good military authority. The Cornet neglects the warning, and, having forfeited his privileges, is shot. If anything is to be said, it is that Sir Walter was too scrupulous in taking such pains to clear the character of a traitor and murderer.

Another passage where we doubt the "Southern's" judgment is that famous one relating to the death of John Brown of Priest-hill. The "Southern" has gone very carefully through the whole tale of Clavers's murders, and has reduced those which have any tincture of evidence to five—probably the smallest amount of blood ever charged against the putter-down of an exceptionally obstinate and fanatical, if not an exceptionally great, rebellion, which had been opened by the rebels with an undoubted murder of the blackest dye. But he, too, thinks it necessary to be apologetic and dubitative about the famous "To man I can be answerable, and as for God, I will take him into mine own hand." We have before now pointed out that these words can be literally accepted; that Claverhouse's character, not only according to seventeenth-century standards, does not incur the blame of profanity, but that, on the contrary, they amount merely to a bold statement of honest conviction in the righteousness before God, as well as the justification before man, of the deed. As for the ineffable silliness to which Macaulay thought fit to lend his countenance about Claverhouse's wicked soldiers playing at Hell, and calling themselves fiends, the "Southern" takes unnecessary pains with it. It is quite sufficient to point out, as indeed he does, though he is not content with this, that even the virulent anilities of Wodrow—the sole foundation for the legend—do not impute the thing to Claverhouse at all. This labour of supererogation is the more remarkable in that the "Southern" dismisses the really interesting case of the "Wigton martyrs"—the two Margarets who were or were not drowned—without discussing it, on the plea that Clavers was not concerned. He certainly was not; but so much capital has been made out of implications and innuendoes that he was, that a rehandling of the case, or at least a summary of the evidence, would better have deserved two pages than the childish folly about Tophet and the dragoons whipping each other and calling each other by the names of devils.

The account of that brief but wonderful career between the sally from Edinburgh and the "chariot of fire" at Killiecrankie, which drew a reluctant kind of admiration from Macaulay himself, is minutely, if not very graphically, done. And, indeed, the whole book may be commended as a sufficiently thorough, if not very artistic, piece of work. That it will kill the lies any more than Mr. Morris's book did we do not in the least expect. A lie is in its nature immortal until, and even after, it and its authors receive their place in the bottomless pit. The only thing to be done is to insist on the truth as forcibly and as often as may be. And the truth about Dundee is, that he was a brave and loyal soldier and statesman, whose hands were rather unusually free from blood in a time when blood was not a matter about which people cared much; who was inviolably faithful to his side in a time when men chopped and changed like chameleons; a man of irreproachable private life in a time of dissoluteness; and a man of exceptional bravery at a time when almost all men were brave.

NOVELS.*

THE fare which Mr. Norris provides for his readers is not exactly strong meat, but in its way it is agreeable enough; a sort of five-o'clock tea, with nicely-cut bread and butter, and wholesome palatable cake. We may reckon on being introduced to some people of rank, and if we have a lurking suspicion about some of their ways, we check ourselves with the reflection that critics dwelling, as every one knows, in Grub Street are very liable to error in such delicate questions of social nuance. At any rate, we make the acquaintance of a set of ladies and gentlemen who are nothing if not decorous, and whose conversation compensates perhaps in sprightly good humour for what it lacks in brilliancy and depth. The repartees doing duty for sarcasm remind us rather of the alphabetical list projected by the hero of Happy Thoughts than of the pages of Esmond or Vanity Fair; however, they are quite up to the average of what passes current in real life. The various characters in the story are natural so far as they go, and suffer, if at all, merely from general debility of constitution; the plot is ingenious, though slight, and the dénouement is happy. What more can any reasonable reader require? Nevertheless, we cannot proclaim ourselves altogether satisfied. When a novelist (of course we speak only of novelists who are to be reckoned with, not the crowd of hapless ladies and gentlemen whose works bestrew the back shelves of circulating libraries) undertakes to relate commonplace events in the lives of commonplace people (and though some of the personages in Miss Shafto are eccentric, none can be called original), he is in duty bound to supply some saving grace of his own, some poetry of style or keenness of insight or subtlety of analysis, or at the least a sturdy and abounding good sense. We ought to feel that we are viewing the world through a glass which is constantly being kept in focus for us, or our eyes are apt to get as weary of the spectacle as would our ears of an indefinitely prolonged personal conversation. In some of Mr. Norris's former books he appeared more or less to supply what we have indicated, but in the present volumes he seems to have left off work before he had put the finishing touches—before the i's were dotted and the t's crossed. When he is chronicling the trifling humours of society we somehow miss the amused twinkle of the eye; while the graver events in his narrative seem diluted in the telling to a uniform thin consistency of drawing-room gossip. Nor do we ever become really intimate with any of his characters; they remain to the end acquaintances rather than friends. The plot is concerned with the love affairs of a certain Lord Walter Sinclair; who, finding on his father's death that he has only 15,000*l.* in the world, becomes a successful sculptor with the happy facility distinguishing gifted amateurs in fiction. His true love, Miss Norna Shafto, is the daughter of a country squire, reduced by agricultural distress to taking a house in Upper Belgrave Street, and frittering away his money in hazardous speculations. Lord Walter retards his happiness by a passing infatuation for a pretty coquette, who jilts him in favour of a rich parvenu; and, when she is safely married, her ex-

* Miss Shafto. By W. E. Norris. 3 vols. London: Richard Bentley & Sons. 1889.

The Story of a Marriage. By L. Baldwin. 3 vols. London: Ward & Downey. 1889.

Both of this Parish. By Algernon Gissing. 2 vols. London: Hurst & Blackett. 1889.

Tumbledown Farm. By Alan Muir. 2 vols. London: Spencer Blackett. 1889.

* Clavers, the Despot's Champion: a Scots Biography. By "A Southern." London: Longmans & Co. 1889.

admirer falls himself under the suspicion of having secretly united himself in youth to a girl of humble birth. These and other minor complications fill not inadequately the regulation three volumes. As is usual in Mr. Norris's books, the stage is peopled by minor characters, no less carefully drawn and perhaps more interesting than the hero and heroine proper. Chief among them is the Marquess of Loddondale, Lord Walter's racing, ill-reputed, but withal generous-hearted elder brother—whose wickedness, by the way, is very succinctly hinted at, and whose reported utterances, though slangy, are decidedly mild. Then there is Baron Lämmergeier, the Jew financier, more astute than honest, under whose guidance poor Mr. Shafto loses his money; and the Baron's remarkably frank wife, uttering friendly but unheeded warnings; Miss Nell Travers, a rattling, plain-spoken, good-natured old maid; Mrs. Wilton, a scheming mother; and, lastly, Mr. Basil Morley, a literary amateur, the broadest piece of caricature in the book. Thus there is no lack of variety in the entertainment, and the result may be described as distinctly good—always with the saving qualification that the author might have made it a great deal better.

The Story of a Marriage is probably the work of a very young lady, and, as such, shows decided signs of promise. The descriptions are well written, and the characters, especially some of the minor ones, are drawn with more than ordinary firmness. There is, too, a sense of reserve in treating the more emotional situations which encourages a hopeful forecast. The book is enormously long; but that, possibly, is not entirely the fault of the author. Its real weakness lies in the crudity of the views of life it embodies, and the fact that the hero, on whom the writer lavishes abundant sympathy, is with his whole heart and soul and strength a prig of the deepest dye. The book is apparently a product of that happy time of life when the conclusions deduced from a judicious "course of reading," and sanctioned possibly by the friends most admired, appear to be the absolute truth, and when all who ignore, reject, or despise them are viewed as dwelling in outer darkness or wilfully blinding themselves to the light. The period when to be "misunderstood" as to the precise aims of our efforts and emotions appears to be the direst of calamities, when all our failures are ascribed to circumstances, and not to ourselves, and when Goethe's immortal line—"Was hat man dir, du armes Kind, gethan?"—seems so precisely to fit our own, though not our neighbour's, condition. Laurence Temple, the hero of the present story, is an example of this frame of mind, pushed to an extreme happily seldom met with in real life. Filled to the eyelids with absurd fads, he falls violently in love with the beautiful daughter of a market-gardener, and marries her with the intention of educating her up to his intellectual and æsthetic level. She naturally enough imagined that she was going to wear fine clothes and do nothing for the rest of her life, and is aghast at finding her new home a simple cottage, modelled with a refinement of inept ingenuity on the dwelling of her parents. She does not appreciate Wordsworth at all, and, O horror! asks her husband to buy her some magenta ribbon. The situation shortly becomes impossible, and Mrs. Temple, after carrying on a flirtation, elopes with a lover in her own rank of life, and, on being subsequently deserted by him, most conveniently dies, thus enabling her widower, without the scandal of divorce, to marry a young lady who had long loved him, and, let us hope, will rule him with a rod of iron. Apart from the perverse misapplication of sympathy, the book, as we have said, has decided merits, and its author may do good work. The peasant wife's father and mother are very vividly sketched, and Job Tolley, her lover, with all his odious vulgarity, is thoroughly alive. Turning to a small point, could not some less cacophonous combination than Sir Stoke and Lady Poges be found for two otherwise inoffensive characters? Readers are patient; but what the last straw did is known.

Both of this Parish can best be described as a dreary muddle. Some pains seem to have been spent on it, and if it had been a first attempt we could have hoped that order might have been eventually educed from chaos; but the title-page informs us that its author has produced at least two other works, whereupon we can only "hush and bless ourselves with silence." Chipping Campden, a village in Gloucestershire, is selected as the scene, and the dialect of the district is, we doubt not, faithfully transliterated. Mr. Gissing has, however, omitted the preliminary step of making his rustics human beings. A broomstick cannot be made to look like a peasant by investing it with an authentic smock frock.

Though titled to suit the times, as auctioneers would say, Tumbledown Farm is not a tale of agricultural distress, but a sort of parable illustrating by a slight story the conflict between two systems of morality, the one dictated by conventional respectability, the other by the spontaneous promptings of the heart. As Pascal said in a different and more serious connexion, "Le cœur a des raisons que la raison ne connaît pas." The book is supposed to be written by a pragmatical old village chemist in literary partnership with the young and sentimental daughter of a squire. Though the device is rather too elaborately carried out, it is ingeniously conceived, and enables the author to emphasize, without incurring the reproach of direct preaching, the aspects of the spiritual conflict he narrates. The actual story, as distinguished from the commentary, is centred round a beautiful girl, endowed with generous impulses and a warm heart, but brought up among evil surroundings by a dissolute and eventually criminal father. Vanity Hardware—for under this preposterous name or nickname the girl is made to figure throughout the book—inspires a violent passion in the breast of an honest but rather sheepish rustic youth, and after a while returns his love. She only partially reveals her circumstances, and asks her lover to forsake all his friends and elope with her to Canada. The test is too strong for his love, and he abandons Vanity for the sake of a former more demure sweetheart. Vanity's father is killed in a conflict with the police; and she herself, after many vicissitudes, marries a rich man, thus completely eclipsing in social station her former timid adorer. The execution of the book is curiously unequal. Speaking broadly, the first volume is very good, the second volume is very much the reverse of good. There is real passion in the scene where the lover is put to the touch and fails, and in the eager outpourings of Vanity's secret diary; but the chapters dealing with the habits and customs of the "cultivated" classes are lamentably flat and feeble, dissipating the impression of power which the reader preserves till the middle of the narrative.

THE YEAR-BOOK OF TREATMENT.*

TO the man in busy practice, whether as consultant or general practitioner, we think The Year-Book of Treatment likely to be of great value. Standard works and long treatises are not for him—indeed, he can often barely spare the time to get through his weekly medical periodicals. Yet it is essential, for his own satisfaction (if he duly appreciate his responsibilities) and for the sustenance of his professional reputation, that he should be cognizant of every improvement in the methods of coping with disease. The little book edited by Mr. Malcolm Morris enables him to do this with a minimum amount of labour. All the articles in it are by men of acknowledged capacity, and their work appears to us to have been conscientiously and satisfactorily performed. We look upon The Year-Book of Treatment as a praiseworthy attempt to render the experience gained by those whose investigations are particularly directed to certain portions of the wide field of medical and surgical science available for the use of the whole body of sanitary workers. We heartily commend the volume for 1889 to the notice of the medical profession.

WARWICKSHIRE PARISHES.†

A BOOK of topographical notes on a whole county, if it is to be worth anything, cannot be put together without considerable labour, and it is evident that the Rev. George Miller has not shirked the work which the preparation of this volume has demanded. He has, he tells us, visited almost every parish in Warwickshire for the purpose of gaining information, and he has recorded the results of his inquiries in a well-arranged and businesslike form. Under the name of each parish he gives some older forms of spelling, and in most cases what he believes to be the derivation of the name. Some of his derivations are decidedly worse than questionable. Perhaps the oddest, especially as coming from a Warwickshire man, is his explanation of Tamworth, which he derives from "thun, a town, and warian, to guard." If he and his pony Puck have, as he declares, "put a girdle round about the county," they must surely have crossed the Tame. He notes the landowners in the time of King Edward the Confessor and in 1087, the area given in Domesday, the later landowners, and the population and rateable value at different dates. In each case also he gives a short description of the parish church and the monuments which it contains, and records the value of the living in the Taxation of Pope Nicolas, in the Liber Regis, and as it stands at present, and the ornaments of the church now existing and as they were in 1552. Several of his notices include a list of incumbents; these lists would have been more valuable if he had not been deterred by a fear of making mistakes from furnishing them with dates. He could, we imagine, have found a good many of the required dates in the Institution books of the diocese, and might have put a query or left a blank where he was at a loss. Here and there it would, no doubt, be possible to find a slip in his work. For example, on turning to the parish of Congleton, we observe that the patron of the living is described as "Sir Throgmorton," and that the name of the last vicar but one is wrongly spelt. A second volume containing notes on the parishes of Worcestershire will complete the survey of the diocese. The introduction consists of some sensible and unpretentious chapters on the value of land and other kindred matters.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

"TU Marcellus eras" has always been, with a change of tense which does not lessen the pathos of the phrase, the sentiment of the Orleanist family and party in reference to the father of the Comte de Paris whose life was cut short forty-seven years ago (1). Even the most acrid political adversaries of the

* The Year-Book of Treatment for 1889. London: Cassell & Co.

† The Parishes of the Diocese of Worcester. By the Rev. George Miller, Vicar of Redway, Rural Dean, &c. 2 vols. Vol. I.—The Parishes of Warwickshire. London: Griffith, Farran, Okeden, & Welsh. 1889.

(1) Lettres du Duc d'Orléans (1825-1842). Paris: Calmann Lévy.

party and the most decided dislikers of certain characteristics, more marked than amiable, which Louis Philippe left to his descendants, if he did not inherit them from his ancestors, have been known to acknowledge with a growl that the eldest Orleans, like the youngest Tarquin, was too good for such a breed. The letters, both familiar and formal, which are here printed fortunately do nothing to dispel, and something to confirm, this favourable impression. Some of them, especially those (or some of them) written to Alfred de Musset, the Prince's schoolfellow, are known already. One of these, by the way—not, we think, one of those previously published—contains a phrase rather ominous. The Duke de Chartres, as he then was, a boy of sixteen, and not yet made, by the success of the "Fifteen Years' Conspiracy," Prince Royal (they had the grace or the baseness, the wisdom or the folly, not to call him Dauphin) of France, went to see a manufactory of laces. "Pendant que nous examinions avec étonnement le procédé ingénieux par lequel des bobines de différentes couleurs, en faisant une chaîne perpétuelle, formaient la tresse du lacet, un monsieur [all the commercial classes were Orleanist then] s'approcha de moi, et me dit, avec un sourire qui prouvait toute l'estime qu'il avait pour sa personne, que la chaîne de ces bobines était un ingénieux emblème de l'union de notre famille." "Alas! the policy and proceedings of the House of Orleans have too often been "an ingenious mixture of different colours," instead of showing one hue dyed in grain. In the extract just given, however, a touch of satire, unexaggerated and pleasant, may be noted. And all through the book—whether the Prince is writing to private friends or describing his experiences when he served with Marshal Gérard on the not very glorious expedition where French numbers crushed the heroic resistance of Chassé and his little garrison at Antwerp; or, much later, telling how, when he and his much-enduring Duchess were "starring" in the South of France, the bold National Guard would defend their lodgings with such desperate vigilance and military precision that it was impossible to get a wink of sleep for the challengings, and marchings, and groundings of arms, and so forth—there is the same agreeable and unforced note. The Duke is a little Chauvinist here and there, of course; he would not have been good for much if, in the circumstances, he had not been. But, on the whole, he plays the modern prince very well here, exhibiting what is called "intelligent interest" in things without the hideous priggishness of a new and terrible type, which has developed itself in some royal personages since it was the fashion for them not to faire la noce any longer, but to learn the tongues and the ologies, and study statecraft and warcraft, and do their best or worst to plant on green shoulders the kind of head that has never been amiably green and so will never be venerably grey. The Comte de Paris has prefixed a preface of which only the ungenerous will complain that it is too much of a manifesto, and suggests his grandfather's propensity to make capital out of an "occasion," rather than the more generous and chivalric spirit of his father, as here portrayed.

M. Allaire's publication, a condensation of the memoirs of Dom Courdemanche, a Benedictine of the last century who died just on the eve of the Revolution, and who was a kind of agent in the interminable lawsuit between the Duke of Penthièvre and the Abbey of Jumièges, is an instance of honest doubt on the part of the document-hunter (2). M. Allaire admits that he has not published the whole of his MS., and we think he doubts whether he ought to have published so much. The fact is that the documents are precisely of the kind which ought to be boiled down with a little extract, by a skilful hand, in an essay of sixty or seventy pages, and no more. Dom Courdemanche was a "doer" at once stout and skilful, loyal to his own side and courteous to the other; he could open oysters (an excellent and not too common accomplishment, very suitable for his position), bear a rebuff, and not be afraid of clever M. de Florian and all his fables. The transactions in which he was engaged have their historical importance, especially as showing the unhealthy effect of certain things in the then state of France which have not been most dwelt on by praisers of the Revolution. But he is not big enough for a big octavo volume.

No country now produces more careful and useful historical monographs than France. The uncomfortable critic, it is true, sometimes objects that such books as M. Bapst's (3), while they are too much for the ordinary reader on their special subjects, do not dispense the painful historian from independent inquiry. But this is hypercriticism. M. Bapst has patiently gone through the long and curious history of the marriages or projected marriages of the "Red Tod of St. Andrews," the Scottish Vert Galant, James V., especially of the negotiations for other brides which preceded his short-lived union with Magdalen of France and his longer and more fateful marriage with Mary of Guise. The European interest taken in the proceedings would, of itself, give them importance, even if they had not immediately resulted in founding the Royal line of United Britain.

We only chronicle here the appearance of the first volume of a new series of French State Papers (4), and shall probably return upon it more fully.

(2) Le Duc de Penthièvre. Par Etienne Allaire. Paris: Plon.

(3) Les mariages de Jacques V. Par E. Bapst. Paris: Plon.

(4) Recueil des actes du comité de salut public. Par F. A. Aulard. Tome I. Paris: Imprimerie Nationale.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

PERHAPS some courage may be ascribed to a translator who introduces a selection of essays by Schopenhauer to the English reader with the cheering remark that the author of Die Welt als Wille und Vorstellung is one of the few philosophers who can be understood without a commentary. It might be pointed out that Schopenhauer has already inspired many commentators, and that his philosophical system is not so exclusively based on observation and experience as Mr. T. B. Saunders declares in the preface to his translations, Religion, a Dialogue, and other Essays (Swan Sonnenschein & Co.) The novelty of Schopenhauer's system is, like Wagner's theory of music and its relation to the drama, to a considerable extent superficial, while its appeal as a practical philosophy to the average human intelligence has scarcely the universality of power and inspiration which has been claimed for it. Mr. Saunders thinks that Schopenhauer "brought down philosophy from Heaven to earth," because his system is of greater practical scope than those of the transcendental schools, yet it would be hard to show in what respect the "heavenly maid" or matron was rendered more attractive by the process. Such fruit of the "practical philosophy" of Schopenhauer as may be gathered from the first essay in Mr. Saunders's volume cannot be said to be one whit more profitable or convincing than the most ethereal philosophic structure ever woven out of abstract ideas by some cunning archimage of a metaphysician. In form, the essay on Religion is modelled after the master of philosophic dialogue, yet nothing could be more anti-Platonic in style or conception. Philalethes battles with Demopheles with a good deal of vigour, it is true, yet the encounter is as a bout with single-sticks. Of the subtlety of fence there is nothing. You hear, rather than feel, the blows, and when the inevitable handshaking occurs between the two, are left an unmoved spectator.

More philosophical essays, again, we have in the Fundamental Problems of Dr. Paul Carus (Chicago: Open Court Publishing Co.), a volume that treats of "Form and Formal Thought," "Causation," and other cognate themes, and offers what the author calls "a philosophy of most radical freethought" under the guise of "a systematic arrangement of positive facts." Wide is the field ranged by Dr. Carus in these discursive papers—from the Kritik of Kant even to Schopenhauer and Mr. Herbert Spencer—and not a little discussion, it would seem, they have provoked in Chicago circles where they "confute, change hands, and still confute." Though we cannot say that the author's method of philosophy is of the clearest possible presentment, or, indeed, readily comprehensive as a whole, there is no denying that his book offers fruitful material for a debating club of philosophers. To paraphrase a criticism of Kant, his position as a Monist is more likely to be misunderstood than to be undermined by the Chicago philosophers. Dr. Carus declares for a unitary conception of the world against supernaturalism and materialism. He is for "clear thought"—and we are with him here—against mysticism, and for "no agnosticism but positive science," which might also be commendable to our judgment, if only we were assured that positive science was a concrete term representing verifiable facts. It is very handsome in any philosopher to distinguish between the unknown and the unknowable; but to refuse to recognize the existence of the latter, as the author appears to do (p. 49), does not persuade us that positive science is a better sheet-anchor than agnosticism.

Under the suggestive title Atlantis (Hutchinson & Co.) we have a little volume of melodious, well varied, and unaffected lyrics, by Mr. Horace G. Groser, who shows decided aptitude in investing old legends with metrical form and a true lyrical faculty in the making of ballads. Some of the latter are a little too suggestive of the not unhealthy assimilative powers that frequently mark the young poets of the day. They recall Aytoun at times; and, again, in the "Fight of the little 'Content,'" we are minded of another poet and a greater when we read

"Fight on!" quoth he, undaunted; but our war-ships moved away;
"She will split!" the cravens shouted, "Stand aloof! 'tis death to stay."

But in "The Smiting of the Fleet," and, better still, in "The Holding of Londonderry" and "The Foster Brother," Mr. Groser is possessed with the spirit of the old ballad writers, and his verse rings strong and clear.

If Mr. Douglas Sladen's Australian Poets had been a little more comprehensive, and embraced the poets of New Zealand, we doubt not that Mrs. Wilson's Themes and Variations (Griffith, Farran, & Co.) would have been fully represented in that collection. There is nothing, it is true, notably colonial in the book. Mrs. Wilson is by no means assertive, or eccentric, or prodigal of Tennysonian or Swinburnian reminiscences, as our colonial poets are apt to be. Her verse is tuneful, her manner is refreshingly unaffected, her diction refined and genuinely poetic.

Mr. Edgar Fawcett's poems, noticed already in their original form as an American book, appear in an English edition dedicated to Mr. Gleeson White, as Blooms and Brambles (Elliot Stock). A newer claimant to poetic honours is Mr. Marcus Rickards, whose Sonnets and Reveries (Clifton: Baker) is obviously a first volume, and one not without promise. In "School Scenes Revisited" the writer expresses with the truth and simplicity natural to the theme a very common experience. There is more promise in this than in the more ambitious attempts of Mr. Rickards, which are, to speak plainly, stilted or artificial.

Mr. H. Bull, C.E., prefaces a readable little book on the much-vexed question of Bimetallism and the standard of value—The Currency Question and its Solution (Effingham Wilson & Co.)—with the humorous observation, "If there is one science more than another in which comes into play what is usually termed 'common sense' it is the science of Political Economy." Never heretofore has the dismal science been honoured in this fashion.

Put forth as a "Mediæval Pilgrim's Progress" is a translation of the "long forgotten and generally unknown" allegorical romance of Jean de Cartheny—The Wandering Knight (Burns & Oates)—done into English from the edition of 1572, with an introductory note, by the translator, of the author and book. That Bunyan may have seen a version of this curious allegory is, of course, possible; yet no reader can say that he was in any respect indebted to the Canon of Cambrai. Between indebtedness and an accidental suggestion there is a vast difference.

We have to acknowledge Dr. Waldstein's Catalogues of Casts in the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge (Macmillan & Co.); Artists' Wives, from the French of Alphonse Daudet, by Laura Ensor, illustrated by De Bieler, Myrbach, and Rossi (Routledge); Tales from Blackwood, No. IV., New Series (Blackwood & Sons); and Junior School Composition, by David Salmon (Longmans & Co.)

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we cannot return rejected Communications; and to this rule we can make no exception, even if stamps for return of MS. are sent. The Editor must also entirely decline to enter into correspondence with the writers of MSS. sent in and not acknowledged.

ADVERTISEMENTS intended for the SATURDAY REVIEW should be addressed to the MANAGER of the ADVERTISEMENT DEPARTMENT at the OFFICE, 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON. A printed Scale of Charges can be obtained on application.

THE UNITED STATES.

The Annual Subscription to the SATURDAY REVIEW, including postage to any part of the United States, is £1 10s. 4d. or $7 39, and may be forwarded direct to the Publisher, Mr. WILLIAM BOYCE, at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, or to Mr. B. F. STEVENS, American Agency, 4 Trafalgar Square, London. International Money Orders can be sent from any office in the United States, and Subscriptions, payable in advance, may commence at any time.

The SATURDAY REVIEW may be had in Paris every Saturday from Veuve J. BOYVEAU, 22 Rue de la Banque (near the Bourse); also at Le KIOSQUE DUPERRON, Boulevard des Capucines, and Le KIOSQUE MICHEL, Boulevard des Capucines, by whom also Subscriptions will be received.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 1,769, SEPTEMBER 21, 1889:

- First-Fruits of the Strike.*
- Some Morals of the Strike. The Spookical Congress.*
- The Coming French Elections.*
- Kurds and Armenians. Mother Goose in Paris.*
- Coming Election Prospects. Picnic Philosophy.*
- Mr. Chamberlain and the "Modern Gladstonians."*
- Learning to Write. More Gold Boxes Wanted.*
- The Serb. Curious Curios.*
- Zermatt, Past and Present. The Experimental Matinee—III.*
- Racing at Doncaster. Two Melodramas.*
- The Stock Markets. "King John" at the Crystal Palace.*
- A Last Illusion.*
- The Hanse Towns. Novels.*
- Timber and Some of its Diseases. Oxford Scholarship. Novels.*
- A Village Propaganda. Memorable London Houses.*
- A Modern Chess Instructor.*
- The Blameless Ethiopians. Clavers. Novels.*
- The Year-Book of Treatment. Warwickshire Parishes.*
- French Literature. New Books and Reprints.*

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

LYCEUM.—THE DEAD HEART.—On SATURDAY EVENING next, September 23, at Eight o'clock. THE DEAD HEART: Mr. Henry Irving, Mr. Bancroft, Mr. Arthur Stirling, Mr. Righton, Miss Kate Phillips, and Miss Ellen Terry. Box Office (Mr. Hurst) open daily 10 to 5. Seats also booked by letter or telegram.—LYCEUM.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—MAGNIFICENT FIREWORK DISPLAY.—Every Thursday at 8, by Messrs. C. T. Brock & Co. Grand special Devices, including the Magic Garden Fountains which spring into life and Flowers that grow and blossom. Brock's Living Fireworks and other novelties of 1889.—Admission daily, One Shilling.

TOUR in the MEDITERRANEAN.—The ORIENT COMPANY will despatch their large full-powered steamship "CHIMBORAZO," 3,847 tons register, 3,000 horse-power, from London on the 9th of October, for a Thirty-eight Days' Cruise, visiting Lisbon, Gibraltar, Algiers, Palermo, Naples (for Rome), Leghorn (for Pisa and Florence), Genoa, Nice, Malaga (for Granada), and Cadiz (for Seville). The "CHIMBORAZO" is fitted with the electric light, hot and cold baths, &c. Cuisine of the highest order.

Managers.....{ F. GREEN & CO., and ANDERSON, ANDERSON, & CO.,
Fenchurch Avenue, London, E.C.

For terms and further particulars apply to the latter firm, or to the West-End Agents, Grindlay & Co., 55 Parliament Street, S.W.

NOTICE to PRINCIPALS of UNIVERSITIES, COLLEGES, and SCHOOLS.

Principals are requested to forward, without delay, particulars of the EXAMINATIONS and OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS for 1890, to the EDITOR, "Schoolmaster's Calendar," 4 York Street, Covent Garden.

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL, Strand, W.C.—The COUNCIL earnestly appeal for DONATIONS and ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS. £20,000 required for new Nursing Establishment, enlargement of Medical School, the Convalescent Home, and current expenses. Bankers: Messrs. Drummond.
ARTHUR E. READE, Secretary.

HATFIELD.—On the G.N. Main Line, close to Park and Station.—VILLAS to be SOLD or LET. Two Sitting and six Bedrooms, Bath (fitted hot and cold), upstairs w.c., large Kitchen, &c. Gravel soil.—Apply to C. CAVE & SON, Station Road, New Barnet.

SCHWEITZER'S

COCOATINA.

GUARANTEED PURE SOLUBLE COCOA.

This Old-established Article retains its position as "the finest Cocoa in the market." It is unequalled in purity and flavour, bears the strictest Chemical test, and keeps in all climates.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS AND ECONOMICAL.

VAN HOUTEN'S COCOA.

PURE—SOLUBLE.
BEST & GOES FARTHEST.
EASILY DIGESTED.
MADE INSTANTLY.

"Once used, always used—its PURITY is beyond question."
Health.

"It is admirable—flavour perfect—and so PURE."
British Medical Journal.

C. J. VAN HOUTEN & ZOON,
WEESP, HOLLAND.

FRY'S

Lancet—"Pure, and very soluble."

Medical Times—"Eminently suitable for Invalids."

PURE CONCENTRATED

COCOA.

Sir C. A. CAMERON, President of the Royal College of Surgeons, Ireland—"I have never tasted Cocoa that I like so well."

BRAIN FAG, SHATTERED NERVES.
Sleeplessness, Nervous Exhaustion, Rheumatism, Gout, Torpid Liver, Nervous Dyspepsia, &c. yield like magic to the healing influence of mild continuous currents of Electricity, generated, without any shock or discomfort whatever, by wearing

HARNESS' ELECTROPATHIC BATTERY BELT.

This world-famed guaranteed genuine Electric appliance has cured thousands of sufferers, and should be worn by all in search of HEALTH, STRENGTH, and VITAL ENERGY. Write for descriptive pamphlet, containing copies of hundreds of unsolicited testimonials, or call, if possible, and personally consult Mr. C. B. HARNESS, Consulting Medical Electrician (President of the British Association of Medical Electricians), 52 Oxford Street, London, W. (corner of Rathbone Place). Advice free, personally or by letter.

A YRTON & THOMAS, PATENT AGENTS.

Conduct every kind of British, Foreign, and Colonial Business connected with PATENTS, DESIGNS, AND TRADE MARKS.

Mr. H. M. THOMAS, Author of "The True Position of Patentees," being a practical engineer, PERSONALLY SUPERINTENDS the applications in respect of mechanical inventions.

Moderate Terms. No charge for preliminary advice.

Telegraphic Address, "Prolonged, London."

9 & 10 Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, W.C.

METROPOLITAN DRINKING FOUNTAIN and CATTLE TROUGH ASSOCIATION.

Supported entirely by Voluntary Contributions.

This is the only Society providing Free Supplies of Water for Man and Beast in the streets of London and Suburbs.

Contributions are very earnestly solicited.

Bankers: Messrs. BARCLAY, BEVAN, TRITTON, RANSOM, BOUVERIE & CO.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & CO.'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

THE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE.

PROSPECTUS FOR THE YEAR 1889-90.

THE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE has taken such a firm hold upon English-speaking people throughout the world that it would perhaps be superfluous to give a detailed description of the Articles and Illustrations that its readers may look for during the coming year. At the same time it has been the custom to give at the commencement of each new volume some indication of the arrangements that have been made, and it is a convenient moment for announcing any new feature that may be of interest to the Subscribers.

The Publishers beg therefore to say that from the October number onwards THE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE will be printed in a new type, which has been decided upon after much deliberation as being an improvement on that hitherto employed, and the letterpress will be printed across the page, instead of in double column. It is believed that the Illustrations, to which the conductors of the Magazine attach the highest importance, will look better when introduced into the solid page, while the letterpress itself will be more legible. At the same time, with a view to further improving the appearance of the Magazine, the thickness of the paper will be increased.

Among the Articles already arranged for, the Editor has to mention a series of three Illustrated Papers graciously contributed by the titles of which will be the subject of future announcement.

HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS CHRISTIAN,

Social questions of the day will be treated of from time to time, and among the Articles on these topics which will appear during the year will be CHILDREN IN THEATRES. By Mrs. JEUNE.

NAIL AND CHAIN MAKING AT CRADLEY HEATH. By the Rev. HAROLD RYLETT (a principal witness before the House of Lords' Committee on the Sweating System). Illustrated to show the work done by Women and Children.

LONDON MATCH GIRLS. By CLEMENTINA BLACK. Illustrated to indicate the difference between Factory and Home Work.

A Series of Papers on various religious movements is contemplated, and the first of these will appear in the November number, entitled CHURCH SUNDAY SCHOOLS. By the Hon. EDWARD PIERSON THESIGER, C.B.

Illustrated Sporting Articles, written by men who have played a prominent part in the Sporting world, will be produced from time to time, and yachtsmen on both sides of the Atlantic will read with interest

YACHT RACING. By the Right Hon. the EARL OF DUNRAVEN, K.T. Accompanied by Illustrations of the yacht's Valkyrie, Irex, Yarana, and the famous American seventy-footer, Katrina.

No change will take place in the artistic character of the Magazine, which is generally admitted to have reached a high level. The Editor will continue to avail himself of the services of the highly-skilled engravers on wood who have worked for the Magazine for the past six years, and he has been fortunate enough to receive promises of support from artists of the highest standing. Mr. WALTER CRANE will contribute a series of Drawings illustrating his recent journey through Greece; and Articles illustrated by HAMILTON MACALLUM, HARRY FURNESS, HERBERT RAILTON, HUGH THOMSON, REGINALD BLOMFIELD, and W. BISCOMBE GARDNER will appear during the year. Special mention is due to the following Articles:—

TAPESTRY. By ALAN S. COLE. Illustrated from Old Examples in the South Kensington Museum, and from New Examples woven by WILLIAM MORRIS after designs by E. BURNE JONES, A.R.A., and

THE EMBOSSEMENT OF METALS. By W. A. S. BENSON. Illustrated from Old Examples.

In view of the increased circulation of the Magazine in the United States of America special efforts will be made to interest American readers, and the Editor has secured the co-operation of authors and artists whose works have already gained much popularity on the farther side of the Atlantic.

Poetry will play a prominent part in the early numbers, and New Poems will be published from the pens of

ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE	LEWIS MORRIS
WILLIAM MORRIS	and
AUSTIN DOBSON	VIOLET FANE.

Among the features of the Magazine during the next year will be a series of papers on "GIRLHOOD IN DIFFERENT COUNTRIES." The Articles already arranged for include

ENGLISH GIRLHOOD. By Mrs. MOLESWORTH.

FRENCH GIRLHOOD. By Mme. GUIZOT DE WITT.

In view of the growing demand for Articles of a purely personal nature, the Editor intends to introduce sketches from the lives of men and women whose position before the public fairly entitles them to rank as Celebrities of the Day.

The Series of Articles on "OLD ENGLISH HOMES" has proved so popular that it is proposed to extend their scope to WALES, SCOTLAND, and IRELAND.

A Series of Papers on "THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF ENGLAND," written and illustrated from the historical as well as the modern side, is likewise in contemplation. Already arranged are—

ETON. By H. C. MAXWELL LYTE, C.B., and the Hon. ALFRED LYTTELTON.

HARROW. By PERCY M. THORNTON and A. J. WEBBE.

RUGBY. By his Honour Judge HUGHES, Q.C., Author of "Tom Brown's School Days."

Letters will every now and then appear from travellers in different parts of the globe giving personal narratives of their experiences and adventures. The Editor is also making arrangements to give the readers of THE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE a descriptive account of the great routes that connect the component parts of Her Majesty's Empire. The Series will begin with an Article on

THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY and the NEW OCEAN ROUTE to AUSTRALIA. By Sir GEORGE BADEN POWELL, M.P., K.C.M.G.

Sir DONALD MACKENZIE WALLACE, K.C.I.E., will contribute a description of his journey home from India through Persia.

It will also be the Editor's endeavour to show the progress that has taken place in the Indian Empire and the far East during the last fifty years, and Articles have been arranged to indicate the rapid strides that have been made in the Crown Colonies. Illustrated Articles on CEYLON and the STRAITS SETTLEMENTS, contributed by Sir J. FREDERICK DICKSON, K.C.M.G., will appear in the early numbers, while papers on JAPAN and CHINA by recognized authorities are already in course of preparation.

Special care has been taken to secure the services of the leading writers in fiction, but only one Serial novel will run through any considerable part of the year. In each issue, however, will appear a short Story, varied so as to suit the interest of different readers.

In October will begin a Story by
The Right Hon. the EARL OF LYTTON, G.C.B., G.C.S.I., C.I.E., entitled
"THE RING OF AMASIS."

Contributions of various kinds have been also promised by

The Rt. Hon. EARL OF CARNARVON.	GRANT ALLEN.
Mrs. OLIPHANT.	OSCAR WILDE.
Hon. MAUDE STANLEY.	WALTER FREWEN LOED.
W. CLARK RUSSELL.	A. M. BROADLEY.
D. CHRISTIE MURRAY.	STANLEY J. WEYMAN.
ARCHIBALD FORBES.	ROWLAND E. PROTHERO.
SIDNEY COLVIN.	J. D. BOURCHIER.
W. B. RICHMOND, A.R.A.	J. ASHBY STERRY.

And other well-known Writers.

Subscriptions to the English Illustrated Magazine are received by any Bookseller or Newsagent, and at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Son's Railway Bookstalls. Monthly Numbers, Sixpence; by post, Eightpence. Yearly Subscription, including Double Number, 6s. 6d.; or if by post, 8s. 6d.

UNIFORM EDITION OF THE WORKS OF THOMAS HUGHES.

In Crown 8vo. cloth extra, in Monthly Volumes, from October 1889, price 3s. 6d. each.

TOM BROWN'S SCHOOL DAYS. Illustrated by A. Hughes and S. P. Hall. [Oct.]
TOM BROWN AT OXFORD. With Illustrations by S. P. Hall. [Nov.]

THE SCOURING OF THE WHITE HORSE, and
THE ASHEN FAGGOT. With Illustrations by Richard Doyle. [Dec.]

UNIFORM EDITION OF THE NOVELS OF F. MARION CRAWFORD.

In Crown 8vo. cloth extra, in Monthly Volumes, from October 1889, price 3s. 6d. each.

MR. ISAACS. With Portrait of the Author. [Oct.]	ZOROASTER. [1890, Jan.]	PAUL PATOFF. [April.]
DR. CLAUDIUS. [Nov.]	MARZIO'S CRUCIFIX. [Feb.]	WITH THE IMMORTALS. [May.]
A ROMAN SINGER. [Dec.]	A TALE OF A LONELY PARISH. [Mar.]	GREIFENSTEIN. [June.]

A SIXPENNY EDITION OF THE NOVELS OF CHARLES KINGSLEY.

In medium 8vo. paper covers, Monthly from October 1889, price 6d. each.

1. WESTWARD HO! [Oct.]	3. YEAST. [Dec.]	5. TWO YEARS AGO. [Feb.]
2. HYPATIA. [Nov.]	4. ALTON LOCKE. [1890, Jan.]	6. HEReward THE WAKE. [Mar.]

MACMILLAN & CO., BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

EDUCATIONAL.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LONDON.

The SESSION of the FACULTY of MEDICINE will commence on October 1. Introductory Lecture at Four P.M. by Mr. R. J. GODLEE, M.S., B.A., F.R.C.S. The Examinations for the Entrance Exhibitions will commence on September 24. Scholarships, Exhibitions, and Prizes of the value of £800 are awarded annually. In University College Hospital about 3,000 In-Patients and 35,000 Out-Patients are treated during the year. Thirty-six Appointments, eighteen being resident, as House-Surgeon, House-Physician, Obstetric Assistant, &c. are filled up by competition during the year, and these as well as all Clerkships and Dresserships are open to Students of the Hospital without extra fee. Prospectuses, with full information as to Classes, Prizes, &c. may be obtained from the College, Gower Street, W.C.

JOHN WILLIAMS, M.D., Dean.
J. M. HORSBURGH, M.A., Secretary.

UNIVERSITY of LONDON.—SPECIAL CLASSES.

LONDON HOSPITAL MEDICAL COLLEGE. SPECIAL CLASSES are held in the subjects required for the Preliminary Scientific and the Intermediate M.B. (London) Examinations. Fee for the whole Course, to Students of the Hospital 8 Guineas. To others..... 10 " A SPECIAL CLASS is also held for the Primary F.R.C.S. Examination. These Classes will commence in October, and are not confined to Students of the Hospital. MUNRO SCOTT, Warden.

HEIDELBERG COLLEGE, Heidelberg.

Principals.
Dr. A. HOLZBERG, Ph.D., M.A. Heidelberg.
A. B. CATTY, M.A., Christ's Coll., Camb.
WALTER LAWRENCE, M.A., St. John's, Oxon.
At the recent Exam. for the I.C.S. a Pupil of the College obtained HIGHEST MARKS IN GERMAN of all Candidates. SANDHURST FURTHER EXAM., August 1889. Alexander R. C. Rew..... 7536. O. & C. SCHOOL EXAMINATION, 1889. Two Senior and 5 Junior Certificates. Mr. CATTY in London, 5 Riverdale Road, Twickenham.

ST. CLARE COLLEGE, WALMER, KENT.

Head-Master—The Rev. E. D'AUQUIER, M.A. Clare College, Camb. One of the Examiners to the Irish Board of Intermediate Education, late Head-Master of South-Eastern College, Ramsgate, with a staff of Assistant Masters (Graduates). The College is situated in a delightful spot, close to the sea, and contains teaching and boarding accommodation, chapel, sanatorium, infirmary, playroom, laundry, gymnasium, tuckshop, workshop, &c., 14 acres of well-timbered and beautiful grounds, cycle path, cricket and football fields, tennis-courts, &c., sea-bathing and boating. The school year is divided into three terms; each term consists of about thirteen weeks. Inclusive fees, Eighty Guineas per annum. Exhibitions and Scholarships, of £10, £15, and £21, are annually thrown open for competition. For further information, apply to the HEAD-MASTER.

ST. GEORGE'S HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL, HYDE PARK CORNER, S.W.

The WINTER SESSION will commence on Tuesday, October 1, when an INTRODUCTORY ADDRESS will be delivered by Dr. T. CLIFFORD ALLBUTT, F.R.S., at 4 P.M. The following ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS will be offered for competition in October:—
1. A SCHOLARSHIP, value £125, for the sons of Medical men who have entered the School as bond fide first-year students during the current year.
2. TWO SCHOLARSHIPS, each of £50, open to all students commencing their studies.
3. A SCHOLARSHIP, value £90, open to all students who have entered the school during the current year, and who have passed the Cambridge 1st M.B. since October 1888.
4. A SCHOLARSHIP, value £65, for students who, having been signed up for or previously passed the Oxford 1st M.B. or the Cambridge 2nd M.B., have entered the School during the current year.
The following Exhibitions and Prizes are also open to students:—
The William Brown £100 Exhibition; the William Brown £10 Exhibition; the Brackenbury Prize in Medicine, value £32; the Brackenbury Prize in Surgery, value £32; the Pollock Prize in Physiology, value £18; the Johnson Prize in Anatomy, value £10 10s.; the Treasurer's Prize, value £10 10s.; General Proficiency Prizes for first, second, and third year students, of £10 10s. each; the Brodie Prize in Surgery; the Acland Prize in Medicine; the Thompson Medal, and Sir Charles Clarke's Prize.
All Hospital appointments, including the two House Physicianships and two House Surgeonships, are awarded as the result of competition, and are open to the students without additional expense of any kind.
Clerkships and Dresserships, and all the minor appointments, are given without extra fees. Several paid appointments, including that of Obstetric Assistant, with a salary of £100 and board and lodging, are awarded yearly upon the recommendation of the Medical School Committee.
The new Physiological Laboratories and Class Rooms are now open.
Prospectuses and fuller details may be obtained by application to THOMAS WHIPHAM, M.B., Dean.

ST. THOMAS'S HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL, ALBERT EMBANKMENT, LONDON, S.E.

The WINTER SESSION of 1889-90 will OPEN on Tuesday, October 1, with an Introductory Address, at 3 P.M., by Mr. WILLIAM ANDERSON, F.R.C.S. TWO ENTRANCE SCIENCE SCHOLARSHIPS, of 125 guineas and £60 respectively, open to all first-year Students, will be offered for competition. The Examination will be held on September 25, 26, and 27, and the subjects will be Chemistry and Physics, with either Botany or Zoology, at the option of Candidates. Scholarships and Money Prizes of considerable value are awarded at the Sessional Examinations, as also several Medals. Special Classes are held throughout the year for the "PRELIMINARY SCIENTIFIC" and "INTERMEDIATE M.B." Examinations of the UNIVERSITY of LONDON. All Hospital Appointments are open to Students without extra charge. The fees may be paid in one sum or by instalments. Entries may be made separately to Lectures or to Hospital Practice, and special arrangements are made for Students entering in their second or subsequent years; also for Dental Students and for Qualified Practitioners. A Register of approved Lodgings is kept by the Medical Secretary, who also has a list of local Medical Practitioners, Clergymen, and others who receive students into their houses. Prospectuses and all particulars may be obtained from the Medical Secretary, Mr. GEORGE RENDLE. E. NETTLESHIP, Dean.

THE Misses S. and R. ALLEN-OLNEY (formerly Head-Mistresses respectively of Blackheath and South Hampstead High Schools), residing in the healthy suburb of Hampstead, receive a few YOUNG LADIES to board and educate. The arrangements are those of a refined home. Large playground and full-sized tennis-court. Preparation for University examinations and degrees. Reference kindly permitted to parents of present and former pupils. —41 Belsize Park Gardens, London, N.W.

PRÉ SCILLA, LAUSANNE.—Miss WILLS, late Head-Mistress of the Norwich High School, has a very comfortable English HOME for Elder GIRLS. Garden and full-sized Tennis-court. Numbers limited. Subjects taken:—French, German, Italian, Music, Singing, and Painting.

THE Rev. W. ALMACK, M.A., BRUCE CASTLE, near TOTTENHAM, prepares PUPILS wanting special help for the Universities, Army, Legal or Medical Preliminaries, or the ordinary requirements of business life. Excellent house in Park of 20 acres, containing Cricket and Football grounds. References, the Head-Masters of Charterhouse, Cheltenham, and Marlborough.

BELL FARM, CLEWER HILL, WINDSOR. BOYS prepared for ETON and other PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—Address Miss HIBBARD.

MORNING PREPARATORY CLASS for the SONS of GENTLEMEN (exclusively), 13 Somerset Street, Portman Square. Miss WOODMAN will be at home for Visitors on and after October 2. SCHOOL BEGINS October 5, at the usual hour.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS UPRIGHT IRON GRAND PIANOFORTES. Prices from 40 Guineas upwards. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Pianoforte Makers by Special Appointment to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales, 1889.—18, 20, and 22 Wigmore Street, W. Lists free.

ILFRACOMBE.—ILFRACOMBE HOTEL. Thoroughly furnished, equipped, and decorated. 250 Rooms. Eight Lawn-Tennis Courts, Large Swimming Bath, Private Baths. Descriptive Tariff of Manager.

LIFE ASSURANCES, &c.

LONDON ASSURANCE CORPORATION.

Established by Royal Charter, A.D. 1721.
7 ROYAL EXCHANGE AND 43A PALL MALL, S.W.
Marine, Fire, and Life Assurances have been granted by the Corporation for more than a century and a half.
Funds in hand exceed £3,500,000.

NATIONAL PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

FOR MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE.

See New Prospectus, page 17, for particulars of ENDOWMENT-ASSURANCE POLICIES combining LIFE ASSURANCE at MINIMUM COST with provision for old age.
48 GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON.

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY,

Established 1836.
LONDON—1 MOORGATE STREET, E.C. ABERDEEN—1 UNION TERRACE.
INCOME AND FUNDS (1888).
Fire Premiums £615,000
Life Premiums 203,000
Interest 149,000
Accumulated Funds..... £3,581,000

ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH LAW LIFE ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION (Established 1839).

12 Waterloo Place, London. 120 Princes Street, Edinburgh.
Whole Life Bonuses never less than £1 10s. per cent. per annum.
Annuities. Loans. Liberal Conditions.
ARTHUR JACKSON, General Manager } 12 Waterloo Place,
FRANCIS E. COLENSO, F.I.A., Actuary } London.
CITY OFFICE—11 LUDGATE HILL, E.C.
JOHN MUNRO, Secretary.

PHENIX FIRE OFFICE,

LOMBARD STREET and CHANCERY CROSS, LONDON.—Established 1782.
Moderate Rates. Absolute Security.
Liberal Loss Settlements. Prompt payment of Claims.
W. C. MACDONALD } Joint Secretaries.
F. B. MACDONALD }
Losses paid over £17,000,000.

IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Established 1803.—1 OLD BROAD STREET, E.C.; and 22 PALL MALL, S.W.
Subscribed Capital, £1,200,000. Paid-up, £300,000. Total Invested Funds, over £1,600,000.
E. COZENS SMITH, General Manager.

BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
THREE per CENT. INTEREST on DEPOSITS repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS when not drawn below £100. The Bank undertakes, free of charge, the Custody of Securities and Valuables; the Collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Shares, and Annuities. Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued. THE BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free on application. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK.

ISSUE of £371,320.
(Authorized by the Sheffield Corporation Acts, 1883 and 1889.)
The CORPORATION of SHEFFIELD give NOTICE that they are prepared to receive applications for the above sum of SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK. Minimum price of Issue £100 per cent.
Interest payable half-yearly, on March 1 and September 1, at the Sheffield and Hallamshire Bank, Sheffield, or by their London Agents, Messrs. Glyn, Mills, Currie, & Co., 67 Lombard Street.
No sum less than £50 of Stock will be allotted, and any amount in excess of that sum must be a multiple of £10.
Under the Trust Investment Act, 1889, recently passed, this Stock is an available investment for every Trustee who is not expressly forbidden by the instrument creating his trust to invest in Corporation Stock.
Forms of Prospectus, &c., and all information required, will be supplied by Borough Accountant's Office,
Bridge Street, Sheffield,
August 16, 1889.
W. FISHER TASKER, Registrar.

FOR THE DECORATION OF THE HOME
visit THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY'S Gallery,
74 New Oxford Street, W.C. A noble display of Copies of THE GREAT MASTERS, framed
and unframed.

The Chef-d'œuvres of THE NATIONAL
COLLECTIONS of London, Paris, Rome, Dresden,
St. Petersburg, Madrid, &c. &c.

Catalogue of 186 pages, Sixpence, post-free.
A descriptive Pamphlet free by post on application to

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY.

BENGER'S FOOD FOR INFANTS, CHILDREN AND INVALIDS.

GOLD MEDAL, HEALTH EXHIBITION.
EXTRACT FROM PRIVATE LETTER.—"The infant was very delicate; our medical adviser ordered your Food. The result in a short time was wonderful; the little fellow grew strong and fat, and is now in a thriving condition—in fact, 'the flower of the flock.'"
BENGER'S FOOD is Sold in Tins, at 1s. 6d., 2s. 6d., 5s., and 10s., by Chemists, &c., everywhere.
THE TRADE SUPPLIED BY ALL WHOLESALE HOUSES.

First produced and designated CORN FLOUR
by BROWN & POLSON in 1856.

BROWN & POLSON'S CORN FLOUR

Was in the Field some time before any other was anywhere heard of, and no other has now an Equal Claim to the Public Confidence.

GOOD MORNING!

Have you used

PEARS' SOAP?

SHOPPING BY POST.

Before purchasing their DRESS MATERIALS elsewhere, Ladies are requested to write to HY. PEASE & CO.'S Successors for a box of their New Patterns of DARLINGTON DRESS FABRICS.

Which include the celebrated Gold-Medal Merinos, Cashmeres, Cross-Warp Serges, and an immense variety of new goods for Autumn wear.
The Patterns are sent free on approval by return of post to any address in Town or Country.
Telegrams: "SUCCESSORS," DARLINGTON.

HY. PEASE & CO.'S Successors, THE MILLS, DARLINGTON.

THE GREATEST of all PIANOFORTES.

THE STEINWAY PIANOFORTES, New York & London.
Steinway Hall, LOWER SEYMOUR STREET, Portman Square, London, W.

BOOKS, &c.

H. SOTHERAN & CO.

BOOKSELLERS, BOOKBINDERS, AND PUBLISHERS.

GENERAL AGENTS FOR PRIVATE BOOKBUYERS & PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS
IN AMERICA, INDIA, THE COLONIES, AND FOREIGN PARTS.

A MONTHLY CATALOGUE OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS, published over forty years; Specimen No. gratis and post-free.

Telegraphic Address: BOOKMEN, LONDON. Established 1816.

136 STRAND, W.C. AND 36 PICCADILLY, W.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW sent by post at following rates
per annum, paid in advance:

Any part of the United Kingdom	£1	8	2
India and China	1	12	6
Other British Colonies, Europe, Egypt, and America	1	10	6

STEEL & JONES, 4 Spring Gardens, London, S.W.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the 1s.—HATCHARDS, 187 Piccadilly,
London. All the New and Standard Books. Bibles, Prayers, Church Services, &c.
Post Orders promptly executed. Libraries arranged and catalogued.

STAMMERERS and STUTTERERS should read a book by a gentleman who cured himself after suffering nearly forty years.

Post free for 13 stamps, from
Mr. B. BRASLEY, Sherwood, Willesden Lane, Brondesbury, London.

Just published, 3s.; free by post, 3s. 4d.

THE OWENS COLLEGE CALENDAR for the SESSION 1889-90.

London: MACMILLAN & CO. Manchester: J. E. CORNISH.

Just published, crown 8vo. sewed, 1s. 6d.

SHAKESPEARE'S CYMBELINE. Edited, with Notes, by C. M. INGLERY, LL.D., Honorary Member of the Deutsche Shakespeare-Gesellschaft of Weimar, and of the Shakespeare Society of New York. Revised (and Adapted for the use of Schools) by HOLCOMBE INGLERY, M.A.

London: TRÜBNER & CO., Ludgate Hill.

PARIS EXHIBITION.—The FRENCH DICTIONARY
for TOURISTS—BELLOWS' POCKET FRENCH DICTIONARY. 32mo.
with 4 Maps, roan tuck, 10s. 6d.; morocco, 12s. 6d.

"Complete."—Times. "Without a rival."—Spectator. "The most portable."
Also Scotsman.

TOUS les VERBES.—CONJUGATIONS of all the VERBS,
French and English, with Tables of Weights, Measures, and Equivalent
Values, from Bellows' Dictionary. Second Edition. 32mo. 6d.

LONDON: TRÜBNER & CO., LUDGATE HILL.

PARIS: ERNEST LEROUX, 28 RUE BONAPARTE.
AND ALL BOOKSELLERS.

THE BUILDER of September 21 contains Illustrations of St. Peter's (R.C.) College, Glasgow; Museum, Baroda; New Ceiling, Drury Lane
Theatre; Sketches of Canterbury Cathedral, &c. Also articles on The Forth and Clyde Ship Canal; Railway Carriage at Paris Exhibition, &c. &c. 4d.; by post, 4½d., at all Bookstalls, of all News-men, and at the Office, 46 Catherine Street, London, W.C.

FIVE NEW NOVELS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DR. EDITH ROMNEY."

HER OWN COUNSEL. By the Author of "An Old Man's Favour" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo. [Just ready.]

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A DAUGHTER OF THE PEOPLE."

DIANA. By GEORGIANA M. CRAIK (Mrs. MAY),
Author of "Godfrey Helstone" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"One of the best Irish novels of the generation."—Observer.

AN IRISH COUSIN. By GEILLES HERRING
and MARTIN ROSS. 2 vols. crown 8vo.

"A faithful and yet sympathetic record of the impressions produced on the mind of a stranger suddenly launched into the middle of a set of thoroughly typical Irish families, geese, 'buckeens,' and peasants. It is redolent of the soil and yet absolutely unpolitical; and finally it has the rare merit of unusual brevity. One closes the second volume with mingled feeling. Gratitude to the authors for their excellent story is united to a sense of disappointment that the all too brief entertainment is at an end."—Spectator.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "WORTH WAITING FOR."

THE SCOTTS of BESTMINSTER. By
J. MASTERMAN, Author of "A Fatal Error" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.
"This novel is one of the best of the season."—Athenæum.
"Exciting and well told."—St. James's Gazette.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "COUNTESS IRENE."

ROBERT LEEMAN'S DAUGHTERS. By
J. FOGERTY. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.

NOW READY, price One Shilling.

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE.

OCTOBER, 1889.

CONTENTS:

WITHIN SOUND OF THE SHOUTING WATERS. Frontispiece. (In the Valley,
p. 442.) Drawn by Howard Pyle.
HOW I CROSSED MASAI-LAND. JOSEPH THOMSON. With Illustrations from Photographs.
THE LAST GIUSTINIANI. EDITH WHARTON.
THE MASTER OF RALLANTRAE. XII. ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. (Begun in November, 1888—concluded.) Illustration by Wm. Hole.
ELECTRICITY IN WAR:—
I. IN NAVAL WARFARE. W. S. HUGHES, Lt. U.S. Navy.
II. IN LAND WARFARE. JOHN MILLIS, First Lt. Corps of Engineers, U.S.A. With Illustrations.
SONG. DUNCAN CAMPBELL SCOTT.
IN THE VALLEY. Chapters IV.-VII. HAROLD FREDERIC. (Begun in September—to be continued.) Illustrations by Howard Pyle.
A SUMMER IN ICELAND. CHARLES SPRAGUE SMITH. Fully Illustrated.
THE COMMON ROADS. N. S. SHALER.
THE MINIATURE. WILLIAM MCKENDREE BANGS.
THE LIFE OF BENVENUTO CELLINI. EDWARD J. LOWELL. With Illustrations.
JACOB'S FAULTS. FRANCIS DOVERIDGE.
LOOKING ON. EDWARD S. MARTIN.
A SCATTERING SHOT AT SOME RURALITIES. DONALD G. MITCHELL.

FREDERICK WARNE & CO., 15 BEDFORD STREET, STRAND, LONDON.

Pp. 128, ILLUSTRATED, PRICE ONE SHILLING.

THE

NEWBERRY HOUSE MAGAZINE.

A Monthly Review and Family Magazine for Churchmen and Churchwomen.

CONTENTS OF No. 4 FOR OCTOBER.

CHURCHMEN AND THE MAKING OF THE NEXT PARLIAMENT.
By the Rev. T. MOORE, M.A.
THE SIGN OF THE CROSS REGARDED AS A PROFESSION OF CHRISTIAN FAITH. By PÉRE HYACINTHE LOYSON.
WINCHESTER COLLEGE. (Illustrated.) By H. J. HARDY, M.A.
THE RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF AN ANGLICAN RELIGIOUS ORDER.
By the Rev. C. H. SHARPE.
THE DEMOCRATIC METHOD IN MODERN FRENCH ART.
By ROSE KINGSLEY.
THE INHABITANTS OF EAST LONDON. By Canon GREGORY.
THE PUBLIC WORSHIP ACT OF 1874 AND ITS RESULTS. Part II.
By Judge HOMERHAM COX.
FATHER DAMIEN AND THE "MEMORIAL" FUND.
By the Rev. M. M. BEN-OLIEL.
ST. AUGUSTINE'S VISIT TO A MODERN CHURCH. (A Short Story.)
By the Rev. W. S. LACH SZYMIA, M.A.
THE BISHOP'S BIBLE. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY and H. HERMAN.
BOY. (Illustrated.) Concluded. By HELEN MILMAN.
LAY AND CLERICAL CONFERENCES—SERMON OUTLINES FOR OCTOBER—
INSTRUCTIONS ON THE CREED—BIBLICAL QUESTIONS FOR COMPETI-TION—NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS—REVIEWS AND CORRESPONDENCE
&c. &c.

GRIFFITH, FARRAN, OKEDEN, & WELSH, NEWBERRY HOUSE,
LONDON, AND SYDNEY.

Now ready, Sixth Edition, cloth, 6s.

(To Fellows, 4s.)

HINTS to TRAVELLERS. Edited for the Council of the Royal Geographical Society, by Captain W. J. L. WHARTON, R.N., F.R.S., and DOUGLAS W. FRESHFIELD, M.A.

CONTENTS.

PRELIMINARY HINTS. DOUGLAS W. FRESHFIELD, M.A.
HINTS ON OUTFIT. DOUGLAS W. FRESHFIELD, M.A., E. WHYMPER, J. THOMSON,
H. H. JOHNSTON, J. COLES, and others.
MEDICAL HINTS. G. E. DORSON, M.A., M.B., F.R.S.
SURVEYING AND ASTRONOMICAL OBSERVATIONS. JOHN COLES, F.R.A.S.
PHOTOGRAPHY. W. F. DONKIN, M.A., F.C.S., A.C.
METEOROLOGY AND CLIMATE. H. F. BLANFORD, F.R.S.
GEOLOGY. W. T. BLANFORD, F.R.S.
NATURAL HISTORY. H. W. BATES, F.R.S.
ANTHROPOLOGY. E. B. TYLOR, D.C.L., F.R.S.
INDUSTRY AND COMMERCE. J. S. KELTIE.
London: THE ROYAL GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY, 1 Savile Row, W.
And at all Booksellers.

MESSRS. BELL'S LIST.

Just published, crown 8vo. 5s.

THE FRIEND of MAN, and his FRIENDS—
the POETS. By FRANCES POWER COBBE.

BELL'S AGRICULTURAL SERIES.

THE FARM and the DAIRY. By Prof. J. P. SHELDON, formerly of the Royal Agricultural College, and of the Downton College of Agriculture, late Special Commissioner of the Canadian Government; Author of "Dairy Farming" &c. Illustrated. 2s. 6d.

MANURES and their USES. A Handbook for Farmers and Students. By A. B. GRIFFITHS, Ph.D., F.R.S.E., F.C.S. Crown 8vo. Illustrated. 2s. 6d. [Immediately.]

* * Others in preparation.

BOHN'S LIBRARIES.

NEW VOLUMES OF THE STANDARD LIBRARY.

ARTHUR YOUNG'S TRAVELS in FRANCE during the YEARS 1787, 1788, 1789. With an Introduction, Biographical Sketch, and Notes by M. BETHAM-EDWARDS. With Portrait. 3s. 6d.

JOSEPHUS (FLAVIUS), The WORKS of. Whiston's Translation. Revised by Rev. A. R. SHILLETO, M.A. With Topographical and Geographical Notes by Sir C. W. WILSON, K.C.M.G. Vols. I. to III., containing Life of Josephus and the Antiquities of the Jews. [Immediately.]

NEW VOLUME OF THE CLASSICAL LIBRARY.

"THE ARGONAUTICA" of APOLLONIUS RHODIUS. Translated into English Prose from the Text of R. MERKEL by EDWARD P. COLERIDGE, E. Coll. Oriel, Oxon. 5s.

Crown 8vo. with Illustrations, Maps, and Plans, 4s.

CÆSAR'S SEVENTH CAMPAIGN in GAUL. B.C. 52. DE BELLO GALLICO, Lib. VII. Edited, with Notes, Excursus, and Tables of Idioms, by the Rev. W. COOKWORTHY COMPTON, M.A., Assistant-Master at Uppingham School.

"A really admirable class-book. No one ought to find Cæsar dull with these illustrations."—Spectator.

"The general character of the Notes is excellent."—Guardian.

A TREATISE on HYDRODYNAMICS.

With numerous Examples. By A. B. BASSET, M.A., F.R.S., formerly Scholar of Trinity College, Cambridge. Vol. I., 10s. 6d.; Vol. II., 12s. 6d.

[Cambridge: DEIGHTON, BELL, & Co.]

THE ELEMENTARY GEOMETRY of CONICS. By C. TAYLOR, D.D., Master of St. John's College. Sixth Edition, Revised. With a Chapter on the Line Affinity. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.

[Cambridge: DEIGHTON, BELL, & Co.]

EXAMINATION PAPERS in ARITHMETIC

By CHARLES PENDLEBURY, M.A. Consisting of 140 Papers, each containing 7 Questions, and 357 more difficult Problems. Arithmetic Papers set at some of the most recent examinations are appended. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.—A KEY, 5s., in the press.

GRADUATED EXERCISES in ADDITION

(SIMPLE and COMPOUND). For C.S. and Commercial Certificate Examinations. By W. S. BEARD, F.R.G.S., Rochester Mathematical School. Fcp. 4to. 1s. (Answers, to Masters only, free.)

* * A COMPLETE CATALOGUE of Works published by Messrs. BELL (revised to date, September 1889) sent post free on application.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

HURST & BLACKETT'S
NEW NOVELS.

MY LORD OTHELLO. By HENRY CRESSWELL, Author of "A Modern Greek Heroine," "A Willy Widow," &c. 3 vols.

GEOFF. By GERTRUDE FORDE, Author of "In the Old Palazzo," "Driven before the Storm," &c. 3 vols.

THE FREAKS of LADY FORTUNE. By MAY CROMMELIN, Author of "Queenie," "Orange Lily," &c. 2 vols.

THE TREE of KNOWLEDGE. By G. M. ROBINS, Author of "Keep my Secret," "A False Position," &c. 3 vols.

BOTH OF THIS PARISH. By ALGERNON GISSING, Author of "Joy Cometh in the Morning." 2 vols.

A CROOKED PATH. By Mrs. ALEXANDER, Author of "The Wooing o't," "The Freres," &c. Second Edition. 3 vols.

LONDON: HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED, 13 GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET.

NEW NOVEL BY AUTHOR OF "JOHN HERRING." Now ready at all Libraries in 3 vols.

THE PENNYCOMEQUICKS. By S. BARING-GOULD, Author of "Mehalah," "Court Royal," &c. London: SPENCER BLACKETT & HALLAM, 35 St. Bride Street.

WARD & DOWNEY'S NEW BOOKS.

FROM the GREEN BAG. By F. M. ALLEN, Author of "Through Green Glasses," "The Voyage of the Ark." 2s. 6d. "All the synonyms of laughable, droll, and humorous may well be applied to these. There is something peculiarly tickling in the unsuspecting turns of expression to be found on every page."—Athenæum.

IRISH INDUSTRIES. By J. BOWLES DALY, LL.D. 6s. "The facts set forth in clear array are of unquestionable value."—Scotsman.

MARRIAGE and HEREDITY; or, Some Aspects of Social Evolution. By J. F. NISBET. 6s. "Worthy of thoughtful and weighty consideration."—Scotsman.

BYE-PATHS and CROSS-ROADS. By Mrs. PANTON, Author of "Kitchen to Garret." 6s. "Most people will find it exceedingly agreeable to lounge along her 'Bye-Paths and Cross-Roads.' It is just the book to choose as a companion on an autumn holiday."—Scottish Leader.

THE NEW NOVELS.

ROY'S REPENTANCE. By ADELINE SERGEANT 3 vols. "The story is full of interest."—Athenæum.

THE STORY of a MARRIAGE. By L. BALDWIN 3 vols. "It contains several excellent character sketches drawn with real humour and insight."—Athenæum.

A YOUNG GIRL'S LIFE. By B. L. FARJEON. 3 vols. "Mr. Farjeon's new novel is one of the best he has ever written."—Academy.

AT the MOMENT of VICTORY. By C. L. PIRKIS 3 vols. "An interesting story with a very exciting catastrophe at the end."—Pictorial World.

A TRUST BETRAYED. By JOHN TIPTON. 3 vols. [Now ready.]

ROGER FERRON. By Mrs. MACQUOID. 2 vols. "A very pleasant holiday volume."—Literary World.

PRICE SIX SHILLINGS.

THE MASTER of RYLANDS. By Mrs. G. LEWIS LEEDS. A RUINED RACE. By Mrs. SIGERSON.

PRICE TWO SHILLINGS AND SIXPENCE.

THE STORY of MARY HERRIES. By J. FRANCIS. THE CRIME of KEZIAH KEENE. By Mrs. VERE CAMPBELL.

PRICE TWO SHILLINGS.

HER TWO MILLIONS. By WILLIAM WESTALL. MISER FAREBROTHER. By B. L. FARJEON. THE NUN'S CURSE. By Mrs. RIDDELL.

PRICE ONE SHILLING.

HIS OTHER SELF. By E. J. GOODMAN, Author of "Too Curious." AT THE ELEVENTH HOUR. By E. T. PICKERING. THE FOG PRINCES. By FLORENCE WARDEN.

WARD & DOWNEY, 12 YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

NEW NOVEL.

On September 26, in 2 vols. post 8vo.

THE COUNTY:

A Story of Social Life.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE.

POCKET EDITION OF MRS. GASKELL'S WORKS.

To be completed in Eight Monthly Volumes, bound in cloth, with cut or uncut edges, price 1s. 6d. per vol.

Vol. I. WIVES and DAUGHTERS, will be ready September 26.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE.

NEW VOLUME OF "THE DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY."

On September 26, royal 8vo. 15s. in cloth; or in half-morocco, marbled edges, 20s. VOL. XX. (FORREST—GARNER) of the DICTIONARY of NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY Edited by LESLIE STEPHEN.

* * Vol. XXI. will be published on December 23, and the subsequent Volumes at intervals of three months.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE.

Now ready, Fifty-seventh Edition, 2s.

THE CHILD'S GUIDE to KNOWLEDGE. By A LADY. The Original Authorized Edition, brought down to the Present Time. London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, & CO.

WALTER SMITH & INNES' NEW PUBLICATIONS.

TWO NEW NOVELS now ready at all the Libraries.
JACK O' LANTHORN. By C. R. COLERIDGE. 2 vols. 12s.
APPLES of SODOM. By M. BRAMSTON. 2 vols. 12s.
THREE LITTLE MAIDS. By MARY DEANE. 4to.
 Illustrated. Cloth, 6s.
COLONEL RUSSELL'S BABY. By ELLINOR DAVENPORT
 ADAMS. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.
PAUL'S FRIEND. By STELLA AUSTIN. Illustrated. 5s.
MAKERS of MULLING. By C. R. COLERIDGE. Crown
 8vo. cloth, 5s.
LIL. By the Author of "Tip Cat" &c. Crown 8vo.
 cloth, 3s. 6d.
PRINCE VANCE. By ELEANOR PUTNAM and ARLO
 BATES. Illustrated. 3s. 6d.
SOAP BUBBLES. By ISABELLA WEDDLE. Illustrated by T. Pym. 2s. 6d.

HALF-HOUR PLAYS.

By AMABEL JENNER. Crown 8vo. cloth, price 2s. 6d.

1. RUMPELSTILSKIN.
2. TOMMY TROUT AND THE OWL.
3. JACK AND THE BEANSTALK.
4. { SILVERLOCKS AND THE THREE BEARS.
THE SNOW QUEEN.
5. LITTLE PRIT.

Each Play sold separately, price 6d.

JUJUBE. A Tale of Humanity in 1887. By ISABEL
 HORNIBROOK. Crown 8vo. cloth, 2s.

FRIDAY'S CHILD. 8vo. sewed, 6d.

THE SOUL'S HOURGLASS. Translated from the Horologium of Drexelius. Edited by the Rev. Canon ATKINSON. Being a Book of Devotions for the Twenty-four Hours. 3s. 6d.

THE HISTORIC RELATION of the GOSPELS.
 By the Rev. J. J. HALCOMBE, Rector of Balsham, Cambridge. Being an Essay towards re-establishing Tertullian's account. [In the press.]

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF GARIBALDI.

Authorised Translation by A. WERNER.

3 vols. large crown 8vo. cloth, 31s. 6d.

With a Supplement by JESSIE WHITE MARIO, including Facsimiles of some Letters.

Garibaldi's Reminiscences, written at different periods, were published at Florence in January 1888. Signora Mario's Supplement contains explanatory matter and additional biographical facts for the advantage of English Readers.

"These volumes are interesting and important. This is the first important life of the famous General which has been published in English."—Athenæum.

"The story of Garibaldi's life will have a peculiar charm to lovers of daring adventure, especially as it is told in his own words."—Morning Post.

"Of this autobiography it may be said, what can be said of very few others of its class, that most readers will lay it down with a higher opinion of its author and subject than they had when they began to read it."—Scottish Leader.

"Shows that as a hero on the simple old lines there has scarce been any like him in our century."—Scotsman.

"A book of absorbing interest."—Truth.

IN HIDING. By M. BRAMSTON. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

"A story which, in respect both of literary finish and power in the conception and development of character, marks a distinct advance on anything the author has heretofore achieved. The interest is skilfully sustained from the beginning to the end."—Scottish Leader.

A HOUSEFUL of GIRLS. By SARAH TYTLER. Crown
 8vo. cloth, 6s.

"From Miss Sarah Tytler we are safe to receive no melodramatic balderdash, no uncouth and meaningless sentences, no violation of the truths of common life. 'A Houseful of Girls' is in the manner familiar to Miss Tytler's readers—a straightforward tale simply told. The heroines are four young charming sisters."—Saturday Review.

IN the SPRING TIME. By ALICE WEBER. Crown
 8vo. cloth, 6s.

"The young heroine is one of those who, neither perfect nor remarkable, has a story that deserves to be recorded."—Morning Post.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "TIP CAT," "LADDIE," &c.

PEN. By the Author of "Tip Cat," "Laddie," "Miss Toosey's Mission," &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

"There is enforced fidelity to nature in the studies of the two little girls, Pen and Tre."—Saturday Review.

"The plot, though slight, is effective, the pathos is genuine, and rings true."—Athenæum.

OUR LITTLE ANN. New and Cheap Edition, with 2 Illustrations. Small crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

"Her character is one of the most beautiful things we have met in fiction.....
 altogether genuine, refreshing, delightful."—Scotsman.

"Full of tender pathos and humour."—John Bull.

TIP CAT. Cheap Edition. With 2 Illustrations by Randolph Caldecott. Small crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

"We welcome another tale by the anonymous author of 'Laddie.' In this unassuming story genuine humour, pathos, and much observation of human, and especially children's, nature are displayed, together with a delightful style."—Times.

WALTER SMITH & INNES, 31 AND 32 BEDFORD ST., STRAND.

MESSRS. WARD, LOCK, & CO. have the pleasure to announce that an entirely New Edition of "HAYDN'S DICTIONARY of DATES" will be published on Monday next, September 23.

NINETEENTH EDITION.

Containing 1,068 Pages, 10,000 Articles, and 120,000 Dates and Facts.

Revised, Corrected, and Enlarged, with New and Important Matter, and thoroughly brought down to the Present Year.

Medium 8vo. cloth, 18s.; half-calf, 24s.; full or tree calf, 31s. 6d.

HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES,

AND

UNIVERSAL INFORMATION.

A COMPLETE RECORD OF ALL NATIONS AND TIMES.

COMPRISING

Remarkable Occurrences, Ancient, Mediæval, and Modern; Nations and their Governments, Laws, Institutions, Manners, and Customs; the Origin, Development, and Progress of Arts, Sciences, Laws, and Learning;

The Civil, Military, Religious, Moral, and Philanthropic Institutions of various Nations in the different Epochs.

With especial reference to the History and Achievements of the British Empire.

CONTAINING

THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD TO THE AUTUMN OF 1889.

By BENJAMIN VINCENT,

Hon. Librarian of the Royal Institution of Great Britain, Cor. Mem. Hist. Soc.,
 New York, &c.

ESPECIAL FEATURES of the NINETEENTH EDITION.

Beyond the fact that the whole work has been thoroughly revised and corrected, this Nineteenth Edition has the advantage over its predecessors in containing the history of the past four years, the principal events being chronicled under the heads of the different countries, and the more important of them described in separate articles. These events include the particulars of the Conquest of Upper Burmah by England; the Bulgarian War with Servia, with the deposition of Prince Alexander, his abdication, and the election of Ferdinand of Saxe-Coburg; the events in the French Republic, including an account of the Wilson Scandal, the resignation of President Grévy, and the election and rule of President Carnot; the career of General Boulanger, with his indictment and condemnation; the Centenary Exhibition, particulars of the Orleans family, &c.; the visit of the Shah of Persia to Europe, &c.; Zanzibar and the German War; Changes in the Transvaal, and the Uganda Revolution, the Revolution in Roumelia, and the troubles in Crete; the death and funeral of Emperor William I., and the decease of Emperor Frederick III. of Germany; the Samoan Conference in Berlin, &c.

THE AFFAIRS of the BRITISH EMPIRE have received especial attention, and have naturally been treated more at large than those of foreign countries. The political events under the Gladstone and Salisbury Administrations, including the great question of the Unionists and Separatists or Home Rulers, the Local Government Act, and the Sugar Bounties Question, &c. The Ecclesiastical Questions, such as the proceedings against the Bishop of Lincoln, the case of the Reredos in St. Paul's Cathedral, the new Bishoprics, &c. The social, commercial, and philanthropic questions and proceedings, such as the Sweating System Inquiry, Technical Education; the great Popular Institutes for Education and Culture, such as the Polytechnic, the People's Palace, &c.; the Tower Bridge and the Manchester Ship Canal; the extension and progress of commercial enterprise, the various National Exhibitions held in London; the Jubilee year and its doings; all these and various other subjects have been chronicled, elucidated, and explained in this new edition, and many small articles have been inserted relating to topics likely to arise in general conversation, though not falling strictly under any of the heads enumerated above. By this means the general usefulness and interest of the book have been increased, for it will be found to contain information for everybody.

The Times says:—"HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES' is the most universal Book of Reference in a moderate compass that we know of in the English Language."

Specimen Page and Prospectus post free on application.

LONDON: WARD, LOCK, & CO., SALISBURY SQUARE, E.C.
 AND OF ALL BOOKSELLERS.

CLARENDON PRESS NEW AND STANDARD EDUCATIONAL WORKS.

NEW BOOKS.

Just published, 8vo. cloth, 16s.
P. OVIDI NASONIS TRISTIUM LIBRI V. Recensuit S. G. OWEN, A.M. Accedunt Libri Marciani et Libri Turonensis Simulacra.

NEW WORK BY PROFESSOR NETTLESHIP.

Just published, 8vo. cloth, 21s.
CONTRIBUTIONS to LATIN LEXICOGRAPHY. By HENRY NETTLESHIP, M.A., Professor of Latin, Oxford.

SECOND EDITION, REVISED AND ENLARGED.

Just published, Second Edition, 8vo. cloth, 18s.
A COMMENTARY on CATULLUS. By ROBINSON ELLIS, M.A., LL.D., Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, and University Reader in Latin Literature.

Just published, extra fep. 8vo. stiff covers, 2s.
CHAMISSO'S PETER SCHLEMIHL. Edition for Schools. Edited, with Introductions Biographical and Literary, English Notes, and Vocabulary. By EMMA S. BUCHHEIM.

 Uniform with the Clarendon Press Series of German Classics.

Just published, extra fep. 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.
SCOTT'S MARMION. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by THOS. BAYNE.

 Uniform with Professor Minto's Edition of "The Lay of the Last Minstrel."

Just published, extra fep. 8vo. cloth, 6s.
THE ELEMENTS of INDUCTIVE LOGIC. For the Use of Junior Students in the Universities. By T. FOWLER, D.D., late Professor of Logic, Oxford. Fifth Edition, with a Collection of Examples.

STANDARD CLASSICAL TEXTS FOR SCHOOLS.

Extra fep. 8vo. cloth.

CÆSAR—The COMMENTARIES (for Schools). With Notes and Maps. By C. E. MOBERLY, M.A.
Part I. The Gallic War. 4s. 6d.
Books I.—II., III.—V., 2s. 6d. each.
Part II. The Civil War. Book I. Second Edition, 2s.
"Stands high among the best classics we have met."

Saturday Review.
CICERO—INTERESTING and DESCRIPTIVE PASSAGES. With Notes. By H. WALFORD, M.A. In Three Parts. Third Edition, 4s. 6d. Separately, each 1s. 6d.

CICERO—SELECT ORATIONS (for Schools). With Notes &c. By J. R. KING, M.A., Editor of "Cicero Philippii" &c. Second Edition, 2s. 6d.

IN Q. CECILIUM DIVINATIO et in C. VERREM ACTIO PRIMA. Separately, limp, 1s. 6d.
"A masterly work."—School Guardian.

CICERO—SPEECHES AGAINST CATILINA. With Introduction and Notes. By E. A. URCOTT, M.A. 2s. 6d.

"A very useful and well-appointed edition."—Scotsman.
CICERO—DE SENECTUTE. Edited, with Notes, by LEONARD HUXLEY, B.A., Assistant-Master, Charterhouse School. 2s.

CICERO—SELECTED LETTERS (for Schools). With Notes. By the late C. E. PRICHARD, M.A., and E. R. BERNARD, M.A. Second Edition, 2s.

HORACE—The ODES, CARMEN SECLARE, and EPODES. With a Commentary. By E. C. WICKHAM, M.A. Second Edition, 6s.

"Probably the best school Horace in existence."

Saturday Review.
HORACE—SELECTED ODES. With Notes for the use of a Fifth Form. By E. C. WICKHAM, M.A. Price 2s.

JUVENAL—THIRTEEN SATIRES. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by C. H. PEARSON, M.A., and H. A. STRONG, M.A., LL.D., Professor of Latin in University College, Liverpool. Crown 8vo. 6s.

LIVY—SELECTIONS (for Schools). With Notes and Maps. By H. LEE-WARNER, M.A. In Three Parts, limp, each 1s. 6d.

LIVY. BOOKS V.—VI. With Notes &c. By A. R. CLUER, B.A. Second Edition, Revised by P. E. MATHESON. 5s.

"A sound and very useful school and college edition."
BOOK V., separately, 2s. 6d. Classical Review.

LIVY. BOOKS XXI.—XXIII. With Introduction and Notes. By M. T. TATHAM, M.A. 4s. 6d.

"A thoroughly good school book."—Saturday Review.
BOOKS XXI., XXII., separately, 2s. 6d. each.

OVID—SELECTIONS (for the use of Schools). With Notes &c. By W. RAMSAY, M.A. Edited by G. G. RAMSAY, M.A. Second Edition, 5s. 6d.

OVID'S TRISTIA. BOOK I. With Notes &c. By S. G. OWEN, B.A. 3s. 6d.

"A thoroughly scholarly edition."—Classical Review.
OVID'S TRISTIA. BOOK III. With Notes. By the same Author. 2s. [Just published.]

PLINY—SELECTED LETTERS (for Schools). With Notes. By the late C. E. PRICHARD, M.A., and E. R. BERNARD, M.A. Third Edition, 3s.

"An admirable specimen of scholarly editing."—Scotsman.
PLAUTUS—CAPTIVI. With Introduction and Notes. By W. M. LINDSAY, M.A. 2s. 6d.

"An excellent school-book."—Guardian.
PLAUTUS—TRINUMMUS. With Notes, &c. By C. E. FREEMAN, M.A., and A. SLOMAN, M.A., late Assistant Masters in Westminster School. 3s.

TACITUS—The ANNALS. BOOKS I.—IV. Edited, with Introduction and Notes for the use of Schools and Junior Students, by H. FURNEAUX, M.A., late Fellow and Tutor of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, Editor of "Tacitus: Annals, Books I.—VI." 5s.

BOOK I., separately, 2s.

TERENCE—ANDRIA. With Notes &c., by C. E. FREEMAN, M.A. and A. SLOMAN, M.A. 3s.

"The best school edition of the Andria yet published." Athenæum.

TERENCE—ADELPHI. With Notes &c., for the Higher Forms of Public Schools. By the Rev. A. SLOMAN, M.A. 3s.

"An excellent edition."—Spectator.
TERENCE—PHORMIO. Edited, with Notes &c. By the same Author. 3s.

SALLUST—BELLUM CATILINARIUM and JUGURTHINUM. With Introduction and Notes. By W. W. CAPES, M.A. 4s. 6d.

"Thoroughly sound and useful."—Guardian.
TIBULLUS and PROPERTIUS—SELECTIONS. With Introduction and Notes. By G. G. RAMSAY, M.A. 6s.

"The notes are copious, clear, and sensible." Classical Review.

VIRGIL. With Notes &c. By T. L. PAPILLON, M.A. 2 vols. crown 8vo. 10s. 6d. The Text separately, price 4s. 6d.

"The best working edition of Virgil." Journal of Education.

VIRGIL—ECLOGUES. With Notes &c., by C. S. JERRAM, M.A. 2s. 6d.

"Distinctly well done."—Educational Times.
VIRGIL—ÆNEID. BOOK I. With Notes &c., by C. S. JERRAM, M.A. Limp, 1s. 6d.

VIRGIL—ÆNEID. BOOK IX. With Notes by A. E. HAIGH, M.A. Limp, 1s. 6d.

LEWIS and SHORT'S LATIN DICTIONARY. Founded on Andrews' Edition of Freund's Latin Dictionary. 4to. cloth, 25s.

A NEW SCHOOL LATIN DICTIONARY. A LATIN DICTIONARY for SCHOOLS. By CHARLTON T. LEWIS, Ph.D., Editor of "Lewis and Short's Latin Dictionary." Small 4to. cloth, 1s.

"Within its limits without a rival among school dictionaries."—Classical Review.

ÆSCHYLUS—PROMETHEUS BOUND (for Schools). With Notes &c. By A. O. PRICHARD, M.A. Second Edition. 2s.

ÆSCHYLUS. With Introductions and Notes. By ARTHUR SIDGWICK, M.A. 3s. each:—

—AGAMEMNON. Third Edition, Revised. "Admirably adapted for the purpose for which it is intended."—Athenæum.

—CHOEPHOROI. "Will abundantly supply the requirements of any ordinary student."—Spectator.

—EUMENIDES. "The work is good and solid, and represents the judgment of an acute scholar."—Guardian.

ARISTOPHANES. In Single Plays. Edited, with English Notes, Introduction, &c., by W. W. MERRY, D.D. 2s. each:—

—The ACHARNIANS. Third Edition. "Quite sustains Mr. Merry's high reputation as a scholar." Cambridge Review.

—The CLOUDS. Third Edition. "The notes seem to leave no difficulty unexplained." Spectator.

—The FROGS. Second Edition. "An excellent school edition."—Athenæum.

—The KNIGHTS. "Excellent fitted to the needs of sixth-form boys." Saturday Review.

CEBES—TABULA. With Introduction and Notes, by C. S. JERRAM, M.A. 2s. 6d.

DEMOSTHENES—The FIRST PHILIPPIC and O LYNTHIACS I.—III. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by EVELYN ABBOTT, M.A., LL.D., and P. E. MATHESON, M.A. 3s.

"A model of what a school-book should be."—Academy.
EURIPIDES—ALCESTIS (for Schools). By C. S. JERRAM, M.A. Second Edition, 2s. 6d.

EURIPIDES—HELENA. For Upper and Middle Forms. By the same Editor. 3s.

EURIPIDES—IPHIGENIA in TAURIS. By the same. 3s.

EURIPIDES—HERACLEIDÆ. By the same. 3s.

EURIPIDES—MEDEA. With Introduction and Notes. By C. B. HEBBERDEN, M.A. Cloth, 2s.

"The notes are practical and to the point."—Spectator.
"All that an edition of this play should be." Oxford Magazine.

EURIPIDES—HECUBA. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by CECIL H. RUSSELL, M.A., Assistant Master at Clifton College, late Scholar of Trinity College, Oxford. 2s. 6d. [Just published.]

HERODOTUS, BOOK IX. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by EVELYN ABBOTT, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Balliol College, Oxford. 3s.

HERODOTUS—SELECTIONS from. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, and a Map, by W. W. MERRY, D.D. 2s. 6d.

HOMER—ILIAD. BOOKS VI. and XXI. With Notes, &c. By H. HAILSTONE, M.A. 1s. 6d. each.

HOMER—ILIAD. BOOKS I.—XII. (for Schools) With an Introduction, a brief Homeric Grammar, and Notes. By D. B. MONRO, M.A. Second Edition, Revised and Corrected. 6s.

"Will supersede, as it deserves to supersede, all its predecessors."—St. James's Gazette.

BOOKS XIII.—XXIV. 6s.
"The edition for English schools."—Guardian.

HOMER—ODYSSEY. BOOKS I.—XII. Edited, with Notes, Introduction, and Synopsis of Homeric Forms, by W. W. MERRY, D.D. Fortieth Thousand. 5s.

Books I. and II., limp, 1s. 6d. each.
"Mr. Merry's editions have revolutionized the study of Homer throughout the country."—Oxford Magazine.

BOOKS XIII.—XXIV. Second Edition, 5s.

LYSIAS—EPITAPHIOS. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by F. J. SNELL, B.A. 2s.

LUCIAN—VERA HISTORIA (for Schools). By C. S. JERRAM, M.A. Second Edition, 1s. 6d.

PLATO—The MENO. With Introduction and Notes. By ST. GEORGE STOCK, M.A., Pembroke College, Oxford. 2s. 6d.

SOPHOCLES (for the use of Schools). Edited by L. CAMPBELL, M.A., and E. ABBOTT, M.A. New Edition, 2 vols. 10s. 6d.

Also in Single Plays, limp.
OEDIPUS TYRANNUS, 2s. AJAX, 2s. ELECTRA, 2s.

OEDIPUS COLONEUS, 1s. 9d. TRACHINIAE, 2s.

ANTIGONE, 1s. 9d. PHILOCTETES, 2s.

THEOCRITUS (for Schools). With Notes. By H. KYNASTON, D.D. (late Snow). Fourth Edition, 4s. 6d.

XENOPHON—SELECTIONS (for Schools). With Notes and Maps. By J. S. PHILPOTTS, B.C.L. Fourth Edition, 3s. 6d.

XENOPHON—EASY SELECTIONS (for Junior Classes). With a Vocabulary, Notes, and Maps. By J. S. PHILPOTTS, B.C.L., and C. S. JERRAM, M.A. Third Edition, 3s. 6d.

STANDARD CLASSICAL WORKS.

8vo. cloth.

PERSIUS—The SATIRES. With a Translation and Notes. By J. CONINGTON, M.A. Edited by H. NETTLESHIP, M.A. Second Edition, 7s. 6d.

CICERO DE ORATORE. With Introduction and Notes, by Professor A. S. WILKINS, M.A. Book I. Second Edition, 7s. 6d. Book II. 5s.

CICERO'S PHILIPPIC ORATIONS. With Notes. By J. R. KING, M.A. 10s. 6d.

CICERO—SELECT LETTERS. With Notes &c. By ALBERT WATSON, M.A. Third Edition, 18s.

TACITUS—The ANNALS. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by H. FURNEAUX, M.A., formerly Fellow and Tutor of Corpus Christi College, Oxford. Vol. I. Books I.—VI. 18s.

"A truly magnificent book, scholarly, practical, and dignified, worthy of Oxford and Tacitus."—New York Nation.
"Has superseded all previous English editions."—Guardian.

BY PROFESSOR JOWETT, M.A.
ARISTOTLE—The POLITICS. Translated into English, with Introduction, Marginal Analysis, Essays, Notes, and Indices. Vols. I. and II. Vol. I., containing the Introduction and Translation. Vol. II., containing the Notes. 21s.

"The most agreeable and helpful English version."—Pall Mall Gazette.
PLATO—The DIALOGUES. Translated into English, with an Analysis and Introduction. New Edition, 5 vols. £3 10s.

PLATO—The REPUBLIC. Translated into English, with an Analysis and Introduction. Third Edition, 12s. 6d.

THUCYDIDES. Translated into English, with Introduction, Marginal Analysis, Notes, and Indices. 2 vols. 32s.

SOPHOCLES—The PLAYS and FRAGMENTS. With Notes &c. By L. CAMPBELL, M.A. 2 vols. Vol. I.—OEDIPUS TYRANNUS, OEDIPUS COLONEUS, ANTIGONE. Second Edition, 16s. Vol. II.—AJAX, ELECTRA, TRACHINIAE, PHILOCTETES, FRAGMENTS. 16s.

"A solid monument of distinguished erudition and rare industry."—Athenæum.

MR. NEWMAN'S EDITION OF THE "POLITICS."
THE POLITICS of ARISTOTLE. Edited, with Introductory Essays and English Notes, by W. L. NEWMAN, M.A., Fellow of Balliol College, late Reader in Ancient History, Oxford. Vols. I. and II. 28s.

"A work of the first magnitude of its kind. May prove the definitive edition for a long while to come."—Oxford Magazine.

FRAGMENTS and SPECIMENS of EARLY LATIN. By J. WORDSWORTH, M.A. 18s.

"Supplies materials for a thorough study of Old Latin which have not been brought together in any English or in any single foreign publication."—Rev. H. A. J. MONRO.

A NEW WORK ON GREEK AND LATIN PHILOLOGY.
THE PRINCIPLES of SOUND and INFLEXION as illustrated in the GREEK and LATIN LANGUAGES. By J. E. KING, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Lincoln College, Oxford, and C. COOKSON, M.A., Assistant Master at St. Paul's School, London. 18s.

"The task has been carried out with full competence, sound judgment, and great accuracy. There are abundant signs of independent study, and the work is sure to find wide acceptance as an authoritative text-book."—Academy.

SELECTIONS from POLYBIUS. Edited by J. L. STRACHAN-DAVIDSON, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Balliol College, Oxford. With 3 Maps, Prolegomena, and Appendices. Buckram, 21s.

FULL CLARENDON PRESS CATALOGUES sent free on application.

LONDON: HENRY FROWDE, CLARENDON PRESS WAREHOUSE, AMEN CORNER, E.C.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW
OF
POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,770, Vol. 68.

September 28, 1889.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

THE FRENCH ELECTIONS.

THE result of the general election in France has justified those who had, after much doubting and with great hesitation, come to the opinion that the chances were slightly in favour of the so-called Parliamentary Republicans. The diminished popularity of General BOULANGER and the somewhat equivocal conduct of the Conservative parties were in their favour. When the nature of the attack on them was considered, it seemed not improbable that, although their own popularity was far from considerable, they would benefit by the support of that great mass of Frenchmen who are at all times opposed to any change of government. The result shows that they have done so, and the Republic has, for the present at least, beaten the coalition formed against it. One member of that alliance has undoubtedly suffered signal defeat. It is now beyond question that General BOULANGER has failed. No doubt it is remarkable enough that he should have formed any party at all; and it is an astonishing illustration of the low level reached by French politics that he should possess in the Chamber of Deputies a following which, when the second ballots have been taken, may be found to be nearer forty than twenty. This, however, was not what General BOULANGER and the Boulangists promised to do. It was not their hope that they would form the smallest of five or six groups in the new Chamber; but, unless fortune changes greatly and soon, this is the utmost they can hope for. It was quite unnecessary to speculate as to whether they will have their chance again. There is, in any case, no probability that it will come early, and for some time, at least, we need not inquire what the position of the General is going to be. So much, at least, is settled by the election. It may also be considered proved that there is no effective majority in France which wishes for a revision of the constitution controlled by parties or persons openly unfriendly to the Republic. As far as it goes, this, no doubt, promises well for the future of the present form of government.

There has, however, been so strong a disposition to believe that the result of the voting would be the complete defeat of the discredited Parliamentary Republicans that there has, by a natural reaction, been a marked tendency to overrate the extent of their victory. The first ballot has given them a majority of sixty-five. The second may increase this majority to a hundred and twenty, or thereabouts. Now if this were a mere party majority, it would be amply sufficient. But it is not. It is a majority in support of a form of government. It is, in fact, all the State has to rely on for its support, against the very large minority which is hostile to it on principle. Although, therefore, it may be enough for the moment, it certainly does not afford a large margin of stability. This majority, too, is composed to a large extent of materials which are by no means trustworthy. Very many of the voters who supported Republican candidates belong to the class which will give its support to any existing form of government—which had voted for NAPOLEON III., for the Republic of 1848, and for LOUIS PHILIPPE—which would vote to-morrow for anybody or anything established simply because it dreads revolutions and changes. Support of this kind, though useful, and even indispensable, is not very trustworthy. It habitually fails a Government in those trials which are apt to fall upon the State in France. Those who gave it to the Third Republic last Sunday would give it next month to General BOULANGER, or King PHILIPPE, or the Emperor JEROME, or the Emperor VICTOR, if any one of them had seized power for himself by violence. There is, it is true, very little danger of this for the present. None of the Opposition leaders enjoys a great popularity. The present generation of Parisians has apparently either not inherited the old taste for street-fighting, or has been taught by the defeat of the Communards that it is helpless against the troops in the open asphalted streets of Paris. The army is apparently resolute to take no part in politics. As long as it remains quiet and the command of the garrison of Paris is in safe hands, there will be no disturbance and the Republic is safe. But this security depends entirely on its own wisdom and immunity from disastrous accident of any kind. Its unpopularity in Paris is manifestly still great, and it would certainly have to fear the populace of the capital if ever it did lie open to attack. The extent, too, of the Republican victory may easily be exaggerated by those who compare the result of the election with what might have been, and not with what was. Even if the second ballots turn out as favourable to them as they hope, the Republicans will still have lost some ground since the last general election. They are, it is true, in the habit of insisting with some complacency on the fact that few of the Conservatives openly called themselves Royalists or Bonapartists. In almost all cases they kept their party principles in the background and contented themselves with demanding a revision. They certainly showed a consciousness on their part that they would do well to consult the timidity of the voters. But the Republicans will be very unwise if they make much of the value of this reticence as evidence of a preference for the Republic among the voters who supported opposition candidates. A man who voted for a Royalist or Bonapartist cannot possibly have been a friend to the Republic. Those who gave their voices for General BOULANGER must at least be actively hostile to the Republic that now is. Taken all together, the revisionists of one party or the other amount to over a third of the voting constituencies of France. This is about the amount of support given to the Conservative candidates at the last general election. The Republic has, therefore, obviously not gained ground, and when the second ballots have been taken it may be found to have lost. When it is remembered that the victory, such as it is, has not been won for a party and a policy, but for a form of government, it can hardly be denied that there is very little to be proud of in the discovery that the victorious side has at the best only lost a little ground. No doubt if the Republicans of all sections are wise—if they have learnt their lesson and are resolute to avoid the errors of the last six or seven years they may regain all the ground they have lost. It ought not to be difficult to reabsorb the majority of Boulangist voters, and it will not be impossible to bring over many of those who were frightened some years ago by the growing power of the Radicals into giving their support to the Conservatives. Whether this is to be done or not depends wholly on the conduct of the Republicans.

It is somewhat early to decide whether there is any promise of this happy change among the Republicans. No doubt there are favourable signs to be seen. The formation of the Liberal-Union party under the leadership of M. LÉON SAY is one. This party is to endeavour to make the Republic Conservative according to the formula of M. THIERS; and it is undeniable that, if any considerable portion of the Royalists and Bonapartists are to be recruited for the Republic, it will be by some such policy as this. Another favourable sign is the undoubted defeat of the Radicals, who have lost several seats. That they will learn wisdom is in the last degree doubtful, but their check may at least convince the other Republicans of the worthlessness of their support. On the other hand, there is much to show that the majority of this Chamber will not differ essentially from the majority of the last. If the Conservatives have been compelled to sink their principles and differences during the election, so have the Republicans to no small extent. They have made the most of a common party name, and have said comparatively little of the principles it covers. When the Chamber meets, these suppressed causes of quarrel may be found—it will be wonderful, indeed, if they are not found—to have lost little of their influence. M. LÉON SAY and M. CLÉMENTEAU both style themselves Republicans; but when they are called upon to co-operate in carrying out a common policy they must infallibly be found at variance on a great many essential points, unless, indeed, one of them is prepared to submit to the other. When a difference of this nature arises, what is to be expected? The Radicals, though diminished in power, will still be able to upset any Ministry by giving their support to the reactionaries, as they repeatedly did in the last Chamber. If, however, they are able to impose their will on any Ministry, it must be at the expense of the loss of the support of the Liberal-Union, on the supposition, that is to say, that this party has a little more backbone than the Moderates have commonly possessed. Should the Liberal-Union prove as feeble as parties of “respectable people” commonly do in France, then we must be prepared for a repetition of the instability, the spiteful anti-clerical policy, and the financial mismanagement which have damaged the Republic already. No Republican party can check another except by coalition with the Conservatives, and hitherto it has been Radicals who have made most use of that alliance. It is well to wait and see whether a new line of conduct is to be followed in the new Chamber. For the present the safest guess to make is that, as the elections have left things much as they were, so they will continue to go on much as they did.

RINGS.

THE Copper Ring was a disastrous failure—profitable to some of its promoters, no doubt, but ruinous to the rest, and obviously discreditable to all. But some other schemes have proved very profitable indeed to the founders of them—more particularly, in our own country, the Salt Union; which enables the monopolists who control it to divide whatever profits may result from doubling the price of the commodity. This, indeed, is an ideal institution of its kind; for, while it returns enormous dividends to the handful of capitalists who share in them, the consumer is not aware of any oppressive exaction. The cheapness of salt, its universal use in comparatively small quantities, and its employment and distribution in a great variety of other articles, account for that. The Salt Union, therefore, has had an easy and profitable time of it; and its success has naturally led to inquiry in commercial circles as to whether some other commodities in common use do not offer similar advantages to financial conspiracy. Various articles have been hit upon as promising for any bold and opulent company of speculators, the last being Bread.

It appears that quite recently two or three Bread Companies (Limited) have been started in London; which, with its four and a half millions or so feeding within a range of six miles from Charing Cross, supplies a very pretty area of consumption. There is the London and County Bread Company, the London and Westminster Bread Company, the Metropolitan District Company. These associations are all new; so new that only one of them has lasted long enough to declare a dividend—“an interim dividend at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum.” But they are said by the composer of a certain captivating advertisement to be equally prosperous. If one is able to declare an interim dividend of 12 per cent. per annum, so could both the others if they pleased, and their books prove it. That looks pretty well for all three companies. They have only just started, they are working in competition with each other, and yet in these early days each of them is able to pay its shareholders 12 per cent. dividends. What to do, then, but continue in prosperity, taking full advantage of their latest processes, their new and improved machinery, and the abundant capital that gives command of the market for material? Yes; but the directors of these 12 per cent. bread companies have made a most important and lamentable discovery. This discovery they seem to have communicated to the newspapers just before they gave out the aforementioned advertisement, which announces that they are resolved to form a Bread Union, or “Ring.” The advertisement is set off with a collection of Opinions of the Press; and, if the gentle reader will take the trouble to scan these opinions, he will find in them a frequent repetition of sentences evidently culled from a common original. But to the discovery, which is this. In the baking business there is “a miserable underselling epidemic which is alike the bane and the disgrace of the trade.” This underselling is so prevalent, so commonly is it practised by “the unprincipled trader bent on ruining himself and his neighbours,” that “companies which have started with more or less success have been considerably hampered by bad prices.” It is therefore necessary, or at any rate desirable, that “a very large company of widespreading power” should be formed to “keep the underseller within bounds,” and “banish the bad prices which bring ruin and misery in their train.”

So write certain trade journals on behalf of the Bread Union (Limited), which is to be based upon the three companies named above. These opinions of the press are quoted by the promoters of the Bread Union, in their prospectus, as supplying the moral justification of their enterprise; their own account of it being stated in a few brief and pregnant words that come to the same thing. The directors beg to state that the object of the Union “is not to unduly raise the price of bread” (which of course should be raised duly, if at all), “but to maintain it at a remunerative figure by securing a large number of shops in the metropolis.” But what else do these gentlemen tell us? Why, that in spite of the disastrous competition in the baking business, the three Companies of which the Union is to be formed are earning 12 per cent. dividends. They do this all the while they are cutting each other’s throats! So they say. Is the statement true? Are there no illusions, no misrepresentations about it? If not, what do they mean by parading these stories of prices so ruinously low that a fair profit cannot be obtained? They themselves, these Companies, take part in the competition which “brings ruin and misery in its train.” They are able to pay 12 per cent. to their shareholders nevertheless; but yet they find it necessary to form themselves into a very large Company of widespreading power “to keep the underseller within bounds.”

After explaining the facts of the case from their own prospectus, we need not waste many words on the promoters of the Bread Union (Limited). They themselves make out that they are engaged in establishing a monopolist Company for the purpose of drawing the whole bread trade of London under their control, for suppressing competition in it, and thereby raising prices which they consider ruinous while it pays such dividends as they say they are now earning. Take them at their word, and their Bread Union is a mere conspiracy to force up the price of bread for the whole population of London by way of enriching a little gang of speculators. That is the plan, supposing (as we have no right to suppose) that the Bread Union is not a “bogus” enterprise from its foundations; and, though it is by no means certain to succeed, it is a scheme so abominable that it cannot be denounced too strongly. At no time would it be endurable that a handful of men with money should get control of a commodity like bread, with intent to levy a tax upon it for their own profit. At a time like this, when capital is attacked right and left for imaginary crimes, as well as for offences which it must continue to commit if the practical affairs of life are to be carried on at all, such naked conspiracies of greed as a Bread Ring for London deserve punishment as mere incendiarism. The Bread Union may come to nothing, and probably will. If we knew all, we might discover offhand that it has no more chance of success than the People’s Bread Company, which broke down the other day in about as disastrous a style for its shareholders as they could well endure. But it must be assumed that the Bread Union is meant to succeed; and the point for observation is that the promoters of this exasperating scheme make no difficulty of flaunting it in the public prints just when attempts are being made to raise the whole mass of working men in insurrection against “the tyranny of capital.” It is this that gives the Bread Union and its audaciously candid advertisement a particular importance. What better justification of their tirades than a Bread Ring can the agitators desire? As exponents of capitalist selfishness and oppression, what could serve them better at this moment, when miners, tailors, letter-carriers, and bakers are urged to emulate the triumphs of the dockers’ strike, than first to point to the proposed Bread Ring in London and then to thousands of mill-hands deprived of work because of a Liverpool "corner" in cotton? To be sure, according to the latest lights on the subject, nobody is to blame for the "corner." Something of the kind does, indeed, exist; and while it disorders and impoverishes the whole cotton trade, certain individuals who are boldly described as speculators hope to make a great deal of money by it. But we are to understand that the "corner" is perfectly legitimate, and quite according to the rules of the game. It is simply a question of "pull devil, pull baker," between speculative dealers in the raw material and speculative manufacturers of it, about which there is nothing unusual. So it may be, without putting a much better face on the matter. Scores of mills are idle all the same, and foreign manufacturers are filling the markets while many thousands of our own workmen are doing nothing. With all this, however, the cotton corner is less detestable than the proposed Bread Ring, which is not without its strict-trade-principle apologists either. Rigs in copper, salt unions, cotton "squeezes," syndicates for buying up medicinal drugs and doubling the price of them, even conspiracies of a similar sort for taxing every loaf of bread, may be carried on without interference from the law; but surely discretion suggests that restraint should be placed on such enterprises at a time like this. They are not only a reproach to commerce, they are a danger to society, and one that Parliament must look to before long. None of them come into the description of honourable trade; some of them rank in point of merit with sheer brigandage; and if the preachers of Socialism are to be decried, quite as pestilent are the knots of capitalists who, with their rapacious rigs and rings, fill the mouth of anarchy with argument and invite rowdiness to violence.

MR. WILKIE COLLINS.

THE death of Mr. WILKIE COLLINS, at the age of sixty-five, on Monday last, closed the career of the last of that group of great writers of fiction whose best work was produced, roughly speaking, in the thirty years between 1840 and 1870. For a long time past Mr. COLLINS has led a retired life. Those who enjoyed his friendship have borne testimony to his many amiable qualities, his modesty, kindness, and courtesy; but the man will never be known apart from his books, and the future admirer of The Woman in White or The Moonstone will find very scanty materials out of which to form an image of his idol. He was the intimate of DICKENS, and like other more or less celebrated writers, he acquired the habit of taking opium in some form or other. It is not certain that he injured himself very materially by the practice. However this may be, it remains the only known sensational incident in the life of the greatest writer of sensational fiction that England has produced.

Mr. COLLINS was the son of WILLIAM COLLINS, R.A. His first novel was published in 1850, and he had to wait ten years, during which he wrote some four or five works, including Basil and After Dark, before The Woman in White placed him in the first rank of living novelists. In 1860 the "first rank" included GEORGE ELIOT and CHARLES READE, The Mill on the Floss and The Cloister and the Hearth being published within the same twelve months as The Woman in White. A great deal of DICKENS's best work had still to be written. THACKERAY's Virginians had appeared two years previously; but some of his most charming if not his best-known books remained unpublished. BULWER and TROLLOPE were at their zenith; DISRAELI and a host of minor writers enjoyed a wide popularity. Nevertheless, Mr. WILKIE COLLINS became prominent even in this company, and, whatever the ultimate judgment as to the true value of his work may be, nothing can deprive him of the credit attaching to such performance.

Of late years Mr. COLLINS's reputation has suffered a partial eclipse, such as overtakes all writers sooner or later. It is perhaps worth while, therefore, to consider how far his literary method is likely to render permanent a neglect for which Mr. HARRY QUILTER (with whom courtesy and wisdom go hand in hand) took the critics severely to task some little time ago. Mr. COLLINS explained his theory of story-telling in the preface to a later edition of The Woman in White. He there says:—"I have always held the old-fashioned opinion that the primary object of a work of fiction should be to tell a story, and I have never believed that the novelist who properly performed this first condition of his art was in danger, on that account, of neglecting the delineation of character. It may be possible in novel-writing to present characters successfully without telling a story, but it is not possible to tell a story successfully without presenting characters." In The Woman in White Mr. COLLINS certainly did attempt to delineate character, succeeding in a great measure with the sketches of Mr. PHILIP FAIRLIE and Mme. Fosco, and failing, brilliantly no doubt, with the highly elaborated character of the Count. Some years afterwards, however, Mr. COLLINS proved the falsity of his theory by writing Armada, in many respects his most remarkable work, but containing not a single character (save Miss GWILT) of which the mind of the reader readily retains even the name. The plot of this book is even more intricate than that of The Woman in White—so intricate, indeed, that it too escapes the memory. It is, perhaps, on this account that many persons read Mr. COLLINS's novels again and again. They are not read for their charm of style—for Mr. COLLINS contented himself with writing forcible, clear, and unadorned English—but because they are always new, the reader forgetting how the virtuous characters escape from the toils of their persecutors. The fact remains, however, that, in spite of his theory, his books enjoy a wide popularity, and, whatever he attempted, he certainly did not succeed in drawing a single character, with the exception of Fosco, which has appealed to the imagination of the reading public. It is impossible, too, not to believe that Mr. COLLINS's method of making his characters tell his story for him will affect his popularity in the long run. The method is clumsy and irritates the reader. This more particularly is the case when the story is taken up by some servant or person who might be expected to have a weak memory. The chapter begins with an apology for the writer's deficiency, and then on the next page some conversation is reported verbatim, with an accuracy that would do credit to the memory of a MACAULAY. Another irritating necessity of Mr. COLLINS's narrative method may seem almost too trivial to mention; but it is really of the first importance where a character is designed to leave a favourable impression on the reader's mind. This is the necessity which characters like MARIAN HALCOMBE labour under of constantly apologizing for playing the eavesdropper. From the beginning they must always be leaning over the banisters, peeping through keyholes, or listening at half-opened doors, otherwise the story could not be told. These objections, perhaps, do not affect our enjoyment of the books very seriously; but we repeat that it is difficult to believe that they will not so affect a generation grown accustomed to more artistic workmanship.

SENSE ABOUT THE NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

THE Times has published within a few days of each other the first two pieces of thoroughly good comment on the naval manœuvres which we have yet had the pleasure of seeing. One was a letter from General Sir ANDREW CLARKE, and the other a letter from Admiral COLOMB. It is only polite to presume that they will have been read and thought over in some quarters where they seem to have been particularly needed. We are not, however, so sure of it that we think it superfluous to call attention to them, and to assure all whom we may reach that they are particularly worthy of attention. They deserve reading if only for the delightful contrast they present to the mass of insignificant detail, the unthinking croaking, and the vague, surprised speculation which made up nearly all the comment written on the manœuvres while they lasted. But they have another value. They point, to those who can read them with any intelligence, the lines on which future manœuvres must be conducted if they are not to run the same course as the autumn manœuvres of the army; that is to say, if they are not to fall into neglect after serving for a very brief period as a raree show. How real that danger has been we need point out to nobody who read the accounts of the doings of one squadron at least in the last manœuvres. The spectacle of ships running loose about the coast making believe to burn towns and running themselves sillily into traps was enough to make many, who have every wish that the navy should be well practised, hope sincerely that there might be no more manœuvres at all if they were to be conducted like this. It can do the navy no good to be taught that a squadron may pardonably do imbecile things, or that its enemy may be expected to do them.

Put briefly, the aim both of General CLARKE and of Admiral COLOMB is to persuade their readers that, if manœuvres are to have any real value as lessons in strategy, they must be conducted with some approximation to an imitation of the conduct which would be expected from a sane enemy in war-time. No risks must be run which would be thought absurd in actual warfare when compared with the objects to be attained. There must be some rational calculation of chances, some regard for probability, some balancing of the comparative values of game and candle. No trace of any such process was to be seen in the late manœuvres. We have not for long seen anything more convincing or more luminous than Admiral COLOMB's demonstration that Admiral BAIRD's ships were employed all through in doing things which would compel them to run an immense risk for an object of the most doubtful value. First, some of them tried to get up Channel on a plan which made it almost certain that they would run into the middle of an enemy greatly their superior in strength, and that when all they could possibly gain would be a few hours' command of a small portion of the enemy's coast. Those hours, too, might be hours of night or mist; they were to be passed in waters which could be made almost unnavigable by the removal of a few buoys and landmarks; where the invader might, or even must, be caught by a superior force, and from which he could not escape. This risk was to be run for no better object than the possible destruction of a limited number of merchant ships and warehouses. Later on, some other ships of the same fleet were sent on a cruise round the coast, burning coal and cartridges as they went, themselves under observation, but utterly ignorant of the whereabouts of the force they might have to deal with, to a place where they were mathematically certain to be caught and crushed. Once and for all, this sort of thing is not war. There never was, as Admiral COLOMB says, a time when this could not have been done. It was not done because in the real game, in which failure entails death or imprisonment, even the most incompetent commander stops short at a certain depth of imbecility. Therefore it ought not to be done in manœuvres, and therefore, too, there are some of us at least who listen with impatience to all the croaking and the solemn platitudes based on such folly. It can prove nothing as to the value of steam in war, or the sufficiency of the fleet, or the defensibility of the coast. All it can prove is that there is a plentiful lack of common sense somewhere; but whether it was worth while to spend so much to attain to so little (and that little old) is a question hardly needing to be put.

THE FUTURE OF THE TRANSVAAL.

EVENTS in the Transvaal seem steadily tending to prove, and not for the first time in our history, that though English Governments may "propose," that which "disposes" is the enterprise of the English race. It is only eight years since this territory was handed over, by a memorably disgraceful surrender, to the Boers, and already the relations, numerical and other, subsisting at that date between two parties to the transaction have been totally transformed. The actual transformation, indeed, has been in the main the work of a shorter period still. It is only during the last two or three years that the influx of British settlers to the gold-producing districts of the Transvaal has assumed its present rapidity and volume; but its consequent results have been such as to recall some of the most remarkable incidents of the history of colonization in the Western American States. We hear of towns, not in existence two years ago, which now count a population of 20,000 inhabitants, while if the survey be extended over the whole area of the State, the result is more surprising still. The Boer inhabitants of the Transvaal maintain their former numbers, but the British settlers now exceed them by considerably more than fifty per cent. Against 60,000 of the former race there are now no fewer than 100,000 of the latter; and, even allowing for a possible slackening of the stream of immigrants, it is impossible to doubt that in a few years they will have reduced the actual owners of the soil to an insignificant minority. At present, however, they are "settlers" in the Transvaal—and settlers only. They are treated entirely as aliens, enjoy no rights of citizenship, and have no voice in the election of the petty Parliament in which the government of the State is actually vested.

This, it must be admitted, is a most anomalous condition of things; and when the British population has doubled itself, as in all probability it will in a few years' time, the anomaly will become more glaring still. That there can be but one ultimate issue of it no man of ordinary foresight can doubt. A country in which 200,000 Englishmen are engaged in developing the latent resources of the soil, and are already masters of a large proportion of its realized wealth, but which is at the same time owned and ruled over by 60,000 men of another race, affords about as good an illustration of unstable equilibrium as could well be found elsewhere than on the more northerly routes of the American liners. The Boer inhabitants of the Transvaal are to the English settlers what the immersed and ever-melting base of the southward-drifted iceberg is to its towering crest. That the displacement of the centre of gravity is due, in the one case, to accretion from above instead of to diminution is an accidental difference which does not affect the essential exactitude of the analogy. The capsizing of the metaphorical as of the actual iceberg is merely a question of time. Nothing is doubtful save whether the catastrophe in the Transvaal will adhere strictly to the lines of Arctic precedent or whether the upsetting will be less sudden and less dangerously convulsive in the one case than in the other. That, of course, will depend in a great measure on the Boers themselves, and in a certain degree, no doubt, on the policy of the Home Government. Judging from past experience of this policy, we should say that the English settlers would not be disposed to any premature invocation of aid from Downing Street; but possibly for that very reason the Boers may be all the more anxious to embroil the Colonial Office in any quarrel that may hereafter arise. The chances are that they will have made considerably more progress during the last eight years in acquiring respect for English colonists than in unlearning their natural, and indeed inevitable, contempt for English Governments. They have some excuse for thinking that, though they might find it difficult to deal with some hundred or two thousand Englishmen, left to themselves, yet, if only they could manage to draw the Imperial Power with all its vast resources once more under control of, say, the illustrious author of the Transvaal Convention, all would be well with them. It is the earnest hope of that celebrity's countrymen, apart from any prepossessions on the subject of Home Rule, that he may never again have these resources at his command, but, whatever Government may be wielding them when the struggle for rule between Englishmen and Afrikaners comes to a crisis in South Africa, it is as earnestly to be hoped that that Government will intermeddle diplomatically as little as possible, and will leave the future to the irresistible shaping of events.

A NEW VICE.

THE hobby of stamp collectors has hitherto been thought harmless and their passion a feeble but not dangerous absurdity. Darker things than this hide in the depths of the "philatelic" mania. Stamp collectors are a power, a vast secret society. The concierges of Abyssinian hotels, the gillies on Highland moors, the children of the so-called "ruling classes" are all gatherers of ancient postage stamps. The passion leads directly to anarchy, to ceaseless revolution, to an insatiate craving for perpetual political changes. At present, perhaps, stamp collectors only desire these things. Soon they will attempt to produce them. The Philatelic Record, their organ, one of their organs, may seem as harmless as the Leisure Hour or the Gardener's Chronicle. The two hundred old stamp shops may not appear hotbeds of sedition. Wait a little and stamp collecting will appear like the Cui Bono of an Anglo-Indian statesman, "in all its native hideousness."

Perhaps the first lurid light on the Revolutionary aims of stamp collectors was cast by a recent remark made in private life. "The Prince of Monaco is dead," cried a young collector, "Hooray!" "Why Hooray?" was the natural answer to this unfeeling speech. "Why, don't you see, there will be a new stamp, and the old ones will be scarce." It seems that this heartless person was a large holder of Monaco stamps up to the five-franc stamp itself. Monaco has a vert olive stamp, a violet stamp, a blue one, a stamp brun sur jaune, blue on rose, carmine, black on rose, but not rouge et noir. There is also a yellow stamp, and the five-franc one, bleu sur gris bleu. On all is the florid effigy of the late Prince, whose death has sent a thrill of ghoulish delight among stamp collectors.

He who desires the end may desire the means. From rejoicing in the death of a lamented prince to plotting his end is but a step. The feverish passion for novæ res in stamps will soon cause the step to be taken. Nor are princes and emperors alone menaced. Presidents must also go, except in America, happy America, where no revolutions can hope to get rid of the same old chubby presidents. Uneasy lies the head that's on a stamp, even at present; and, when once the Philotelic revolution is unchained, there will be a monthly sweeping away of unhappy rulers. The mere political form of a Constitution will not avail to protect it. Republics must go, with kings, that a new face or figure may appear on the stamp. These predictions cannot seem exaggerated to any one who knows philatelists. They will give pounds of honest money for half a square inch of paper with a view of Sydney on it, and hideous colonial caricatures of Her Britannic Majesty fetch as high a price. They talk of "serpentine perforations," of Wmk (a pass-word, like L.P.D. in Joseph Balsamo), they have their secrets from the world. Only one good thing can be said of them politically. They are not Separatists; they do not conspire in favour of the Heptarchy, nor of autonomous communes. Nay, concerning the stamps of such interesting societies they speak disdainfully, calling them, "Beastly little locals."

EASTERN WORRIES.

THE provinces which have been partially or wholly taken from the dominions of the Porte continue to prove to Europe how little it has gained for its own peace by weakening the authority of the SULTAN. Armenia, which has been promised some kind of help against its sovereign, is striving for more. What exactly it was that Armenia was to receive has not proved in practice so intelligible as it seemed to be in treaties, but, at least, it is enough to encourage continual appeals to an external authority. In Crete the discovery that the suppression of rebellion cannot be made agreeable to the rebels has aroused that indignation among the friends who first egged them on and then hoped to profit by them which was to be expected. The reports of atrocities which came in such abundance from Athens need not be dismissed as unfounded. All that fair critical treatment will do with them is to attach a proper meaning to the word atrocity. It is convenient for the active persons at Athens who have done their best to boil the water in Crete very hot to represent that measures of great atrocity are being taken against their dupes. In their version of the story, the ordinary means by which a Government restores obedience in a disturbed district take, as a matter of course, the appearance of outrages. How CHAKIR Pasha was to restore quiet in Crete except by the ordinary method of disarming and imprisoning those who disturb it, or by shooting them when they refuse to deliver up their arms or to go to prison, might have been thought at one time a question which did not admit easily of an answer. The Athenian Committee is, however, doubtless well aware that there are many persons in Europe who hold the doctrine that the rebel is to have all the honour due to him who defies the tyrant's power, but is to be protected from the risks formerly attached to the defiance. To them the Committee will naturally appeal. But to secure the support of these friends is only a secondary aim. A much nearer object with them is the Ministry of Mr. TRICOUPI.

It will suit the Greek Opposition very well to pose as the defenders of the Cretans, who, for purposes of business, are considered as of their race. That in the course of their manœuvres they may possibly entail some unpleasant consequences on Greece does not appear to be a consideration of any weight with them. As a party measure their course is not without merits. They have already forced Mr. TRICOUPI to take steps for the assistance of some of the exiled Cretan leaders, which, if Greece were dealing with a Power better able to resist provocation than Turkey, might have brought some of those consequences upon it already. Happily, Greece is not in good odour at present with the Power which alone has any interest in furthering the disintegration of what remains of Turkey. The weakness of its Ministries and the intrigues of its Oppositions must continue to be mainly important to itself, and Turkey has no immediate reason to fear that whatever steps it may take to restore its authority in Crete will be made an excuse for further attacks. The extraordinary combination of political confusion and family quarrel which make Servia a centre of disorder at present is at least capable of being much more mischievous. It is a thousand pities that the young KING cannot exercise that royal authority with which he is understood to believe himself endowed for the purpose of putting both his parents under lock and key. The measure, though it would have a certain flavour of barbarism, would unquestionably work for the peace of Servia. It is, unfortunately, only too probable that there is not authority enough in the country in any hands to apply this efficacious remedy to a dangerous scandal. Failing this, Servia must continue to be a little hotbed of intrigue between provoked husband and injured wife, with whom are allied in some not quite intelligible way the disavowable, but not yet disavowed, agents of Russia. Whether this condition of the interesting Servian nationality has yet got beyond the stage of mere possibility of danger to peace is a question which could only be answered by those—if there are any—who know the inner mind of the Russian Government. The doubt as to the existence of any such authority to read the riddle may be justified by another and very vehement doubt whether the very few who for this purpose constitute Russia can be supposed to have an inner mind made up on the course to be followed in the Balkan Peninsula. A policy of patient vigilance is very apt to mean a policy of puzzled waiting. That Russia will act if it has the chance is a matter of course. So much may be regarded as certain; but whether the chance will be afforded, and even what "Russia" will consider a chance, are matters covered with profound obscurity. The well-meant but unexecuted intention of Turkey to ask European recognition for Prince FERDINAND of Bulgaria was an effort—or motion towards making an effort—to remove a possible temptation from Russia's path. Formally, it was justified; for, if diplomatic recognition is more than the purest ceremony, it should certainly be given to a Government which is, in fact, recognized by all Europe. But Bulgaria, which has shown a fine power of distinguishing between substance and shadow, can dispense with a ceremonial acknowledgment of its existence. Its strength and security rest on something very different from recognitions, and it can continue to do without that which it has dispensed with already.

MR. GLADSTONE'S LAST.

IT is something to have been able to teach Mr. GLADSTONE any lesson that his mental preoccupations indispose him to learn, and the Unionist party may therefore congratulate themselves on having at last awakened him to the fact that Ireland and Irishmen do not engross the entire and undivided interest of the people of the United Kingdom. For the first time for many months Mr. GLADSTONE has made a speech in which Irish politics only make their appearance as a subject among subjects, instead of supplying the text of the entire discourse. It is true, as we shall presently have to remark at greater detail, that his reference to Irish politics was evidently regarded by him as much the most important passage in his speech to the deputation from the Hyde Reform Club, and that in all likelihood it was the desire to make this reference which induced him to honour that not exactly world-renowned political association with an elaborate reply to their address. Still, it remains true that Mr. GLADSTONE has at last opened his eyes to the fact that the average English and Scotch elector, urban as well as rural, the elector of Peterborough or Dundee no less than the elector of North Bucks or Sleaford, does not really go to bed every night with a prayer for the speedy establishment of an Irish Parliament, and wake every morning with a groan at the returning consciousness that Mr. BALFOUR still rules at the Castle, and that the "greatest of living Englishmen" has no official residence in Downing Street. It remains true that Mr. GLADSTONE has discerned among Mr. CHAPLIN's constituents a faint interest in such matters as allotments, Protection, and other like subjects of concern to an agricultural population, and that the bulk of his speech was addressed to the purpose of inspiring the Lincolnshire farmers and labourers with distrust of their representative as regards his dealings with these questions.

It cannot, indeed, be said that this recent descent of Mr. GLADSTONE upon English local politics was a very fortunate one. Probably his thoughts have now dwelt so long on Ireland, and his voice has become so attuned to his favourite key of declamation on the subject of Irish grievances, that he can no longer handle English agrarian questions with skill, or discuss them in the proper tone. Certainly it would appear so from the singular infelicity of his reference to the past history of the allotments question. He might have said anything he pleased about its present condition or its future prospects, but to recur to its past for the mere sake of making an ineffective point against Mr. CHAPLIN with respect to his speech on Mr. JESSE COLLINGS's now historic motion, was a tactical fatuity of the most glaring description. Suppose it were true that Mr. CHAPLIN's speech on that motion was as "hostile to the "labouring classes" as Mr. GLADSTONE represents it—though, if we remember rightly, its author has since pointed out that the construction placed upon it at the time was an erroneous one—the Sleaford electors have not forgotten either (1) that Mr. CHAPLIN is, after all, a member of a party and a Government which, though outbitten, defeated, and displaced by their opponents on this very question, have yet done for the labourer all that ever has been done for him by legislation in the matter; or (2) that Mr. GLADSTONE is the chief of a party and a Government who, riding into power on a promise to legislate for the labourer on this question, at once pitched it contemptuously into the first pigeon-hole, there to remain, so far as they were concerned, until the close of an indefinitely prolonged period of political turmoil brought about by their adoption of a revolutionary policy for Ireland. If Mr. GLADSTONE were not at once the most audacious, and in these days the most maladroit, of controversialists, the name of Mr. JESSE COLLINGS would have been avoided by him as religiously as were inauspicious words by a Roman general on the eve of giving battle.

As to his attack on Mr. CHAPLIN's Protectionist leanings, the principal importance of that was as a foil to his subsequent apology for Mr. SEYMOUR KEAY's agrarian Socialism. His critics in the daily press have already sufficiently exposed the ludicrous inconsistency of appealing to Unionist Free-Traders to reject a Unionist because his economical orthodoxy is suspect, and at the same time exhorting Separatists who are presumed to be neither knaves nor idiots to elect a Separatist in spite of his having declared in favour of an agrarian scheme which, by his advocate's own admission, spells fraud in one arrangement of its letters and folly in another. No more need be said here of this argumentative absurdity. Examples of the same kind have become too common in and too characteristic of Mr. GLADSTONE's later political oratory to make it worth while to dwell upon this particular one. We prefer to pass on to the one Irish matter on which Mr. GLADSTONE enlarged in his recent speech, and possibly the matter which impelled him to the delivery of that speech at all. We refer, it is scarcely necessary to say, to the subject of Irish University Education, and to Mr. GLADSTONE's comments upon the letters in which Mr. BALFOUR has recently explained his Parliamentary reference thereto. It is interesting to hear that Mr. GLADSTONE considers this explanation "the "shabbiest of the shabby proceedings of which this Government has been guilty." That, we say, is interesting, as any criticism of this kind coming from the correspondent of Colonel DOPPING, the expositor of the Kilmainham negotiations, the scholiast on Lord ODO RUSSELL's conversation with Prince BISMARCK in 1870, and the hero of a host of similar verbal exploits, must always interest. But, except for the authority which his criticism on such a point must necessarily derive from his personal antecedents, we doubt whether it can be regarded as having much in it. Mr. BALFOUR's utterances on the now memorable occasion of the debate on the Appropriation Bill were undoubtedly of a somewhat obscure kind; but Mr. GLADSTONE's pretence of finding in his explanatory statement a withdrawal of a definite undertaking previously made will not bear a moment's examination. The very defect of Mr. BALFOUR's Parliamentary declaration was its indefiniteness. He began by repeating an opinion formerly expressed by him outside the House—namely, that "something ought to be done to "give a higher University education to the Roman Catholics "in Ireland"; and he went on to speak of devising some scheme by which the wants of Roman Catholics should be met. But he added in the same breath that "he did not "think it was proper for him on that occasion even to "suggest the main lines of what the scheme ought to be." There is assuredly nothing here at variance with Mr. BALFOUR's subsequent declaration that, "though he desires "to promote the higher education of the Roman Catholic "population of Ireland, the foundation and endowment of "a University for that purpose has never been in contemplation." It may be fair criticism enough from the Gladstonian point of view to say that this explanation, taken with what it explains, leaves the whole matter more mysterious than ever; but to describe the later statement as an evasion or retraction of the earlier one is absurd. Mr. BALFOUR has simply corrected a false construction of the intentions of the Government in this matter, without giving any inkling of the true one. Their intentions were left obscure in his Parliamentary statement; they remain obscure now. That is all that can be said.

Mr. COURTNEY's description of the incident as a "false "start" in Ministerial policy must be regarded, therefore, as based upon a purely private assumption. It was, no doubt, natural to him to make it, as it afforded him a convenient excuse for appearing in that character of MENTOR which he always prefers to any other. His customary lecture, however, was accompanied in this instance by some not unprofitable remarks on the mode in which the alleged false start of the Government has been received by the Parnellites, and on the lesson which that reception conveys. He omitted, however, to point the further moral of the Gladstonian attitude towards the supposed Ministerial policy. He might have noted not only the fact that the assumed offer to endow a Roman Catholic University was accepted by Mr. PARNELL and the other Irish leaders, but also the fact that the Gladstonians made haste to declare that such a policy would be a perfectly legitimate one for a Home Rule Parliament to adopt, and that the repugnance of the English people to it was actually an additional reason for calling such a Parliament into existence for the purpose, among other things, of carrying it into effect. Such an argument, of course, is, abstractedly speaking, not by any means an untenable one. The only objection to it is that it is in direct and glaring opposition to the whole body of pleas, pledges, and assurances wherewith, when Mr. GLADSTONE's Separation Bill was still before Parliament, its author and his entire following endeavoured to recommend it to Parliamentary approval.

SELF-HEALING.

SO many impostors have devoted themselves with more or less success to the practice of what is called faith-healing, that the treatment—which consists in telling the patient first that you are going to cure him, and then that you have cured him—has come to be of rather tarnished repute. Accordingly, the times are ripe for Mr. AUGUSTUS J. HARVEY, who has devised a simpler and more thorough-going plan, and advocates it on printed slips. It may be described as Every Man his own Faith-Healer, and it is asserted by the inventor to be sovereign for all the ills which, not flesh only, but also "heart" and "mind" may have the misfortune to inherit.

The method is simplicity itself. The patient must "daily " (at least) go into a quiet room [but qu. whether a quiet "spot out of doors would not do equally well] for a short "time, and turn all his thoughts, feelings, and sole attention to within, without, and about every part of his "body, heart and mind, and ascertain if each and all feel "healthy, strong, and peaceful." Anybody can do that, and that is nearly half the battle. For "the self-healer "while doing this really (as he will soon find out, but "does not know why), adding or giving strength or force "to each of them." There appears to be something wrong about this sentence, but the residue of the treatment is explained quite clearly. "He must gently and gradually "force the daily strength got out of the daily food equally "throughout every part of the body, heart, and mind in "order to bring each of them up to a daily standard of "bodily strength and health of sensations, kindliness of "disposition, and cheerful, hopeful feeling and thought. "Painful and poisonous feelings, emotions, thoughts, ideas, "and even sensations must be daily expelled and healthier "and happier ones introduced and substituted. The portals "of the ears, eyes, and mouth must be guarded and "strengthened to prevent all future entrance, thus at "length the Self-healer either restores or preserves his "peace of body, heart, and mind." It would seem hardly desirable to take this quite literally. To prevent all future entrance by the portal of the mouth appears inconsistent with the supply of daily food which Mr. HARVEY obviously contemplates. Still to sit for a short time daily gently forcing strength into every part of oneself is a prescription so simple that the wonder is that no one has ever thought of it before. Mr. HARVEY does not say what is the best period which should be devoted daily to this exhilarating pursuit. "Invalids, all those weakly and the aged (who "would prolong life by adding strength) should be self-healing off and on all day long; all those who have "nothing better to do, adding to their strength and "beguiling time."

The explanation of how this process acts is almost as simple as the directions for working it. "The daily strength "of force derived from the daily food . . . after strengthen- "ing and working all the various organs of the body "ultimately ascends into the brain (which is an inex- "haustible storehouse of strength) appearing as conscious- "ness or mind. The mind contains thoughts. Thoughts "represent so much daily strength or force got from our "daily food." The uninstructed would infer that the way to attain bodily forcibleness was not to think. But not at all. Let the patient think steadily of his inside, and then "the feel- "ings and thoughts become changed, and the chemistry of the "body converts them into heat and muscular energy, both of "which denote strength or force. When, however, the "feelings and thoughts are directed to outside things and "objects totally independent of the body, heart, and mind, "the force or strength which produced them is used up, "lost, and gone for ever." It has been supposed hitherto that a man who allows his thoughts to be continually dwelling on his own infirmities is likely to make them worse rather than better. It now appears that the contrary is the case. That other HARVEY who discovered the circulation of the blood hardly made a more momentous discovery. The inventor asserts that he has "made many cures," including cases of "Rheumatism, Asthma, Incipient Paralysis, " &c." As it seems to be an essential part of the treatment that nobody adopting it can have any patient except himself, we are driven to the conclusion that Mr. HARVEY has suffered more or less from the distressing complaints enumerated, and from others. Who, then, could be much better adapted to testify to the merits of self-healing? Its universal adoption would, no doubt, be a great blow to the members of a learned profession, but they would at least have the melancholy satisfaction of never being ill themselves. The one point left entirely in the dark is whether it avails much in surgical cases. Could a man cut off his leg by sitting quiet and infusing force or strength into the unwounded parts of it? The moral aspects of the matter are too tremendous for brief notice. How long would it take General BOULANGER to self-heal his mental annoyance at the recent elections? But perhaps he is a self-healer already, and that accounts for his alleged good spirits. Mr. HARVEY incidentally observes, or his printer observes for him, "God help those who help themselves." For our own part, we should rather say, God help those who heal themselves.

"QUELCH AND LIBERTY."

THE jury at the Surrey Sessions have not risen quite to the level attained by their political ancestors who acquitted the Seven Bishops. They have only risen to the height of declining to convict, and having to be discharged without a verdict. HENRY QUELCH, therefore, and FRANCIS SOUTTER and their companion vindicators of popular rights have been bound over to appear on bail-day at the next Sessions instead of being dismissed from the Newington Court-house in the proud consciousness of freedom and of triumph; while as for the jury, they have not received, and, of course, could not expect under the circumstances, the same enthusiastic greeting which was given to the men who protected Archbishop SANCROFT and his right reverend brethren from the persecution of arbitrary power. "God bless you! God prosper your "families! You have done like honest good-natured gentle- "men!" Popular exclamations of this kind are not likely to have reached the ears of jurors who simply could not make up their mind whether ratepayers illegally, or alleged to be illegally, excluded from a vestry-hall are or are not entitled to make a forcible entry. The defendants meanwhile, though they have missed the full honours which would have awaited them on an acquittal, have, it is said, "received an ovation" from the crowd outside the court; and this seems to us to have been particularly appropriate. An ovation, says a well-known manual of classical antiquities, "was granted when the advantage gained, although "considerable, was not sufficient to constitute a legitimate "claim to the higher distinction of a triumph, or when the "victory had been achieved with little bloodshed, or when "hostilities had not been completely terminated, or when "the contest had been carried on against base and unworthy "foes." It will here be seen how true was the popular instinct in according Mr. QUELCH and his comrades only the minor honour of an ovation. Not on one or two only, but, it will be observed, on every one of the grounds above set forth, an ovation was manifestly the proper thing. The advantage gained by breaking into the Bermondsey Vestry Hall, "although considerable," was not of the highest possible amount, and the victory was "achieved with little "bloodshed"—no more, probably, than was due to a few scratches from the broken glass and the injuries to "SKINNER's hand, through his own fault in pulling away "the broom-handle, which was not being used as a weapon, "but only as a lever to remove the barricade." Hostilities, again, were certainly "not regularly proclaimed," nor has "the war been completely terminated"; for "QUELCH and "others" are under "recognizances to appear at the next "Sessions"; while, as to the contest having been carried on against "base and unworthy foes," that is merely another way of saying that the Champions of the People were opposed by the Vicar of a State-supported Church and his myrmidons the churchwardens.

Still, though Mr. QUELCH—whom we take to be no other than the tyrant-quelcher who distinguished himself in that office at or about the time when Authority raised a feeble protest against the looting of West-End shops by patriotic East-Enders—has not scored as highly as he might have done, by his bold attack on the Bermondsey Vestry Hall he has scored, and so emphatically has Mr. SOUTTER and, in a less degree, Mr. GLANVILLE and Mr. CLARKE. For Mr. SOUTTER "spoke for over two hours, during "which time he passed in review his early life," and Mr. QUELCH "followed at some length, declaring that the prosecution were not seeking to vindicate the law, but to "crush political opponents," and that "nothing could "recoup them [the defendants] as working men for the "anxiety, worry, and monetary loss which they had sustained." Add to this that Sir PETER EDLIN gave them the benefit of a summing-up of over an hour in length, and that the learned Dr. PANKHURST defended them with a spirit worthy of an ERSKINE, and in language which a severe criticism might have objected to as of somewhat excessive pomposity if it had been used by counsel for the defence in the ship-money case. And seeing that the law appears to have been less perfectly clear in the matter, and that a conviction by a less "patriotic" jury would have been unavoidable, we cannot but think that "QUELCH and others" have had luck all round.

NORTH UIST.

THE learned Dr. MacCulloch, in his letters to Sir Walter Scott on the Highlands and Western Islands of Scotland (1824), discourses at some length on the vain attempts of etymologists and antiquaries to derive the names of those islands and of the mountains, headlands, bays, and lochs therein. He says, probably with truth, that they are a mixture of Scandinavian and Gaelic. That Gaelic inflexions and corruptions have transformed Scandinavian names, and that the Gaelic names themselves, transmitted orally, have undergone considerable alteration, seems probable. It is worthy of remark that Scott, in the Lord of the Isles, calls Loch Coruisk in Skye "Corriskin," and says in a note that the name is derived from the word "Corrie"; and he also calls the sea-loch or bay, the shore of which is close to Loch Coruisk, Loch "Slavig." It is invariably spelt now "Scavaig." Such variations in spelling are sufficient to indicate the great uncertainty (to say the least of it) which prevails as to the true rendering of the names of places in these districts. Dr. MacCulloch says that the name "Harris" has proved hopeless; but that "Uist" simply means "West." The only objection we can see to such an explanation is that it is so extremely obvious. North Uist is a very remarkable island. It is said that at least one-third of it consists of lochs, and that statement is confirmed by a reference to the Ordnance map, and still more by an ascent of one of the few hills on the island, from which a pretty extensive view can be obtained. The eastern part of North Uist is, indeed, a labyrinth of lochs. Arms of the sea project into the island from all sides, and it is almost impossible to follow their tortuous courses. Then come the fresh-water lochs, which are innumerable, and many of them exceedingly intricate in their windings. In most instances observation leads to the discovery of a system or chain of lochs beginning in the interior and ending at the sea. Although there is little uniformity in the course of such chains, a short description of one may give some idea of the others. Some distance inland there is a very large and very tortuous fresh-water loch, with more than three hundred islands in it—out of this flows a very small stream, hardly worthy to be called a burn—in dry weather a mere trickle—into loch No. 2. This loch is joined to No. 3 by a similar small stream, not many yards in length. No. 3 flows into No. 4. Into No. 4 the sea comes occasionally at high tides, but it is a fresh-water loch. No. 5 is next to the sea, and is invaded by the salt water twice a day. Next comes a sea-loch or arm of the sea proper. The inland lochs are inhabited by large quantities of what in Scotland are called brown trout, and on some, where there are boats, fine baskets can be taken with the fly. Sea-trout in great numbers, and a good many salmon, run into the lochs communicating with the sea, and, passing up the chain of lochs, find their way to spawning-beds in the upper lochs or burns. It is said that salmon enter the large loch No. 1, which has been mentioned, and, being unable to find their way back, remain there as fresh-water fish. This statement is not very easy of verification, for No. 1 is not fished now, lest the deer which frequent the islands in it should be disturbed, but it seems far from improbable, looking at the extreme intricacy of the coast-line of the loch and the smallness of the outlet. It would be very interesting to ascertain whether salmon which have been to the sea could live and breed in fresh water. The young salmon and sea-trout, however, must find their way to the sea, and, if they do so, it is hard to understand why their parents should not. The red-deer seem partial to islands—on one loch on which there is a boat a herd of nine or ten is sometimes to be seen on a good-sized island. If rowing up-wind the fishermen may get very near them, and it is a fine sight to see them jump up, look at you for one instant, and then plunge into the loch and swim to the shore.

Her Majesty's mail steamer calls every day at Lochmaddy, coming on alternate days from Portree and Dunvegan. Lochmaddy is the principal place in North Uist—we call it "place" because it is neither a town nor a village. There is an inn (a good one), a bank, a post-office, one or two dwelling-houses, a good many crofters' hovels, a poor-house and a gaol; but these buildings are scattered over a wide area and do not give one the idea of belonging to one community. The gaol, as far as we could learn, was almost always uninhabited, and it was said that those who had the administration of the criminal law solaced themselves for want of work by much fishing and shooting.

A great market is held twice a year at Lochmaddy, and it was a surprise to a party of fishermen staying at the hotel to see in such a sparsely-inhabited country an almost continuous procession of people, cattle, and horses thronging the principal road which intersects the island. A few small booths or tents of a primitive kind made with turf in a wooden frame-work were erected for refreshments, but the people bivouacked with their cattle on the open moor and there the buying and selling took place. Every mare in North Uist seems to have a foal, and that foal is inseparable from her, so that for miles along the road there were foals following or accompanying carts and horses, and galloping wildly about, and getting into the way of everything. Few people walked; the old people sat in chairs in their carts, with their backs to the horse; only one woman was seen riding, and that was a girl behind her father. The men rode; the form of saddle being a piece of sacking, kept in its place by being fastened with a rope round the horse's neck; the stirrups being simply loops of rope, but in one instance the loops were distended by two pieces of wood let in at the bottom.

The strangers on the island were much struck by the gravity, nay, sadness, of the people of North Uist. There was no merriment. Neither men nor women laughed, or even smiled. The very children are grave. They do not play, or run about and shout. Truth to tell, it would be wonderful if the people were merry, for they lead hard lives. They are, for the most part, crofters, cultivating their patch of oats or potatoes, and living in rough, low, thatched hovels which look miserable dwellings for human beings. Very little light can reach the inside of them; and no window, as far as our observation went, was made to open. Light and air are provided by the front door, which is always open by day; but what must the condition of such places be at night? Some of the crofters, of course, are better off than others; and some rise to the condition of small farmers. We saw some good-sized fields of barley at the western side of the island, and they were being reaped (i.e. with the sickle) by women. The agricultural population is said to be more prosperous in North Uist than elsewhere in the neighbourhood, and we heard no rumours of discontent. The whole island belongs to one proprietor.

The men of the island were not remarkable in any way. They were not tall, or well set up, or handsome; but, on the other hand, were not particularly small, and appeared to be physically strong enough for what they had to do. There was a singular absence of good looks and good figures among the women, which may be accounted for if they have to do such hard work as reaping, while they are probably underfed. The flatness of a great part of North Uist, which is simply the most desolate moorland, and the entire absence of trees, must detract from the cheerfulness of life. Living on the verge of a melancholy bog must affect the character and spirits as much as, or more than, living on the shore of a melancholy ocean; and the inhabitants of North Uist are certainly less cheerful than those of Kerry, who appear to live in very much the same way.

Geologically, there is nothing very remarkable in the island. The rock which forms its foundation is gneiss; but there are some basaltic rocks at the entrance of the harbour of Lochmaddy which probably belong to the same great lava irruption which covered the northern part of Skye. There is evidence in all parts of the island of glacier action. The peat-beds are of great thickness, of excellent quality, and practically inexhaustible.

Dr. Macculloch mentions a considerable kelp trade at Lochmaddy in 1824; but that has disappeared. Seaweed is now reduced in large quantities by heating in retorts at some works at Loch Eport, nearer the western side of the island, and the product is sent to Glasgow to be manufactured into iodine. The seaweed used is not that which grows in prodigious quantities on the rocks, but principally the deep-sea tangle (Laminaria digitata) which is thrown up on the western side of the island by the Atlantic. A very large stock, computed at many hundreds of tons, was to be seen stacked near the works; by the new process of heating in retorts the iodine is retained, and a steamer comes at every spring-tide to carry away the product.

Seals abound in North Uist, and a good many are shot for the sake of their oil, which is given to cattle, and is said to fatten them and make them sleek. It acts on them, in fact, in much the same way as cod-liver oil does on human beings. The fur of the seal is not good; but the skin is occasionally made into waist-coats. Wild-geese are common, and devastate the tiny crops of the crofters sadly. All the sea birds of the British islands are probably represented. Grouse are not very numerous, but some fair bags are made by those who shoot. The woodcock shooting is said to be excellent, the birds having no other cover, lying in certain places where there are stones and long heather; blue-rock pigeons also abound in one part of the island. There are plenty of sea fish, such as lythe (pollack) and staithe, but few herrings. There is also a considerable lobster fishery; one giant lobster was caught last year weighing 9 lbs., and we have heard of one of 11 lbs. this year—quite an uncomfortable neighbour for a bather. The average lobster weighs about 1 lb., so that an 11-pounder must be a monster indeed. The lobsters go principally to the London market; but the men who undergo the labour and exposure of catching them get poorly paid. To them each lobster only brings in from about 6d. to 8d.

To the stranger the principal attraction of North Uist is the fishing. Special leave is required for a great many of the lochs, and vast numbers of them are never fished at all, and no one knows what is in them. But people staying at the hotel at Lochmaddy can get very fair trout-fishing, and good sea-trout fishing if the season is favourable. Great runs of sea-trout take place when heavy rain and a spring tide occur at the same time; and, if the fisherman can meet with the fish before they have distributed themselves in the larger lochs, he may bring home a heavy creel, including, possibly, a salmon.

A CLERICAL BROTHERHOOD.

ON Tuesday next, at the meeting of the Church Congress at Cardiff, Canon Medd will read a paper which will open the subject of a recommendation contained in the Report to Convocation, presented by the Bishop of Rochester's Committee, on the best means of supplying the spiritual destitution existing in our great towns. No one will be disposed to quarrel with the general tenour of the Report. Magnificent as the machinery of the Church of England is, and self-devoted as are the lives of the large majority of its ministers, vast numbers of the people of our towns live and die without having had any religious influence brought to bear upon them, at least since their childhood. While missionaries are easily found for any foreign land, the evangelization of our own people is really only partially accomplished, and year by year the need becomes more pressing for increased effort at home. All men look to the Church of England, as the Church of the nation, to find a remedy; and its members, of every order, are not unwilling to accept the responsibility laid upon them. What, however, is to be the remedy? The efforts made to amend the religious or social condition of the East End of London by forming Halls, in which a number of young men of the upper class live together and carry on work of one kind or another among their poorer neighbours, seem to have suggested one of the chief proposals of the Bishop's Committee. They recommend the formation of a Brotherhood, at once clerical and extra-parochial, the members of which are to live together in different Halls, be at the disposal of their Warden, and carry on work in any parish to which he, acting on the request of the incumbent, may choose to send them. The Brethren, it is proposed, are to bind themselves for certain periods, or until they are released by authority, by vows analogous to those taken by the religious of the middle ages—by vows, that is, of poverty, celibacy, and obedience. This scheme has aroused the indignation of several members of the Evangelical party and others, and their opinions have been collected by the editor of Church and People, the organ of the Church Pastoral Aid Society, and have already appeared, in part at least, in many of the daily papers.

While we consider, for reasons which we shall give later on, that the institution of the proposed Brotherhood would be a most unwise step, some of the answers sent to Church and People strike us as rather foolish. They seem mainly inspired by a horror of any custom prevalent in the Church before the Blessed Reformation. If, however, an observance or custom can be shown to be fitted for the wants of the present day, we for our part should like it all the better for its bearing the stamp of antiquity and forming a fresh tie between the present and past of our Church. Lord Grimthorpe, as positive and violent as ever, foams at the idea which he has conjured up of a restoration of "clerical superiority and all Popery except the Pope." We are not aware that any cleric was ever supreme in England except the Pope, and his supremacy in ecclesiastical affairs was by no means complete or undisputed; and what Popery without the Pope may be we must leave to Lord Grimthorpe to define. To him alone of the objectors is it given to see that the scheme has such terrible and far-reaching consequences. There is, however, a feeling among them that the Committee propose virtually to re-establish mediæval monasticism. To this we must demur. Although our earliest missionaries were monks, the general character of mediæval monasticism was claustral; its primary aim was to do good to the soul of the monk. The life of the new Brethren would be spent mainly outside the walls of their houses; and the primary aim of the Brotherhood would be to do good to the souls—and we hope the bodies also—of others. If its opponents had likened the Committee's scheme to the foundation of the mendicant Orders, they would have been nearer the truth; and the Friars for a time at least regenerated society. The Dean of Ripon seems to have had some confused idea of this. He speaks, in the extract from his letter before us is printed correctly, of the decline of the "Cistercian Friars"—a body which he has been the first to discover. They, it seems, went about doing good in Norfolk and elsewhere, which is impossible in the case of Cistercians. Was he thinking of Franciscans? He says that his Friars became degenerate when they formed societies under vows of poverty, celibacy, and obedience. But all Franciscans were from the first bound by these vows, and societies of Franciscans were formed here the very year after the Order was introduced into England. He further urges that Our Lord did not command that His ministers should live and work together. To which we may add that neither did He command that any of them should become deans; yet, nevertheless, it has been wisely ordained that there should be a Dean of Ripon. And as regards his contention that the work of evangelization cannot be carried on by men who are bound by vows, we may remark that he must be strangely ignorant of the history of the great Saint of his own church, Bishop Wilfrid. But, to return to the character of the proposed Brotherhood, the really important difference between it and a monastic Order would be that the vows of its members would be revocable. The perpetual obligation of vows was the strength and essence of monasticism. It insured peace, and generally contentment; for men do not pass their lives in fretting against the irrevocable. Matters would be wholly different in an Order in which vows could, even with some difficulty, be cast aside. The Brotherhood of the Committee's scheme would not be monastic, though we grant that it would present a superficial and somewhat ridiculous resemblance to a monastic Order.

In spite of what we have said as to some of the remarks of those who object to the scheme, we agree with a great deal that has been urged against it. It is open to objection on the score both of the proposed vows and of the relations which it will bring about between the Brethren and the incumbents of parishes. Vows of the kind proposed were for ages regarded as the means of entrance into a higher life than that led by secular persons. It is different now; and we can scarcely suppose that the Committee believe that a man who renounces the obligations of wealth, who refuses to marry, and puts himself under the orders of another, lives a higher life than the husband and father who discharges his duties to society, and recognizes no obligations save those of his own conscience. The vows which they would revive, instead of awakening reverence and exercising a wholesome influence on society, will only excite laughter. They will be held to be a mere attempt at archaism, a feeble imitation of the real thing, which they certainly do not wish to see re-established. No power can enforce their observance; they can have no legal obligation, and as they are to be revocable, no moral force either. How is a revocable vow of poverty to be worked? If a man gives up his income and retains his capital he has not renounced private property. If he surrenders his capital, how is he to get it back again when he wishes to revoke his vow? If any one wishes to give all his goods to feed the poor, or to endow a Brotherhood, he can do so without making a vow about it. Wherein lies the virtue of a vow of obedience? As long as a man remains a member of a society he must, of course, obey its rules. But a vow of obedience means a great deal more than this. What it does mean may, as Dr. Maitland pointed out in his Dark Ages, easily be learnt from the "Rule of St. Benedict," cap. iv. Such a vow is wholly different from a legal obligation to obey an official superior. That has well-marked limits, which are absent in the case of a vow to obey a private person. Surely a man is not to be honoured for submitting himself to the will of another who has no legal claim to his obedience. Lastly, what on earth is the good of a revocable vow of celibacy—a vow not to marry until you choose to do so? Are these vows to be imposed simply to insure the usefulness of a brother while he remains a member of the Order? Vows which are condemned by the world as foolish are scarcely likely to win respect for the men who take them, and it is at least exceedingly doubtful whether a celibate clergyman is as well fitted to work amongst the poor as one with a wife and family. The other objection to the scheme which we share with some of the writers to the editor of Church and People is that it will lead to a conflict of authority in parishes, and will add to the burden already borne by the parson. Let us suppose the case of a rector of a town-parish who is anxious for help. The Brotherhood will, in most cases, be a Bishop's pet, a part of the diocesan organization over which he will exercise a good deal of immediate control. The rector will therefore be pressed in various ways to apply to the Warden of a neighbouring House. He does so possibly with some misgivings, knowing that young curates are, as Lord Grimthorpe says, not always easy to manage, and suspecting that a young Brother, fresh from a place specially calculated to foster clerical priggishness, and with the feeling of superiority which his vows give him over a rector with a nursery and a scanty income from tithes, will not be a more amenable assistant than the average curate. The Brother naturally works on the lines laid down in his House, and the rector who dislikes them finds that his remonstrances are disregarded. He appeals to the Warden, who naturally upholds his subordinate, and at last, after much worry, the rector is forced to exert his legal right to put a stop to the ministrations of a clergyman who may have secured a party in his parish, and to declare war against an institution which is a favourite with his Bishop and the Diocesan Societies' Board. Archdeacon Blakeney and the Vicar of Kensington give prominence to the disastrous effect which would be produced by a conflict of authority in parochial matters. The right remedy for the present need is, as the Vicar of Kensington says, to augment the number of curates, and, we may add, of vicars also. The parochial system is capable of indefinite expansion as regards the sub-division of cures and the number of clergy, and the more it is expanded the stronger it will be for good; it will only be weakened by setting up a new Order with an undefined position, and with superiors other than the incumbents of the parishes in which its members work. As the population grows, so also should the number of cures and of parochial clergy. It is mainly a matter of money, and Churchmen are not wont to be backward in supplying means for the promotion of the spiritual good of the nation. We see no reason for weakening a system approved by long experience and a noble record in order to obtain the services of an unpaid body of clergymen. If a clergyman is willing and able to work without stipend, let him put himself, as it is well known some do, at the disposal of an overworked rector, and become his unpaid curate. If he is unwilling to work as a curate, and demands a position more or less independent of the incumbent, he is likely to cause the rector more trouble than his services are worth.

LLASSA AND ITS SCAPEGOAT.

IT seemed at one time extremely probable that the British force encamped in the Jalepla Pass would be constrained to march on Llassa before the Thibetans learned the impropriety of encroaching on Sikkim territory. Happily the sharp lesson administered by General Graham to the trespassers relieved the men under his orders from the interesting but troublesome task of penetrating to the capital of Thibet. Llassa therefore remains unvisited by Englishmen, except by the eccentric Manning, whose proposed travels filled his affectionate correspondent, Charles Lamb, with horror at the idea of a "Tartar fellow eating my friend, and adding the cool malignity of mustard and vinegar." For Bogle, Warren Hastings's agent, did not penetrate beyond Teshu Lumbo. Nor does there seem much immediate prospect of English or European travellers finding their way to the mysterious city of monks, unless the Russian expedition under Prejevalsky's successor should fulfil its boasts. The only chance of supplementing the meagre information about the place and its inhabitants collected by the French missionaries or their Italian predecessors lies in the enterprise of those native explorers whom the Government of India sends forth from time to time into regions inaccessible to the European. These adventurous emissaries, whose identity is carefully disguised under false initials in their reports, have already gleaned much knowledge about trans-frontier countries, and have even been among the Llassa people taking notes without detection. An itinerary of one of these wanderers who made that distant metropolis his goal has just been published in the Indian survey records and contains much interesting information. "U. G.," by which collocation of initials our explorer must be known, set out from Darjeeling, and beyond shaking cane-bridges, a difficulty of breathing caused by the rarefied air in the lofty passes he crossed, and exorbitant charges for the use of ponies, he had not much to complain of until he found himself well in Thibet. The first distinctive mark of the country of monks and priests was a nunnery. But there was no romance about this cloister. The care of large flocks of sheep and goats formed the occupation of these sisters, and our traveller complains that they were "very dirty" and their faces were "very black." However, they appear to have been civil to the explorer and his wife; for, in order better to keep up the disguise of being a pilgrim, "U. G." took the devoted partner of his bosom with him. A succession of hot springs, temples, and caves with grotesque local legends, brought him to a great monastery at Shalu, where the famous magical arts of the Thibetan initiated are taught. But the magic did not make much impression on so experienced a traveller, who had the criticism of the Bengal Educational Department at command; and, indeed, it appears from his account to be singularly childish. One test of initiation is to sit on a heap of barley without displacing a seed; but then you have to exist in an underground cave for eleven years previously. A little further on a high-priest of the degraded cult, which finds such curious votaries in Europe, induced him to promise the repetition of certain forms of prayer to a local deity 3,000 times a day. But as "U. G." found this wearisome, the high-priest let him off for a douceur with 1,000 prayers and "as many more as he could manage." Three thousand priests were collected at this spot.

From this district the adventurous couple descended to the lakes and the great plateaux of Thibet, where they found plenty of cultivation. A misunderstanding with the local officials got them into trouble, and revealed their true character as explorers, but the officials proved to be good-natured, and winked at their journey for an inconsiderable bribe. More rough country intervened before the neighbourhood of Llassa was reached, the environs of which appear to be very deserted and unsafe. But at last "U. G." and his wife succeeded in stealing into the city at night, and he took up his lodgings with a Chinese sergeant, as this would excuse his baggage from inspection. He continued in Llassa for some days, and contrived to take certain measurements of its size. The fear of detection, however, made his residence somewhat anxious and uncomfortable, and in particular he was alarmed at a growing intimacy between his wife and the wife of his host, and feared for the revelations which might slip out in the confidential chats between the ladies. On the question of female discretion "U. G." evidently shared the opinions of Shakspeare's Hotspur. It cannot be said that he brought back a very full or clear account of the constitution of the Llassa government. But that is perhaps excusable. The relations of the secular to the ecclesiastical power, and of both to the Chinese residents, are difficult to grasp, because they are constantly fluctuating within certain limits. On the whole, however, the chief power resides with the monks, who generally manage the election of the Dalai Lama, through some "pious person" who commands public confidence, and is perhaps also in their interest. But the Lama's power is also controlled from time to time by a prophet or oracle. One wielder of oracular power was in great repute during "U. G.'s" stay, and had interfered to prevent the Lama being selected by lot in the usual manner. The heaven-born child was "designated" by a pious monk who saw his image in a lake.

This oracular personage, indeed, has to be consulted on all State affairs, and one of his functions is, like Zadkiel, to prophesy the events of the coming twelvemonth at the new year. He is held to be very sacred, and even high officials have been fined for looking on him. But for a certain period in the year his authority is in abeyance, and at that time a sort of carnival seems to be held in Llassa, and huge processions of monks are organized. During this time the annual scapegoat is driven into the wilderness. The man who is selected for this invidious part (it does not appear by what method) is allowed a week's license in the market-place previous to his expulsion. With face painted half-white and half-black, and with the wildest antics, he helps himself from the stalls at nominal prices, and shakes a black yak's tail over the heads of people who thereby transfer their ill-luck to him. Before his time is up he also solemnly plays dice with one of the minor Lamas, the understanding being that the Lama shall take his place if luck goes against him. But as the Lama's dice have six marked on every face, while the Scapegoat throws with the ordinary cubes, it is, to use a vulgar expression, a case of "heads I win; tails you lose." Finally, the "bearer of one year's ill-luck," as the Thibetans call him, is hunted out into the wilderness for six months, with every man's hand against him, and his hand against every man. If he survives, he is allowed to re-enter society as one of its ordinary members at the expiration of his term. As this account of the Llassa Scapegoat tallies with a previous account brought back by an Indian explorer from Thibet there is no reason to doubt its accuracy, or to refuse to credit Llassa with preserving this ancient religious institution in its most primitive form. "U. G." also brought back some interesting notes about Thibetan burial-customs, which in some instances resemble the exposure of the dead to the vultures by the Parsis. But he and his wife were quite ready to leave the capital, and they got back to Indian territory by the shortest route without serious mishap, passing on their way several gigantic images of Buddha, and a good many prayer-wheels performing vicarious devotions for mankind.

THE APPLE AND PEAR CONFERENCE.

THERE is no room for debate upon the culture of apples and pears in this realm henceforward. The Royal Horticultural Society summoned a council of the learned last October and laid down rules, by consensus of experts, which can scarcely be challenged. They are published in a bulky little volume. Elsewhere, some writer whose qualifications are not always apparent to the uninitiated—nor to the initiated either, perhaps—lays down a law, quotes what he will in support of it, and refutes opponents whom he himself selects. But in this admirable compilation all who bear a part are recognized authorities, and the critics speak for themselves. Upon such questions as the tenure of land under fruit, and the means of overcoming the "great railway difficulty," the soundest and most successful of horticulturists has no special quality to pronounce; but, though we be not convinced by his arguments, it is well at least to know how the important class he represents regard these matters. Upon the choice and preparation of land for orchards, through all the processes of planting, culture, harvest, and storage, the gentlemen who contribute to the work speak ex cathedra. The project of a conference arose naturally from the Apple Congress of 1883 and the Pear Congress of 1885. Each of these assemblies wrought so much public good, within the limits appointed, that all who take interest in fruit-growing demanded an extension of the idea. It was the purpose of those former meetings to secure a representation of every variety of apple or pear grown in England, to fix, once for all, the name by which it should be recognized, to ascertain which are most favoured in different parts of the country, and to denounce, with all the weight of the Royal Horticultural Society, such varieties as are not worth cultivation at the present day. There are signs enough that these objects have been gained, practically, though years must elapse before amateurs and farmers and small nurserymen can be induced to abandon the old ways. But the great fruit shows since 1883 display a striking regard for the Society's lessons. The desperate confusion of names is almost at an end. The kinds pronounced suitable for a district already begin to take the lead there; and the large nurserymen have thrown aside those varieties which are condemned. It may be noted that a general verdict, collected over all England, places Warner's King at the head of the list of apples, Blenheim Orange next, and King of the Pippins third. We do not find such a useful hint in connexion with pears. The Conference met at Chiswick on October 16, 1888, and separated on the 20th. Sir Trevor Lawrence, President of the Royal Horticultural Society, opened the proceedings with a speech, mildly cautioning an impulsive public against the observations upon fruit culture "that have been made by gentlemen occupying positions in the political world, very often somewhat at a loss for a subject." It is not to be supposed that the raising of hardy fruit will dispel those troubles that afflict the agricultural interest. In the succeeding days fourteen experts dealt with one point or another bearing upon the cultivation of apples and pears; and the audience, experts also, commented upon their views.

In order to begin at the beginning we may take the penultimate paper first. Before one can plant and manure and prune and gather and distribute, it is obviously needful to secure the ground, and very grave questions arise at once upon this matter. In fact, Mr. W. F. Béar does not hesitate to say that landlords, land laws, railway rates, and middlemen, "in my opinion, have pretty much all to do with" success in fruit-raising. The land laws are directly opposed to planting, so far as they go. Men whose estates are settled will not sink capital in an enterprise the benefit of which they may probably not live to enjoy if they have younger children to provide for; and Mr. Béar assumes that such landowners form a large majority of their class. As for tenants, without the consent of the landlord in writing, the law fails to allow them any compensation whatsoever for capital sunk in the planting of fruit; "and I doubt whether that consent can be obtained by one out of a hundred tenants." Even a long lease is "a delusion" as security, unless it contain compensation clauses or embody a right of assignment; for the man may be obliged to remove, or he may die and his executors may be unwilling to carry on the business. Mr. Béar personally advocates a free sale of improvements, with a right of pre-emption to the landlord. He readily admits that the latter has certain just claims which should be protected in making the terms of a free sale, and "elsewhere on many occasions" he has shown how that can be done. He admits, also, that free sale is an unpopular suggestion in this country. An easier and simpler process would be to strike out the stipulation in the Agricultural Holdings Act which requires the landlord's consent before a tenant is entitled to compensation for planting fruit-trees. A simple "reform," indeed! which might impose a fine of 1,000*l.* or 5,000*l.* on the luckless gentleman for his tenant's speculations. Mr. Béar anticipates that, if it were carried, the land-owning class would instantly and vehemently demand free sale, and thus his object would be reached by another path. The audience did not offer any useful comment upon these remarks, but we gather that the point at issue excites much warm feeling, as well it may. Mr. W. Paul quoted an astonishing incident at Knockholt, in Kent. A farmer there, who was not allowed to renew his tenancy nor could obtain compensation, has rooted up by a steam-plough thirty acres of raspberry bushes in the most perfect condition, which returned upwards of 1,690*l.* this present year. Mr. Paul argued, with force, that our system of charges on land under a fruit crop is grossly unjust to the planter. He can get no return for four years at least, and when the return comes, his charges are raised. In equity, he should pay nothing during those years when he receives nothing. His outlay is great. From various returns it would seem that the average cost of preparing soil, buying trees, planting, staking, four years' cultivation before the crop begins to pay, rent, rates, &c., will not be less than 30*l.* per acre. The return may be large truly, where all surroundings are favourable. Mr. Paul expects more than fifty per cent. on his orchard. But it is cruel to quote such figures.

Upon the actual processes for establishing an orchard, we cannot enter here. The soundest rules and the latest applications are detailed at length by the most competent authorities. The first words of the first paper contain a hint of the useful service to be expected from this volume. Beginners, says Mr. George Bunyard, from his experience, are apt to distrust the nurseryman. They think he will recommend such varieties as he may wish to dispose of, and, with ingenuous shrewdness, they go round the market, inquiring of the salesmen what kinds of apple or pear are most in demand. That course, indeed, looks judicious. But the honest salesman can tell no more than he knows. His stock reaches him from many quarters. The fruit which sells best may have come from the Land's End or from Kent, and be quite unsuitable to Lincolnshire, for instance. Many of the finest sorts produce a very small crop, others grow very slowly, others seldom make good trees, and thus the land is not fully utilized. The best plan, formerly, was to look round the gardens of one's neighbourhood, and observe what kinds flourished "with a clean and kindly growth." That will always be prudent; but we have here a report from every county of England, stating which varieties are found, upon the whole, most successful there; one from the Northern, Midland, and Southern Divisions of Scotland; one each from North and South Wales, from Jersey, and from Ireland. Such lists, of course, can be no more than the roughest guides for a planter; but indirectly they should be very valuable, for intelligent nurserymen, we may hope, will gradually collect those sorts which are recommended for their county, and they will be capable of advising the beginner about his special circumstances if he can persuade himself to trust them. We are mostly used to think that it is an operation ranking among the simplest in horticulture to plant an apple-tree. That pleasing fancy is challenged and routed with vehemence again and again by the experts. "The practice of sticking in a few trees in the way one would stick in a post cannot be too loudly condemned." It is an initial error which no goodness of soil, no care in the aftertime, can remedy. Hardly less important is the choice of situation, adapted both to apples and pears in general, and also to the variety in particular. Mr. W. Paul told a sad story of an orchard planted in the bottom of a valley. He foresaw what would happen; but the money was already spent. Year after year the trees blossomed finely, but little or no fruit appeared. The unhappy planter has just dug them all up and cropped his ground with vegetables. We may enumerate the papers read, which really contain, with the appendices, all that is necessary for beginners to understand. Mr. George Bunyard deals with "Apples for Profit"; Mr. W. Paul, F.L.S., with "Fruit Culture for Profit in the Open Air"; Mr. W. Wildsmith with "Dessert Pears"; Mr. Shirley Hibberd with "Pruning." This latter is calculated to make old-fashioned gardeners appeal to the secular arm, so deadly heretical it is. Doubtless his audience were familiar with such views, and they heard him patiently, even with some approval, but all who joined the debate persisted in assuming that the speaker did not really mean what he appeared to say—which is droll. Then Mr. Edmond Tonks, B.C.L., dilated with originality and force upon "Canker in Fruit Trees"; while Mr. James Douglas explains the "Cause and Cure" of that deadly pest. Mr. J. Fraser points out the "Enemies of the Apple and Pear," finding a good word for the sparrow, which Mr. Roupell endorses; but Mr. R. Dean lifted up his voice bitterly upon the other side, declaring the sparrow to be a "thoroughly heathenish bird," which devours not his fruit only, but even his blossom. Mr. J. Cheal treats "Apples for Sussex"; Mr. W. Coleman "Orchards in the West Midlands"; Mr. Malcolm Dunn "Apples and Pears for Scotland"; Mr. C. B. Saunders "Cultivation in Jersey"; Mr. F. J. Bailie "Production and Distribution"; Mr. W. F. Béar "Compensation for Orchard Planting"; Mr. D. Tallerman, K.F.J., F.R.H.S., "The Railway Difficulty." The familiar grievances on this score are put forward in a most effective way, and a radical treatment is urged, which, no doubt, will be laid before the public in due time. Mr. Tallerman illustrates his views with a very striking map to show the proportion which orchard ground and market-gardens bear to population in every county of England. As he says, "The facts thus disclosed are of a startling character, proving that in the major portion of the country there is little or no fruit or green foods locally produced to supply the requirements of the people." It is, indeed, a very singular map. Of all counties Hereford has most orchards, and actually least of market-gardens—less than Westmoreland, far less than Rutland. Westmoreland, however, stands lowest all round, alike in fruit and garden produce. Wales is sadly deficient; all the Western counties must depend on importation if they consume anything like an average quantity of green food. These are points to note wherever we cast an eye over this curious record. Lancashire, with 3,454,441 inhabitants, has almost exactly the same area laid down in orchards and market-gardens as has Nottingham, with 391,815, and Cambridge, with 185,594; much less of both than Worcestershire, with 380,283. The map is well worth study on its own account; and, if Mr. Tallerman can sustain his argument that the extraordinary deficiency in certain districts is due to the abuses of our railway system, he supplies a very potent weapon to the foes of the Companies, who were well armed before.

THE LANCASHIRE PLATE.

IT has been often said this season that the two-year-olds are very superior to the three-year-olds, and that Donovan himself owes his extraordinary success in a great measure to the exceptional inferiority of his contemporaries. If this were the case, it might have been thought that a two-year-old of such merit as Heaume would have been expected to beat Donovan over seven furlongs when receiving 12 lbs. more than weight for age from him. Yet Heaume was hardly ever mentioned as a likely winner, even when it was still supposed that he might start. With the exception of an extreme outsider, the only two-year-old that started for this valuable stake was a foreigner, M. M. Ephrussi's Alicante, a remarkably fine chestnut filly by Hermit, that had won all the races for which she had hitherto run and but little short of 3,000*l.* in stakes. Among the three-year-olds, Chitabob was considered the most likely colt to beat Donovan; and, if there was anything in the theory that his failure in the St. Leger was owing to the length of the course, it seemed reasonable to expect that he would do better over one that was only half the distance. Then, on the principle that what has happened once may happen twice, there was something to be said for Enthusiast, who had beaten Donovan by a head for the Two Thousand, over a course differing only by a furlong from that for the Lancashire Plate; yet his five defeats by Donovan within six months were not encouraging to his supporters. Minthe, the winner of the One Thousand, had little, if any, chance on public form; but she had been improving greatly as the autumn advanced, and her defeat of Carmine at Doncaster had been highly creditable. Pioneer had run second to Donovan in the early spring; but since then his form had rather deteriorated than improved. St. Patrick, although a useful sort of horse, could not claim to be considered more than second-rate; he had, however, 10 lbs. less to carry than several of his opponents. The only four-year-old that started was Seabreeze, who had won the Lancashire Plate last year, as well as other stakes, worth in all more than 20,000*l.*; but as she had become a roarer, and had suffered several defeats this season in races over a mile and a mile and a quarter, her chance seemed small; the only question was whether she might not be able to run for seven furlongs without being hampered by her infirmity.

After the field of twenty-four that ran last year, it was disappointing to see only eleven going to the post on Saturday last. On the former occasion it was also a more interesting race. Odds of 5 to 1 were then laid against the favourite; five horses were backed at from 5 down to 10 to 1; and three more stood at from 14 to 16 to 1. This time it was a very different affair. Odds of 6 to 4 were required upon the favourite, 9 to 2 was laid against Alicante, 7 to 1 was laid against Chitabob, and, with the exception of St. Patrick at 14 to 1, the rest of the field stood at from 20 to 200 to 1. After a very short delay, there was a good start; and, as soon as the horses had settled into their strides, Chitabob made the running. This policy was unexpected with a horse somewhat wanting in condition and under suspicion of unsoundness, especially as the course was very heavy. After running a furlong, he increased his lead to two or three lengths; and on nearing the awkward turn he, with all the leading horses, hurried still more in order to escape a scrimmage. This they succeeded in doing; but those in their rear were not so fortunate, as there was some crowding, if not cannoning, and St. Patrick "scraped the rails," while the French filly, Alicante, was "interfered with." On entering the straight, Chitabob was still leading, and Donovan had made his way almost to his heels. In the meantime, Enthusiast was bearing to one side, as he has several times done before to the chagrin of his admirers. Seabreeze and Pioneer were next to Chitabob and Donovan, but neither of them showed any signs of rushing to the front, and it was already evident that the race lay between the two leaders. Halfway up the straight, Fred Barrett brought Donovan up to Chitabob, and the pair raced side by side until they had almost reached the distance; then Donovan drew away from him, and gradually increased his lead until he reached the judge's chair, a winner by two lengths. Chitabob, thereby winning 1,500*l.*, finished just as far in advance of Alicante, who well deserved the 500*l.* given to the third in the race, for working her way so forward after having been disappointed at the awkward turn. Odds have been laid on Donovan for each of the races for which he has run this season, including the 85 to 20 that was laid on him for the Two Thousand which he lost. His enormous winnings of 54,694*l.* 10*s.* in two years have already been reported even in journals which rarely notice racing; but no one who understands anything about the Turf will commit the error of supposing that his unparalleled gains necessarily prove him to be the best horse that has ever carried racing colours; nor should those who make such a point of his running often, and almost always winning, forget that he has only run in six races this season.

ONIONS.

IN one of Shakspeare's "stage directions" there is a passage in which the use of onions is recommended to boys acting women's parts, and unendowed with

A woman's gift
To rain a shower of commanded tears.

There are other allusions to the same vegetable in the works of "our immortal bard." In Henry V. it is the leek, and Fluellen makes Pistol eat his leek. Considering the number of allusions to onions, leeks, scallions, shallots, and garlic in Shakspeare and the older poets, it is rather strange that nobody has hitherto written anything like a complete treatise on the genus "allium." Some enthusiastic Unionist might take up the subject if it is true that the word "onion" is derived from the Latin "unio." The successive pearl-coloured layers of which the delicious, though perhaps too fragrant, bulb is composed, are very suggestive. Its scientific description is much to the point; "the bulbous root is composed of a series of concentric coats, and varies in size according to the soil and climate." Much might be made of this, properly treated. The long and sustained contemplation of so pleasing an object ought to bring wholesomeness to the most jaundiced vision. Its effect on the nose is another thing. There is something symptomatic of selfishness in food which we all like to eat ourselves, and all wish equally to withhold from our neighbours. Considered, however, wholly in the abstract, the onion and its congeners are very interesting plants, and have natural, historical, literary, chemical, and philological associations by no means unworthy of close investigation. Some people have occupied themselves diligently in hunting up the meaning of the names of the Jerusalem artichoke and of its attractive product, Palestine soup. Did we not recently hear a most interesting disquisition on sainfoin, its meaning and derivation? But nobody seems to have troubled himself about scallions and shallots. Yet these two names would carry a philological lecture in themselves. There is, or was, a town named Askelon, and both these names are derived from it. At least, so they say who ought to know. But may not anything be derived from anything else if we go to the East? Some ingenious linguists say that Moor and Moorish come direct from gharb, the Arabic word for the west—a word preserved in a nearer form in Algarve, the western province of Portugal. But to derive shallot from Askelon requires an equal effort on the part of the supreme human intellect. Mr. Knaggs, who has recently edited a compilation on Onions and Cress (Pickering & Chatto), merely remarks that "eschalots, or, strictly speaking, scallions, take their name from Ascalon." In Mr. Annandale's Imperial Dictionary there is mention of "scallions" and the Allium ascalonicum, and Beaumont and Fletcher are quoted:—

What a scallion-faced rascal 't is!

But Mr. Knaggs may be correct with his one l. Lord Tennyson, who has immortalized the other word, spells it with one l; but we do not know for certain whence he derived his "remote Shalott." Neither occurs in Shakspeare. Mr. Annandale spells it "shallot," and derives it directly from "eschalot," and more remotely from Ascalon, through the French échalote and the old French escalone.

As leek is an English word, as old as the language, we may conclude that this is the native form of the onion, the form specially sacred to St. David and chiefly patronized by them of Wales. The word garlick may be of the same origin, and the Old English is gar-leac, meaning the "dart leek," from the dart-shaped leaf; but there seems to have been some early confusion between it and balm or treacle. We have the famous text in one old translation of the Bible, "Is there not triacle in Gilead?" and this, according to some, meant garlic. Mr. Beisley, in his Shakspeare's Garden, tells us that Galen calls garlic "the countryman's treacle," and the antiquity of its use is testified by Garlickhithe, one of the oldest local names in London. Juvenal tells us that the Egyptians of his time venerated onions and garlic, and swore by them:—

'Tis mortal sin an onion to devour,
Each clove of garlic is a sacred power;

but their ancestors of the Captivity were not so particular, and the Israelites in their wanderings longed for the Egyptian leeks, onions, and garlic, as well as for the cucumbers and melons. There is no odour so common in Oriental towns as that produced by the various forms of this root, and possibly the modern fondness for coffee developed by Turks and Arabs may be partly caused by the fact that it takes away both the taste and the smell of onions, if not also of garlic. There would not be a word to say against either were it not for this subsequent disadvantage. To return to Shakspeare, what else can he have alluded to in the last scene of Hamlet? We may make a present of the question to the commentators who have tried to explain "union" by "a pearl," or have substituted "onyx." But read "onion" and all is clear:—

The King shall drink to Hamlet's better breath,
An in the cup an union shall he throw.

True, the context requires that the "union" should be something precious, but can we think of anything more precious, in certain circumstances, than, say, a stewed Spanish onion, or one "that hath been cool'd a long age" in pickle, or a tiny "escalonia" in salad, or a "suspicion" of garlic on the dish which bears your English beefsteak after long absence among frog-eaters. Let us pity the woes of an unhappy man who, voyaging from the Iberian coast in a schooner laden with oranges and onions, was long becalmed, so that the vegetables decayed, with the result that our traveller, when at length he reached home, could never care for either the golden fruit or the silvery root again.

THE NEW BURLESQUE.

BURLESQUE, as presented at the Gaiety Theatre, is a curious product containing much that does not fit into any recognized variety of dramatic performance. The music-hall contributes not a little, the resources of the entertainer have been drawn upon, the Ethiopian serenader or Christy Minstrel furnishes something, the stage proper is occasionally suggested, and so is the buffoon who grins through a horse-collar at a country fair. Audiences have, however, been educated up to it, or down to it, and, as there is no reason to suppose that the daily papers exaggerated their accounts of the reception bestowed upon the principal members of the Gaiety company on the occasion of their return from a foreign tour, it is evident that if Garrick himself had revisited the stage there could have been no greater show of enthusiasm than that created by the appearance of Miss Farren and Mr. Leslie. Moreover, this enthusiasm was maintained throughout the evening, notwithstanding that the burlesque occupied nearly four hours in representation.

No doubt there is something contagious about the reckless dash and unrestrained spirit with which Mr. Leslie and Miss Farren fulfil their tasks; and the actor possesses a vein of wildly eccentric humour that surprises and diverts. One never knows what he will do next, beyond the fact that it is almost sure to be something unexpected and laughable. His proceedings do not bear description; it is the manner that amuses. As for burlesque, very little—it may almost be said no—endeavour is made to parody or make capital out of the incidents of Victor Hugo's fine drama. Mr. Leslie is set down in the programme as Don César de Bazan, and Miss Farren as the hero; but except a hint of the relations between Ruy Blas and the Queen no suggestion is taken from the plot, and these relations are so twisted that finally Don Salluste's ex-lacquey wins the Royal hand by success in a competitive bull-fight. The assumption of character is, in fact, merely a peg on which to hang songs, dances, mimicries, and extravagances of all sorts. The actor and actress appear as schoolgirls in white muslin, as chimney-sweeps with sooty faces, and as wandering actors, giving a preposterous burlesque of a scene between Pauline and Claude Melnotte; then Miss Farren changes a glittering dress for the rags of a crossing sweeper, and Mr. Leslie transforms himself into a hybrid Scotch-Irishman, half his face and body being made up and dressed in the guise of the stage representative of Caledonia, the other half of Hibernia; and thus equipped, he sings in praise of the whisky of both countries. He dances, too, a combination of jig and reel, which is very quaint. The subsequent imitation of Mr. Irving in ballet costume struck us as vulgar and foolish, and the fatuous idea is expanded by bringing on other comedians in gauze skirts probably intended to represent other actors—Mr. Toole, Mr. Roberts, and Mr. Wilson Barrett—the last named in a disguise so complete as to be doubtfully recognizable, and we will not warrant our supposition. In any case the folly is beyond the legitimate bounds of burlesque.

Many of the songs are suitable enough, a few are bright and pretty, others dull and commonplace. It is a curious incident of burlesque to find a vocalist—Miss Marion Hood—diverging from the strains of a feeble ballad to bring in "Home, Sweet Home," sung with all possible fervour and supported by a harmonized chorus behind the scenes. Why "Home, Sweet Home"? Nothing is prettier in the music than Mr. Leslie's whistling of a lullaby, with orchestral accompaniment, duly toned down. His intonation is true, and the notes are musical. There is a "topical" duet in no way favourably distinguished from the average of such compositions. Considering that balladmongers have the whole range of current subjects to choose from, it is strange that a good topical song should be so rare. Miss Farren would also do well to get something new instead of her song in the last act, which is neither pretty nor interesting. The dances, however, are all quite excellent. Miss Letty Lind is singularly graceful and pleasing. Since Miss Kate Vaughan retired from burlesque none of the many dancers who have been seen—and a dancer in the fashion introduced by Miss Vaughan is now considered an essential to pieces of this class—has equalled Miss Lind, who, indeed, may be ranked on a level with her model. Miss Sylvia Grey has merit also, but lacks something of the lightness and ease of her companion—if a critic may safely venture on such delicate ground in the desire to do full justice to a very accomplished young lady. Mr. Leslie and Miss Farren, again, are admirable dancers in their own ways, and Mr. Storey—half dancer, half acrobat—does wonderful things with legs which are apparently quite flexible. There is abundance of glitter and colour in the dresses. If we were to express our opinion that the whole business was too long, we should find ourselves in opposition to the majority of the audience; and it must be admitted that, if modern burlesque is an acquired taste, the taste has been acquired by a great many people.

HOLLAND HOUSE.

THAT the anxiety of the people of Kensington as to the future of Holland House has led some of them to write to the papers even before the burial of the remains of the late owner is not to be wondered at. They have lost, by what most of them perhaps rightly regard as a pure fraud, the site of the Horticultural Gardens; and now they fear that the grounds of Holland House are threatened. We understand that two stories are circulated on the subject. According to one, the little park, or what is left of it, is to be cut up by the speculative builder; and a well-known firm is said to have the plans ready. According to a different and, we would hope, more authoritative story the next heir of the Holland family means to keep things as they are; and most circumstantial details are forthcoming as to the arrangements made to this end. It will be remembered that owing to some transactions in which a Romanist dignitary was concerned, it became, some seventeen or eighteen years ago, expedient for the then proprietor of Holland House to part with all the adjacent land as far as possible. To understand this, we must remember that the estate comprised, besides what went with the house, two or three outlying, but not very distant, holdings. One of these, a field which had joined the park with the Bayswater Road, was covered with a triple row of hideous stucco houses. A second portion joined the park to Addison Road, and contained the very interesting remains of the manor-house of West Town, locally known as "The Moats." Here Sir Walter Cope lived, and very possibly died, in 1614, for Cope's Castle, as it was called at first, was not finished for more than thirty years after his death. The Moats estate extended from Addison Road to the brow of the hill, close to the gardens of Holland House; nevertheless, it too was sold, but it has fallen into good hands. Finally, the site of Little Holland House was similarly amputated, and the well-known artistic village of Melbury Road has arisen on the site. The question has now been asked in the Times—Are the people of Kensington, and, indeed, of London, to lose Holland House?

It may be well to reckon up some of its points of interest. Putting aside the history of the Fox family, we may be permitted to recall that not only was Cope's famous building designed by Thorpe, but it had also the advantage of some touches by Inigo Jones. No doubt we know little and care less about Jones and Thorpe at the present day, and many people even admire much more than their work the new and terribly anomalous building at Caius, or the Law Courts at Manchester. But it may be that when the new Institute at South Kensington is finished, and when more people have had access to Eaton, a better tone may prevail—a tone more like that which preserved Aston for Birmingham. We confess, however, to an uneasy feeling. The taste which admires the Albert Hall and the Natural History Museum is not likely to care much for Holland House and all its associations. Many of us were recently interested in the delightful Letters of Dorothy Osborne. Is it generally known that the beautiful Lady Diana Rich, so often mentioned in them, lived and died at Holland House, and that the dark avenue where she met her "wraith" just before her death is still pointed out? Here Addison taught Lord Warwick how a Christian can die; and one of the more interesting relics preserved in the House is a table which had been in the Spectator's rooms in the Temple. The scene of the famous duel in which Best shot Lord Camelford—who, to be sure, seems not to have stolen his fate—has already been alienated, and Little Holland House, where he died, has been pulled down. But enough remains at Holland House to make us all, whether we live at Kensington or elsewhere, very anxious as to its fate.

THE ROYAL OAK.

THE only remarkable thing about the new Drury Lane drama, The Royal Oak, is the extraordinary absence of invention by which it is characterized. The piece might be described as a species of dramatic puss-in-the-corner, or blind man's buff, repeated four times over with practically no variation. King Charles II. is the puss whom the Puritans are trying to catch, and here, as in so many other plays, the heroine is beloved by a Cavalier and a Roundhead, the latter of whom, having for a time the upper hand, for Cromwell's star is in the ascendant and a price is put on "Charles Stuart's" head, seeks to gain the lady's hand by treacherous promises to spare and save her lover. This is all trite, and, moreover, obvious. When the period of the story was first announced—1651 is the date—the experienced playgoer may well have anticipated very much such a work as this, though he would naturally have believed and hoped that it would be shorter and distinguished by something a good deal fresher in the way of incident. The playwright who takes in hand an historical subject must of course be guided, if not scrupulously at any rate in essentials, by the facts of history, though here the authors, Messrs. Hamilton and Harris, have not refrained from introducing an episode which certainly has no warrant in the annals of the time, the killing of the child Sir Bevis Cholmondeley by a bullet aimed at the fugitive King. We do not complain much of that. If every deviation from authenticated fact were to be severely regarded, incident would necessarily be lacking; but it is a very weak point in the play that, having liberally permitted themselves a good deal of latitude, the authors should follow the same lines act after act. On two separate occasions Charles is almost caught while hiding disguised as a groom, and known by the name of Jackson, in the house of his faithful adherents the Cholmondeleys; he is as nearly as possible caught again in the boughs of the Boscobel oak, though on the evening when we saw the play it was obvious that the Drury Lane officer on the Drury Lane horse who commanded the troops sent in search of the King would never have caught anybody until he had dismounted, for with a rein in each hand he was quite powerless to control the movements of his steed. That, however, is not a structural fault in the drama; but the constant repetition of incident is. Moreover, the authors linger unduly on their way, and if it be true that Mr. Hare intends to produce a version of Esmond, it is—or would be if The Royal Oak were to attract the attention of the better class of playgoers—a little hard on him that the Drury Lane writers should have borrowed one of the most dramatic scenes in Thackeray's novel. That the compilers of the new piece had Esmond in their thoughts internal evidence proves. Dorian Cholmondeley, who believes that he has found the King in amorous conversation with Mildred Clavering—and, indeed, the suspicion is not altogether without warrant, though the jealous lover is to some extent on the wrong track—taunts him by recalling the history of Strafford. Does the reader recollect the "Esmond" episode? "I draw this sword and break it, and deny you," said the Colonel; "and, had you completed the wrong you designed us, by heaven I would have driven it through your heart, and no more pardoned you than your father pardoned Monmouth." How far the parody at Drury Lane falls short of the superb scene which Thackeray describes with the rarest art it would be difficult to make clear.

Mr. Henry Neville, as the King, is the central figure throughout the first four acts, and then, having sailed for France from Shoreham beach, he finally retires, while the play concerns itself with the fortunes of the lovers, Dorian Cholmondeley and Mildred Clavering. No one can say for certain that Mr. Neville does not precisely resemble Charles II., but a doubt will occur to many minds whether there can be any striking degree of similarity between original and representative. At the same time the actor may be said to fulfil all the requirements of a Drury Lane hero. His faithful defender, Dorian Cholmondeley—that is to say, when Dorian's jealousy does not temporarily oust his loyalty—finds a somewhat stolid interpreter in Mr. Arthur Dacre. It was the King himself who is said to have apologized for taking an unconscionable time to die; and when on the scaffold—for Dorian has been arrested and sentenced to the block on Tower Hill—his adherent anticipates his royal master. Mr. Dacre does not appear to succeed in creating very much sympathy when he mounts the steps and makes tedious preparation for laying his head on the block. It is a "situation" in which an actor who had any command over the feelings of his audience could scarcely fail to create effect, but we found it impossible to feel any particular anxiety. Of course the pardon, which has been obtained by Mildred and forced from her by her Roundhead persecutor, comes just in time—had Dorian been less prolix and dilatory his head would have been off before he knew that the Protector had spared it, but all the same, from the dramatic point of view, the action wants quickening. It is really a good idea in this scene to show Mildred fainting at the foot of the scaffold and dropping the pardon before she can make known what it is, and there are so few good ideas in this very commonplace drama that we should not omit to mention this one. Miss Emery's style is too delicate for Drury Lane heroines, but we have such pleasant memories of Little Lord Fauntleroy's mother that we could not easily bring ourselves to find much fault with the actress to whom we were indebted for that charming study, particularly when that actress is found struggling with an unsuitable part. By far the best played character is the Patty Woodroffe of Miss Fanny Brough. We think that the merit of this really admirable actress is not nearly enough recognized. Her gaiety and humour are irresistible. She possesses that genuine sense of fun and seeming enjoyment of the scene which are among the most valuable attributes of the comédienne. Miss Jessie Bond may be instanced as another actress who is also thus gifted; but it is difficult to recall many examples. Patty is a delightful damsel, and one can readily understand the transformation of her admirer, Walk-in-the-way Dear-love, from Puritan to follower of the King. Mr. Harry Nicholls plays this latter part in his accustomed fashion, and though some of the paraphrases of Scripture jar on us, the character is, on the whole, amusing; for if Mr. Nicholls has little variety he has a perception of comedy. The boy who plays Sir Bevis Cholmondeley, and is killed by the bullet aimed at the King as they stand beneath the Boscobel oak, might well be omitted from the drama; for he has all the usual faults of the conventional stage child.

ON INSURING LIFE.

THERE are few matters respecting which the ordinary man finds himself less competent to decide than the relative merits of competing insurance Companies. The whole business of insurance is a mystery to him, and he knows not what test to apply to determine which offers to him the greatest advantages. Usually, therefore, he turns for advice to some friend upon whose judgment he relies, or he yields to the solicitations of a pushing agent or other interested person. Considering the importance of the question, we feel that we owe no apology to our readers for offering a few suggestions that may help those amongst them who are thinking of insuring their lives, and are at a loss for the means of ascertaining what Company they ought to select.

The first and indispensable condition which an office should fulfil is, that it should offer full security to the person insuring with it. Unless the Company is able to meet all its liabilities, the provision which the assured thinks he has made for his family after his own death may prove to be no provision at all. He has made sacrifices for years without attaining the object for which he submitted to them. The ordinary man, of course, has not the means of satisfying himself absolutely of the solvency of an office, and if he had, he probably would not be competent to use those means properly. But there are a few rough rules which may help to guide him safely. Speaking generally, it is obvious that an old Company is more likely to be safe than a new one. The new one has yet to give evidence that it is well managed, that it can build up a sound business, and sustain competition with its rivals. The old one has, by the very fact that it has existed so long, given proof, at all events, that it has formed a connexion, and can sustain competition. Of course, a new office may turn out to be exceedingly well managed and prosperous, but at the beginning the presumption undoubtedly is in favour of the old one. The intending insurer, however, will do well to bear in mind that it is only a presumption, for, unfortunately, experience has shown that old offices not seldom are utterly insolvent. As between old offices, that one is likely to afford the greatest advantages to those who insure with it whose accumulated funds bear the highest proportion to the outstanding policies. A Company may have a large income, and very large accumulated funds, and yet the liabilities may be proportionately much larger. The point of importance for the intending insurer is the proportion borne by the funds to the liabilities. If a Company has in the past accumulated much money, the probability is that it will continue to practise forethought in the future, whereas another, which has been less prudent in the past, has not so acted as to inspire cautious men with confidence. The mere fact, however, that the funds are apparently ample is not enough. The intending insurer should inquire how those funds are invested. Is a large proportion of them lent out upon mortgage on lands and houses? And, if so, where are those lands and houses situated? Has the depreciation of the mortgaged property been considerable since the mortgage was effected? And would it be possible to realize if there was a necessity to do so? These are all questions of great interest to the insurer. Then, again, in what kind of securities is the money invested which has not been lent upon land and houses? Have the directors looked rather to safety than to high interest? Have they contented themselves, for example, with Consols, guaranteed and preference stocks of British railways, and other high-class securities? Or have they been tempted into risky investments by the promise of high returns? On this point the intending insurer will probably like to take the opinion of his banker or his broker, or of both. But before he proceeds so far there are some other points which he will do well to inquire into.

The first of these is the tables of mortality employed. It is clear that tables which require large reserves to be held are safer than those which allow of small reserves. Some few Companies use special tables. These may be either good or bad—some of them are very bad. And it will be better for the man who is not an expert to select an office which employs tables proved to be trustworthy by the great majority of offices and long experience. Hardly less important is the rate of interest assumed by a Company to be earned in future upon its funds. If, for example, one Company assumes that it will obtain 4 per cent. on its investments and another assumes only 3 per cent., the latter will manifestly have to keep larger reserves than the former, and therefore will be safer. Further, there will be a wider margin between the 3 per cent. assumed and the actual interest earned than between 4 per cent. and the actual interest. And consequently the accumulations of the Company taking a low rate of interest will increase much more rapidly than those of the Company taking a high rate of interest. There is another point of very great importance—namely, that the Company which assumes that a high rate of interest will be earned is under a temptation to invest in rather speculative securities in order to increase the margin between the rate assumed and that earned. Lastly, it is to be borne in mind that for a considerable time past the rate of interest has been steadily falling, and it will continue to fall as long as peace is maintained. It is not at all improbable, therefore, that the Company which assumes that a high rate of interest will be earned may discover that it is pursuing a dangerous policy, and may, therefore, be compelled to lower the assumed rate. In that case it will have to reduce its bonuses, or even perhaps to suspend them altogether for a while. We have said above that the presumption is in favour of an old rather than a new Company. And if the intending insurer finds that an old Company upon which he has fixed has accumulated large funds in proportion to its liabilities, employs tables of mortality that are generally recognized to be trustworthy, and assumes that the interest earned by its investments will be low, the presumption is greatly strengthened. But he will not rest there. He will naturally like to know what is the proportion borne by the working expenses to the premium income. The premium income ought to defray all the expenses of every kind of the office, ought to yield a dividend to the shareholders, if there are shareholders, and ought to furnish a fund which, being judiciously invested, will so grow as to be sufficient to meet all the liabilities of the Company. It will be seen that the ratio borne by the expenses to the premium income is, therefore, a matter of very great importance. If that ratio is high it is not probable that the funds will accumulate rapidly enough to meet all the liabilities of the Company. Of late years there has been a tendency to increase the working expenses, and, therefore, it is essential that the intending insurer should pay close attention to this matter. About a dozen Companies which stand highest in the opinion of the well-informed keep their expenses at about 10 per cent. of their premium income. A company which greatly exceeds that ratio ought to be avoided by the intending insurer. There are exceptional cases due to special circumstances; but, broadly speaking, we are inclined to think that, where the expenses amount to 20 per cent. of the premium income or more, the intending insurer may conclude that he will not get what he ought to expect for his money. Even 15 per cent. is a high ratio.

So far we have been considering insurance generally. Before concluding, however, we may offer a remark or two on the kind of policy most advantageous to the assured. The least beneficial to him and the most beneficial to the Company is a policy for life without participation in profits, for if the assured lives long he pays much more than he receives—indeed, he may pay two or three times as much as he gets back. Insurance with participation in profits may be effected in several different ways. A man may contract to pay a fixed sum as premium every year, the bonuses being added to the policy, or he may engage to pay a fixed premium, the bonuses being applied to reduce the premium, or he may stipulate to pay a definite number of annual premiums—ten, fifteen, or twenty, as the case may be—the policy, however, not being payable until death, or, lastly, he may insure for a definite number of years, say, fifteen or twenty, the policy being payable at the end of the time, or on death, if it occurs in the interval. The objection to the latter plan is that the premium is about double the rate charged for the whole of life; but, on the other hand, if a good office is chosen, the bonus is usually calculated at a higher rate, the policy carries a higher surrender value, and, above all, it is not forfeitable. It has, therefore, very strong recommendations. So, also, has the insurance for life under the terminable scale of premiums. As in the case just considered, the premiums are of course higher than when they are paid every year as long as life lasts; but then the premium ceases to be payable when the man is growing old, and therefore less fit for work, and usually the bonuses and surrender value are higher. Whichever plan he adopts, if a man decides to insure with participation in profits, the scale of bonuses becomes a matter of great importance. The higher the bonus the better return he receives for his money, provided, of course, the premium is not extravagantly high. Further, the office which increases bonuses with age acts more equitably towards its customers. The longer a man has contributed to the funds of a Company the more he is clearly entitled to receive back from it. Yet there are offices which actually give larger bonuses to the newly assured.

REVIEWS.

TRAVELS IN FRANCE.*

THE centenary of the meeting of the States-General in 1789 has inspired many much more foolish things than this reprint of Arthur Young's Travels in France. It is a work which ought to be made more easily accessible than it has hitherto been, not only because of its own value, which is considerable, but because of the frequency and manner of its appearance as an authority in works on the Revolution. There are passages of it which appear with the utmost regularity in book after book till one begins to suspect that the learned authors quote from one another, and not from the original. A convenient new edition, handy to hold and agreeable to read, may help a few here and there to check these citations. Miss M. Betham-Edwards has, it must be allowed, supplied such a reprint. The book is no larger than a book should be—that is to say, large enough to hold comfortably in one's hand by the fireside. The print, if not exactly handsome, is reasonably legible to the average man who enjoys the possession of fourteen-inch sight. Miss Betham-Edwards has done her purely editorial work in a fashion with which we have no serious faults to find. She carefully tells us, in the notes, what departments the various places named by Arthur Young are. This is at times a useful kind of information, since he wrote before this administrative division had been adopted. In the notes, too, she corrects the occasional antiquities or eccentricities of his spelling of names, while very properly leaving his text as he wrote it. There is a slight biographical sketch of Young in the "chatty" style which is not now quite so young as it once was. It is properly laudatory, and Miss Betham-Edwards is not more contemptuous of a Government which gave her author such a miserable reward as a place of 600*l.* a year than would have been thought quite right according to the standard of taste prevailing twenty years ago. Why a gentleman who frittered away a handsome private fortune in amateur farming, who gained great popularity by his books, and did finally get those 600*l.* a year should be supposed to have been ill used we do not for our part see. When the editor wrote that in France such a man would have a statue she is telling the truth; but she might have remembered Young's own comment on the Bishop of Sisteron's remark that a statue ought to be put up to Olivier de Serres. He called it "snuff-box chat." Considering to what parish pump heroes statues have been erected in France, we doubt whether the blessed ghost of Arthur Young would have a more civil phrase for the remark of his editor.

* Travels in France during the years 1787, 1788, 1789. By Arthur Young. With an Introduction, Biographical Sketch, and Notes by M. Betham-Edwards. London: Bell & Sons. 1889.

The introduction which Miss Betham-Edwards has written for her reprint is in a way very well in place. It is distinguished all through by a certain begging of the question which is to be found in most of those who make a habit of quoting the few select passages of Arthur Young already referred to. Miss Betham-Edwards, after saying with great truth that a survey of France as it is makes a good shoeing horn to a description of France as it was, and, after giving some details of the changes which have come over the provinces which Young found in the worst state, goes on to take it for granted through several pages that the prosperity of to-day is solely the work of the Revolution, and that Arthur Young proves it. The calmness with which this is taken for granted by those who quote the stock passages is one of the reasons which lead the not inexperienced reviewer to conclude that they take their quotations from one another and do not select them after reading their author through. For, as a matter of fact, Young's travels when consulted fairly do not bear that proposition out at all. Whether this be so or not, its intrinsic absurdity is great. Nobody denies that one part of the work of the Revolution in its earlier days and before it became anarchical was to sweep away one of the most oppressive and also unproductive systems of taxation ever known, and to free France from a most detestable double ownership in land (something even worse than the handiwork of the Liberal party in Ireland), which was very deserving to be swept away. This is undeniably true; but was it also necessary to destroy the whole framework of Government in France, to make a clean sweep of every organization in the country, to massacre, to confiscate millions of private property, and to launch the nation on a century of instability and confusion? Was it necessary to hand France over, first to rabid prigs of the Robespierre and St. Just stamp, then to greedy rogues of the Barras order, and then to the colossal scoundrel who bled it well nigh to death to serve his own insane ambition? The good which the Revolution did in France has been done elsewhere at an infinitely lighter cost. It is no honour to the French that they alone could not reform without wholesale destruction. Those who quote Arthur Young, as Miss Betham-Edwards does, as excusing the miseries of the Revolution, should, we think, remember the distinction. To give reasons for thinking that a system of taxation and of "servitudes" on real property is a very bad one and requires reform is one thing, to assert that the need of reform justified the most ignoble and stupid welter in history is quite another. Even if Arthur Young had taken this latter view, which he did not, that would only be a reason for disabling his judgment. In truth, this excuse for the crimes of the Revolution has been found in Arthur Young by the convenient process of picking and choosing and drawing deductions from fragments. It is a favourite device of those who admire the Revolution, not so much because it improved the lot of the peasant as because it lowered the position of the gentleman. We may instance as very characteristic of a certain class of apologists for the Revolution a note of Miss Betham-Edwards's on that savoury but obscure subject the "Marquette." She quotes Henri Martin's evidence, that in some cases the "droit de seigneur" was demanded—or rather that a money payment was demanded as a relief—but she does not quote his statement that the so-called right was never recognized as legal, even by the mediæval law courts. She leaves it to be inferred that it was habitually demanded down to 1789, and was one of the horrors from which the Revolution freed the French peasant.

As we have said, Arthur Young himself by no means bears out these apologists of the Revolution. He himself became scared, as Mr. Morley puts it, when he saw what the movement was becoming—but even before it had reached its height, and while he, along with some thousands of Englishmen, who also became scared in time, was inclined to admire it—he had said nothing to show that France was in a condition which made a clean sweep necessary. Neither his sagacity nor his impartiality was above reproach, but he was a good observer and an intelligent reporter of what he observed. The picture he gives of France before 1789 will, we think, surprise some of those who take this book up with the idea of its contents naturally formed after reading the usual select quotations. He found long stretches of waste land, many estates suffering from absentee landlords, much bad farming, much poverty. A good deal of this may be put down to the thinness of the population of France, which even now is by no means dense, being indeed, as the great foreign immigration shows, not equal to the work of the country. Some of it was the remains of the terrible exhaustion caused by the wars of Louis XIV. Some of it was due to the fact that the French were then, as they are now, slow to move from a familiar routine. Finally, we may remark, that poverty quite as grinding as anything he saw is to be found to-day among the peasant proprietors of some districts of France. Still it cannot be denied that some part of the evils he saw were the direct effect of bad taxation and of the feudal servitudes still levied on the land, even when the ownership had passed to the peasants. These were certainly evils which, if the leaders of the French Revolution had not been prigs destitute of any kind of political faculty, would have been removed without throwing the nation into a pit of anarchy and encouraging such scenes as Arthur Young himself saw near Besançon. "The mischiefs," he said, "which have been perpetrated in the country towards the mountains and Vesoul are numerous and shocking. Many châteaux have been burnt, others plundered, the seigneurs hunted down like wild beasts, their wives and daughters ravished, their papers and titles burnt, and all their property destroyed; and these abominations," he notes, were "not inflicted on marked persons who were odious for their former conduct or principles," but on the whole class. But there was another side to what Arthur Young saw. He did not find France stagnating in poverty. On the contrary, he found much industrial enterprise in all parts of it; and that even agriculture, though backward, was improving. There were many landlords of the stamp of the Duc de Liancourt, who were as eager to improve their estates and sometimes more successful in doing it than Young himself. It was these landlords, he it observed, who were massacred; the absentees escaped in the emigration. When, then, all that the traveller saw is taken, and not only a part of it, the impression given of France is not that of a country in a state of extreme misery, still less of a country which could consider that it had improved its condition by exchanging even the evils of the old régime for the anarchy which was the immediate fruit of the Revolution. The prosperity which has come to it since is great, no doubt, but not, all things considered, greater than the prosperity of other countries which have not performed that process of politically stripping themselves naked, which Burke describes in a famous passage. We have been so busy with Arthur Young as a witness that we have no space left to speak of the man himself. And yet he is an interesting figure. He was very much the kind of Philister whose bones were made in England in the eighteenth century. For art he obviously cared very little, and for antiquity he had no kind of respect. Old houses, old customs, old methods were mere rubbish in his eyes, fit only to be swept away to make room for rational novelties. In his ideas on government he did not differ from thousands who more or less consciously repeated Rousseau. Again and again he declares, sometimes with the emphasis which small capitals impart, that Government is responsible for all he does not like in France. If officers annoy him by "a voluble garniture of bawdry or nonsense," if men of business will not talk, if overwork makes women prematurely old, it is all the fault of Government. Obviously he thought that Government was a species of machine which any people could make to any pattern, and do anything with. Beyond agriculture, indeed, his interest did not extend, and his knowledge was not considerable. On that topic, however, he had all the merits of the enthusiast. There is something almost grandiose in his wish to possess a string of farms from Valencia to the Highlands, and to direct them all at once. It was a wish worthy of one who wrote on agriculture like an angel and farmed like poor Poll. There is even a touch in it of sheer mania which might but for accident have taken the form of hunting for the philosopher's stone. Withal he was a genial man, and one likes to part with him by quoting in support of this praise his audacious remark that a man is not worth hanging who does not drink a little too much champagne on proper occasions.

NOVELS.*

IF Mrs. Burnett's popular story had never been written, the plot of Diana might very naturally have occurred to Mrs.

* Diana. By Georgiana M. Craik (Mrs. A. W. May). 3 vols. London: Richard Bentley & Son.

Geoff. By Gertrude Forde. 3 vols. London: Hurst & Blackett.

The Crime of Keziah Keene. By Mrs. Vere Campbell. London: Ward & Downey.

The Story of Mary Herries. By J. Francis. London: Ward & Downey.

May. But it is a fact that, in reading the latter novel, Little Lord Fauntleroy constantly occurs to the memory. Diana Fielding is a sort of grown-up Lord Fauntleroy, and throughout the second volume of Diana the parallelism is really very closely kept up. The Rev. Mr. Fielding has been employed in early life at Wilmites, the seat of an exceptionally haughty baronet, Sir Henry Rivers. He falls in love with and runs away with the only daughter of the house. The erring couple are never forgiven, and, when the story opens, the poor lady has long been dead, the sole child of their union, Diana, is twenty-two, and her father is married again, and has a small family. They are all pinched with poverty in a little Southern incumbency, and Diana, who is a complete "queen and huntress, chaste and fair," has no Hesperus to entreat her light except an almost incredibly mild and irritating curate, whom she snubs nearly to death. Into the midst of this duck-pond of a parsonage falls suddenly, like a bolt, a letter from Sir Henry Rivers, imperiously demanding a visit from his unseen granddaughter. She accepts the invitation, and makes Wilmites her home until the death of the baronet. It is this portion of her career which is so strikingly like the early experiences of Cedric Errol at Dorincourt. But Mrs. May's baronet is more wicked than Mrs. Burnett's earl, and when his will is read strange confusions ensue. We must not spoil Mrs. May's story, which is a very good one, by telling how it ends. Diana is an excellently constructed novel, wholesome in feeling, well written, and with touches here and there of genuine humour. The sway of the heroine over her romantic and tearful stepmother, whom she is for ever proudly riding over, metaphorically, and then repentantly stopping to pick up and kiss, is funny and very original. The children at Hettlestowe are unusually well drawn, and, with another child, Bertie Brydon at Wilmites, there is a scene which is quite admirable. This exceedingly wicked urchin is discovered on the surface of a deep pond in a lonely old quarry floating awkwardly about on an improvised raft with a pole. The ever-impetuous Diana swoops down upon him and skirmishes round and round the pond trying to catch him, but Master Bertie is too wary for that. At last, the raft happening to come close to shore, she dashes wildly upon it, jerks Bertie off into the water, and comes very near to killing him in order to save his life. We congratulate Mrs. May on the production of a very pleasant and wholesome story.

If Diana is sometimes a little humdrum, its social pictures are life itself in comparison with those in the London parts of Geoff (a most annoying name for a book, be it said in passing). "Proud, shy, and deeply enthusiastic, Bertha Curtis was at once peculiar, repellent, and lovable." Another member of the family "moderates the habitual sarcasm of his remarks, and condescends even to receive his mother's attentions with more grace than usual." This latter person is the brother of Bertha and Geoff, and does all the things which proud Guardsmen do in ladies' novels. He "lifts his eyebrows serenely," his "lips curl ominously," his "callous face flushes"; while his sister is crimsoning with quiet bitterness, and Geoff wrings his long yellow moustache after the fashion of Ouida's Russian princes. The whole rude and ill-bred family talk slang, "chaff" one another, and flounder through reams of bad English. This is how the one member, Geoff, who afterwards proves to be more sympathetic, speaks to his sister in return for a bouquet:—

Thanks, old girl—werry chic. Yes, only fancy, two years at least before I don this garb of civilization once more—if I ever do. I say, what do you think of these pink silk socks? Tell me, have I got that beastly curl out of my wig?

We hasten to say that towards the close of the first volume Geoff gets away from London, and the whole tone of the book improves. He rather abruptly becomes a cowboy in the West, and his adventures in learning his trade are carefully and pleasingly described. The scenes in Perry's Ranch are very good indeed. We are less pleased with Black Peak Cañon, because there the sentiments begin to be trotted out again, and Miss Ford does not ride her emotions as well as Geoff rode the bucking broncho. In the third volume we get back to London society and the dreadful Curtis family, with its slang and its violent modes of speech. Why is it that certain lady novelists at the present moment think it proper to make their characters, presumed to be ladies and gentlemen, speak in this vile jargon? There must always be a convention in the dialogue of second-rate novels. We cannot expect every one to possess Jane Austen's skill in combining extreme realism with the finest personal distinction. But we know nothing uglier than the tricks of the living disciples of Ouida. We prefer the dear old puppets of Mrs. Gore, ladies who "had never been detected in the slightest infraction of the minor social duties," or even those giddy fairies of the footlights who move in fashionable splendour through the pages of Lady Blessington, to the heroes and heroines of such London life as Geoff describes. The pity of it is in this case the greater that Miss Gertrude Forde sacrifices to an odious habit distinct gifts, though rather in the evolution of narrative than in the analysis of character.

A curious book is The Crime of Keziah Keene. It belongs to a class very little cultivated in England, but tolerably well known in France, where M. Catulle Mendès is now its leading exponent. The class is not one which we care to see introduced into this country; but, taken on its own merits, Mrs. Campbell's is rather a remarkable study. There is very little narrative and no plot; the interest of the book lies in the analysis of Keziah Keene's motives. She is an impulsive girl, the physical side of whose nature is more strongly developed than the moral. She lives with a brilliant and eccentric young aunt, who is really an adventuress, and she becomes acquainted with Paul Feramors, a handsome musician. Keziah does not learn that Paul is married until it is too late, as she thinks, to withdraw from his influence. Paul's wife has money, and by-and-bye, having set herself the task of winning him back from Keziah, succeeds at last in doing this by arts which are cleverly conceived. Keziah is left upon the world, but is protected, with a view to ultimate marriage, by an excellent hospital surgeon, Basil Latimer. In the process of time Paul becomes once more enamoured of Keziah in absence, and begins to visit and try to influence her. She knows not which man she loves best, but takes for granted that it is Paul. One night, however, Paul and a man whom she erroneously supposes to be Basil fight a duel in the hospital garden. Paul is mortally wounded, and is brought in and left for a few moments in Keziah's keeping. She then commits her "crime"; she strangles the dying man, lest in his last ravings he should denounce Basil. But his antagonist was not Basil at all, and the conscience-stricken Keziah flies to a valley in the Alps, where she pours out her confessions in a series of letters to a friend, and then dies of a broken heart. It will be seen that probability is not much considered in The Crime of Keziah Keene, which aims at being a Rousseauish sort of poem in prose; but the interest of the book lies, not in its story, but in its analysis of feeling. The final scene of the duel and the strangling is not quite so well done as it should be; the author has not clearly witnessed it in her own imagination. But the curious unconscious development of a new secret passion, which is at the root of the crime, is ingeniously described. From a literary point of view The Crime of Keziah Keene is considerably above the average of such books. It is written carefully in balanced, and sometimes very graceful sentences, a little too rhetorically perhaps for a modern reader. When Mrs. Campbell writes:—

So soon she died, they told me that I need not grieve. So soon she died, my kisses were no more to her than others. So soon she died, an open rose could hide her face—she misses the chance of moving us with her pathos by an affected inversion which is a positive error in English, and she needs to guard herself against being what Miss Forde's cowboys would call "high-toned."

A certain inequality of execution, combined with an unusual freshness, makes The Story of Mary Herries an interesting and tantalizing book. We suppose that "J. Francis" is a new hand. She has something to learn in the handicraft of her art; but it is obvious that she has excellent native qualities. It is not often that we can blame a book for being too short, but it is certain that Mary Herries would have been the better for greater elaboration. The first nine chapters are as good as they can be, and promise, we are bound to confess, more than the rest of the story quite fulfils. The picture of the breezy life of Miss Herries, in her maiden meditation, is exceedingly charming, and so brightly and clearly described as to show that "J. Francis" possesses the rare gift of perception. The heroine is the solitary daughter of a wealthy man of science, whose house she manages, and whose yacht she animates. Captain St. Quintin, an engineer officer, comes to her across the deck of the ancestral yacht, and they fall in love with one another. The course of their passion is ruffled by a somewhat improbable episode with a scoundrel who pretends to be the brother of Mary Herries, and forges a cheque in his name; by a stumpy and carrot-locked Lord Haslemere, who persistently but vainly woos her; and by other moving incidents. Of course it all comes right in the end. As we have said, the early part of the book is the best; but all is good, except where, as in describing the vulgar family of the Busbies, "J. Francis" is tempted to portray a kind of life with which she is not personally acquainted. The dialogue in The Story of Mary Herries is almost always noticeably good and natural. We are inclined to predict for "J. Francis" a greater success with a second picture, painted on a broader canvas.

AN ENGLISH-PERSIAN DICTIONARY.*

MR. WOLLASTON may be congratulated on having brought to a happy issue a most onerous task. Dictionary-makers, as a rule, begin with their magnum opus, and publish an abridgement subsequently; we note that Mr. Wollaston has gone the other way to work. Some seven years ago he brought out what, in comparison with the present gigantic production, might be termed a pocket English-Persian Dictionary—namely, a volume in crown 8vo. The present magnificent publication is in 4to, of large dimensions, double-columned, with close on fifteen hundred pages; and, as is stated in the preface, we are now provided with the Persian equivalent or equivalents of "every word of the least importance in the English language," Walker and Webster's Dictionary having been adopted as the basis of the English portion of the text.

It is difficult to criticize a dictionary with fairness; time and constant use can alone show the extent of omissions, and the occurrence of errors of the press which in so huge a work it is practically impossible to avoid. A cursory glance through these pages, as the great work lies open before us, tends to the conviction, however, that the author has been wonderfully quick-sighted in correcting his proofs, and that the number of errors in the printing is very insignificant. No one expects with the aid of a dictionary to be able to learn to speak and write a language, but one may fairly ask that, with some practice in reading and composition for the groundwork, a dictionary should be so constituted as to supply a copia verborum, and indicate to a reasonable degree the sense in which the individual words are to be taken. As regards a copious supply of so-called synonymous words under each heading, Mr. Wollaston leaves nothing to be desired; under the heading of the verb "to give," for example, are eleven equivalents in the first place, followed by half a column of Persian phrases for subsidiary or compound forms of the verb—e.g. "to give justice," "to give out," "to give up," &c. All this is excellent; but where we should be inclined to find fault is that no indication is to be found among the eleven Persian equivalents that are registered as translating the simple verb to give, which may enable a learner to pick out the special word he should use, and avoid such as are obsolete and stilted; and, above all, show how he may avoid falling into absurd mistakes of phrase and form. We do not, of course, accuse Mr. Wollaston of making no distinction between, say, a (lucifer) match and a (cricket) match; these he differentiates fully; it is among the commoner words, especially verbs, that in a future edition much might, we think, with advantage be added. As an example, we recur to the case of the verb to give, with its eleven equivalents. Persian, as everybody knows, is a formal language, full of etiquette and fine phrases. In Persia the verb to give is in constant request; for you pay for very little, being on the other hand held bound to give in return for all you get. The parties in the contract, however, are generally of unequal rank (or supposed to be so, in polite parlance), and hence a totally different verb comes into play if you give your servant ten Túmáns on New Year's Day, and when your servant gives you a cauliflower and some candied fruits, in return, on the same happy occasion. Mr. Wollaston, be it noted, provides no needful commentary on the equivalents he registers. He writes:—

* A Complete English-Persian Dictionary: compiled from Original Sources. By A. N. Wollaston, C.I.E., &c. London: Allen & Co.

Give, verb. dádan, bakhshídan, arzání dáshtan or kardan, 'atá kardan, 'itá nimúdan, hibih nimúdan, ta'áruf dádan, guzáshtan, mauhabat kardan, pishkash kardan, tuhfah dádan. [The Persian transcript we have omitted as needless to the present example.]

All this to the learner is a hopeless puzzle. The learned author should, we think, have briefly informed us that dádan means "to give," used generally; that bakhshídan means "to make a present" from a superior to an inferior; that pishkash kardan, on the contrary, is to give in the sense of "offering a present" from an inferior to a superior. It would be more ridiculous to use pishkash kardan when you give your servant a pair of boots, than with us to talk of "offering a donation" of a penny to the crossing-sweeper or a bootblack. As regards the other synonyms, it might have been stated that 'atá kardan and 'itá nimúdan mean respectively "to make a gift" and "to present a gift," while for the remaining significations they are all one more pompous each than the last, and have the meaning of "to make or offer or lay before (a superior) a presentation or humble donation." Each Persian periphrase need not, perhaps, have been translated in full, but the synonyms should certainly have been grouped in categories and the usage indicated more fully.

Take another case—the verb to say or tell. In Persian what is said or told to an inferior (since the telling implies a command) is translated by farmúdan, "to command." A servant, on the other hand, does not tell his master that there is no beef in the kitchen, but "makes a petition" to that effect, using the verb arz shudan. These are the common locutions, meaning no more in everyday parlance than when anybody with us, writing formally to a stranger, signs himself his "obedient servant." Mr. Wollaston, however, gives under the headings "Say" and "Tell" no explanation of this usage, and we cannot but hold that in this and in other similar cases he has omitted what might with reason be looked for in "a complete and exhaustive work." In a somewhat similar case we have noted that, under the heading "I" and "You," beyond the simple pronouns Man for the first person and Shumá for the second, no further explanation is afforded, except that, according to the author, "To you" is to be translated by "bi-tán," which, in point of fact, is at the present day entirely obsolete. Mr. Wollaston should have added a few words of explanation to the effect that when your servant tells you something he phrases it that he "makes a petition in your service" (arz mi-shavad bi-khidmat-i-shumá), and that the first person in polite Persian with equals, or from an inferior to a superior, is commonly expressed by the locution "Bandah"—i.e. "your servant or your slave," says so and so. These omissions, however, which it would be well to correct in any future edition, do not, it may readily be granted, in any serious degree militate against the usefulness of the great work which Mr. Wollaston has accomplished. What Dr. Badgers's great lexicon, English-Arabic, has been for students of the latter language, Mr. Wollaston's Dictionary will be for this and the next generation of Persian scholars. That dictionary-making is unremunerative labour, we may with the author sympathetically and cordially agree. With Mr. Wollaston it has been a labour of interest, if not a labour also of love. His patience, perseverance, and industry will doubtless in time meet with a substantial reward; for this ponderous quarto, as he writes at the conclusion of a very modest preface, cannot fail to "remain, at least for some years to come, a standard work of reference."

C. B. VIGNOLES.*

MR. OLINTHUS VIGNOLES has described this Life of his father as a reminiscence of early railway history, and it is in that connexion that the subject of the biography finds his most enduring title to fame. In the early days of railways the name of Vignoles was one to conjure with. He was the contemporary and associate of Stephenson and Locke and Brunel in the stirring time when engineering was in the flush and fever of its romantic youth. He was a pioneer of railway construction, not in England only, but in Ireland, Germany, Switzerland, Spain, Russia, and Brazil. At the age of twenty he was under fire as an ensign of the York Chasseurs in the unlucky assault upon Bergen-op-Zoom; at thirty-two he was making plans under George Rennie for the first Manchester and Liverpool Railway; at forty-one he was completing the first railway in Ireland; at fifty-four he was shaking hands with Nicholas of Russia over his bargain to build from his own designs the great bridge over the Dnieper at Kieff; and at the age of seventy-six he was delivering his address as President of the Institution of Civil Engineers. A soldier in his youth—literally from his cradle—Vignoles may be said to have remained a soldier of fortune to the end of his long span of eighty-three years. A man of picturesque and striking personality, living a life of extraordinary activity and variety, mixing in great affairs, though scarcely achieving greatness of the first class, coquetting with success rather than grasping it, brilliant, generous, impetuous, reckless even, and quarrelsome, Vignoles is a capital subject of biography. But he has not been very happy in his biographer. Mr. Olinthus Vignoles has a number of qualifications for the task—strong qualifications so far as they go. He has filial piety—itself an excellent thing and the parent of many virtues—he has had access to all available materials; he has taken infinite pains (he excuses the thirteen years that have passed since his father died by the necessity that existed for great labour in examining letters and documents); and he has striven most conscientiously to be scrupulously fair in dealing with the relation of his father's work to that of other engineers. Indeed, his eulogy is often more moderate than the occasion might warrant. But he has one defect—his style is not interesting. The trail of the thirteen years' labour among documents is too conspicuous on every page of what ought to have been a particularly attractive book. We do not say that the volume is actually dull; no narrative of what Vignoles did could be dull. But one cannot read it without feeling that the author, while he deserves praise for his obvious fairness and care, has lost an opportunity which might have been made much of by some one better gifted with the knack of writing biography.

Born in 1793, Vignoles was left an orphan before he was a year old by the death, from yellow fever, of his mother and father while the latter, a captain in the 43rd Regiment, was wounded and a prisoner in the hands of the French in Guadeloupe. A charitable Frenchman gave asylum to the infant for ten months, till an uncle could reach Guadeloupe to claim it. Meanwhile the relatives at home took care to make provision for its present and future by having the year-old orphan at once presented with a commission in His Majesty's forces. Baby Vignoles was appointed an ensign in his dead father's regiment, on condition "that he shall exchange to half-pay immediately, as he is too young to serve," says the official despatch. The young officer spent his half-pay on pap and coral in the charge of his grandfather, Dr. Hutton, of logarithm fame, Professor of Mathematics in the Military Academy at Woolwich. By-and-bye he was promoted to the responsible task of reading and correcting mathematical tables. The boy was clever, but headstrong, and by no means industrious. He is said to have spoken in after life with pride of the share he took in his grandfather's computations; probably he found little pleasure in it at the time. It seems that a futile attempt was made to break him in to the study of law. For some reason not clearly recorded the high-spirited lad quarrelled sharply with his venerable relative, so sharply that the quarrel was never made up before the old man died—a thunderbolt burst on his head, he says, and he ran away from home. He is suspected of having joined the army in Spain, but for two years his story is a blank. In 1813 he reappears as a student at Sandhurst, and at the end of that year he was gazetted to an ensigncy by the Prince Regent, in a regiment that was soon ordered on active service to Holland. He learnt to stand fire in the grievously mismanaged affair at Bergen, when his captain was shot down and he was left to command the company, of whom more than half were killed or wounded before the attacking party was drawn off. After then he knocked about the world with his regiment for some two or three years—now in Canada, now in Scotland, till, disappointed at the slowness of promotion, he quitted the service and sailed to Florida to try his fortune as a civil engineer. A fortnight before leaving England he married, clandestinely, a young lady to whom he had become engaged while he was still a boy of twenty, at Sandhurst. Nothing could have been more imprudent, and his sensible young wife knew it. She took the risk of unhappiness and the certainty of discomfort with her eyes open. Some of her love-letters are delightfully quaint :—

* Life of Charles Blacker Vignoles, F.R.S., F.R.A.S., M.R.I.A., &c., Soldier and Civil Engineer, formerly Lieutenant in H.M. 1st Royals, Post-President of the Institution of Civil Engineers. By his Son, Olinthus J. Vignoles, M.A., Assistant-Minister of St. Peter's Church, Vere Street, London. London: Longmans, Green, & Co. 1889.

I know the extent of your faults, and confess your great culpability ; yet it was more than likely your maturer years would teach reformation and wisdom [his "maturer years" then numbered twenty]. I, however, know how to appreciate the qualities of your heart, on the intrinsic worth of which I build my fondest hopes.

And again :—

You have abilities that, I should think, would point out a variety of ways to support yourself, and in due time a wife ; but without a competence, where'er we might go, we should be pursued by poverty's evil eye and all its attendant miseries.

Poverty's evil eye may have now and then winked at the imprudent couple, but as a rule they must have found its stony glare more than a little trying. The young wife strove hard to get her husband reconciled to his relatives ; but what could be done with a young man who could write :—

I have given up all idea of correspondence with my own family. The flinty obstinacy of my octogenarian grandfather, and the cold apathy of my maiden aunt, freeze every germ of affection in that quarter.

In 1823 the octogenarian grandfather died ; and in the same year Vignoles returned to England, glad enough to find that the "cold apathy" of the aunt did not prevent her from taking compassion on the almost penniless condition of himself, his wife, and two children, or from showing what he gratefully acknowledged afterwards as numberless marks of affection. He obtained casual employment as a surveyor, and was ready, when the railway epoch opened in 1825, to be engaged under the Rennies as resident engineer in laying out the Liverpool and Manchester Railway. Unluckily for his connexion with that famous pioneer line, his chiefs, the Rennies, resigned, and George Stephenson, who was appointed principal engineer, liked Vignoles as little as Vignoles liked him. The retirement of the younger man was inevitable ; but other work was not long in coming in. We cannot here attempt any narrative of the share taken by Vignoles in the early development of railways. It is bewildering to follow the author in his account of the lines projected with extraordinary rapidity with which Vignoles was professionally connected—lines which in many cases did not fall in pleasant places, nor reached any terminus but the Parliamentary Committee-room. In a number of cases, however, his railways were made, and several great works of exceptional merit in point of taste remain to attest his genius as an engineer. His work abroad was even more considerable than at home. The form of rail with which his name will always be associated, although not used by English railway men, has found permanent favour with American and Continental engineers. His reputation as a Parliamentary witness brought him fame and fortune, and in this connexion the following extract from his diary may be quoted to give an idea of the life led by a railway engineer in those eager days :—

On July 2 (1832) received a sudden and urgent summons to London [to support the London and Birmingham Railway Bill], whilst engaged on the Widnes Dock. I immediately crossed the ferry at Runcorn, and posted thence to Northwich, thence to Sandbach. Gig from there to Lawton Gate, where I was taken up by the "Red Rover" for some distance. Posted on for the rest of the day and through the night. July 3. Posted on right through to London, and arrived at the House of Lords exactly at noon, and was immediately sworn.

On one occasion Vignoles's confidence and rashness nearly proved his ruin—did, indeed, completely ruin him for a time. He supported one of his own railways, the Manchester and Sheffield, by taking so much of the share capital that when calls were made he could not pay, and a decision of the Courts stripped him of some 80,000*l.*, the whole savings of his professional work during twenty years.

Five or six years later we find Vignoles entering upon one of the most interesting periods of his kaleidoscopic life. Hearing from an old friend that the Emperor Nicholas had a great wish to build a bridge over the Dnieper, under the fortress of Kieff, Vignoles resolved to design a bridge and to lay the drawings in person before the Czar. It was a bold scheme and it was carried out with characteristic dash. When the drawings were finished and mounted on silk, superbly bound in morocco and embossed with the arms of Russia in gold, Vignoles set out with them for St. Petersburg in January 1847, accompanied by his two grown sons. Admitted to audience, he found the Emperor extremely gracious ; the proposals were accepted in principle, and Vignoles was commissioned to return to Russia with complete working drawings and estimates as soon as he could. In September he again presented himself before the Emperor, after visiting Kieff and maturing his plans, and succeeded in carrying everything before him :—

The Emperor, after explaining the necessity for the width of the portals to be 28 feet, frankly and nobly decided to leave everything else to my own judgment and experience. The Emperor's words were :—"Si vous voulez me répondre sur votre parole d'honneur que le pont sera stablement construit, je vous laisse pleine action, et je vous en donne la main" ; and shaking my hand heartily, the Emperor added in English, "Is it a bargain?" I answered without a moment's hesitation, and looking him full in the face, "Sur mon honneur, Sire, et sur ma tête."

This curious bargain, in which there seems to have been no clear separation of the functions of contractor and engineer, would have been a risky one had it been struck with any man possessed of less than Vignoles's lofty sense of professional honour. To Vignoles, we are told, the bargain turned out to be by no means profitable. But in six years the bridge was completed, a magnificent structure, and a really fine monument of engineering skill. It was characteristic of the man that he spent seven thousand pounds on two models of the bridge, one of which was destroyed in the Crystal Palace fire in 1866. Vignoles was in treaty with Nicholas for more engineering work in Russia, but the plans were rudely checkmated by the outbreak of the Crimean War. We have not space to follow the record of his later years, but would rather send readers to the conscientious pages of the Life for details of the work accomplished through the energy, versatility, and resource of this very remarkable man.

THE CATHOLIC HIERARCHY.*

IN pointing out a defect the Rev. T. E. Bridgett seems to us to have erred on the side of excess. While he proves that the Marian bishops, as they are sometimes called, suffered more in Elizabeth's reign than has been noted by most writers, whether Roman Catholic or Anglican, his book is likely to lead his readers to imagine that their sufferings were greater and more wantonly imposed than we have reason to believe was the case. Allowing, however, for this tendency, we gladly acknowledge the value of his work on a subject which has been obscured by prejudice and carelessness. He devotes his first chapter to exposing the blunders and misrepresentations of other writers, and quotes an amazing statement of Dr. Jessopp, whom he describes, apparently without ironical intention, as "delighting above all things in accuracy," as a "gauge of the general ignorance on this matter." Some of his comments are open to exception. When, for example, Lord Burghley says that certain persons "enjoyed their life as the course of nature would," he does not mean that the deprived bishops as a body led pleasurable lives ; he is speaking of certain Roman Catholic clergy, such as Bishop Watson and Dr. Feckenham, who, after having been retained in the houses of Elizabeth's bishops, "were found busier in matters of State, tending to stir troubles, than was meet for the common quiet of the realm," and were therefore more strictly confined, yet were "not called to any capital or bloody question," but were allowed to live until their lives came to an end in the course of nature. Again, Strype's remark that he doubted "much that they [the deprived bishops] were also committed to prisons" is neither so "bold" nor so absurd as is made out here ; for he is speaking of the immediate consequence of their deprivation, which was not at once followed by imprisonment, and he says on the same page that several "both of the bishops and others of the popish clergy" were afterwards imprisoned. Strype is more than once most unfairly quoted in this matter.

Of the sixteen diocesan bishops who were alive in 1559, fifteen were deprived for refusing to acknowledge the Queen's jurisdiction in ecclesiastical matters ; they would have met with a sharper lot in her father's days. Two of them, White of Winchester and Watson of Lincoln, had already been imprisoned for a very short time for contumacious language. Five died before any further proceedings were taken. All the others, except Poole of Peterborough, who was left unmolested, and Goldwell of St. Asaph, who had fled the country, were imprisoned the following year, because it was considered unsafe to allow them to remain at liberty. Their imprisonment, speaking generally, lasted from three to four years. Mr. Bridgett contends, and, we think, justly, that this imprisonment has been treated too lightly. Camden's words, "hi primum in carcerem dati, sed plerique mox amicorum vel episcoporum commissi," certainly do not convey the length of its duration, and he has been followed by some modern writers. Strype also gives us to understand that the six bishops confined in the Tower were, in virtue of a letter of the Council, allowed to have their meals together, whereas it is proved here that, as late as 1562, they and their two companions were "close and severally kept," and were served separately. If they suffered some hardship, what was their lot compared with that of the Reforming bishops in the last reign? Bonner was kept in prison for the rest of his life. There is no reason to believe that he was the monster of cruelty depicted in certain Protestant books ; he administered the law and was not responsible for it, nor is it certain that he delighted in the horrible severities which it prescribed. At the same time he never, after Queen Mary stirred him up, showed himself backward in his hideous work. Although his part in the burnings is scarcely noticed here, we cannot forget it when called upon to think of him as a confessor. His imprisonment probably saved his life from private vengeance. Mr. Bridgett sneers at Andrewes and Fuller for saying as much ; but refers in a note to a letter of Sanders in which he relates that before Bonner was lodged in the Marshalsea he could scarcely venture abroad on account of the hatred of the Londoners. In this case Sanders was, no doubt, telling the truth. The six bishops confined in the Tower were released in 1563. Heath, formerly of York, spent the rest of his days in peace, and not without honour, and Turberville, formerly of Exeter, received permission to live with his friends—"at his own liberty," Burghley says. Mr. Bridgett is convinced that Burghley is lying; the Bishop must, he assumes, have lived under limitations and surveillance; and, having assumed this, he exaggerates his assumption, in order apparently to excite the indignation of his readers. "In a word," he says, the Bishop spent the rest of his life "with what in modern language is called a ticket of leave." Pate, the deprived Bishop of Worcester, left England, and Scott, formerly of Chester, also fled to the Netherlands, or, as it is oddly put here, "into Belgium." Scott had given his bond to remain in a certain district; this, Mr. Bridgett says, was a "penal obligation, and not a parole d'honneur," and the distinction seems to have satisfied the Bishop's conscience. The other bishops living in England were, with the exception of Bonner, committed to the keeping of different Anglican prelates. They are said by Heylin to have been "kindly entreated," and by Strype to have lived "with much ease." On the other hand, Mr. Bridgett would have us believe that they "merely exchanged jail for jail." Nothing that he says seems to us to invalidate the statements of older writers. Nevertheless, there is, of course, another side to their picture. While the bishops lived in a fair degree of comfort, they were, as will be seen here, subject to many restraints, they were deprived of the external observances of their religion, and must have been forced to hear a good deal of theological talk of a kind obnoxious to them. But that they were otherwise well treated is established beyond question. It is urged here that they were at the mercy of men who "were almost without exception the bitterest of Puritan fanatics"—an absurd misstatement—and that the Elizabethan bishops were not likely to do anything to alleviate their lot. The implied conclusion may be compared with a quotation given in another place. Parker, it is truly said, was doubtless a pleasanter host than Horn of Winchester; yet Watson, who was in Horn's custody, wrote, "My good Lord of Winchester hath dealt with me this whole year and quarter as if I had been his natural brother." Watson was sent to Wisbeach Castle in 1580, and was kept in confinement there until his death. He brought this upon himself, for he was "most active in persuading Catholics to refuse any compromise," and had been found to be in correspondence with the King of Portugal, a discovery which cannot fairly be described, as it is by Mr. Bridgett, as of no importance. Burghley was, therefore, justified in putting him "in safe ward," especially as the coming of the seminary priests was then impending. He was not imprisoned for his religion, but because he made himself dangerous to the welfare of the State.

* The True Story of the Catholic Hierarchy deposed by Queen Elizabeth. With fuller Memoirs of its two last survivors. By the Rev. T. E. Bridgett, C.S.S.R., Author of "Life of the Blessed John Fisher," and the late Rev. T. F. Knox, D.D., of the London Oratory. London: Burns & Oates, Limited. 1889.

The dealings of the Government with the deprived bishops are well illustrated by a quotation which Mr. Bridgett inserts from the pamphlet entitled Important Considerations by the Secular Priests. The writers say that during the first ten years of the reign the state of the Catholics in England was tolerable, and they distinctly declare that the bishops and clergy who were boarded with the Elizabethan bishops and deans were well treated. It was, they consider, in consequence of the action of the Pope that the Government became more severe. First, the bull excommunicating the Queen was followed by a "great restraint of the prisoners," and then the Jesuit mission made matters still worse. Watson, of whose life we have a detailed account, was well aware of the mistake which the Pope was making; he knew that the mission of the Jesuits would be fruitless and worse than fruitless, and, as the secular priests say, he and "divers of the gravest clergy then living in England did greatly dislike them, and plainly foretold that (as things then stood) their proceedings after that fashion would certainly urge the State to make some sharper laws, which should not only touch them, but likewise all others, both priests and Catholics." Mr. Bridgett endeavours feebly enough to extenuate the force of the priests' statement. An account of Bishop Goldwell's life is written by the late Rev. T. F. Knox; it was mostly spent at Rome. We have no wish to make light of the troubles and inconveniences which came upon the deprived bishops, or of the constancy which they exhibited, but we are sure that every one who studies the subject dispassionately will be convinced that, considering the spirit of the time and the danger which would probably have ensued to the kingdom had the more active of them been allowed to remain at large—to say nothing of the feelings with which the nation looked back on the Marian persecution—the bishops were treated with remarkable leniency. Every one of them might by the Act of 1563 have been called upon to take the oath renouncing the Papal jurisdiction, or on a second refusal to suffer death. Yet in Bonner's case only, and he was allowed to escape, was an attempt made to force this alternative upon any of them. Indeed, after their first imprisonment, which was a matter of public expediency, their treatment was determined by the opinion of the Government as to whether they would live as good subjects of the Queen, or were likely to cause trouble. One matter yet remains to be noticed. Mr. Bridgett says that an assertion which, he thinks, renders it probable that Kitchin was persuaded by Bonner to refuse to consecrate Parker, "certainly lends some support to the first half of the Nag's Head story." In writing this did he, we should like to ask him, or did he not intend to lead his readers to believe that there is, in his opinion, some probability that the narrative, as a whole, is true? Kitchin's conduct is, of course, of no importance. Mr. Bridgett must know—we would not insult him by supposing otherwise—that the story of the mock consecration at the Nag's Head is an impudent falsehood, devised not earlier than 1604, probably by a priest named Holywood. The absurdity of this malicious fable has been exposed by many historians, and, above all, by the late Arthur West Haddan—a name which we cannot write without reverence and regret—both in his edition of Archbishop Bramhall's Works and in his Apostolic Succession in the Church of England. Mr. Bridgett should not have written in such a way as to make it possible for his readers to infer that he believes that there is some ground for the story. Knowing, as he must, that it is false, he should, if he had occasion to refer to it, have followed Lingard's example, and said so in plain terms.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

IN Carmen Sylva's German version of the Songs of the Dimbovitza (1) we have an interesting and valuable contribution to European folklore. The Roumanian melopees (mostly unrhymed improvisations intended to be sung in unison, to the rude harmony of a native measure) are collected by Helena Vacaresco, a young Roumanian poetess, out of the mouths of peasants, lute-players (cobzar), and gypsies, at weddings, christenings, burials, spinning meetings, feasts, harvests, and dances. The freshness, passion, and purity of them have so charmed their translator that she does not hesitate to compare them with the finest examples of Eastern or Scandinavian folksong. It is not possible to coerce the German words, into which the Queen of Roumania has infused much of the wild, woodland fragrance of her people's thought and emotion, into a semblance of the native rhythm. Yet, in a measure, the dedication to the memory of her child, "who loved the land so well that the land stole her from her mother and hid her in its bosom," approaches the most popular form of the native metre:—

Ich habe mich erinnert,
Es war dein Recht, mein Kind;
Das Schwert hab ich herausgerissen,
Und siehe! Noch ist heiss das Schwert,
Lebendig ist das Blut das kalt ich glaubte!
Mir bebt die Hand, ich habe mich erinnert,
Und es erwacht der Groll
Dass ich der Erde fluchen muss
Die dich mir raubte.
Da, siehe, öffnet sich die Erde
Und zeigt in ihrem Schoosze mir den Schatz,
All ihrer Lieder.

The book is divided into two parts—Lute-player's Songs and Spinning Songs. It closes with a quaint, weird drama entitled "Autumn," of a kind to be played "only on that ideal stage which every man carries in his brain." Among the Lute-player's Songs none are more remarkable for that indefinable quality we are fain to call atmosphere than the "Song of the Blood," the "Soldier's Wife," and the gypsy "Song of the Knife." Among the Spinning Songs none are more touching than the "Foundling," more quaintly sad than the "Heyduk's Flower," nor more graceful than the "Hora-song," to be sung and danced to to the cobzar's accompaniment, with an occasional line sung by the lute-player to change or renew the melody.

The author of Deutsche Psalmen (2) is no unworthy descendant of that August Herman Franke whose name will live as long as Evangelical hymns are sung in Protestant Germany. Herr Franke's modern German hymns express with the strong and direct simplicity of his forbears contemporary needs, struggles, and experience. There is a triumphant ring in such lines as

Der Strahl, der mir den Tag gebracht,
Der Glanz, der endet meine Nacht,
Die Kraft, die meine Bande bricht
Ist ew'ges Licht,

which should be a powerful antidote to the pessimism which has followed upon the sturdy faith of Luther's day.

Herr E. Bernheim's Lehrbuch der historischen Methode (3) is a theoretical work on the science of history from fundamental principles to particulars. Many a new problem is here presented, more than one glimpse of unfrequented paths is offered to the student. The first chapter treats of the relation of history to philology, statecraft, sociology, philosophy, anthropology, ethnology, natural history, and art. It sums up with the nature and mission of history. The second treats of methodology (Methodologie); the third of available sources (Quellenkunde); the fourth of criticism (Kritik); the fifth of the perceptive faculty (Auffassung). In the sixth and last, which treats of presentation (Darstellung), there is a passage on the necessity of the objective presentation of history, to which the writer adds an encouraging rider for the benefit of those who, while telling of deeds as remote as those of Ramses or Alexander, wish to add something about themselves. The historian may speak his mind in a preface. Should he in the course of his narrative be impelled to praise, blame, or otherwise record any personal impression, "without distortion of the facts of history, the historical conscience will be satisfied," and such a presentation

(1) Der Rhapsode der Dimbovitza. Von Carmen Sylva. Bonn: Emil Strauss.

(2) Deutsche Psalmen. Von A. H. Franke. Gotha: Friedrich Andr. Perthes.

(3) Lehrbuch der historischen Methode. Von Ernst Bernheim. Leipzig: Duncker und Humblot.

may, to the satisfaction of the scribe and the advantage of the reader, be considered "intrinsically objective."

Dr. Kleinschmidt's Charakterbilder aus der französischen Revolution (4) are fairly well-drawn character sketches of a time about which, albeit of perennial interest, there is nothing new to say. The illustrations, portraits of Montesquieu, Louis XVI., Mirabeau, Marie-Antoinette, Necker, Danton, the Duchesse d'Angoulême, and Louis XVII., are from the originals of Callet, Vigée-Lebrun, David, and Hersent. The essay on Louis XVII. opens with a transcription of the epitaph on the tombstone at Delft of a man known to his following as the Duc de Normandie, but to the world in general as Naundorff. Dr. Kleinschmidt is apparently not less exercised by the remarkable physical resemblance of the descendants of the one described on his tombstone as "Roi de France et de Navarre," to Bourbons better known to history, than by his own conviction that the heart offered by Pelletan, and refused as spurious by Louis XVIII., had been taken from the body of the Martyr of the Temple.

In the Ariadnefaden für das Labyrinth der Edda (5), Herr August Schierenberg applies to the Edda the same process to which M. Ernest Havet has subjected the Hebrew prophecies in those chapters of his Etudes d'histoire religieuse which treat De la Modernité des Prophètes. The Edda is not, in his opinion, of Scandinavian origin, but a daughter of the Teutoburger-Wald, who wandered north until she settled in Iceland. Sigurd, who killed the dragon Fafnir, is, he holds, none other than Arminius, destroyer of the Roman power. Brunhilde is the Fatherland, Kriemhilde or Gudrun, the regal power, in gaining which Arminius lost his life at the hands of the patriotic party. Loki stands for Segestes, and Etzel or Attila for that nephew of Arminius whom the Romans placed on the throne of the Cherusci. The Icelandic Abbot, Niclas, quoted by Herr Schierenberg, who travelled through Germany to Rome in 1150, describes the Gnitahede as situate near Paderborn, between the villages Horus (Horn) and Kilian (the Roman Aliso), on the river Lippe. This corresponds exactly to the battlefield where Varus met his death. Holzman, who is cited among other authorities in support of the writer's view, says that "these songs did not originate in Scandinavia, but in Germany. There are Huns and Goths in this land, a river Rin (probably the Rhine), and a Niderheide (in the neighbourhood of Paderborn)."

In a pamphlet entitled Der blaue Junge (6), Herr W. Döring investigates the causes of eighty-one accidents to German merchant vessels during the past ten years, taking for his motto, "Lead, log, latitude, and lookout." He claims that this synthesis of wreckage in every navigable latitude should forearm, as it forewarns, the blue-jacket to whom it is addressed. Among other remarks of a more general character, he points to the significant fact that German seamen are employed in the merchant services of England, Holland, and America at from 30 to 50 per cent. higher wages than they could earn in the service of their own country. He demands for the German sailor fuller social and pecuniary recognition than now falls to his share.

Lust und Lehre, a progressive German Reader (7), mainly intended for those beginners who have mastered the intricacies of German grammar, appeals through its admirable selection of examples of prose and verse to the more advanced scholar. The notes are a capital guide to technical proficiency. We are glad to find J. V. von Scheffel represented by his Trompeter's Lebewohl among the poets.

THE FARM AND THE DAIRY.*

THIS little volume is one of the useful handbooks published under the heading of "Bell's Agricultural Series." In a few pages, and in a convenient form, it contains a great deal of information likely to be valuable to farmers and cowkeepers of all kinds, whether professional or amateur. On the very first page there is a capital summary of the chief things to be considered before taking a farm, such as the quality, condition, and nature of the land, its soundness, fertility, altitude, climate, aspect, slope, form, situation, natural or acquired shelter, water supply, buildings, fences, roads, distance from markets and railways, rent, rates and taxes, all of which should form subjects for careful notes to those who visit farms with a view to renting them. Excellent, again, is the advice to the agriculturist in search of a farm, that he ought to ascertain as exactly as possible his own capital, not only in money—the only thing usually considered—but also in skill, in health, in energy, in experience, and its application. In the author's opinion, sound land, that is to say land which has not required artificial drainage, is, "quality for quality," to be preferred to drained land, unless the soil is very loose and "unretentive." Indeed, he tells us that in Leicestershire many farmers like even damp land undrained, and that, in their opinion,

(4) Charakterbilder aus der französischen Revolution. Von Dr. A. Kleinschmidt. Leipzig: Hartleben.

(5) Der Ariadnefaden für das Labyrinth der Edda. Von G. Aug. B. Schierenberg. Frankfurt a. M.: Reitz und Köhler. 1889.

(6) Der blaue Junge. Von W. Döring, königlichem Navigationslehrer. Leipzig: A. Schwartz.

(7) Lust und Lehre. Edited by Otto Schlapp. London: Hachette & Co.

* The Farm and the Dairy. By Professor J. B. Sheldon. Illustrated. London: George Bell & Sons. 1889.

"inferior pastures are not the better for being improved where cheese is made"; for in that country, the finest quality, although not the largest quantity of cheese is supposed to be obtained on land that lies low, "having a cold, marly subsoil, on which a few rushes grow." On the other hand, he dissents from the theory which prevails in some parts of Cheshire, that the use of bone-manure on pastures makes cheese inferior in quality. He thinks that, if Cheshire cheeses have deteriorated on certain farms, it is owing to overskimming the evening's milk, and not to the improvement of the land. With regard to shelter, he says that it stands in the place of food up to a certain point. At any rate, the absence of shelter demands extra food, and exposure deprives a beast of much of the advantage of food already eaten. Of the importance of good roads, or rather of the loss caused by the wear and tear of both horses and vehicles on bad roads, few farmers with a grain of sense need to be reminded; but many farmers are not sufficiently appreciative of the immense value of a copious supply of running water to a man who knows how to avail himself of it. In exact proportion to the increase in the value of the milk trade in comparison with other branches of farming does proximity to a good milk-market become of greater and greater importance. In some cases a railway-station may be as serviceable as a town for this purpose; and in others, quarries or collieries surrounded by miners' cottages may be equally valuable. Professor Sheldon considers a sufficient capital of more importance to the farmer now than formerly, and on account of the recent rise in the price of stock we are inclined to agree with him. Three or four years ago, however, when sheep and cattle were much depreciated, some landlords and agents thought that, whereas 10*l.* had been the usual capital considered necessary per acre, 8*l.* was then enough. In The Farm and the Dairy we are told that from 10*l.* to 12*l.* is now none too much, and that the tenant ought to have besides half a year's rent in a bank. He tells us that there was a rise of thirty per cent. in cattle between the springs of 1888 and 1889, and that between the autumns of 1887 and 1888 the rise was still higher. The statement that "good land is seldom too dear, and bad land is never cheap enough," is a strong one; for although there may be a substratum of truth in it, surely not a little bad land has been re-let at such a low rent during the last few years that it can scarcely fail to prove remunerative, now that the value of stock has increased, on the author's own showing, considerably more than thirty per cent.

It is a fallacy to suppose that, with the increase of dairy-farming the plough will gradually disappear; for we are told in this book that a farm will carry more stock with one-third of it arable land than if it were all in permanent pasture. By ploughing a greater variety and a larger bulk of green crops may be obtained, to say nothing of the importance of a supply of corn and roots for the winter; and, although the author is not in favour of putting the whole of a dairy farm under the plough, breaking up the seeds after the first or second mowing, and keeping the cattle in sheds and yards—a system extensively followed in France and Denmark—he admits that by this means a "farm may be made to yield its utmost in food, and possibly also in profit." Yet the expense of an arable dairy farm is enormous, and wages are far higher in this country than on the Continent; so a method of farming which answers well enough in France or Denmark might not invariably succeed here.

The chief lesson inculcated in the chapter on the breeding and rearing of calves is that they must be what farm-servants call "done well." Meal, cake, corn, hay and roots, if used with judgment, will well repay the necessary outlay. Attention to condition is of the utmost importance, and every individual calf must be carefully watched; for what would be only generous feeding for one might be over-stuffing for another. As with thoroughbred horses for racing, so also with pedigree shorthorns, it has become the fashion to force the yearlings intended for sale to a point verging upon unhealthiness. Yet when we look at our own nurseries, how different is the system of feeding children at present from that of forty or fifty years ago! Certainly the increase in the use of animal food for young children is at least proportionate to that of stimulating food for calves and colts. Cowkeepers differ much as to the advantages and disadvantages of brewers' grains. The author recommends his readers to store them for some months, or even a year, in air-tight pits, and to mix them with chaff before giving them to cows in milk. Even then he would use them in moderation, and only as a supplementary food. He is not an advocate for giving much decorticated cotton-cake to milking cows, as it is apt to flavour butter and cheese unpleasantly; yet in small quantities, and judiciously mixed with other foods, it is not only harmless, but beneficial, and its manurial value is too well known to require description; indeed, it is higher than that of any other food given to cattle. With regard to ensilage we are told that "too much of it will often give an unpleasant taste to the milk, as too many turnips will"; yet that in moderation, and mixed with hay or straw, it not only increases the quantity of the milk, but improves the quality and colour of the butter.

The yield of milk in these islands is valued by Professor Sheldon at about forty-three millions sterling per annum; and he calculates that London alone requires 600,000 cows to supply it with the products of the dairy, 84,000 of them being needed for milk alone. Some 10,000 are kept "within the metropolitan radius itself, in 1,100 sheds, by 395 cowkeepers"; and "there are probably no fewer than 4,000 horses engaged in the delivery of milk in London." Notwithstanding the difficulties of supplying fresh milk in such prodigious quantities, "probably no town in the world is so well supplied with milk as London." In Paris the consumer "is content to have the milk delivered once daily, and then twenty-four hours old"; "while in London it is delivered twice daily, in a very short time after it is drawn from the cows."

One of the greatest innovations of recent times in the dairy is the cream-separator—or rather, we should say, cream-separators, for there are several kinds. In one sort the milk is poured into covered pans which have double sides and bottoms, with spaces for water between them. These spaces are first filled with boiling water until the milk is raised to 110° Fahr., when it is drawn off, and cold water is put in its place until the milk is lowered to 60°. When, in from twelve to fifteen hours, the cream has risen, the skim-milk is drained away from the bottom of the pans, leaving the cream, which is let out, in its turn, through a tube. Another kind of separator consists of a vessel containing a series of long, narrow, and deep cells, which are placed in the coldest water that can be procured. A clever contrivance for skimming off the milk by one turn of the wrists is an important feature of this form of separator. The centrifugal separator, however, is attracting more attention than any other at present. With this machine the milk is placed in a receiver, from which it flows in a regulated stream into a drum. This "drum is actuated by means of a handle that is attached to a cog-wheel, and a very high rate of speed is attained." In the larger machines horse-power, water-power, [or steam-power is used. By means of the centrifugal separator fresh cream may be obtained in a few minutes, and fresh butter in something less than an hour, after milking the cows.

According to Professor Sheldon, "the cheese of England is essentially a food, while that of the Continent is rather a relish." He maintains that "a well-made cheese is, as a food for toiling men, without a rival in cheapness and nutritive value," and that it is not only an excellent food, but one that is already "partially digested." Whether the remainder of the process is very easy is a question which we are not prepared to discuss at this moment. We read that extracts of rennet are supplanting home-made rennet. Rennet of uniform strength is of great importance in cheese-making, and it is one of those things which are usually best when prepared by experts. Uneven rennet will make cheeses of uneven strength and quality; but in Rennet Extract, as in all other ready-made preparations, there are ample opportunities of adulteration. The author accuses the Americans of the latter offence in making cheese itself, or what purports to be cheese, and he says that "most of the dairy abominations with which the current generation is familiar have first seen the light" in the United States. "Oleomargarine cheese, for example, is a cheese which, containing lard and various kinds of slaughter-house offal-fat, and simulating Cheddar cheese in form and size, has done incalculable mischief to the reputation of Cheddar cheese in the minds of the rank and file of cheese-eaters in England." Even in this country, according to this little book, cheese-making has deteriorated in certain places. It tells us that Stilton, which ought to be a "double-cream" cheese, is now often made from "single cream," when it is no richer than any other sort of cheese made from unskimmed milk; that in Leicestershire generally very fine dairies of cheese are rarer than they were some years ago; that the sale of milk in Cheshire for the supply of the great towns of Lancashire has greatly reduced the amount of Cheshire cheese, while its quality has suffered from the growing practice of overskimming; and that there are makers of Cheddar who endeavour to produce a cheese that will ripen exceedingly quickly, with the consequence that in three months' time it "is past its best, if best it ever attains." On the whole, however, the prospects of dairy-farming in Great Britain are, perhaps, brighter than they have ever been before. Immense strides have been made during the last few years in the requisites and machinery of the dairy; the system of cheese factories has proved a great economy of both time and labour in some counties, and in others the large dairy companies offer a ready and convenient milk market to the smaller farmers; but, best of all, while the influx of American cheeses injures the sale of those of England, and the importation of frozen and tinned meat keeps down the price of fat cattle, the ever-increasing demand for fresh milk has to be almost exclusively supplied by the cowkeepers of this country.

A NEW LEXICON.*

IT has often been said by experienced teachers that the big Liddell-and-Scott was too big and the little one too little; the one is cumbersome to handle and awkward to carry about, especially for the purposes of an itinerant reading-party; and the other, good as it is, can hardly be used with profit by anybody except a very young beginner or a very old hand. Between these two there has hitherto been no Greek-English lexicon which has obtained any popular success; and in supplying one of an intermediate size Dr. Liddell and the Clarendon Press have hit upon an idea which is certain to bring profit to themselves as well as advantage to the Greek-reading or Greek-learning public. The new lexicon is much less than half the size of the sixth edition of the old Liddell-and-Scott; it contains not quite half as many pages, and each page, though nearly the same in breadth, is shorter by about two inches. The number of the pages has been tested by comparison only with the sixth edition, because the seventh (on which the new lexicon has been founded) does not happen to be accessible; but, speaking from memory, we think that in this respect there was no great difference between the two editions. With such reduced dimensions it goes without saying that we get a much more convenient volume. It remains to be seen what sacrifices we have to put up with. None at all in the matter of type and general appearance. It is, then, in the abbreviation of some articles and in the omission of others that we must look for the inevitable loss, as compared with the old sixth or seventh edition. In some cases the loss is hardly noticeable, and in others it is quite considerable. Of course we are speaking here, not from the point of view of a serious student who verifies every reference (to him the big lexicon is, and must always be, indispensable), but from that of the ordinary scholar, who is not quite a scholar or ever likely to become one—the scholar who looks out a word in his dictionary just to find a meaning which he may fit puzzle-wise into the context before him. To go in any detail even through a single letter is, of course, impossible. We can only compare the two lexicons by taking samples from each. Dr. Liddell tells us in a short and businesslike preface that generally "the words only used by late writers and scientific terms have been omitted." That was, of course, an indispensable preliminary. But care has been taken to insert, we are told, all words "used by Homer downwards, to the close of Classical Attic Greek," and besides these "words used by Aristotle in his moral and political treatises, by Polybius and Strabo in the books generally read by students, by Plutarch in his Lives, by Lucian, by the poets of the Anthology, and by writers of the New Testament." That is to say, that Dr. Liddell has aimed at scholastic purposes, and, as he has fairly carried out a sufficiently heavy programme, he may be congratulated upon having succeeded in a task which entailed a great deal of tedious labour and sometimes called for a careful exercise of practical judgment. Before we examine any of the special articles it may be useful for those of our readers who wish to know whether they should or should not buy the new lexicon, if we show what proportion of Greek words Dr. Liddell has thought proper to omit. Between the words ζόφος and ζυγόδεσμον we find omitted in the Intermediate Lexicon the following words which were inserted in the original one:—

ζοφώδης	ζυγηφόρος
ζόφωμα	ζυγία
ζόφωσις	ζυγιανός
ζυγάδην	ζυγικός
ζύγαινα	ζύγιμος
ζυγαρχία	ζύγιμος
ζυγός	ζύγιον
ζυγάστριον	ζυγίς
ζυγέω	ζυγίτης
ζυγηδόν	ζυγίτις

That is to say, between the two points which we have selected we only find seven articles in the Intermediate Lexicon as against twenty-five in the original one. In this way a considerable amount of space has been saved, and for the practical purposes of an ordinary teacher or learner the new lexicon is not much the worse because it has passed in silence over these eighteen words, since none of them are specially important or likely to occur in the common run of classical work. But this might be an exceptional case, and it may be as well to apply the same test at another part of the lexicon—this time between the words κόλπος and κόμη. Here we get the following omissions:—

κόλπωσις	κολυτρία
κολπωτός	κόλυτρον
κολύβδαινα	κόλχος
κολύβριον	κολφάω
κόλυθροι	κολωνία
κόλυθρον	κόμαιθος
κολυμβάς	κομαρίς
κολύμβατος	κόμβη
κολύμβησις	κομβολύτης
κολυμβήτειον	κόμβος
κολυμβητήρ	κομβόω
κολύμφατος	κόμβωμα

Here, again, we see that a great number of articles have been omitted in the Intermediate Lexicon (more than twenty), but that, with three or four exceptions, none of them need be very much regretted, inasmuch as a wholesale massacre of the innocents was absolutely necessary. After testing the book in a more haphazard style, we have come to the conclusion that very few words have been left out which are likely to occur to the advanced schoolboy or the unambitious undergraduate. Certainly we did not find προσέληνος, although it is in itself an interesting word and occurs in the Schol. Ar. Nub.; nor σπενστικός, which occurs in Arist. Nic. Eth.; nor several other words which might very well have been included. At least they might have been inserted in preference to many of the proper names which have been allowed to stand. We quite agree that a lexicon which professes to be complete ought to contain the proper names, which are as much a part of the language as any other word in it. But in a lexicon intended only or mainly for practical use it would have been better to cut out all those of them which are not justified in their position through some duplication of form or some irregularity of inflection.

* An Intermediate Greek-English Lexicon, founded upon the Seventh Edition of Liddell and Scott's Greek-English Lexicon. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 1889.

Having sufficiently or (as Aristotle would say) in outline discussed what is not in the lexicon, we must say something about what is there. After examining a great number of the articles we are, on the whole, surprised to find how little that was essential has been sacrificed in the process of condensation. You may turn to article after article and find that every meaning and sub-meaning registered in the original has been preserved in the abridgment. The references are curtailed and many of the illustrative quotations have been cut out. That was unavoidable. But a considerable number of references have been retained and not a few quotations. The result will be satisfactory, except to the serious student of language who wishes to be helped in tracing the growth and development of usages, but it is not for him that the Intermediate Lexicon has been compiled. Under the words δοῦπος, ἐπίδικος, Ὀλυμπιάς, and ὀμφαλός, hardly anything that was important in the original has been slurred in the abridged lexicon. We take these words as fairly typical specimens of different classes, and find that the space which has been saved has not impaired the general value of any of the articles. Sometimes the brevity which was necessary has even improved the article as judged by a literary standard. But in a good many other articles we think that undue sacrifices have been made to the exigencies of compression. Let us give a few instances. Under πάροδος, after all the other meanings have been given, we come to the following words at the end, "The first entrance of the chorus, their first song." Not a hint is given how the word came to bear a meaning apparently so distant from the one which is natural and original. Again, under πάρεδρος we are simply informed that it may mean "the assessor or coadjutor of a king or magistrate." That is not enough to tell a schoolboy or an undergraduate who may safely be presumed to know nothing else about the subject. It is just the words of this class on which explanation was necessary and about which considerations of space should not have been rigorously regarded. Again, in some of the quasi-technical terms used by philosophical writers, even in such widely read treatises as the Republic and the Ethics, we do not find all, or nearly all, the help that we have a right to expect; thus πολυπραγμοσύνη is simply translated as "officiousness," or "meddlesomeness," and ἐπιείκεια is briefly dismissed in the following words:—"Reasonableness, fairness, equity, Thuc. Plat. &c., clemency, goodness, Dem." This would not greatly assist a youth, unversed in Aristotle, who was puzzling out a detached passage in the Ethics. Again, we are told (s.v. Κύκλωψ) that the Cyclopes appear in the Odyssey as savage giants dwelling in Sicily, and also that they were builders of the walls of Mycenæ. But in the longer article in the original lexicon care is taken to point out that, according to Strabo, the builders of the walls of Mycenæ were a different race from the one-eyed inhabitants of Sicily, and that they had a Thracian origin. We could give many other instances in which we have detected slight oversights and slight omissions, but to lengthen our list would be to give a false impression of a most useful, and on the whole a most accurate and scholarly, work. It may be a matter of regret to the frivolous that the only pun which has been hitherto discovered in the original lexicon has not been allowed to find its way into the abridgment. It will be remembered, in discussing the proposed derivation of the word συκοφάντης from σῦκον and φαίνω (one who informed against persons exporting figs from Attica), that the humorous lexicographers thought proper to remark:—"This explan. is prob. a mere figment." This learned frivolity survived into the "sixth edition revised and augmented." But it has not found a place in the abridgment. It would not be seemly for intermediate scholars to be admitted to the facetie of their betters. They are simply informed that such a theory of derivation is not admissible, and are recommended to adopt (with some reserve) the suggestion of Mr. Shadwell that the idea of "false accuser" comes from a person who brought figs to light by shaking the tree, and that from this meaning we reach the metaphorical one of "a person who makes rich persons yield up their fruit by false accusation." On this now time-honoured theory we have only to remark that of all devices for finding figs the most foolish and unlikely would be to shake the tree.

A GERMAN FOG.*

DR. RAUE published a long time ago "a little book" entitled by the German equivalent of Dr. Beneke's new soul-doctrine arranged for teachers on methodical principles in simply developing ways. It was substantially, in its author's view, an endeavour to "popularize" the "researches" the result of which Dr. Beneke had some time previously given to the world under the title of Psychological Sketches. It had considerable success, going through five editions, some of which were translated into the Flemish, English, and French tongues. Since then Dr. Raue has learnt English, and, partly adopting the English translation already made by some unknown person and apparently without his knowledge, he has now republished his book in English, with considerable amplifications, and a "culminating point" which is "the result of" his "own thought and research." The culminating point is the concluding part of the present volume, and it consists of what Dr. Raue calls the application of psychology as a natural science to the solution of occult phenomena. It is not now necessary to review in detail Dr. Raue's discussions of psychology generally. The value of his application of it to the problems of the what, the how, and the why of what he calls occult psychic phenomena is a sufficient topic of criticism for the moment. Nevertheless, in order to give some idea of his explanations, it is necessary briefly to indicate a few of the statements and explanations of which his earlier work consists.

Suppose a man sees a pig. What is it that happens to him, and how does it happen, and why? This is the sort of question to which a properly equipped psychologist is always ready to give an answer which he considers satisfactory. Dr. Raue's answer is something like this. The man has two eyes. Each of them is a "sense-organ." That is to say, if light comes upon it it sees whatever the light comes from. In the supposed instance, the light comes from the pig, and falls on the man's eyes. If they were artificial they would reflect in the proper place an image of the pig. Being natural human eyes, and therefore sense-organs, in the face of a living man, they reflect that image in such a way that the man, with the assistance of his optic nerves, brains, and body generally, sees what they reflect, and would be able, upon being questioned, to give information about the pig—its size, shape, and colour, the place where it was, and so on. Also he would remember, for a longer or shorter time, the fact of having seen the pig, and what it looked like; and would be able more or less to think and talk about it. So far, anybody would agree with Dr. Raue. But he goes further. He says that an eye would be a fatuous thing, and of no more use than a small and inconvenient mirror, if it were not for the person to whom it belongs, and that the person to whom it belongs would not be able to make any use of it but for the "primitive forces" of his soul. Now the primitive forces of a man's soul are described by Dr. Raue as being the forces which enable his sense-organs to be of use. The primitive forces receive "stimuli" from the sense-organs, and then they act. The image of the pig, reflected in the eyes, and suitably affecting the optic nerves, is a stimulus which the eyes convey to the particular primitive force which can see. The primitive force sees, and not only so, but it retains a "vestige" of what it saw, which may remind it of the pig at any subsequent time, and when it does the man will remember the pig and think about it. The primitive forces "manifest themselves" by the senses; but they are there all the same, whether they are manifesting themselves or not. In fact the soul consists largely of them. These forces are in no way material, but wholly psychical. In other words, they are made of, or are functions of, the stuff souls are made of, which is not stuff at all, except in a certain way of speaking. Of course Dr. Raue has written an immense deal more about the primitive forces of the soul, but these few words will suffice to indicate to persons interested in psychological research the kind of things he has to say about them.

Having in his former work got his primitive soul-forces well in hand, it is not surprising that Dr. Raue finds in them the key to all "occult psychical" problems. Indeed, it would be tempting Providence to look further afield for an explanation, when the primitive forces obviously provide one so ingeniously profound, so verbally plausible, and so impossible to contradict. The mode of solving psychical problems may also be best illustrated by a common example. Suppose a man in London sees his long-forgotten friend having his throat cut in the Fiji Islands, just when that transaction is actually taking place. The solution is simply that, though his eyes cannot see without his primitive forces, his primitive forces can, under peculiar circumstances, see without his eyes. The primitive forces, being psychical and immaterial, are not bound by the conditions of space and time. They can see what is going on in Fiji as well as what is going on a yard in front of them, although they do not so frequently act independently of the sense-organs as they act in connexion with them. That, says Dr. Raue, explains everything—mesmerism, spiritualism, and phantasms of the living, and it will explain the pranks of Mme. Blavatsky, her leaders, and followers, equally well, though Dr. Raue does not say so. Phantasms of the dead are also, in Dr. Raue's opinion, liable to be perceived in this way, because the primitive forces of the soul, being purely psychical, survive death, and continue to go through evolution, although during life they exist, and act in interdependence upon the physical forces. It can hardly be necessary to add that as to the reality of alleged phenomena of all these kinds, and as to the value and accuracy of the stories laboriously collected by Messrs. Gurney, Myers, and Podmore (whom Dr. Raue invariably calls Padmore) in Phantasms of the Living, and the journals of the Society for Psychical Research, Dr. Raue displays a credulity, and an absolute ignorance of the proper way of testing evidence, which could not be outdone by the veriest noodle who was ever gladly duped by the commonest "Spiritualist" impostor.

When this ingenious theory is industriously elaborated into a thick volume, full of long words, it can be made to wear for a moment a kind of superficial plausibility. It is, in fact, word-spinning of the emptiest kind. The whole edifice is founded upon propositions which really mean nothing at all. The plain truth is that there are no primitive forces of the soul. The proposition that there are is only another way of saying that when a man sees a pig he sees a pig. What a man is, besides being sixty per cent. of water and the rest of it, arranged in a particular way, or what he does when he sees, except that something happens about his eyes, nerves, brain, and possibly other parts of him, Dr. Raue knows no more than the babe unborn. Therefore he invents "primitive forces of the soul" out of his own head or Dr. Beneke's, assumes their existence without any evidence whatever, and without even explaining what he means by "force," and pretends to have solved problems and to have explained that which could not be understood before. His application of the "science" of psychology to the solution of "phenomena" much the larger part of which never happened at all and are recorded only in falsehoods is nothing whatever but an airy, or rather foggy, creation of his own pen, and depends upon the reiterated statements of identical propositions, in different, but always in pompous and ambiguous, language.

* Psychology as a Natural Science applied to the Solution of Occult Psychic Phenomena. By C. G. Raue, M.D. Philadelphia: Porter & Coates. 1889.

As to his method of reasoning, one or two examples will suffice to show that any inferences drawn by him from his own or other people's observations of facts must be entirely untrustworthy. They shall be taken from that part of his work with which Dr. Beneke had nothing to do. His theory of primitive forces making and seeing ghosts depends entirely upon the proposition that for psychical activity space has no existence, and that it makes no sort of difference where the body of the soul whose primitive forces are perceiving without sense-organs may happen to be. In upholding the existence of ghosts of dead people he says:—

We should not trouble ourselves in speculations about the place where spirits dwell. There is no place—a space confined by length, breadth, or depth—for psychic forces or psychic organisms. Their presence or absence, their nearness or distance, cannot be determined by measuring-rods, but depend entirely on the psychical relation which they bear to other forces. These may be spirits in or out of the body, or they may be particular localities to which the psychic organisms have become attached during their development in earth life. Any locality may become a part of their psychic life, and the more so the more deeply this connexion is grounded on lifelong habits or strong passions, which keep the connexion in constant nearness to consciousness, or, in other words, fasten the mind to a particular place.

A man who says in the same breath that there is no place for psychic organisms, and that any locality may become part of them, does better to assume his facts than to argue for their existence. To do Dr. Raue justice he does seem to have acted generally on this principle. On the same topic he observes that when a body is dead, and the psychic organism has left it [in spite of being everywhere and nowhere], "there is no reason to assume that its [the psychic organism's] activity and capability should not go on all the same." There is not, if Dr. Raue's views about psychic organisms are correct. But, according to the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research, upon which Dr. Raue is here commenting, and which he says deal with the subject "in the most cautious and skeptical spirit," experience shows that, whereas phantasms of the living are nearly as common as blackberries, phantasms of the dead are extremely rare, if it can be said to be proved—even according to the easy canons of the S.P.R.—that they ever occur at all.

Dr. Raue makes a considerable boast of the proposition that there is nothing impossible in his theory—that is, that observed facts do not clearly demonstrate it to be incorrect. It may cheerfully be granted that assuming his ponderous phrases to be capable of having any particular meaning this would be so, or nearly so. But there is a vast difference between being theoretically possible and being true. It is probable that nothing is known absolutely inconsistent with the existence of animals with five legs and green tails in the centre of the moon. All the same, anybody who earnestly maintained that there were such animals would, unless he had sources of information not available for other people, be a silly fellow. Our souls may possibly be capable of some kind of convulsions remotely corresponding to what Dr. Raue calls primitive forces, only there is no reason whatever to suppose that they are. If they were, some such convulsions might perhaps enable people to see and otherwise perceive ghosts, only no one has yet been able to establish the fact. Under these circumstances it is a waste of good ink, and of time which may or may not be valuable, to call facts that you cannot understand by names that you cannot satisfactorily explain, and then boast that you have enabled everybody to know all about it.

YET ANOTHER CONCORDANCE.*

OF the making of concordances there appears to be no end, and though the Rev. J. Faulkner Potts intimates in his introduction to The Swedenborg Concordance that there has been an end of that, it has taken him fourteen years to write, and it will take him (as far as can be made out, for he is a little nebulous on the point) eight more to get the three remaining volumes before the world. Certainly the most enthusiastic concordant could not wish for a more suitable subject. The Writings (as they are always respectfully called) of Swedenborg fill a large—almost an extravagant—number of volumes. Moreover, in the opinion of Mr. Faulkner Potts, the sublime author of the Writings contradicted himself rather freely. "A reader's attention may," he says, "be arrested by some statement which appears to be at variance with one or more other statements he has met with elsewhere in the Writings. Yet he has frequently no means of referring back; and, even if he should find the passage or passages he remembers to have read, the apparent discrepancy may, after all, be explicable only by reference to another passage which forms the connecting link, but on which he cannot lay his hands, and of the very existence of which he may, indeed, be ignorant." What work, then, can be more beneficial than a concordance which will bring all the contradictory passages together, and enable the reader who has paid his money to take his choice, free from the possibility that his author may subsequently go back on him in an unexpected manner?

The whole of the Writings have been specially translated by Mr. Faulkner Potts, in order that he might more effectively concord (? or concordate) them. In the performance of this feat "two principal objects have been steadily kept in view. The first is reverent fidelity to the original. The second is the Queen's English." The spectacle of Mr. Faulkner Potts hard at work for fourteen years (out of twenty-two), with one eye fixed on reverent fidelity and the other on Her Majesty's language, must, indeed, have been a moving one. The result is worthy of the labour. Each word has its Latin equivalent after it. Thus, if you look up "man," the passages in which Swedenborg wrote "vir" are distinguished from those in which he wrote "homo." There are also cross-references in rich abundance. The consequence is that A—C, or, to be accurate, from "A" (not the indefinite article, but the capital letter, about which we learn that words of the celestial class in the Hebrew Word are to some extent characterized by it [and sometimes u and o], and that it is used in the third Heaven because it gives a full sound) to "Czar" (whom Swedenborg says he saw two or three times, in dreams and otherwise), takes up 893 pages, containing an extraordinary amount of information.

We have space for only one or two specimens. They shall be taken at random, and ought therefore to be fairly representative. "ALLURE. Allicere. A 1983¹. Sirens are chiefly of the female sex, and are women who in the bodily life studied to allure their associates to them by deep wiles." "BULLOCK. Juvenus. 2179. When oxen and bullocks appear in the World of Spirits, they know that the Angels are talking about natural goods." "CUT-THROAT. Cultrarius. A 2799¹². The reason a knife is scarcely mentioned in the Word is that in the other life there are evil spirits, who are called cut-throats, at whose side knives appear to hang, on account of their having a nature so savage that they want to cut the throat of every one with a knife."

NEW MUSIC.

WE have been sent the pianoforte score of the new work by Mr. F. Corder written for the Leeds Festival this year. It is entitled "The Sword of Argantyr," and is published by Forsyth Brothers. The subject is one of those elaborate Viking sagas, of which in this work only a short episode is treated, but enough to make a long cantata. It is almost impossible to judge of a work of this importance without hearing it performed; but it is eminently dramatic, written entirely in the latest modern style; in fact, there is only one number in the whole work where sustained fugal writing is introduced, and this is a trio for solo voices in scene iii., commencing with the words "Love is abjur'd." There is only one female solo part in the work—we need hardly say for soprano—but the renderer of it will be taxed to her utmost limit; for the tenor, Hjalmar, only appears in the second part, and the second baritone or bass, the spirit of Argantyr, only in the third part. The introduction, with chorus, is weird, representing a fog at sea in a boundless ocean; the music is very pictorial, and is contrasted by an adjuration to a reindeer, sung by soprano and alto in strains suggestive of hunting. Then comes a clanging, clashing scene of a mutiny on board. The uproar is well represented by an elaborate six-part chorus, consisting of a soprano and alto part, and two tenor and bass parts. Hervor, the soprano, then makes her appearance in a dramatic scena to quell the riot, and from that time to the end has not much rest. The first scene, or what in other works would be called Part I., ends with a fine chorus, "Our voices go up with a joy," in which again appear a few bars of canon. The intermezzo and first tenor solo, which begin the second scene, are of a pastoral character, and a good contrast to the preceding dramatic and impassioned scenes. The chorus, "Ha! see, 'tis a mountain of fire," is powerful, and, we predict, will produce a great effect; but it is only suitable to a choir of the excellence and scale of the Leeds one, the intervals and writing being most complicated. This ends the second scene or part. We have before mentioned the trio in the third scene, "Love is abjur'd"; it is very original and will require first-rate rendering. The cantata concludes with a fine chorus beginning "Hervor, mighty heroine," accompanied by a high, impassioned air for Hervor. We shall be curious to hear the verdict pronounced on this work at Leeds; we cannot help thinking that it will be favourable; but it all depends on the parts being well balanced and the instrumentation, of which points we cannot judge from simply a pianoforte score.

* The Swedenborg Concordance. A Complete Work of Reference to the Theological Writings of Emanuel Swedenborg. Based on the Original Latin Writings of the Author. Compiled, edited, and translated by the Rev. John Faulkner Potts, B.A. 4 vols. Vol. I. A to C. London: Swedenborg Society. 1888.

The London Music Publishing Company sends us a set of songs by Wentworth Bennett called "Love Lyrics." We are agreeably surprised in them; for it is a dangerous experiment to have a suite of sixteen songs on the same sentimental topic and by the same composer; but Mr. Bennett contrives to rise superior to our prognostications, and has introduced a great deal of variety and originality in each song. For instance, there could be no greater contrast than that between the treatment of the first and second—"I love thee" and "I live for thee"—and all are pretty and effective.

The firm of Charles Woolhouse sends us a varied selection of music. "Valse de Concert," by T. A. de Orellana, is a showy piece for the piano, with a certain brilliance; but we are lost in surprise that there should be such a demand for this kind of music. It requires some technical skill; and for those who can attain to this standard of execution we should have thought it would have raised a taste for a higher class of music. "Toujours à toi," Pensée pour piano, by G. Saint George, is another of the same kind of piece destined for an ephemeral existence in the drawing-room. "Réveil du printemps," by the same composer, is also of a light class of music, but has some good points. The first four bars of the subject of the Allegro movement are good, and capable of some working out; but, unfortunately, it rapidly develops into the commonplace. "The Castle in the Air," a song also by Mr. Saint George, is pretty, of the ballad type, and does not strain at too much effect; while his "Elégie," for violin or violoncello and piano, is a successful work. Mr. Saint George never writes anything very great for the violin and kindred instruments, but he understands bringing out the rich sustained notes of these instruments, which, practically, is all that an amateur can ever attain to. We like his "Feuilles d'Album" much less; there is a sad want of originality, for at every opening note to each subject we know well the hackneyed phrase that will follow. We have an "Idylle," for flute or violin and piano, by Herbert F. Sharpe, Op. 38. This is much more elaborate music, and requires a higher stamp of virtuoso to play it. It is effective, and has a great deal of passion running through it. We also like his "Légende" for violin and piano; it is not the least hackneyed in conception, and we would wish to hear it done full justice to by Mr. Carrodus, to whom it is dedicated. Miss S. Emily Oldham shows her wisdom in adhering to an old good model in her minuet for the piano, entitled, "In the Olden Time." She has not much to say in the music, but what she does is well put and attractive. Her song, "Love's Return," is equally simple and taking, and "Guardami," which is a more ambitious attempt, is a successful imitation of the old Italian style. "Feuille d'Album," by Jacques Haakman, for violin and piano, has one good short motive, but this is so frequently repeated with no other subject to relieve it, we are truly glad the work is short. His "Afternoon in February" is a descriptive song of a melancholy subject, but has some dramatic power. "In Fairyland," morceau caractéristique, by J. Cliffe Forrester, is a bright piece for the pianoforte, and "Can you forget?" music by Sydney Shaw, is nothing very striking, but up to the average of many drawing-room songs. Mrs. J. E. Vernham's song, "Twilight," is pathetic and pretty. "Beneath the Roses," by Gilbert Byass, is simply an ordinary valse set to music, bright, but of no originality; and as to "The Aureola," also by him, it may become popular, for it is a complete plagiarism of Sullivan's "Lost Chord." "Hermione" and "Margaret," two vases, also by Gilbert Byass, have plenty of tune and go in them; but we like the last best, for it has a germ of originality. Mr. Byass has a knack of picking up other composers' ideas and clothing them in a slightly different form. "Merry Voices," polka by Carl Kiefert, has a lot of life and spirit, which is the essential thing for a polka good for dancing.

MARINE AQUARIA.*

WHEN the late Mr. P. H. Gosse published, in 1854, his volume entitled The Aquarium—a volume which, by the way, seems to be still the main authority on the subject—he remarked that it was the well-known naturalist Dr. Johnston to whom the honour was due of having first invented the marine aquarium, in 1842. This statement, however, called forth appeals from several other competitors, and in particular from the family of Mr. Ward, the inventor of the Wardian case for ferns, who stated that in 1841 that gentleman had established "in a vessel, which contained twenty gallons of water, and which he surrounded with rockwork raised several feet above its margin," a complete fresh-water aquarium, in which he kept gold and silver fish. This enterprise, however, was of the nature of a fish-tank, and was not of the first importance to marine natural history. But in 1846 Mrs. Thynne, as Mr. Gosse duly acknowledged in the second edition of his Aquarium, was the first to bring to London and preserve in captivity living seaweeds and madrepoes, which she had collected on the coast of Devon. She aerated the water by daily pouring it backwards and forwards from one glass bowl to another, and she deserves all praise for being the earliest real inventor of the marine aquarium.

The two naturalists, however, to whom the study of sea-creatures in aquaria owes most were Mr. P. H. Gosse and Mr. Robert Warington, who, almost exactly at the same time, in the year 1849, but without any cognisance in either of the experiments of the other, began to form and develop aquaria in London. Mr. Gosse began immediately with sea-animals and plants, while it was not until 1852 that Mr. Warington began to prosecute experiments with salt water, his vivaria having up to that time been stocked with pond-snails, gold-fish, and water-weeds. In October 1852 Mr. Gosse published the results of his observations in the Annals of Natural History, and in 1853 they added a charm of novelty to his delightful volume, A Naturalist's Rambles on the Devonshire Coast. Late in 1853 Mr. Warington gave some valuable details of the progress of his experiments in the Annals of Natural History, and the question of marine aquaria began to attract universal attention. In 1854, as we have said, Mr. Gosse issued his Aquarium, which was illustrated with exquisite coloured plates, in a style then quite novel to the English public. The subject became extremely popular; and, to meet the demand for information from those who desired to take a personal interest in marine zoology, Mr. Gosse published, in 1855, his Handbook to the Marine Aquarium, which was presently followed by the Glaucus of Charles Kingsley. The marine aquarium then became the fashionable rage of the moment. No drawing-room was considered complete which did not contain a bowl of animated rarities; and the late Mr. Lloyd began to sketch out his scheme for the creation of great public aquaria in the chief European cities. Such, we believe, is the succinct history of a very agreeable and humanizing branch of modern popular science.

The little book which Mr. Bennett has produced makes no pretension to originality, but may be found a useful compendium of information scattered elsewhere, as to the kinds of animals and seaweeds which live best in captivity, and which it is therefore most profitable to procure. It explains where such objects are to be obtained, and how they are to be kept in health. It is profusely illustrated, and those pictures which are engraved by a process from photographs after nature, although they are ugly, are vivid and useful, except in cases in which the engraver has not understood the formation of the creature. An example of the latter is seen on p. 70, in the illustration of that exquisitely pearly sea-anemone, the Bunodes gemmaceus, to which Gosse gave the unjustifiably cruel English name of the Gem Pimplet. The tentacles of this anemone, in the engraving, look like nothing so much as the orange capsules of the fruit of the wild iris, when they lie burst open and shattered by the wind. The engraver or process-maker has evidently not understood the structure of the Pimplet.

There has been little improvement in the artifices by which marine animals are brought from the shore and preserved in tanks. The collecting apparatus recommended by Mr. Bennett is the precise counterpart of that described by Gosse nearly forty years ago, a square-bottomed wickerwork basket, divided into four compartments and fitted up with two large and four small glass vessels. The implements are the same, too; a geologist's hammer, a cold chisel, and a leno net. Mr. Bennett describes the methods of collecting, from his own experience, and he seems to be an enthusiastic naturalist. His descriptive powers, however, must be limited, or he is deceived in his nomenclature when he says that the Zostera marina is to be found in rock-pools, and is a "green weed, with feathery branches." What can he mean? Zostera marina is the Sea-grass, beds of which occur in deep water, never in pools, and its leaves are long, glossy, narrow ribands, like grass, but even less "feathery" and less "branched," if that be possible. He goes on to recommend Zostera for the tank, but our own experience is that it is totally useless and even harmful in an aquarium. Mr. Bennett gives excellent advice when he remarks that stone jars containing specimens, when sent by passenger train to London, should be but half filled with water. The splashing about of the contents, which alarms the timid collector, is really beneficial to the animals, as it keeps the water comparatively fresh and aerated. Perhaps the most valuable pages of his little manual are those (pp. 49-52) in which he enumerates the things which the collector is not to do. Sometimes these seem a little unlikely to be done, as "Don't let the animals take a header up the siphon." We should not have supposed that they would wish to do so, but Mr. Bennett once possessed an eel that performed this extraordinary feat of suicide.

THREE MEDICAL BOOKS.*

THE perusal of Mr. Ellis's treatise on the human foot has given us great pleasure. We have not previously met with so intelligent and accurate a description of the mechanism and functions of the various structures which enter into its formation. The keynote of the book is struck in the opening paragraph, which runs as follows:—

Of the two feet with which man is endowed, each may be regarded as

* The Human Foot. By Thomas S. Ellis. London: J. & A. Churchill.

Medical Handbook of Life Assurance. By James Edward Pollock, M.D., F.R.C.P., and James Chisholm. London: Cassell & Co., Limited.

The Dictionary of Medical Specialists. Edited by W. P. W. Phillimore, M.A., B.C.L. London: Charles J. Clark.

* Marine Aquaria: their Construction, Arrangement, and Management. By Reginald A. R. Bennett. London: L. Upcott Gill.

the counterpart of the other, in every respect corresponding. It is, however, impossible to understand the feet, from whatever point of view they may be regarded, unless we consider them in combination.

We entirely endorse the opinion here expressed. To the non-recognition of its truth, and the consequent attempt to make either foot appear symmetrical in itself are principally due the mistakes in shoe-making which give rise to so much misery and fully justify Carlyle's description of us (in his letter to Mr. Dowie) as "a public suffering much in its feet." From this false conception of the real beauty of a foot has arisen the fashionable boot, coming to a central point, and producing overlapping toes, ingrowing nails, bunions, corns, and other unsightly deformities so frequently observed in the feet of those who have persistently sacrificed comfort and utility at the shrine of fashion. The same idea is carried out in practice to a still greater extreme by the high-caste Chinese ladies. The author shows that artists have not been altogether blameless in this matter. At first sight we should be disposed to hold the makers of boots and shoes as chiefly responsible for the unsuitable and, from the point of view of true art, inelegant foot-clothing in common use; but this would be unjust, as they are obliged to supply the form of article demanded by a vitiated public taste. It is a pitiful sight to see the distortion of the feet of young children deliberately, though ignorantly, undertaken by loving parents almost before they can walk. We think Mr. Ellis perfectly right in his opinion that the military position, with the toes turned out, is not the best for either walking or prolonged standing, and agree with him that the feet should be parallel in both cases. His advocacy of making boots from lasts which are really of the same shape as the feet to be clothed is, of course, sound; and the form of last invented by him appears to us excellent. We trust that this book will obtain the wide circulation to which its merit entitles it, and that the principles set forth in it will meet with general acceptance.

The Medical Handbook of Life Assurance is the joint production of a physician and an actuary, both men of eminence in their respective professions. Under these circumstances we should expect to find it a good guide for medical men who are called upon to examine those proposing to insure their lives. In this expectation we are not disappointed. The methods by which the personal and family history and the present condition of the proposer can be best ascertained are fully described. The relative importance of the various hereditary taints and existing morbid conditions as affecting the value of a life is carefully pointed out. We notice occasionally some inexactness of wording, as in section 28, p. 23, where experience is spoken of as a rare intellectual gift. Errors such as this do not detract greatly from the value of the book, but are certainly blemishes, and should be corrected in any future edition. Contrary to the generally received teaching, Dr. Pollock speaks of the murmur of mitral stenosis as occurring "in the first part of the heart's systole," instead of the latter part of the diastole. The book is thoroughly practical, and should prove useful to those who are only occasionally required to examine for life assurance.

The raison d'être of the Dictionary of Medical Specialists is not obvious. The author states that "its object is to place in the hands of the profession, in a convenient form, information which hitherto has been unattainable, save at much loss of time in searching and comparing medical directories and hospital lists." We have reason to believe that almost every practitioner of medicine possesses, or has access to, Churchill's Medical Directory, which contains considerably fuller information respecting the physicians and surgeons devoting themselves to the practice of special branches of the profession than is given by Mr. Phillimore. The proposition that it is necessary to inform medical men as to who are the leading lights in their profession is altogether untenable.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE second part of M. Decrue's History of the great Constable of Montmorency (1) marked itself off naturally enough from the first. Whatever the defects of Francis I. (and they were many enough and large enough), no Minister was ever likely to make of him a mere king who reigns and does not govern. With his son and grandsons it was different, and great part of the history of France under them reduces itself, in fact, to the rivalries or coalitions of the Constable with Guises, with the Châtillons, with Condé, with Catherine de Medicis. The wars with England and Germany in the first part of the volume, the religious wars in the second, are all connected with Montmorency's name and actions; nor was he less eminent in peace than in war. M. Decrue is right in saying that no one ever succeeded him in exactly the same double capacity. The Guises would willingly have done so, but could not; Richelieu, though an infinitely greater statesman, and not unwarlike, was Montmorency's equal neither in lineage nor in generalship. If Marlborough had been a great noble by birth, and had not been so much engrossed in foreign war, he would have come near to the Constable. But the Minister-Commander-in-Chief, the "Lieutenant-General of the Kingdom," has become a practical impossibility since the sixteenth century, unless, like Cromwell and Napoleon, he makes himself nominal as well as real chief of the State. M. Decrue, however, makes no exaggeration in respect to his hero. Indeed, Anne de Montmorency is not personally a fascinating character, despite his splendour. He is more desirable in the fine equestrian statue which was exhibited a few years ago in the Salon, and is now at Chantilly, on canvas or on paper, than he could have been to live with. For all his bravery (which was indeed sometimes suspected of bravado), his high birth, his wealth, his encouragement of art, he is inferior in romantic interest, not merely to Guise, but to the severe figure of Coligny. Of the worst fault of the French nobility—its perfectly shameless and insatiable place-hunting and money-grabbing—there never was a more signal example than Montmorency. Still his extraordinary position and his very remarkable abilities entitle him to the place which he holds in French history and in this book, which will probably remain for some time the accepted monograph on the subject, and the first part of which has already been "crowned" by the Academy. As a book to read it perhaps abounds a little too much in detail, some of which might have been omitted without loss of precision and with considerable gain to the lucidity and interest of the narrative. But this of itself makes it a more valuable book for reference, and the fulness of its page-by-page reference to authorities is extraordinary.

The Sensations (2) of M. René Maizeroy (a writer of almost the youngest school, and of considerable powers, who has sometimes, like too many others, been unfortunate in his choice of subjects) belongs to a class of book which was almost unknown till fifty or sixty years ago, the class of very elaborate sketches—vignettes as it were—sometimes purely descriptive, sometimes with a little "story" thrown in, always more or less short, and aiming at great accomplishment of style. The earliest book of the kind that we can think of was Louis Bertrand's Gaspard de la nuit; the best is Baudelaire's Petits poèmes en prose. M. Maizeroy does not come up to these two, and indeed his attempts are less elaborately planned as hybrids between prose and poetry; but they are good specimens of literary impressionism, with passages here and there of considerable merit. There is, of course, a certain insincerity of tone about them, as where the author after one of his country journeys and enjoyments of pure delights, sighs over the necessity of returning to his drudgery at Paris, and to the "particular cabinets, with their mirrors scribbled over by the diamond rings of droleses." The contrast is, no doubt, one which will commend itself as much to the man of taste as to the moralist. But if we come to that, was there any force majeure which obliged M. Maizeroy, even if he had to return to his drudgery, to return at the same time to the particular cabinets and the droleses? Je n'en vois pas la nécessité, as the best form of one of the best of anecdotes has it.

The perplexity which always weighs upon the reviewer of M. du Boisgobey, in the matter of "telling the story," is perhaps best solved by strictly quoting the official description of the book. Double-blanc (3), then, is "a recital of the most dramatic, full of surprises, emotion, and the unexpected." Its title is "the surname of a charming woman who at last finds happiness after terrible peripeties." We can attest the truth of this, and yet there is nothing in it to diminish the fearful joy of the reader who declines to be informed beforehand of anything which that story contains. Le petit Gosse (4) (a common, not a proper, name) is a foundling. His experiences, both in the asylum and out of it, are pleasantly told, and the stage English governess who appears may be forgiven to M. Busnach. By the way, it is rather a curious instance of the ineradicable tendency of human nature to "pass it on" that this impossible person is a revenge not nearly so much for any English caricature as for the German Hausfrau. In striking contrast with both these books, good as both are, is M. Victor Fournel's Maman capitaine (5). It is hardly a novel, and may even be, as the author hints, over-true. The misfortunes of Lieutenant Hardy are, perhaps, a little too harrowing, according to a well-known canon of art which forbids the attempt to portray hopeless and continuous ill luck and misery; but they are horribly possible, and told with a curious absence of exaggeration and a very delicate and pathetic touch. The book is simply the history of a man who, partly through over-delicacy of feeling, partly by sheer ill luck, misses, or loses, every chance in life, and is killed at last, less by the continued pressure of hardship and misfortune than by the death of the adopted child whom he has managed to support. The public which buys, "crowns," and hails as a kind of revelation such maundering trash as M. Edouard Rod's Sens de la vie—the weary, old, effeminate whinings of idleness and fulness of bread—will probably put Maman capitaine aside, as well as sensationists, Socialists, and all other "ists." But it certainly has the truth of literature, and we fear it has the truth of life. It should be added that there is another short story in the book, as a make-weight. This is comic, not tragic, but also good of its kind.

(2) Sensations. Par René Maizeroy. Paris: Plon.

(3) Double-blanc. Par Fortuné du Boisgobey. 2 tomes. Paris: Plon.

(4) Le petit Gosse. Par W. Busnach. Paris: Perrin.

(5) Maman capitaine. Par Victor Fournel. Paris: Perrin.

(1) Anne Due de Montmorency sous les rois Henri II., François II., et Charles IX. Par F. Decrue. Paris: Plon.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

WHAT may be termed the commercial energy of the trading nations of the world is strikingly exhibited in Mr. George G. Chisholm's Handbook of Commercial Geography (Longmans & Co.) The subject has attracted much attention in recent years among teachers and men of business, its educational importance having been strangely overlooked by most writers or compilers of geographical text-books. Of the various manuals that treat of the geographical distribution of commerce which have appeared of late years, the majority may be described as books of reference or statistical epitomes. Mr. Chisholm's work aims at fostering an "intellectual interest" in commercial geography, and has a wider scope than any book of the kind we have seen. With the exception of such items as area, population, and raw or manufactured products, the statistical information, which is of great value and most conveniently tabulated, is separated from the body of the work in an appendix. Thus the reader who consults the book for facts is not distracted by a superfluity of figures. By an excellent arrangement of sections and paragraphs, which are numbered throughout the book and referred to by their numbers when necessary, the information is both clearly and concisely conveyed. The numerous maps, by Mr. F. S. Weller, offer well-defined and strictly relevant illustration of population, products, coaling-stations, railways, canals, and other channels of trade. Altogether, this careful and conscientious volume is something better than that kind of tedious and familiar compilation of indigestible facts known as a guide to useful knowledge. Here and there Mr. Chisholm's commentary takes a theoretical form, as in the comparison of the advantages and disadvantages of the commerce of Great Britain. Among the commercial disabilities of this country Mr. Chisholm reckons the dearness of land, the high rate of wages, the high tariffs of Protectionist countries, the want of a decimal coinage, and the backward state of technical and commercial education, in connexion with which Mr. Chisholm indicates as a hindrance "a mode of spelling in favour of which not one argument of weight can be advanced, except the fact that it exists and is difficult to get rid of." This is surely a very extreme view of a simple matter. It is well enough to clinch this severity of judgment by citing Mr. Max Müller's opinion that "English spelling is a national misfortune"; but, as a matter of fact, foreigners engaged in commercial pursuits in England easily vanquish the difficulties of our language. If German clerks triumph, as they notoriously do, why should the English child be handicapped, as Mr. Max Müller suggests, in the keen international race? The plea of the spelling-reform faddists was never revealed in more naked absurdity than in Mr. Chisholm's advocacy. It is the foreigner, not the native, who is handicapped. Let our mercantile clerks master German and French and we should hear nothing more of the supposed disability.

In the Clarendon Press Series we have a selection from Burns—Burns: Selected Poems, edited, with notes, glossary, and introduction, by J. Logie Robertson (Oxford: at the Clarendon Press)—which does not lessen the healthy distaste for selections from the English poets which much experience of such labours tends to promote. In the first place, Mr. Robertson's notes are written, it would seem, for mere children. His introduction, intended to be a "clear outline of the life of Burns," is thin and scrappy. His selection excludes, on the ground of necessity, some of the poet's most characteristic work, and omits from several poems deemed worthy of inclusion here a line and there a stanza, and this "for one reason or another." This unaccounted-for prudishness is truly unaccountable. Here, too, is a specimen of Mr. Robertson's "notes," a commentary on the lyric, "My love is like a red, red rose":—"A simple, straightforward, impassioned love-lyric, conceived with all the charming abandon of the old romantic ballad style." Could anything be more tediously superfluous? "Style" quoth'a? Why, the art is nature.

The new volume of the English Illustrated Magazine (Macmillan & Co.), an attractive gift-book in its pretty cloth binding of pale green and gold, shows in all respects a constant adherence to the standard of excellence prescribed at its birth. Much of its contents is already familiar matter to the general reader. Mr. Swinburne's musical and pathetic Jacobite ballad, and Mr. Marion Crawford's Sant' Ilario, are now no new things for the magazine reader, though they impart, with the many well-illustrated topographical papers that are a characteristic feature of the English Illustrated, a permanent interest to a bright and varied volume which is by no means common to magazine literature.

The third volume of Blackie's Modern Cyclopedia, edited by Mr. Charles Annandale (Blackie & Sons), is advanced well on in the letter F, and reveals nothing on consultation that should affect our original impression of its utility as a handy and accurate work for general reference. The maps and woodcuts are unusually good, the latter being quite free from the murky ambiguity that marks the ordinary embellishments of dictionaries. Perhaps the attempt to give phonetic equivalents of foreign names is to be deplored. It never has succeeded and never will. The English reader is decidedly not assisted when he is directed to pronounce Delaroche "dè-là-rosh," and Delavigne "dè-là-vèny."

It is pleasant to note a third edition of Mr. W. Warde Fowler's delightful notes on bird life in Oxford, the Midlands, and in Alpine parts—A Year with the Birds (Macmillan & Co.)—with Mr. Bryan Hook's unconventional illustrations.

In his drama Louis the Eleventh (Elliot Stock) Mr. John Arthur Coupland is scarcely successful either as an imitator of Delavigne's popular play or as a dramatizer of dramatic fiction. His drama is a very thin solution of Quentin Durward, with the dramatic spirit of Scott entirely evaporated. There are all the characters, save the picturesque Bohemian, and most of the incidents of the novel, in Mr. Coupland's play; yet all is said with this acknowledgment. Of characterization the author reveals absolutely nothing. His puppets are all delivered of one kind of speech, a diction that recalls the inflated style of the Minerva Press fiction. The subtlety of Louis is indicated in the following "aside," spoken of Charles of Burgundy:—

Oh that I had this fellow in my power!
I'd torture him as now he tortures me.

Quentin starts a hand-to-hand fight with De la Marck, who is about to slay Louis, with Hold! felon knight, thy sacrilegious hand;

while Louis, as a spectator, gleefully shouts, as the fight goes on,

Oh, my brave Scot! well struck, my bonny Scot!
There, there! a very David in the field!
He's down! He's down! He's down!

And De la Marck responds, as do all the dramatis personæ, whenever anything like a crisis arises, in a mellifluous rhymed couplet:—

Ay, low enough! Now sorrow grip your hearts—
I curse you dying! Now my soul departs!

Bluebeard Notes, by Ira Billman (New York: Funk & Wagnalls), is a nicely-printed volume of carefully-dated commonplace lyrics, none of which is in any way remarkable, except a daring and grotesque Tennysonian celebration of an episode of the battle of Chancellorsville, when "Major Keenan with his 300 horse-men" was ordered to check the enemy's charge while his commander got certain guns into position. "You must do it at all cost," he was told, and Keenan replied, "That is the same as saying 'you must be killed,'" adding with a smile, "General, I will do it." It was nobly done, this charge of "The Brave Three Hundred":—

In the nick of time,
On the tick of time,
Where the front thunder'd;
To inflict a blow,
In the face of the foe,
As it rushed along
Twenty thousand strong,
Rode the brave three hundred.

Truly they are an inventive people in the U.S.A., and their poets proclaim the fact.

We have to acknowledge The Gentleman's Magazine Library, edited by George Laurence Gomme, F.S.A., with bibliographical notes by A. C. Bickley (Elliot Stock), a collection of extracts on special books and subjects; the annual volume of Sunday, an excellent illustrated magazine for children (Wells Gardner, Darton, & Co.); The Eagle, a magazine privately printed for members of St. John's College, Cambridge; Mining Royalties, and their Effect on the Iron and Coal Trades, by W. R. Sorley, M.A. (Henry Frowde); and Mrs. Carlisle-Carr's Illustrated Manual of Vowel Sounds (Weekes & Co.), a useful addition to the author's previous brochures on voice production and singing, with photographic illustrations.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we cannot return rejected Communications; and to this rule we can make no exception, even if stamps for return of MS. are sent. The Editor must also entirely decline to enter into correspondence with the writers of MSS. sent in and not acknowledged.

ADVERTISEMENTS intended for the SATURDAY REVIEW should be addressed to the MANAGER of the ADVERTISEMENT DEPARTMENT at the OFFICE, 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON. A printed Scale of Charges can be obtained on application.

THE UNITED STATES.

The Annual Subscription to the SATURDAY REVIEW, including postage to any part of the United States, is £1 10s. 4d. or $7 39, and may be forwarded direct to the Publisher, Mr. WILLIAM BOYCE, at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, or to Mr. B. F. STEVENS, American Agency, 4 Trafalgar Square, London. International Money Orders can be sent from any office in the United States, and Subscriptions, payable in advance, may commence at any time.

The SATURDAY REVIEW may be had in Paris every Saturday from Veuve J. BOYVEAU, 22 Rue de la Banque (near the Bourse); also at Le KIOSQUE DUPERRON, Boulevard des Capucines, and Le KIOSQUE MICHEL, Boulevard des Capucines, by whom also Subscriptions will be received.

For CONTENTS see page 368*

GOOD MORNING
HAVE YOU USED
PEARS' SOAP?

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 1,770, SEPTEMBER 28, 1889:

The French Elections.
Rings. Mr. Wilkie Collins.
Sense about the Naval Manœuvres. The Future of the Transvaal.
A New Vice. Eastern Worries.
Mr. Gladstone's Last. Self-Healing.
"Quelch and Liberty."

North Uist.
A Clerical Brotherhood. Llassa and its Scapegoat.
The Apple and Pear Conference.
The Lancashire Plate. Onions. The New Burlesque.
Holland House. "The Royal Oak."
On Insuring Life.

Travels in France.
Novels. An English-Persian Dictionary.
C. B. Vignoles. The Catholic Hierarchy.
German Literature. The Farm and the Dairy.
A New Lexicon. A German Fog. Yet Another Concordance.
New Music. Marine Aquaria.
Three Medical Books. French Literature.
New Books and Reprints.

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

LYCEUM.—THE DEAD HEART.—This (SATURDAY)
 EVENING at Eight o'clock. THE DEAD HEART: Mr. Henry Irving, Mr. Bancroft, Mr. Arthur Stirling, Mr. Righton, Miss Kate Phillips, and Miss Ellen Terry. Box Office (Mr. Hurst) open daily 10 to 5. Seats also booked by letter or telegram.—LYCEUM.

CRYSTAL PALACE. SATURDAY CONCERTS.—The Thirty-Fourth Annual Series of these world-renowned CONCERTS will COMMENCE on October 19 at Three o'clock. Vocalist: Mr. Edward Lloyd. Pianoforte: Madame Roger-Miclos. Conductor: Mr. AUGUST MANNS. Transferable tickets for Reserved Seats for the Twenty Concerts, Two Guineas. Prospectus, post free, on application to the MANAGER, Crystal Palace, S.E.

BRITISH MUSEUM.
THE READING-ROOM and NEWSPAPER-ROOM will be CLOSED from Tuesday, October 1, to Friday, October 4, both days inclusive.
 British Museum, E. MAUNDE THOMPSON, Principal Librarian.
 September 24, 1889.

NOTICE to PRINCIPALS of UNIVERSITIES, COLLEGES, and SCHOOLS.
 Principals are requested to forward, without delay, particulars of the EXAMINATIONS and OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS for 1890, to the EDITOR, "Schoolmaster's Calendar," 4 York Street, Covent Garden.

HATFIELD.—On the G.N. Main Line, close to Park and Station.—VILLAS to be SOLD or LET. Two Sitting and six Bedrooms, Bath (fitted hot and cold), upstairs w.c., large Kitchen, &c. Gravel soil.—Apply to C. CAVE & SON, Station Road, New Barnet.

P. and O. MAIL STEAMERS FROM LONDON TO BOMBAY, GIBRALTAR, MALTA, BRINDISI,
 EGYPT, ADEN, and MADRAS via BOMBAY every week.
 CALCUTTA, MADRAS, COLOMBO, CHINA, STRAITS
 and JAPAN, AUSTRALIA, NEW ZEALAND and TAS-MANIA, ALEXANDRIA, and NAPLES every alternate week.

CHEAP RETURN TICKETS.
 For particulars apply at the Company's Offices, 122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., and 25 Cockspur Street, London, S.W.

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL, Strand, W.C.—The
 COUNCIL earnestly appeal for DONATIONS and ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS. £20,000 required for new Nursing Establishment, enlargement of Medical School, the Convalescent Home, and current expenses. Bankers: Messrs. Drummond.
 ARTHUR E. READE, Secretary.

A Y R T O N & T H O M A S,
PATENT AGENTS.
 Conduct every kind of British, Foreign, and Colonial Business connected with PATENTS, DESIGNS, AND TRADE MARKS.
 Mr. H. M. THOMAS, Author of "The True Position of Patentees," being a practical engineer, PERSONALLY SUPERINTENDS the applications in respect of mechanical inventions.
 Moderate Terms. No charge for preliminary advice.
 Telegraphic Address, "Prolonged, London."
 9 & 10 Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, W.C.

EDUCATIONAL.

NEW SOUTH WALES.
UNIVERSITY OF SYDNEY.
 (1) CHALLIS CHAIR OF ANATOMY.
 (2) CHALLIS CHAIR OF LAW.
 (3) CHALLIS CHAIR OF HISTORY.
 (4) CHALLIS CHAIR OF LOGIC AND MENTAL PHILOSOPHY.

The Senate of the University of Sydney, having decided to establish the above Chairs in accordance with the Bequest of the late Mr. John Henry Challis, invite Applications from Gentlemen qualified to fill the same.

All particulars as to tenure of office, salary, &c., may be obtained from the Agent-General for New South Wales, 9 Victoria Street, S.W., to whom applications, stating Candidate's age, and accompanied by eight copies of testimonials, should be sent on or before October 19, 1889.

SAUL SAMUEL,
 Agent-General for New South Wales,
 9 Victoria Street, London, S.W.
 September 16, 1889.

UNIVERSITY of LONDON.—SPECIAL CLASSES.

LONDON HOSPITAL MEDICAL COLLEGE.
 SPECIAL CLASSES are held in the subjects required for the Preliminary Scientific and the Intermediate M.B. (London) Examinations.

Fee for the whole Course, to Students of the Hospital 8 Guineas.
 To others..... 10 "
 A SPECIAL CLASS is also held for the Primary F.R.C.S. Examination.
 These Classes will commence in October, and are not confined to Students of the Hospital.
 MUNRO SCOTT, Warden.

HEIDELBERG COLLEGE, Heidelberg.

Principals.
 Dr. A. HOLZBERG, Ph.D., M.A. Heidelberg.
 A. B. CATTY, M.A., Christ's Coll., Camb.
 WALTER LAWRENCE, M.A., St. John's, Oxon.
 At the recent Exam. for the I.C.S. a Pupil of the College obtained HIGHEST MARKS IN GERMAN of all Candidates.

SANDHURST FURTHER EXAM., August 1889.
 Alexander R. C. Rew..... 7536.
 O. & C. SCHOOL EXAMINATION, 1889.
 Two Senior and 5 Junior Certificates.

ST. CLARE COLLEGE, WALMER, KENT.

Head-Master—The Rev. E. D'AUQUIER, M.A. Clare College, Camb.
 One of the Examiners to the Irish Board of Intermediate Education, late Head-Master of South-Eastern College, Ramsgate, with a staff of Assistant Masters (Graduates).
 The College is situated in a delightful spot, close to the sea, and contains teaching and boarding accommodation, chapel, sanatorium, infirmary, playroom, laundry, gymnasium, tuckshop, workshop, &c., 14 acres of well-timbered and beautiful grounds, cycle path, cricket and football fields, tennis-courts, &c., sea-bathing and boating.
 The school year is divided into three terms; each term consists of about thirteen weeks.
 Inclusive fees, Eighty Guineas per annum. Exhibitions and Scholarships, of £10, £15, and £21, are annually thrown open for competition.
 For further information, apply to the HEAD-MASTER.

THE LONDON HOSPITAL MEDICAL COLLEGE.

The WINTER SESSION will commence on Tuesday, October 1.
 The Hospital, which is the largest general Hospital in the kingdom, contains nearly 800 beds, all in constant use. There are wards for Accidents, Surgical and Medical cases, Diseases of Women and Children, and Ophthalmic cases. Special departments for Diseases of the Eye, Ear, Throat, Skin and Teeth, and for Cancer, Tumours, Diseases of the Bladder, Piles, and Fistula. Number of in-patients last year, 8,873; out-patients, 101,518; accidents, 7,456.
 Surgical operations daily.

APPOINTMENTS.—Resident Accoucheur, House Physicians, House Surgeons. Forty of these appointments are made annually. Numerous Dressers, Clinical Clerks, Post-mortem Clerks, and Maternity Assistants are appointed every three months. All appointments are free. Holders of resident appointments are also provided free board. The New College Buildings are now complete, and afford more than double the former accommodation.

Two Entrance Science Scholarships, value £50 and £10, and two Buxton Scholarships, value £30 and £20, will be offered for competition at the end of September to new Students. Sixteen other Scholarships and Prizes are given annually.

Luncheons or dinners, at moderate charges, can be obtained at the Students' Club.
 The London Hospital is now in direct communication with all parts of the Metropolis. The Metropolitan, District, and other Railways have stations within a minute's walk of the Hospital and College.

For further information apply personally, or by letter, to Mile End, E. MUNRO SCOTT, Warden.

ST. GEORGE'S HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL, HYDE PARK CORNER, S.W.

The WINTER SESSION will commence on Tuesday, October 1, with an INTRODUCTORY ADDRESS by Dr. T. CLIFFORD ALLBUTT, F.R.S., at 4 P.M.
 A Prospectus of the School, and further information, may be obtained by personal application between One and Three P.M., or by letter addressed to the DEAN at the Hospital.

PROFESSORSHIP of MODERN LITERATURE and ENGLISH LANGUAGE at UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LIVERPOOL, VICTORIA UNIVERSITY.

CANDIDATES for the Chair are requested to send in applications (with testimonials) on or before October 5.
 Residence to commence in January 1890. Endowment, £375 with two-thirds of fees.
 For particulars apply to REGISTRAR, University College, Liverpool.

THE Misses S. and R. ALLEN-OLNEY (formerly Head-
 Mistresses respectively of Blackheath and South Hampstead High Schools), residing in the healthy suburb of Hampstead, receive a few YOUNG LADIES to board and educate. The arrangements are those of a refined home. Large playground and full-sized tennis-court. Preparation for University examinations and degrees. Reference kindly permitted to parents of present and former pupils. —41 Belsize Park Gardens, London, N.W.

PRÉ SCILLA, LAUSANNE.—Miss WILLS, late Head-
 Mistress of the Norwich High School, has a very comfortable English HOME for Elder GIRLS. Garden and full-sized Tennis-court. Numbers limited. Subjects taken:—French, German, Italian, Music, Singing, and Painting.

THE Rev. W. ALMACK, M.A., BRUCE CASTLE, near
 TOTTENHAM, prepares PUPILS wanting special help for the Universities, Army, Legal or Medical Preliminaries, or the ordinary requirements of business life. Excellent house in Park of 20 acres, containing Cricket and Football grounds. References, the Head-Masters of Charterhouse, Cheltenham, and Marlborough.

BELL FARM, CLEWER HILL, WINDSOR.
 BOYS prepared for ETON and other PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—Address Miss HIBBARD.

MORNING PREPARATORY CLASS for the SONS of GENTLEMEN (exclusively), 13 Somerset Street, Portman Square.
 Miss WOODMAN will be at home for Visitors on and after October 2.
 SCHOOL BEGINS October 5, at the usual hour.

EDUCATION, PARIS.—An ENGLISH LADY, residing at Neuilly, receives a limited number of YOUNG LADIES of good family. Qualified French and English governesses. Professors for all accomplishments. French is the language of the household. The house stands in its own grounds. Large garden, tennis court. Highest references. For particulars apply to Rev. G. G. W. CLEMENGER, the Rectory, Alwalton, near Peterboro'.

BOARD, RESIDENCE, and SUPERVISION for Young Ladies attending either the Senior or Junior Divisions of the Crystal Palace School of ART, SCIENCE, and LITERATURE. Highest references: Moderate Terms; most comfortable home, conveniently situated.—The Misses ELLIOTT, Highfield, Longton Avenue, Upper Sydenham.

IMPEDIMENTS of SPEECH.—The Rev. Professor D'ORSEY,
 B.D., receives RESIDENT and VISITING PUPILS, at 13 Prince's Square, Bayswater, W.

RADFORD HOUSE, COVENTRY.
 PREPARATORY SCHOOL for the SONS of GENTLEMEN. Established 1800. Boys received from Six to Twelve years of age, and prepared for College and Local Examinations, which have hitherto been successfully passed by the Pupils of this School. Eight acres of recreation ground.—Apply for particulars to Mrs. and Miss HOUGHTON.

RE-OPENING of the SCHOOLS.—SCHOOL PIANOS.
 NEW MODELS from 18 Guineas. All the latest Improvements. These instruments are remarkable for their beautiful tone, perfect touch, and durability. PIANOS for HIRE, or on the THREE YEARS' SYSTEM.—W. J. ENNEVER & SON, Manufacturers, 57 Berners Street, London, W.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS'
 UPRIGHT IRON GRAND PIANOFORTES.
 Prices from 40 Guineas upwards.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Pianoforte Makers by Special Appointment to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales, 1889.—18, 20, and 22 Wigmore Street, W. Lists free.

ILFRACOMBE.—ILFRACOMBE HOTEL. Thoroughly furnished, equipped, and decorated. 250 Rooms. Eight Lawn-Tennis Courts, Large Swimming Bath, Private Baths. Descriptive Tariff of Manager.

SCHWEITZER'S COCOATINA.

GUARANTEED PURE SOLUBLE COCOA.

This Old-established Article retains its position as "the finest Cocoa in the market." It is unequalled in purity and flavour, bears the strictest Chemical test, and keeps in all climates.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS AND ECONOMICAL.

FRY'S

Lancet—"Pure, and very soluble."

Medical Times—"Eminently suitable for Invalids."

PURE CONCENTRATED

COCOA.

Sir C. A. CAMERON, President of the Royal College of Surgeons, Ireland.—"I have never tasted Cocoa that I like so well."

SUTTON'S BULBS

GENUINE ONLY DIRECT FROM
SUTTON & SONS,
READING.

For full particulars see
SUTTON'S BULB CATALOGUE.

Beautifully Illustrated, 6d. post free.

Complete Priced List of Bulbs gratis and post free.

First produced and designated CORN FLOUR
by BROWN & POLSON in 1856.

BROWN & POLSON'S CORN FLOUR

Was in the Field some time before any other was anywhere heard of, and no other has now an Equal Claim to the Public Confidence.

THE PERFECTION
OF SCOTCH WHISKEY.

The LANCET says:

"DOUGLAS & MASON'S Whiskey is excellent in every respect, smooth in taste and delicate in flavour, the advantage of skilful blending."

Cash Price 40/ per dozen. Carriage paid to any Railway Station in England on two dozen and upwards.

DOUGLAS & MASON, EDINBURGH.

ESTABLISHED 1839.

BRAIN FAG, SHATTERED NERVES,
Sleeplessness, Nervous Exhaustion, Rheumatism, Gout, Torpid Liver, Nervous Dyspepsia, &c. yield like magic to the healing influence of mild continuous currents of Electricity, generated, without any shock or discomfort whatever, by wearing

HARNESS' ELECTROPATHIC BATTERY BELT.

This world-famed guaranteed genuine Electric appliance has cured thousands of sufferers, and should be worn by all in search of HEALTH, STRENGTH, and VITAL ENERGY.
Write for descriptive pamphlet, containing copies of hundreds of unsolicited testimonials, or call, if possible, and personally consult Mr. C. B. HARNESS, Consulting Medical Electrician (President of the British Association of Medical Electricians), 53 Oxford Street, London.
W. (corner of Rathbone Place). Advice free, personally or by letter.

DINNEFORD'S MAGNESIA.

This pure Solution is the best remedy for Acidity of the Stomach, Heartburn, Headache, Gout, and Indigestion.

DINNEFORD'S MAGNESIA.

The safest and most gentle Aperient for delicate constitutions, Ladies, Children, and Infants.

180 Bond Street, London; and all Chemists.

ROYAL ALFRED AGED MERCHANT SEAMEN'S
INSTITUTION. Opened in 1867.

THE HOME, BELVEDERE, KENT.

Pensioners at all Ports of the United Kingdom.
Annual Disbursements, £6,000. Annual Subscriptions, £1,800.

Number of Inmates, 100. Out-Pensioners, 200.

Patron—Rear-Admiral H.R.H. THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH, K.G.

Chairman—Admiral Sir F. LEOPOLD MCCLINTOCK, F.R.S.

Deputy-Chairman—Captain DAVID MAINLAND, F.R.G.S.

The object of this Charity is to give a Home or a Pension to the Merchant Sailor when Old, Destitute, and Friendless.

800 Old Sailors, out of 1,700 Applicants, have enjoyed the benefits of this Charity; but from want of funds the Committee are unable to admit hundreds of necessitous and worthy Candidates, who for Forty years have been at Sea as Seaman, Mate, or Master.

Subscriptions and Donations are urgently needed to reduce this heavy list and to relieve many from destitution.

Bankers—Messrs. WILLIAMS, DEACON, & CO.

Office: 58 Fenchurch Street, London, E.C.

W. E. DENNY, Secretary.

LIFE ASSURANCES, &c.

GUARDIAN FIRE and LIFE OFFICE.

HEAD OFFICE—11 LOMBARD STREET, LONDON, E.C.

LAW COURTS BRANCH—21 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Established 1821. Subscribed Capital, £2,000,000.

Directors.

Chairman—JOHN B. MARTIN, Esq.

Deputy-Chairman—HENRY JOHN NORMAN, Esq.

Henry Bonham-Carter, Esq.
Wm. Hill Dawson, Esq.
Charles F. Devay, Esq.
Granville F. H. Farquhar, Esq.
Alban G. H. Gibbs, Esq.
James Goodson, Esq.
John J. Hamilton, Esq.
Thomson Hankey, Esq.
Richard M. Harvey, Esq.

John Hunter, Esq.
George Lake, Esq.
Rt. Hon. G. J. Shaw Lefevre, M.P.
Beaumont W. Lubbock, Esq.
David Powell, Esq.
Augustus Prevost, Esq.
John G. Talbot, Esq., M.P.
Henry Vigne, Esq.

Actuary and Secretary—T. G. C. BROWNE.

Manager of Fire Department—A. J. RELTON.

Share Capital at present paid up and invested £1,000,000

Total Funds upwards of £4,179,000

Total Annual Income over £850,000

N.B.—Fire Policies which expire at Michaelmas should be renewed at the Head Office, or with the Agents, on or before October 14.

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY,
Established 1836.

LONDON—1 MOORGATE STREET, E.C. ABERDEEN—1 UNION TERRACE.

INCOME and FUNDS (1888).

Fire Premiums £615,000

Life Premiums 203,000

Interest 149,000

Accumulated Funds £3,581,000

ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH LAW
LIFE ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION (Established 1839).

12 Waterloo Place, London. 120 Princes Street, Edinburgh.

Whole Life Bonuses never less than £1 10s. per cent. per annum.

Annuities. Loans. Liberal Conditions.

ARTHUR JACKSON, General Manager } 12 Waterloo Place,
FRANCIS E. COLENSO, F.I.A., Actuary } London.

CITY OFFICE—11 LUDGATE HILL, E.C.

JOHN MUNRO, City Secretary.

PHENIX FIRE OFFICE

LOMBARD STREET and CHARING CROSS, LONDON.—Established 1782.

Moderate Rates. Absolute Security.

Liberal Loss Settlements. Prompt payment of Claims.

W. C. MACDONALD } Joint Secretaries.
F. B. MACDONALD }

Losses paid over £17,000,000.

IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Established 1803.—1 OLD BROAD STREET, E.C.; and 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

Subscribed Capital, £1,200,000. Paid-up, £300,000. Total Invested Funds, over £1,600,000.

E. COZENS SMITH, General Manager.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane.

THREE per CENT. INTEREST on DEPOSITS repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS when not drawn below £100. The Bank undertakes, free of charge, the Custody of Securities and Valuables; the Collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Shares, and Annuities. Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued. THE BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free on application. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK.

ISSUE of £371,320.

(Authorized by the Sheffield Corporation Acts, 1883 and 1889.)

The CORPORATION of SHEFFIELD give NOTICE that they are prepared to receive applications for the above sum of SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK.
Minimum price of Issue £100 per cent.

Interest payable half-yearly, on March 1 and September 1, at the Sheffield and Hallamshire Bank, Sheffield, or by their London Agents, Messrs. Glyn, Mills, Currie, & Co., 67 Lombard Street.

No sum less than £50 of Stock will be allotted, and any amount in excess of that sum must be a multiple of £10.

Under the Trust Investment Act, 1889, recently passed, this Stock is an available investment for every Trustee who is not expressly forbidden by the instrument creating his trust to invest in Corporation Stock.

Forms of Prospectus, &c., and all information required, will be supplied by

Borough Accountant's Office,

Bridge Street, Sheffield,

August 16, 1889.

W. FISHER TASKER, Registrar.

THE GREATEST of all PIANOFORTES.

THE STEINWAY PIANOFORTES, New York & London.

Steinway Hall, LOWER SEYMOUR STREET, Portman Square, London, W.

BOOKS, &c.

H. SOTHERAN & CO.

BOOKSELLERS, BOOKBINDERS, AND PUBLISHERS.

GENERAL AGENTS FOR PRIVATE BOOKBUYERS & PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS
IN AMERICA, INDIA, THE COLONIES, AND FOREIGN PARTS.

A MONTHLY CATALOGUE of SECOND-HAND BOOKS, published over forty years; Specimen No. gratis and post-free.

Telegraphic Address: BOOKMEN, LONDON. Established 1816.

136 STRAND, W.C. AND 36 PICCADILLY, W.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW sent by post at following rates
per annum, paid in advance:

Any part of the United Kingdom £1 8 2
India and China 1 12 6
Other British Colonies, Europe, Egypt, and America 1 10 6

STEEL & JONES, 4 Spring Gardens, London, S.W.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW.—The following NUMBERS
of THE SATURDAY REVIEW are required, for which 1s. each will be given, viz.
1, 2, 15, 25, 50, 59, 73, 75, 99, 112, 130, 132, 138, 174, 452, and 1627 (clean copies)—at the Office
38 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

STAMMERERS and STUTTERERS should read a book by a gentleman who cured himself after suffering nearly forty years.

Post free for 13 stamps, from

Mr. B. BEASLEY, Sherwood, Willesden Lane, Brondesbury, London.

IN ACTIVE PREPARATION.

THE SCHOOLMASTER'S CALENDAR.—Handbook of Examinations and Open Scholarships for 1890.

Advertisers desirous of securing space in the above should communicate at once with the Manager, "Schoolmaster's Calendar," 4 York Street, Covent Garden.

MESSRS. HATCHARD'S LIST.

Just published, crown 8vo. cloth extra, 6s.
NEIGHBOURS.

By Mrs. MOLESWORTH, Author of "Third Miss St. Quentin," "The Palace in the Garden," &c. &c. With Illustrations by M. Ellen Edwards.

Just published, crown 8vo. cloth extra, 3s. 6d.
THE HOUSE of SURPRISES.

By L. T. MEADE, Author of "Daddy's Boy," "Deb and the Duchess," &c. With 6 Full-page Illustrations by Edith Scannell.

NEW NOVEL BY A NEW WRITER.
IN DAYS of ADVERSITY.

By REGINALD LUCAS. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE GIFT BOOK OF THE SEASON.

With nearly 400 Illustrations by the first English and American Authors of the day.

ATALANTA. Volume II.

This Volume consists of nearly 800 pages beautifully printed on highly-finished paper. Imperial 8vo. handsomely bound in extra cloth, price 8s.

Containing amongst others Serials and Stories by the following:—

W. E. NORRIS.
J. T. TROWBRIDGE.
L. B. WALFORD.

JOHN STRANGE WINTER.
Mrs. MOLESWORTH.
S. BARING-GOULD.

&c. &c.

Also papers by the following popular Authors:—

Professor CHURCH.
Professor C. LLOYD MORGAN.
Sir EDWIN ARNOLD.
GEORGE GROSSMITH.
The Author of "The Schönberg-Cotta Family."

JEAN INGELOW.
Miss THACKERAY.
ARABELLA BUCKLEY.
SARAH TYTLER.
Mrs. HAMILTON KING.
&c. &c.

MONTHLY, PRICE SIXPENCE.

ATALANTA.

Edited by L. T. MEADE and JOHN C. STAPLES.

Contents of the OCTOBER Number:

FRONTISPIECE. THE GLEANERS. From the Picture by RUDOLPH BLIND—TO A CHILD WHO ASKED ME FOR A POEM. Hon. RODEN NOEL—A ROUGH SHAKING. Serial Story. Chaps. I., II. GEORGE MACDONALD—MORE ABOUT MISS EDGEWORTH. Miss THACKERAY. Illustrated—THE CHOICE OF THE CASKETS. From a Photograph by the Berlin Photographic Company—VERY YOUNG. A Serial Story. JEAN INGELOW. Chap. I.—THE LUCK OF EDENHALL. AMANDA B. HARRIS. Illustrated—WEDNESDAY, THE TENTH. A Tale of the South Pacific. Serial Story. Chaps. I., II. GRANT ALLEN—OLD-FASHIONED GIRLS. Stories from the Old Tales and Novels. Cecilia. Edited by L. T. MEADE. Illustrated—THE BROWN OWL. By L. B. WALFORD and L. T. MEADE—ATALANTA SCHOLARSHIP AND READING UNION. I. "Speucer." RICHARD GARNETT.

LONDON: HATCHARDS, 187 PICCADILLY, W.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LIMITED,

30 to 34 NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.;
241 BROMPTON ROAD, SOUTH KENSINGTON, S.W.;
AND 2 KING STREET, CHEAPSIDE, E.C.

FOR THE CIRCULATION OF BOOKS.

SUBSCRIPTION from £1 1s. per annum.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists Gratis.

FOR THE SALE OF BOOKS.

Second-hand Copies of all the best Books of past Seasons,
at greatly Reduced Prices.

Lists with Prices Gratis.

FOR THE BINDING OF BOOKS.

On the Premises by the best Workmen.

List of Bound Books Gratis.

N.B.—All Lists and Prospectuses Gratis and
Postage Free to any Address.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY,

30 to 34 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

THE BUILDER of September 28 contains Illustrations of Restored Chancel, St. Paul's, Bedford; Flixton Hall, Suffolk; Houses in Cadogan Gardens, &c. &c. Also article on Excavations at Naukratis; Report of Worcester Sanitary Congress, &c. 4d.; by post, 4jd. Annual subscription, 19s.
Office, 46 Catherine Street, London, W.C.

HURST & BLACKETT'S NEW NOVELS.

MY LORD OTHELLO. By HENRY CRESSWELL,
Author of "A Modern Greek Heroine," "A Wily Widow," &c. 3 vols.

GEOFF. By GERTRUDE FORDE, Author of "In the Old Palazzo," "Driven before the Storm," &c. 3 vols.

THE FREAKS of LADY FORTUNE. By
MAY CROMMELIN, Author of "Queenie," "Orange Lily," &c. 2 vols.

THE TREE of KNOWLEDGE. By G. M.
ROBINS, Author of "Keep my Secret," "A False Position," &c. 3 vols.

BOTH OF THIS PARISH. By ALGERNON
GISSING, Author of "Joy Cometh in the Morning," 2 vols.

A CROOKED PATH. By Mrs. ALEXANDER,
Author of "The Wooing o't," "The Freres," &c. Second Edition. 3 vols.

LONDON: HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED,
13 GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET.

Pp. 128, ILLUSTRATED, PRICE ONE SHILLING.

THE NEWBERRY HOUSE MAGAZINE.

A Monthly Review and Family Magazine for Churchmen and Churchwomen.

CONTENTS OF No. 4 FOR OCTOBER.

CHURCHMEN AND THE MAKING OF THE NEXT PARLIAMENT.
By the Rev. T. MOORE, M.A.
THE SIGN OF THE CROSS REGARDED AS A PROFESSION OF CHRISTIAN FAITH. By PÈRE HYACINTHE LOYSON.
WINCHESTER COLLEGE. (Illustrated.) By H. J. HARDY, M.A.
THE RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF AN ANGLICAN RELIGIOUS ORDER.
By the Rev. C. H. SHARPE.
THE DEMOCRATIC METHOD IN MODERN FRENCH ART.
By ROSE KINGSLEY.
THE INHABITANTS OF EAST LONDON. By Canon GREGORY.
THE PUBLIC WORSHIP ACT OF 1874 AND ITS RESULTS. Part II.
By Judge HOMERSHAM COX.
FATHER DAMIEN AND THE "MEMORIAL" FUND.
By the Rev. M. M. BEN-OLIEL.
ST. AUGUSTINE'S VISIT TO A MODERN CHURCH. (A Short Story.)
By the Rev. W. S. LACH SZYRMA, M.A.
THE BISHOP'S BIBLE. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY and H. HERMAN.
BOY. (Illustrated.) Concluded. By HELEN MILMAN.
LAY AND CLERICAL CONFERENCES—SERMON OUTLINES FOR OCTOBER—
INSTRUCTIONS ON THE CREED—BIBLICAL QUESTIONS FOR COMPETI-TION—NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS—REVIEWS AND CORRESPONDENCE
&c. &c.

GRIFFITH, FARRAN, OKEDEN, & WELSH, NEWBERRY HOUSE,
LONDON, AND SYDNEY.

THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY for OCTOBER.

Now ready, price 1s.

CONTENTS:

The Begum's Daughter. XIX. - XXI. Ladies and Learning. L. D. Morgan.
Edwin Lascelles Bynner. Fiction in the Pulpit. Agnes Repplier.
A Non-Combatant's War Reminiscences. The Plait of the Rose. John B. Tabb.
J. R. Kendrick. The Tragic Muse. XXVIII. - XXX. Henry
The Monmouth and Newport Campaigns. James.
John Fiske. Theodore Dwight Woolsey. Joseph Henry Prismatics. Sophia Kirk. Thayer.
The Closing Scenes of the Iliad. William The Butterflies of the Eastern United States.
Cranston Lawton. The Beginnings of New England.
In the Harara. Clinton Scollard. The Contributors' Club.
Dave's Neckliss. Charles W. Chesnut. By the Sea—Roman Pin Money—The
The Government and its Creditors. Henry Lark and the Gamut.
Loomis Nelson. Books of the Month.
Sunset. Mary Colborne-Veel.

London: WARD, LOCK & Co., Salisbury Square, E.C.

Now ready, Sixth Edition, cloth, 6s.
(To Fellows, 4s.)

HINTS to TRAVELLERS. Edited for the Council of the Royal Geographical Society, by Captain W. J. L. WHARTON, R.N., F.R.S., and DOUGLAS W. FRESHFIELD, M.A.

CONTENTS.

PRELIMINARY HINTS. DOUGLAS W. FRESHFIELD, M.A.
HINTS ON OUTFIT. DOUGLAS W. FRESHFIELD, M.A., E. WHYMPER, J. THOMSON,
H. H. JOHNSTON, J. COLES, and others.
MEDICAL HINTS. G. E. DOBSON, M.A., M.B., F.R.S.
SURVEYING AND ASTRONOMICAL OBSERVATIONS. JOHN COLES, F.R.A.S.
PHOTOGRAPHY. W. F. DONKIN, M.A., F.C.S., A.C.
METEOROLOGY AND CLIMATE. H. F. BLANFORD, F.R.S.
GEOLOGY. W. T. BLANFORD, F.R.S.
NATURAL HISTORY. H. W. BATES, F.R.S.
ANTHROPOLOGY. E. B. TYLOR, D.C.L., F.R.S.
INDUSTRY AND COMMERCE. J. S. KELLIE.

London: THE ROYAL GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY, 1 Savile Row, W.
And at all Booksellers'.

Now ready at all Libraries, 1 vol. 7s. 6d.

ROYAL WINCHESTER: Wanderings in and about the Ancient Capital of England. By Rev. A. G. L'ESTRANGE, M.A., Author of "The Village of Palaces" &c. With numerous Illustrations drawn on the spot by C. G. Harper.
London: SPENCER BLACKETT & HALLAM, 35 St. Bride Street.

MISS BRADDON'S NEW NOVEL.

In 3 vols. At all Libraries.

THE DAY WILL COME. A Novel. By the Author of "Lady Audley's Secret" &c.
London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co.

A NOVEL COMMENDED by Mr. GLADSTONE and by Dr. GEORGE MACDONALD.
FOR the RIGHT. Now ready, New Cheap Edition. 3s. 6d.
GEORGE MACDONALD:—"I have seldom, if ever, read a work of fiction which moved me with so much admiration."
London: JAMES CLARKE & Co., 13 and 14 Fleet Street, E.C.

Now ready, Fifty-seventh Edition, 2s.

THE CHILD'S GUIDE to KNOWLEDGE. By A LADY.
The Original Authorized Edition, brought down to the Present Time.
London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, & Co.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 888. OCTOBER 1889. 2s. 6d.

CONTENTS:

MASTER OF HIS FATE. By J. MACLAREN COBBAN.
THE ART OF SHOOTING. By T. E. KEBBEL.
ST. DYFRIG'S CITY.
LADY BABY. Chaps. XXXIII.-XXXVI.
THE CROFTERS—
I. THE CROFTER COMMISSION.
By REGINALD MACLEOD.
II. THEIR CONDITION AND PROSPECTS.
By AN ISLESMAN.
THE LIBERAL PARTY. By Lord BRABOURNE.
LOOKING BACK IN YARROW. By J. B. SELKIRK.
THE NAVAL MANŒUVRES OF 1889.
MURDER IN A DREAM. NOTE TO "SCENES FROM A SILENT WORLD," No. V.
LEPERS AT THE CAPE: CORRESPONDENCE AND EDITORIAL COMMENTS.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

BLACKWOOD'S NEW SERIAL.

Part IV. this day, price 1s.

TRAVEL, ADVENTURE, & SPORT.

From "BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE."

No. IV. CONTAINS:—A PERSONAL NARRATIVE OF A JOURNEY FROM HERAT TO ORENBURG, ON THE CASPIAN, IN 1840. By Captain Sir
RICHMOND SHAKESPEAR—THE INLAND SEA OF JAPAN. By ANDREW WILSON
—A RUN TO NICARAGUA. By LAURENCE OLIPHANT—UP STREAM: ON THE RED RIVER.

* * Each Part, containing several Sketches, will be uniform in size and type and will be issued on Alternate Months with the "TALES FROM BLACKWOOD."

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW

For OCTOBER.

Edited by FRANK HARRIS.

THE LABOUR PROBLEM. By D. F. SCHLOSS.
PLAIN WORDS ON THE WOMAN QUESTION. By GRANT ALLEN.
THE ARMED STRENGTH OF FRANCE IN 1889. With Map.
PROGRESS IN CHINA. By R. S. GUNDRY.
SOME OF BALZAC'S MINOR PIECES. By GEORGE MOORE.
EASTERN WOMEN. By HORACE VICTOR.
IN THE FORESTS OF NAVARRE AND ARAGON. By the Rev. JOHN VERSCHOYLE.
LAST DAYS OF THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE. By JOHN WELSH.
AFRICAN DEVELOPMENT: THE SOUDAN. By Sir SAMUEL BAKER.
RUSSIAN CHARACTERISTICS. Part II. By E. B. LANIN.

CHAPMAN & HALL, LIMITED.

THE NATIONAL REVIEW.

OCTOBER. 2s. 6d.

CONTENTS:

THE ENDOWMENT OF A ROMAN CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY IN IRELAND.
By F. C. CONYBEARE, M.A.
FICTION—PLETHORIC AND ANÆMIC. By WILLIAM WATSON.
THE EMPIRE:—
1. THE IMPERIAL FEDERATION LEAGUE. By WILLIAM GRESWELL.
2. THE CROWN AND THE COLONIES. By EDWARD SALMON.
THE GENESIS OF THEOSOPHY. By Colonel OLCOTT.
WOMEN AND TOBACCO. By J. D. HUNTING.
THE BRITISH WORKMAN. By G. ROME HALL.
WILD DUCKS AND DUCK-DECOYING. By J. WATSON.
THE EDUCATION OF THE BLIND AND DEAF. By C. E. D. BLACK, Secretary to the late Royal Commission.
POLITICS AT HOME AND ABROAD.
CORRESPONDENCE.

LONDON: W. H. ALLEN & CO., 13 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

Now ready, No. XX. (OCTOBER), price 2s. 6d.; post free, 2s. 9d.

THE LAW QUARTERLY REVIEW.

Edited by Sir FREDERICK POLLOCK, Bart., M.A., LL.D.,

Corpus Professor of Jurisprudence in the University of Oxford,
Professor of Common Law in the Inns of Court.

CONTENTS:

INDIAN CODIFICATION. By C. P. ILBERT.
CHANCERY IN MASSACHUSETTS. By EDWIN H. WOODRUFF.
CODIFICATION OF THE LAW OF MORTMAIN. By R. E. MITCHESON.
ADMINISTRATION OF TRUSTS BY JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES. By T. CRISP
POOLE.
DERRY V. PEEK IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS. By the EDITOR.
THROUGH BILLS OF LADING. By H. D. BATESON.
NOTES: Is the Child of a Naturalised British Subject himself a British Subject? By A. V. DICEY.
REVIEWS: CONTENTS OF EXCHANGES.

* * Vols. I., II., III., IV., and V., cloth lettered, each 12s.

STEVENS & SONS, LIMITED, 119 & 120 CHANCERY LANE, LONDON.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the 1s.—HATCHARDS, 187 Piccadilly,
London. All the New and Standard Books. Bibles, Prayers, Church Services, &c.
Post Orders promptly executed. Libraries arranged and catalogued.

NOW READY, PRICE ONE SHILLING.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

OCTOBER NUMBER.

CONTENTS:

A CORNER OF SCOTLAND WORTH KNOWING. Professor W. G. BLAIKIE, D.D.
Ten Illustrations. Drawn by Joseph Pennell and W. Small.
FORESTS OF THE CALIFORNIA COAST RANGE. FRED M. SOMERS. Seven Illustrations. Drawn by Julian Rix.
ALL'S WELL AT THE EARTH. A Poem. HOWARD HALL.
THE NOBLE PATRON. A Poem. AUSTIN DOBSON. With 8 Illustrations, including Frontispiece. Drawn by Edwin A. Abbey.
THE FAIR OF NIJNI-NOVGOROD. THEODORE CHILD. Fourteen Illustrations.
Drawn by T. de Thulstrup.
HAIL, TWILIGHT. A Sonnet. WILLIAM WORDSWORTH. With 2 Illustrations. Drawn by Alfred Parsons.
HIERAPOLIS AND ITS WHITE TERRACE. TRISTRAM ELLIS. Six Illustrations.
Drawn by Tristram Ellis.
BUTTERNEGGS. A Story of Heredity. ANNIE TRUMBULL SLOSSON. With Illustration Drawn by A. B. FROST.
RECENT PROGRESS IN SURGERY. W. W. KEEN, M.D.
A LITTLE JOURNEY IN THE WORLD. A Novel. Part VII. CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER.
WITH THE EYES SHUT. A Sketch. EDWARD BELLAMY.
AUNT DOROTHY'S FUNERAL. A Story. MARGARET J. PRESTON.
CAPTAIN BROOKE'S PREJUDICE. A Story. Mrs. LUCY C. LILLIE. With 2 Illustrations. Drawn by W. H. Hyde.
THE BUILDING OF THE CHURCH OF ST.-DENIS. CHARLES ELIOT NORTON.
Seven Illustrations. Drawn by Hughson Hawley and F. V. Du Mond.
A PECULIAR PEOPLE. HOWARD PYLE. Nine Illustrations. Drawn by Howard Pyle.
&c. &c.

Over Seventy Illustrations.

Now ready, bound in coloured silk, 15s.

ARTISTIC JAPAN. Vol. II.

An Illustrated Journal of Arts and Industries.

Conducted by S. BING.

Published also in Fifteen Parts, each containing Ten Royal 4to. Coloured Plates, being Reproductions of Work by the best Japanese Artists. Price 2s. each.

"A capital publication."—Saturday Review.

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON, SEARLE, & RIVINGTON, LIMITED,
ST. DUNSTON'S HOUSE, FETTER LANE, FLEET STREET, E.C.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

OCTOBER. 2s. 6d.

THE ATTACK ON THE NATIVE STATES OF INDIA. By MOHSIN-UL-MULK (Mehdi Ali).
THE UNIVERSITIES IN CONTACT WITH THE PEOPLE. By J. CHURTON
COLLINS.
ROME IN 1889. By Mrs. HENRY ADY.
JOURNAL DE MARIE BASHKIRTSEFF. By the Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE, M.P.
A RÉSUMÉ OF THE IRISH LAND PROBLEM. By T. W. RUSSELL, M.P.
THE COMPARATIVE INSENSIBILITY OF ANIMALS TO PAIN. By Dr. W.
COLLIER.
ON SOME WAR-SONGS OF EUROPE. By Miss LAURA A. SMITH.
OLD COUNTRY HOUSES. By Sir EDWARD STRACHEY, Bart.
MENTAL AND PHYSICAL TRAINING OF CHILDREN. By Mrs. JESSIE WALLER (née HUNLEY).
LADY TOAD. By Professor MAX MÜLLER.
THE CITY OF LHÁSA. By GRAHAM SANDBERG.
WATER POACHERS. By JOHN WATSON.
THE MIDDLE CLASS AND THE NEW LIBERALISM. By the Rev. J. GUINNESS ROGERS.

LONDON: KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.

CONTENTS of No. LVII. OCTOBER 1889. Price 6s.

THE

CHURCH QUARTERLY REVIEW.

1. ROMAN INFALLIBILITY.
2. CLARENDON'S HISTORY OF THE REBELLION.
3. PROPOSED CHANGES IN THE SCOTTISH LITURGY.
4. W. G. WARD AND THE OXFORD MOVEMENT.
5. THE AMERICAN COMMONWEALTH.
6. A ROMAN PROSELYTE ON ANCIENT CHURCH HISTORY.
7. METROPOLITANS AND THEIR JURISDICTION.
8. THE NEW EDUCATION CODE.
9. CHRISTIAN SYMBOLISM.
10. CONDITION OF THE POOR AT THE EAST END OF LONDON.
IN MEMORIAM—LORD ADDINGTON.

SHORT NOTICES.
SPOTTISWOODE & CO., NEW-STREET SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

Monthly, 2s. 6d.

THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.

CONTENTS FOR OCTOBER.

THE TRIPLE ALLIANCE, AND ITALY'S PLACE IN IT. By OUTIDANOS.
CHEAP MISSIONARIES AND MISSION EDUCATION. By Principal MILLAR (Madras).
THE LATEST LIFE OF STEELE. By AUSTIN DOBSON.
TWO YEARS OF NAVAL MANŒUVRES. By Colonel F. MAURICE.
THE ETHICS OF THE DRINK QUESTION. By JAMES RUNCIMAN.
AMERICAN STATE LEGISLATURES. By ALBERT SHAW, LL.D.
SMALL LATIN AND LESS GREEK. By H. ARTHUR KENNEDY.
"OUR GREAT PHILOSOPHER." II. By W. S. LILLY.
IS A SOLDIER'S LIFE WORTH SAVING? By Captain SINCLAIR.
THE IRISH UNIVERSITY QUESTION. By JUSTIN M'CARTHY, M.P.

ISBISTER & CO., LIMITED, 15 & 16 TAVISTOCK STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON'S LIST.

Now ready, price 1s.

THE TEMPLE BAR MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS FOR OCTOBER, 1889 :

1. SIR CHARLES DANVERS. By the Author of "The Danvers Jewels." Chaps. 21-24.
2. THE AGE OF GOLD.
3. SIR PHILIP FRANCIS. By W. FRASER RAE, Author of "Miss Bayle's Romance" &c.
4. DR. GABRIEL'S EXPERIMENT.
5. GEORGE CRUIKSHANK AS VIRTUOSO. By GEORGE SOMES LAYARD.
6. A LITTLE VILLAGE. By the Author of "Octavia's Lovers" &c.
7. SHAKESPEAR'S BEAR-GARDEN AS IT IS. By LIZZIE ALDRIDGE, Author of "The Queen's House" &c.
8. ARMINELL. By the Author of "John Herring" &c. Chaps. 41-45.
9. MADAME RECAMIER.
10. EPICURUS AND THE SPHINX.
11. PAUL'S SISTER. By the Author of "His Cousin Betty" &c. Chaps. 25-27.

NEW WORKS OF FICTION.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "DR. EDITH ROMNEY."

HER OWN COUNSEL. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "A DAUGHTER OF THE PEOPLE."

DIANA. By GEORGIANA M. CRAIK (Mrs. MAY). 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"One of the best Irish novels of the generation."—Observer.

AN IRISH COUSIN. By GEILLES HERRING and MARTIN ROSS. 2 vols. crown 8vo.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "WORTH WAITING FOR."

THE SCOTTS of BESTMINSTER. By J. MASTERMAN. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.

SMITH, ELDER, & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW NOVEL.—At all the Libraries, in 2 vols. post 8vo.

THE COUNTY:

A Story of Social Life.

POCKET EDITION OF MRS. GASKELL'S WORKS.

To be completed in Eight Monthly Volumes, bound in cloth, with cut or uncut edges, price 1s. 6d. per vol.

Vol. I., WIVES and DAUGHTERS, is ready this day.

NEW VOLUME OF "THE DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY."

Ready this day, royal 8vo. 15s. in cloth; or in half-morocco, marbled edges, 20s. VOL. XX. (FORREST—GARNER) of the

DICTIONARY of NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY

Edited by LESLIE STEPHEN.

. Vol. XXI. will be published on December 23, and the subsequent Volumes at intervals of three months.

Now ready (Sixpence), New Series, No. 76.

THE CORNHILL MAGAZINE

For OCTOBER.

Containing "THE BURNT MILLION," by JAMES PAYN, Author of "By Proxy" &c. &c. Chaps. 14-17—"MOSTLY FOOLS"—"A COURT DAY IN FIJI"—"LADY BETTY'S INDISCRETION"—"THE HUNDRED GATES: a Dream of Bad Books"—"WEEDS"—"ON HAMPSTEAD HILL," and "THE COUNTY" (concluded), Chaps. 37-40.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

PARIS EXHIBITION.—The FRENCH DICTIONARY for TOURISTS—BELLOWS' POCKET FRENCH DICTIONARY. 32mo. with 4 Maps, roan tuck, 10s. 6d.; morocco, 12s. 6d.

"Complete."—Times. "Without a rival."—Spectator. "The most portable."—Scotsman.

TOUS les VERBES.—CONJUGATIONS of all the VERBS, French and English, with Tables of Weights, Measures, and Equivalent Values, from Bellows' Dictionary. Second Edition. 32mo. 6d.

LONDON: TRÜBNER & CO., LUDGATE HILL.

PARIS: ERNEST LEROUX, 28 RUE BONAPARTE.
AND ALL BOOKSELLERS.

Now ready, PART I., price 1s.

THE

CABINET PORTRAIT GALLERY.

Containing a Series of CABINET PHOTOGRAPHS of EMINENT MEN and WOMEN of the day,

From Photographs by Messrs. W. & D. DOWNEY,

With Biographical Sketches.

PART I. contains PORTRAITS of

THE DUKE AND DUCHESS OF FIFE;

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY;

AND

SARAH BERNHARDT.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED, LUDGATE HILL, LONDON.

Just published, price 5s.

MR. ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON'S NEW WORK,

THE

MASTER OF BALLANTRAE.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED, LUDGATE HILL, LONDON.

Now ready, price 9s.

THE WORLD of ADVENTURE. (YEARLY

VOLUME.) An entirely New and Original Work, containing 768 pages, extra crown 4to. fully illustrated throughout in the text, and containing 12 Full-page Plates.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED, LUDGATE HILL, LONDON.

CLARENDON PRESS NEW BOOKS.

Just published, 8vo. cloth, 12s. 6d.

THE ATTIC THEATRE: a Description of the Stage and Theatre of the Athenians and of the Dramatic Performances at Athens. By A. E. HOUGH, M.A., late Fellow of Hertford College, Oxford. With Facsimiles and Illustrations.

. My purpose in this book has been to collect and piece together all the available information concerning the outward features and surroundings of the old Athenian dramatic performances; in other words, to write a history of the Attic drama from the theatrical as opposed to the literary point of view.—From the PREFACE.

FOR MATRICULATION EXAMINATION, ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND, 1890. Just published, extra fcp. 8vo. stiff covers, 2s.

CAMPBELL'S GERTRUDE of WYOMING: a Pennsylvanian Tale. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by H. M. FITZGIBBON, M.A.

Just published, 8vo. stiff covers, 2s. 6d.

A SUPPLEMENT to the ANGLO-INDIAN CODES, 1887, 1888. By WHITLEY STOKES, D.C.L., late Law Member of the Council of the Governor-General of India.

. Supplementary to Vols. I. and II. of the ANGLO-INDIAN CODES by the same Author.

Just published, 8vo. cloth, 16s.

P. OVIDI NASONIS TRISTIUM LIBRI V. Recensuit S. G. OWEN, A.M. Accedunt Libri Marciani et Libri Turonensis Simulacra.

"It is not easy to speak too highly of Mr. Owen's acute and laborious work."—Saturday Review.

BY THE SAME EDITOR.

Just published, extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 2s.

OVID.—TRISTIA. BOOK III. The Text Revised, with an Introduction and Notes, by S. G. OWEN, M.A., Classical Lecturer at Owens College, Manchester.

NEW EDITION OF CHAMBERS'S "HANDBOOK OF ASTRONOMY."

Just published, 8vo. cloth, 21s.

A HANDBOOK of DESCRIPTIVE and PRACTICAL ASTRONOMY. By G. F. CHAMBERS, F.R.A.S. Vol. I. The Sun, Planets, and Comets.

The remaining Volumes, II. Instruments and Practical Astronomy; III. The Starry Heavens, will be published in due course.

Just published, extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.

LIVY.—BOOK V. With Introduction and Notes, by A. R. CLUER, B.A., Balliol College, Oxford. Revised and enlarged by P. E. MATHESON, M.A., Fellow of New College, Oxford.

"The Notes are very good. The translations when given are terse and to the point. True scholarship and a sympathetic care for the wants of the student pervade the work."—Schoolmaster.

"A sound and very useful school and college edition."—Classical Review.

THIRD EDITION REVISED.

Just published, crown 8vo. cloth, 10s. 6d.

A SHORT HISTORY of FRENCH LITERATURE. By G. SAINTSBURY, M.A. Third Edition.

"Mr. Saintsbury is thoroughly master of his subject."—Scottish Review.

"It is in many ways a masterpiece."—Athenaeum.

FULL CLARENDON PRESS CATALOGUES SENT FREE ON APPLICATION.

LONDON: HENRY FROWDE, CLARENDON PRESS
WAREHOUSE, AMEN CORNER, E.C.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & CO.'S LIST.

New Novels.

BY W. CLARK RUSSELL.

MAROONED. By W. CLARK RUSSELL, Author of "The Wreck of the Grosvenor" &c. 3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d. The Scotsman says:—"Mr. Clark Russell tells his story with vigour and freshness.....It is fine spirited reading, and heartily enjoyable."

BY F. MARION CRAWFORD.

SANT' ILARIO. By F. MARION CRAWFORD, Author of "With the Immortals," "Greifenstein," "Paul Patoff," "Mr. Isaacs," "Dr. Claudius," "Marzio's Crucifix," &c. 3 vols. Crown 8vo. price 31s. 6d.

The Academy says:—"Sant' Ilario" is a continuation of "Saracinesca," and, like that story, is a picture of the ways of the old Roman nobility under the last days of the Temporal Power, drawn with force and fidelity, which we have learned to expect from the author."

The St. James's Gazette says:—"As a picture of modern life in Italy 'Sant' Ilario' cannot fail to make its mark and add to the author's reputation."

BY CHARLOTTE M. YONGE.

A REPUTED CHANGELING; or, Three Seventh Years Two Centuries Ago. By CHARLOTTE M. YONGE. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 12s.

Now ready, SECOND EDITION, Crown 8vo. 9s.

DARWINISM. An Exposition of the Theory of Natural Selection, with some of its applications. By ALFRED RUSSELL WALLACE, LL.D., F.R.S., &c., Author of "The Malay Archipelago," "The Geographical Distribution of Animals," "Island Life," &c.

The Times says:—"Mr. Wallace has written what may be accepted as a Text-book of Darwinism..... No more perfect or more readable exposition of the doctrine as Darwin left it exists than is contained in this volume by one who, more than any one else, is in a position to place himself inside of the whole subject."

THE CRADLE of the ARYANS. By GERALD H. RENDALL, M.A., late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, Principal and Professor of Greek, University College, Liverpool. 8vo. 3s.

THE GIFT-BOOK OF THE YEAR, with 500 Pictures.

THE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE, 1889.

The Volume consists of 900 closely printed pages, and contains nearly 500 Illustrations, of various sizes, bound in extra cloth, coloured edges, 8s.

Among the chief Contents of the Volume is a Complete Story, Sant' Ilario, by F. MARION CRAWFORD; and Contributions by STANLEY J. WEYMAN, W. E. NORRIS, ARCHIBALD FORBES, ELIZABETH BALCH, KATHARINE S. MACQUOID, ARTHUR PATERSON, W. CLARK RUSSELL, A. C. SWINBURNE, GRANT ALLEN, OSCAR WILDE, J. E. HODGSON, R.A., R. T. BLOMFIELD, M.A., CHARLES DICKENS, Jun., Hon. L. WINGFIELD, THEODORE CHILD, Lady LINDSAY, H. S. CLARK, W. TRUSCOTT, E. E. PRINCE, BARBARA C. FINCH, KATE CARTER, DEWEY BATES, W. WALLIS, F.S.A., and other Writers, with Illustrations by leading Artists.

The Spectator says:—"The volume shows no falling off either in the literary matter or the illustrations, which are the specialty of the periodical."

The Athenæum says:—"The volume is an excellent bargain....The letterpress is all that can be desired."

The Record says:—"The volume, whether for its letterpress or its illustrations, is of the highest and most interesting order."

The Scotsman says:—"As for the illustrations, they are countless in number and wonderfully good in execution. A jaded reader may turn the pages over idly and not be bored, while a reader who 'means business' will find it under his hand. No better book could be suggested for a summer holiday or winter retreat."

The Manchester Guardian says:—"The volume may be confidently recommended as a suitable gift book."

The Aberdeen Daily Free Press says:—"We know of no periodical of its kind equal to it as regards both its literary and artistic contents."

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE,

No. 330, for OCTOBER, price 1s., contains:—

1. MAROONED. By W. CLARK RUSSELL. Chapters 34-37 (concluded).
2. VERDI'S "OTELLO."
3. ARCHIBALD PRENTICE. By R. DUNLOP.
4. A SCHOLASTIC ISLAND. By J. THEODORE BENT.
5. ENGLISH BIRDS OF PREY.
6. KIRSTEEN. By Mrs. OLIPHANT. Chapters 7-9.
7. CANADA AND THE JESUITS. By GOLDWIN SMITH.

A New Volume of

THE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE

Begins with the OCTOBER Number. Several new changes have been introduced, a Prospectus giving full details may be obtained from any Bookseller. The Magazine is now printed on thicker paper, a new and bolder type being used, and the letterpress is printed across the page.

THE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE

For OCTOBER, Profusely Illustrated, price 6d.; by post, 8d., contains:—

1. PORTRAIT OF A MAN. After FRANS HALS. Frontispiece.
2. ON THE SOUTH COAST. (To THEODORE WATTS.) By ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE.
3. CHILDREN IN THEATRES. By Mrs. JEUNE.
4. CEYLON. By Sir FREDERICK DICKSON, K.C.M.G. With Illustrations.
5. ENGLISH GIRLHOOD. By Mrs. MOLESWORTH.
6. THE WHITE AND SILENT NUNS. By HENRY W. LUCY. Illustrated.
7. PAMELA. By the Hon. Mrs. ANSTRUTHER.
8. FALLEN MAN. By B. MIDDLETON BATCHELOR.
9. THE EMBOSSED OF METALS. By W. A. S. BENSON. Illustrated.
10. RONDEAU. By WALTER CRANE. Illustrated.
11. A HOMELESS LOVE. By VIOLET FANE.
12. WAGNER IN BAYREUTH. By GEORGE BERNARD SHAW. With Illustrations.
13. THE RING OF AMASIS. A Romance. (To be continued.) Chaps. I. and II. By the Right Hon. the EARL OF LYTON.
14. THE LABOURS OF THE XII. MONTHS: OCTOBER. A Design. By HEYWOOD SUMNER.

* Single Numbers, 6d.; by post, 8d. Yearly Subscription, including Double Number, 6s. 6d.; or if by post, 8s. 6d.

MACMILLAN & CO., BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

NEW BOOK BY THE AUTHOR OF "SUPERNATURAL RELIGION."

A REPLY to DR. LIGHTFOOT'S ESSAYS.

By the Author of "Supernatural Religion." 1 vol. 8vo. 6s.

SUPERNATURAL RELIGION: an Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. 3 vols. 8vo. 36s.

NEW BOOK ON GRAHAM OF CLAVERHOUSE.

CLAVERS, the DESPOT'S CHAMPION:

a Scots Biography. By A. SOUTHERN. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

"This is the most judicial, the most careful, the most impartial and satisfying Life of Claverhouse that has yet appeared.....If impartiality and lucidity can do so, this work should make an end of the Claverhouse controversy."

Scottish Leader.

CRICKETING SAWS and STORIES. By

HORACE G. HUTCHINSON. Consisting of scraps of advice to duffers (chiefly on points of cricketing culture) by one of them—of saws not sharp enough to hurt anybody, and of stories picked up between the innings. With rectilinear Illustrations by the Author. Price 1s.

"Ought to be in the hands of everybody who can or could, or believes that he can or could, play cricket."—St. James's Gazette.

A PRACTICAL PLAN for ASSIMILATING

the ENGLISH and AMERICAN MONEY as a STEP towards a UNIVERSAL MONEY. By the late WALTER BAGEHOT. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

"This little book has been long out of print, and is republished in view of the Monetary Congress which has been held in Paris during the present month."

TACITUS.—The ANNALS. Book XIV.

Edited by JOHN R. WORTHINGTON, B.A. With Notes and Index. Fcp. 8vo. 2s.

NATURAL RELIGION. The Gifford Lectures

delivered before the University of Glasgow in 1888. By F. MAX MÜLLER, K.M., Foreign Member of the French Institute. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

THREE LECTURES on the SCIENCE of

LANGUAGE and its PLACE in GENERAL EDUCATION. Delivered at the Oxford University Extension Meeting 1889. By F. MAX MÜLLER. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 2s.

THÉÂTRE de la JEUNESSE. Twelve Little

French Plays for Schoolroom and Drawing Room. By Mrs. HUGH BELL, Author of "Petit Théâtre des Enfants." Fcp. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

"The idea of teaching French in this way is decidedly good. The language is that of every-day life, and the structure is necessarily correct and idiomatic. To commit even a single play, thoroughly understood, to memory is a great gain; and to master the twelve is to go far towards mastering French."—Educational News.

NEW NOVELS.

WILD DARRIE: a Story. By CHRISTIE MURRAY

and HENRY HERMAN. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

"A moving story, with carefully drawn characters, well balanced between the strong effects of its human sentiment and the sustained interest of its adventurous action."—Athenæum.

SUCH IS LIFE: a Novel. By MAY KENDALL,

Author of "From a Garret" and "Dreams to Sell"; Joint Author of "That Very Mab." 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

"The cleverness of this story is manifest on every page."—Athenæum.

"A book that may be read with genuine pleasure."—Scotsman.

BY the WESTERN SEA: a Summer Idyl.

By JAMES BAKER, Author of "John Westacott" &c. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

"A graceful little romance, which will be especially attractive to all who know Lynmouth and its neighbourhood."—Graphic.

The TANGENA TREE: a True Story from

Madagascar. By AGNES MARION. Fcp. 8vo. sewed, 1s.

Now ready, price Sixpence.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE.—OCTOBER.

CONTENTS:

- THE BELL OF ST. PAUL'S. Part II. Chaps. 23-26. By WALTER BESANT.
THE DRAMATISATION OF NOVELS..... By BRANDER MATTHEWS.
THE DEVIL'S DUE..... By E. NESBIT.
WAITING FOR THE "KHIVA"..... By M. ROWAN.
THE FÖHN..... By HENRY HARRIES.
MRS. FENTON: a Sketch. Chaps. 7-9..... By W. E. NORRIS.
AT THE SIGN OF THE SHIP..... By ANDREW LANG.
THE "DONNA" AND THE STRIKE..... By THE EDITOR.

Now ready, price Sixpence.

THE NEW REVIEW.—OCTOBER.

Edited by ARCHIBALD GROVE.

CONTENTS:

- A NEW POEM:—"THE THROSTLE."..... By LORD TENNYSON, Poet Laureate.
THE GREAT STRIKE..... By CARDINAL MANNING and JOHN BURNS.
THE NEW JOURNALISM..... By T. P. O'CONNOR, M.P.
WEAK POINTS IN OUR INDIAN EMPIRE. By Sir RICHARD TEMPLE, Bart., M.P.
A BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF OPORTO..... By OSWALD CRAWFORD.
WHITECHAPEL..... By the Rev. SAMUEL A. BARNETT.
THE SHAH'S IMPRESSIONS OF EUROPE.. By Professor VAMBERY.
COMMERCE AND WAR..... By FREDERICK GREENWOOD.
IN THE OLD MUNIMENT ROOM OF WOL-
LATON HALL..... By the LADY MIDDLETON and CONSTANCE F. GORDON-CUMMING.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO.

PUBLISHED BY BLACKIE & SON.

NOW READY, VOLS. I., II., and III.

To be completed in Eight Vols., published quarterly, square 8vo. cloth, 6s. each; or half-morocco, 8s. 6d. each.BLACKIE'S MODERN CYCLOPEDIA.A Handy Book of Reference on all Subjects and for all Readers.

WITH NUMEROUS ENGRAVINGS AND MAPS.

Edited by CHARLES ANNANDALE, M.A., LL.D.

From the ATHENÆUM.

Promises to suit the wants of a large and increasing section of the public. On the whole, the editor may be congratulated on having performed an exceedingly difficult task so far satisfactorily.

From the SPECTATOR.

The articles are distinguished by accuracy not less than by succinctness. We have been particularly struck with the scientific, geographical, and legal articles. The work is being admirably supervised by Dr. Annandale.

From the SATURDAY REVIEW.

Will be found a boon to the general reader. Some handy form of encyclopædia has long been wanted. This is comprehensive, without being bulky. The information is succinctly given, sufficiently copious, and strictly relevant. With these good features must be noted the excellent type and paper, the useful woodcuts and maps, of these neatly-bound octavo volumes.

Now ready, Vols. I. to VI., to be completed in Eight Volumes, small 4to.
cloth, gilt top, 10s. 6d. each.THE HENRY IRVING SHAKESPEARE.Edited by HENRY IRVING and FRANK A. MARSHALL, and Illustrated by Gordon Browne and other Artists.

From the GLOBE.

The edition is unquestionably one which every thorough student of Shakespeare must needs acquire.

From the ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

Edited in a really good workmanlike manner. For the benefit of the reader rather than for the display of the commentator's cleverness, the edition has the further merit of being beautifully printed. Mr. Gordon Browne's illustrations are amongst the most perfect things of the kind we have ever seen. Accuracy, animation, and grace distinguish them in a very high degree.

From the SPECTATOR.

This handsomely printed edition aims at being popular and practical. Add to these advantages Mr. Gordon Browne's illustrations, and enough has been said to recommend an edition which will win public recognition by its unique and serviceable qualities.

4 vols. imperial 8vo. cloth, £5; or half-morocco, £6 6s.

THE IMPERIAL DICTIONARY OF THE
ENGLISH LANGUAGE.A Complete Encyclopædic Lexicon, Literary, Etymological, Scientific, Technological, and Pronouncing.

By JOHN OGILVIE, LL.D.

New Edition, carefully Revised and greatly Augmented.

Edited by CHARLES ANNANDALE, M.A., LL.D.

Illustrated by above 3,000 Engravings on Wood.

From the TIMES.

So far as vocabulary and treatment are concerned, we should not wish for anything better than the new "Imperial." Few, except specialists, are likely to come across terms not to be found here; and the definitions are accurate and intelligible, developing into detailed explanations where necessary. The etymology is clear and concise, and the illustrations are copious, appropriate, and well executed.

From the ACADEMY.

Our vocabulary of praise would fail us if we tried to say all that we really think of this dictionary. A somewhat searching use of the earlier volumes has entirely tended to confirm the very high opinions which we have more than once already expressed.

From the SATURDAY REVIEW.

A monument of patience, industry, and good work. From beginning to end it has received the same thorough and conscientious care; it is copious; it is trustworthy; it is beautifully illustrated; and it is admirably printed on good paper. We cannot praise too highly the man who brings a great dictionary to a successful termination. Mr. Annandale will have his reward, we hope, in the consciousness that his will be for many years the most serviceable and most highly valued of English dictionaries.

LONDON: BLACKIE & SON, 49 AND 50 OLD BAILEY.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

NON-CHRISTIAN RELIGIOUS SYSTEMS.

ISLAM as a MISSIONARY RELIGION. By C. R.
HAINES, M.A. Fcp. 8vo. cloth boards, 2s.

* * Six other Volumes of this Series have already appeared.

CHIEF ANCIENT PHILOSOPHIES.

ARISTOTELIANISM. Part I. The Ethics of Aristotle. By the Rev. J. GREGORY SMITH, M.A., Hon. LL.D. Part II. The Logical Treatises, the Metaphysics, the Psychology, the Politics. By the Rev. W. GRUNDY, M.A. The Two Parts in One Volume. Fcp. 8vo. cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

DIOCESAN HISTORIES.

CARLISLE. By RICHARD S. FERGUSON, Chancellor of
Carlisle. Fcp. 8vo. with Map, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

* * Fifteen other Volumes of this Series have already appeared.

THE PETRINE CLAIMS: a Critical Enquiry. By the Rev. RICHARD F. LITLEDALE, LL.D., D.C.L., Author of "Plain Reasons against joining the Church of Rome" &c. Small post 8vo. cloth boards, 5s.THE PARABLES of the OLD TESTAMENT. By the Right Rev. ALFRED BARRY, D.D., D.C.L. Post 8vo. cloth boards, 4s.THE HOLY SCRIPTURES in IRELAND ONE THOUSAND YEARS AGO: Selections from the Wurtzburg Glosses. Translated by the Rev. THOMAS OLDEN. Post 8vo. cloth boards, 3s.THE EPISTLES and HYMN of ST. PATRICK.
With the Poem of Secundinus, translated into English. Edited by the Rev.
THOMAS OLDEN. Post 8vo. cloth boards, 1s. 6d.THE BEATITUDES: Thoughts for All Saints' Day.
By the Author of "The Schönberg-Cotta Family." Post 8vo. printed in red and black, cloth boards, 1s. 6d.A DISSERTATION UPON the USE and IMPORT-ANCE of UNAUTHORITATIVE TRADITION as an Introduction to the Christian Doctrines; including the substance of a Sermon by the late Rev.
EDWARD HAWKINS. Crown 8vo. cloth boards, 1s. 6d.THE EVOLUTION of RELIGIOUS THOUGHT in MODERN INDIA. By HERBERT BAYNES, M.R.A.S. Post 8vo. cloth boards, price 1s.

THE ROMANCE OF SCIENCE.

DISEASES of PLANTS. By Professor MARSHALL
WARD. With numerous Illustrations. Post 8vo. cloth boards, 2s. 6d.TIME and TIDE: a Romance of the Moon. By Sir ROBERT S. BALL, LL.D., F.R.S., Royal Astronomer of Ireland. Illustrated.
Post 8vo. cloth boards, 2s. 6d.THE STORY of a TINDER-BOX. By CHARLES MEYMOTT TIDY, M.B.M.S., F.C.S. With numerous Illustrations. Post 8vo.
cloth boards, 2s.TOILERS in the SEA. By M. C. COOKE, M.A., LL.D. With numerous Illustrations. Post 8vo. cloth boards, 5s.WAYSIDE SKETCHES. By Professor HULME,
F.L.S., F.S.A. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo. cloth boards, 5s.A SKETCH of the HISTORY of EUROPE. Chiefly International. From the Beginning of the Roman Empire to the Present Day. By ARTHUR REED ROPES, M.A. Post 8vo. cloth boards, 2s. 6d.THE ABORIGINES of AUSTRALIA. Being an Account of the Institution for their Education at Poomindie, in South Australia. By the Right Rev. BISHOP HALE. Crown 8vo. cloth boards, price 1s. 6d.STAR ATLAS. Gives all the Stars from 1 to 6.5
magnitude between the North Pole and 34° South Declination, and all Nebulae and Star Clusters which are visible in telescopes of moderate powers. Translated and adapted from the German of Dr. Klein, by the Rev.
E. MCCLURE, M.A. Imperial 4to. with 13 Charts and 80 pages of illustrative letterpress, cloth boards, 7s. 6d.WELLINGTON; or, The Public and Private Life of Arthur, First Duke of Wellington, as told by Himself, his Comrades, and his Intimate Friends. By G. LATHOM BROWNE. With Portrait, Plans, &c.
Crown 8vo. cloth boards, 5s.EVERY-DAY HEROES: Stories of Bravery during the Queen's Reign, 1837-1888. Compiled from Public and Private Sources.
With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo. cloth boards, 2s.LONDON: NORTHUMBERLAND AVENUE, CHARING CROSS, W.C.;43 QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C. BRIGHTON: 135 NORTH STREET
374

MESSRS. BELL'S CLASSICAL BOOKS.

CATULLUS :

A Revised Text, with Annotations and an Introduction, by J. P. POSTGATE, M.A., Litt.D., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. Professor of Comparative Philology at the University of London. Sq. fcp. 8vo. 4s. 6d. [Immediately.]

THE DRAMAS of SOPHOCLES.

Rendered into English Verse, Dramatic and Lyric, by Sir GEORGE YOUNG, Bart., formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. 1 vol. 8vo. 12s. 6d.

"In every page of it there is evidence of accurate scholarship, keen poetic sympathies, and indefatigable pains."—W. S. LILLY in the Nineteenth Century.

"His book, we imagine, will hold the field for a long time against all comers." Notes and Queries.

"A very able and admirable translation."—Scotsman.

PASSAGES for TRANSLATION into LATIN PROSE.

Preceded by Essays on :—I. Political and Social Ideas. II. Range of Metaphorical Expression. III. Historical Development of Latin Prose Style in Antiquity. IV. Cautions as to Orthography. By H. NEITLESHP, M.A., Corpus Professor of Latin in the University of Oxford. Crown 8vo. 3s. A Key (for Masters only), crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.

"The Introduction ought to be studied by every teacher of Latin."—Guardian.

SABRINÆ COROLLA.

In Hortulis Regiæ Scholæ Salopiensis contexuerunt tres viri floribus legendis. Fourth Edition, Revised and Re-arranged. By the late BENJAMIN HALL KENNEDY, D.D., Regius Professor of Greek at the University of Cambridge. [Immediately.]

Crown 8vo. with Illustrations, Drawings, Maps, and Plans, 4s.

CÆSAR'S SEVENTH CAMPAIGN in GAUL.

B.C. 52. DE BELLO GALLICO, Lib. VII. Edited, with Notes, Excursus, and Tables of Idioms, by the Rev. W. COOKWORTHY COMPTON, M.A., Assistant-Master in Uppingham School.

"A really admirable class-book. No one ought to find Cæsar dull with these illustrations."—Spectator.

"The general character of the Notes is excellent."—Guardian.

LUCRETIIUS.—TITI LUCRETI CARI DE RERUM NATURA LIBRI SEX.

By the late H. A. J. MUNRO, M.A., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. Fourth Edition, finally revised. 3 vols. Demy 8vo. Vols. I., II., Introduction, Text, and Notes, 18s. Vol. III., Translation, 6s.

TRANSLATIONS from and into the LATIN, GREEK, and ENGLISH.

By R. C. JEBB, M.A., Regius Professor of Greek in the University of Cambridge, H. JACKSON, M.A., Litt.D., and W. E. CURREY, M.A., Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge. Second Edition, Revised, crown 8vo. 8s.

BETWEEN WHILES ; or, Wayside Amusements of a Working Life.

A Collection of English, Latin, and Greek Verse, Original and Translated by the late Rev. B. H. KENNEDY, D.D., Regius Professor of Greek in the University of Cambridge. Second Edition, Revised and improved, crown 8vo. price 5s.

Edited by HUBERT A. HOLDEN, LL.D., late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge.

FOLIORUM SILVULA ; being Passages for Translation into Latin Elegiac and Heroic Verse. Tenth Edition, post 8vo. price 7s. 6d.

Part II. Passages for Translation into Latin Lyric and Comic Iambic Verse. Fourth Edition. 5s.

FOLIA SILVULAE, sive Eclogae Poetarum Anglicorum in Latinum et Graecum conversae quas disposuit H. A. HOLDEN. Volumen A terum continens Fasciculos III. IV. 4s. 6d.

FOLIORUM CENTURIAE. Selections for Translation into Latin and Greek Prose, chiefly from the University and College Examination Papers. Tenth Edition. Post 8vo. 8s.

TRANSLATIONS IN BOHN'S CLASSICAL LIBRARY.

NEW VOLUMES.

"THE ARGONAUTICA" of APOLLONIUS RHODIUS.

Translated into English Prose from the text of R. MERKEL, by E. P. COLERIDGE, B.A., E. Coll. Oriel, Oxon. 5s.

PLUTARCH'S MORALS. Ethical Essays.

Translated, with Notes and Index, by the Rev. A. R. SHILLETO, M.A., sometime Scholar of Trinity College, Cambridge, Translator of "Pausanias." Price 5s.

"This is a thoroughly good translation of the twenty-six ethical essays." St. James's Gazette.

SENECA'S MINOR DIALOGUES, together with the Dialogue on Clemency. Translated by A. STEWART, M.A., late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. Price 5s.

THE WORKS of FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS.

Whiston's Translation. Revised by Rev. A. R. SHILLETO, M.A. With Topographical and Geographical Notes by Sir C. W. WILSON, K.C.M.G. Vols. I. to III., containing Life of Josephus and the Antiquities of the Jews. Each 3s. 6d. Just published. Vols. IV. and V., containing the Jewish War, &c. [Preparing.]

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

CAMBRIDGE: DEIGHTON, BELL, & CO.

MESSRS. WHITTAKER'S EDUCATIONAL BOOKS.

MODERN FRENCH AUTHORS.

Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by JAMES BOIELLE, Senior French Master at Dulwich College.

FOR BEGINNERS.

LA BELLE NIVERNAISE : Histoire d'un Vieux Bateau et de son Equipage. By ALPHONSE DAUDET. With 6 Illustrations, 2s. 6d.

FOR ADVANCED STUDENTS.

BUG JARGAL. By VICTOR HUGO. 3s.

By A. BARRÈRE, Professor R.M.A., Woolwich.

ELEMENTS of FRENCH GRAMMAR and FIRST STEPS in IDIOMS. With numerous Exercises and a Vocabulary. Being an Introduction to the Précis of Comparative French Grammar. Crown 8vo. 2s.

JUNIOR GRADUATED FRENCH COURSE. Affording Materials for Translation, Grammar, and Conversation. Being an Introduction to the Graduated French Course. 1s. 6d.

PRÉCIS of COMPARATIVE FRENCH GRAMMAR and IDIOMS, and GUIDE to EXAMINATIONS. Cloth, 3s. 6d.

RÉCITS MILITAIRES. With Biographical Introductions and English Notes. Crown 8vo. 3s.

MODERN GERMAN AUTHORS.

With Notes, &c., by Professor LANGE, Dr. A. A. MACDONELL, and F. STORR, B.A. Small crown 8vo.

FIRST SERIES, for Beginners. Edited, with Grammatical Introduction, Notes, and Vocabulary.

HEY'S FABELN für KINDER. Edited by Professor F. LANGE, Ph.D. 1s. 6d.

SECOND SERIES, for Intermediate Students. Edited with Biographical Introduction, Notes, and Vocabulary.

BENEDIX'S DR. WESPE. Edited by F. LANGE, Ph.D. Price 2s. 6d.

THIRD SERIES, for Advanced Students. Edited, with Critical Introduction and Notes.

HOFFMANN'S MEISTER MARTIN, Der Küfner. By Professor F. LANGE, Ph.D. 1s. 6d.

HEYSE'S HANS LANGE. By A. A. MACDONELL, M.A., Ph.D. 2s.

AUERBACH'S AUF WACHE, and ROQUETTE'S DER GEFRORENE KUSS. By A. A. MACDONELL, M.A. 2s.

MOSER'S DER BIBLIOTHEKAR. By Professor F. LANGE, Ph.D. 2s.

EBERS' EIN FRAGE. By F. STORR, B.A. 2s.

FREYTAG'S DIE JOURNALISTEN. By Professor F. LANGE, Ph.D. 2s. 6d.

GUTZKOW'S ZOPF UND SCHWERT. By Professor F. LANGE. 2s.

GERMAN EPIC TALES. Edited by KARL NEUHAUS, Ph.D. Price 2s. 6d.

By F. LANGE, Ph.D., Professor R.M.A., Woolwich, Examiner in German to the College of Preceptors, London, Examiner in German at the Victoria University, Manchester. Extra fcp. 8vo. cloth.

ELEMENTARY GERMAN READER. A Graduated Collection of Readings in Prose and Poetry. With English Notes and a Vocabulary. By F. LANGE, Ph.D., Professor, &c. 1s. 6d.

CONCISE GERMAN GRAMMAR. With Special Reference to Phonology, Comparative Philology, English and German Equivalents and Idioms. By F. LANGE, Ph.D., Professor, &c.

I. ELEMENTARY COURSE. Cloth, 2s.

II. INTERMEDIATE COURSE. Cloth, 2s.

III. ADVANCED COURSE. Cloth, 3s. 6d.

PROGRESSIVE GERMAN EXAMINATION COURSE.

In Three Parts. Comprising the Elements of German Grammar, an Historical Sketch of the Teutonic Languages, English and German Correspondences, Materials for Translation, Dictation, Extempore Conversation, and Complete Vocabulary.

I. ELEMENTARY COURSE. Cloth, 2s.

II. INTERMEDIATE COURSE. Cloth, 2s.

III. ADVANCED COURSE. Second revised Edition. Cloth, 1s. 6d.

HANDBOOKS FOR ENGINEERS AND ELECTRICIANS.

HYDRAULIC MOTORS: Turbines and Pressure Engines. For the use of Engineers, Manufacturers, and Students. By G. R. BODMER, A.M.Inst. C.E. With numerous Illustrations. 14s.

ALTERNATING CURRENTS of ELECTRICITY. By THOMAS H. BLAKESLEY, M.A., M.Inst.C.E. Second Edition, enlarged. 4s. 6d.

THE TELEPHONE. By W. H. PREECE, F.R.S., and J. MAIER, Ph.D. With 200 Illustrations. Appendix, Tables, and full Index. Crown 8vo. 12s. 6d. Mr. Rothen, Director of the Swiss Telegraphs, the greatest authority on Telephones on the Continent, writes :—"Your book is the most complete work on the subject which has yet appeared. It is, and will be for a long time to come, the book of reference for the profession."

ELECTRIC TRANSMISSION of ENERGY, and its Transformation, Subdivision, and Distribution. By GIBBERT KAPP, C.E., Associate Member of the Institution of Civil Engineers, M.I.E.E. and Member of the Council, &c. [A New and thoroughly Revised Edition is in the Press.]

MANAGEMENT of ACCUMULATORS and PRIVATE ELECTRIC LIGHT INSTALLATIONS. A Practical Handbook by Sir DAVID SALOMONS, Bart., M.A. Fifth Edition, Revised and Enlarged. [In the press.]

ELECTRICAL ENGINEERING in our HOMES and WORKSHOPS. A Practical Treatise on Auxiliary Electrical Apparatus. By SYDNEY F. WALKER, M.I.E.E., A.M.Inst.C.E., M.I.M.E., &c. 2s.

ELECTRICAL INSTRUMENT-MAKING for AMATEURS. A Practical Handbook. By S. R. BOTTONE, Author of "The Dynamo" &c. With numerous Illustrations. Third Edition, cloth, 3s.

LONDON: WHITTAKER & CO., PATERNOSTER SQUARE.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

LIFE of WILLIAM ELLIS. By E. KELL BLYTH. With Portrait. Demy 8vo.

MAJOR-GENERAL SIR THOMAS MUNRO, Bart., K.C.B., Governor of Madras. A Memoir. By Sir ALEXANDER J. ARBUTHNOT, K.C.S.I., C.I.E. With Portrait. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

THOMAS DAVIS. The Memoirs of an Irish Patriot. 1840-1846. By Sir CHARLES GAVAN DUFFY, K.C.M.G. Demy 8vo.

MACREADY. By WILLIAM ARCHER. This forms the first volume of a series of Biographies of EMINENT ACTORS. Crown 8vo.

New and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo. 1s.

HODSON of HODSON'S HORSE; or, Twelve Years of a Soldier's Life in India. Being Extracts from the Letters of the late Major W. S. R. Hodson, with a Vindication from the Attacks of Mr. B. Smith and Mr. Holmes. By his Brother, GEORGE H. HODSON, M.A., Vicar of Enfield. Small crown 8vo.

TALKS WITH RALPH WALDO EMERSON. Crown 8vo.

RUPERT of the RHINE: a Biographical Sketch of the Life of Prince Rupert, Prince Palatine of the Rhine, Duke of Cumberland, &c. By Lord RONALD GOWER. With Portraits. Demy 8vo.

STAFFORD HOUSE LETTERS. By Lord RONALD GOWER. With Portraits. Large crown 8vo.

TOIL, TRAVEL, and DISCOVERY in BRITISH NEW GUINEA. By THEODORE F. BEVAN, F.R.G.S. With Maps. New Edition. Demy 8vo.

MATABELE LAND and the VICTORIA FALLS: a Naturalist's Wanderings in the Interior of South Africa. From the Letters and Journals of Frank Oates, F.R.G.S. Edited by C. G. OATES. With enlarged Natural History Appendix and New Plates. Small crown 8vo.

THROUGH CARNARVONSHIRE with a KNAPSACK. By FOUR SCHOOLMISTRESSES. Crown 8vo.

EGYPT AS A WINTER RESORT. By F. M. SANDWITH. Vols. III. and IV. Demy 8vo.

AN OLD SHROPSHIRE OAK. By the late JOHN WOOD WARTER, Author of "The Seaboard and the Down." Edited by RICHARD GARNETT, LL.D. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

IN CAP and GOWN: Three Centuries of Cambridge Wit. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by CHARLES WHIBLEY, B.A., sometime Scholar of Jesus College, Cambridge. A NEW SPORTING NOVEL. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 21s.

A MATCH PAIR. By AMES SAVILE. 2 vols. 8vo.

THE MARBLE FAUN: a Romance of Monte Beni. By NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE. With 50 Photogravures of Sculpture, Paintings, Views of Rome, &c., and Portrait of the Author. Crown 8vo. 1s.

ANDREWLINA. A Novel. By J. S. FLETCHER. Crown 8vo.

THE DEAD SAILOR; and other Stories. By Sir J. C. ROBINSON. Crown 8vo.

ONEIROS; or, Some Questions of the Day. By CHRISTOPHER YELVERTON. Crown 8vo.

THE LAST DAYS of OLYMPUS: a Modern Myth. Crown 8vo.

MUSIC and ACTION; or, the Elective Affinity between Rhythm and Pitch. Crown 8vo.

A DOUBTER'S DOUBT about SCIENCE and RELIGION. By a CRIMINAL LAWYER. Demy 8vo.

MISCELLANIES. Vol. III. By F. W. NEWMAN. Crown 8vo.

THE MAXIMS of FRANCISCO GUICCIARDINI. Translated from the Italian. By NINIAN HILL THOMSON, M.A., Translator of "The Prince" and the "Discourses of Machiavelli." New and Cheaper Edition. Demy 8vo. 3s. 6d.

GLOSSARY of TERMS and PHRASES. Edited by the Rev. H. PERCY SMITH, M.A. New and Revised Edition. Fcp. 8vo. 5s.

ENGLISH PAST and PRESENT. By R. C. TRENCH, D.D., Archbishop. Fourteenth Edition. Revised by the Rev. A. L. MAYHEW. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

PRINCIPLES of UNIVERSAL PHYSIOLOGY. A Reform in the Theories of Physics, Chemistry, Biology, and Cosmology. By CAMILO CALLEJA, M.D. Crown 8vo.

THE PREVENTION of MEASLES. By C. CANDLER, Author of "The Prevention of Consumption."

THE ICE AGE in NORTH AMERICA and its BEARINGS upon the ANTIQUITY of MAN. By G. FREDERICK WRIGHT, D.D., LL.D. With 147 Maps and Illustrations. Demy 8vo.

THE ORIGIN of HUMAN REASON: being an Examination of Recent Hypotheses concerning it. By ST. GEORGE MIVART. Demy 8vo.

PHYSIOLOGY of BODILY EXERCISES. By Dr. FERNAND LAGRANGE. Crown 8vo. [International Scientific Series.]

SOCIALISM. By WILLIAM GRAHAM, M.A., Author of "The Creed of Science," "The Social Problem," &c. Crown 8vo. [International Scientific Series.]

THE LAND and the COMMUNITY. In Three Books. By the Rev. S. W. THACKERAY, LL.D. With Preface by HENRY GEORGE. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

THE WELFARE of the MILLIONS. By the Rev. F. MINTON, Vicar of Middlewich, Author of "Capital and Wages." Crown 8vo.

THE TREATMENT of POLITICAL PRISONERS. By GEORGE SIGERSON, M.R.I.A., Fellow of the Royal University, Dublin. Crown 8vo.

STRIKING EVENTS in IRISH HISTORY. By C. F. DOWSETT. Crown 8vo.

A KEY to the IRISH QUESTION. Mainly compiled from the Speeches and Writings of Eminent British Statesmen and Publicists, past and present. With some Chapters on the Reign of Evictions in England and Scotland. By J. A. FOX, Author of "Why Ireland Wants Home Rule" &c. 2 vols. demy 8vo.

A MANUAL of CATHOLIC THEOLOGY. Based on Scheeben's Dogmatik. By the Rev. JOSEPH WILHELM, D.D., and the Rev. T. B. SCANNELL, B.D. Demy 8vo. cloth, 16s.

MARTIN LUTHER and the REFORMATION in GERMANY until the CLOSE of the DIET of WORMS. By the late CHARLES BEARD, LL.D., Author of "Port Royal: a Contribution to the History of Religion," and "Literature in France," &c. Crown 8vo.

BLUNDERS and FORGERIES. By the Rev. T. E. BRIDGETT. Crown 8vo.

THE LIGHT of REASON. By SEBASTIAN S. WYNELL-MAYOW. NEW VOLUMES IN THE PULPIT COMMENTARY.

II. KINGS. Exposition by the Rev. Canon RAWLINSON. Homilies by Rev. J. ORR, D.D., Rev. Dr. THOMAS, and Rev. C. H. IRWIN, M.A.

II. CHRONICLES. Exposition by the Rev. P. C. BARKER, M.A. Homilies by the Rev. P. C. BARKER, Rev. Dr. WHITELAW, and Rev. W. CLARKSON, B.A.

REVELATION. Exposition by the Rev. Dr. PLUMMER, assisted by Rev. T. RANDELL and A. T. BOTT, M.A. Homilies by Rev. Dr. CLEMENCE, Dr. THOMAS, Rev. R. GREEN, and Rev. S. CONWAY, B.A. Elzevir 8vo.

SELECTION from the POEMS of MATTHEW PRIOR. With Introduction by AUSTIN DOBSON. [Parchment Library.] Crown 8vo. 5s.

BALLADS of the NORTH; and other Poems. By HARRIET ELEANOR HAMILTON KING, Author of "The Disciples" &c. Small crown 8vo.

THE CHIMES of WESTMINSTER; and other Poems. By MAXWELL GRAY, Author of "The Silence of Dean Maitland" &c. Elzevir 8vo.

ON VIOL and FLUTE: Lyrical Poems. By EDMUND GOSSE. Elzevir 8vo.

A NEW PILGRIMAGE; and other Poems. By WILFRID SCAWEN BLUNT. Elzevir 8vo.

VERSES WRITTEN in INDIA. By Sir ALFRED LYALL. Small crown 8vo.

PSALMS of the WEST. Crown 8vo.

VOICES from the HOLY SEPULCHRE. By ALFRED GURNEY, M.A., Vicar of St. Barnabas, Pimlico, Author of "Vision of the Eucharist, and other Poems." Crown 8vo.

CAUSE. By MICHAEL DOYLE. Crown 8vo. 6s.

BRITISH REASON in ENGLISH RHYME. By HENRY HALFORD VAUGHAN, M.A., sometime Regius Professor of Modern History in Oxford University. Crown 8vo.

HOMER'S ILIAD. Translated by J. G. CORDERY. Third Edition. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.

SELECTIONS from WORDSWORTH. By MEMBERS OF THE WORDSWORTH SOCIETY. With Preface and Notes. Edited by the Secretary of the Society, Professor W. KNIGHT. * Five hundred Copies have been printed on hand-made paper, large crown 8vo. parchment, 12s; vellum, 15s.

LONDON: 1 PATERNOSTER SQUARE.

Printed by SPOTTISWOODE & CO., at No. 5 New-street Square, in the Parish of St. Bride, in the City of London, and Published by WILLIAM BOYCE, at the Office, No. 38 Southampton Street, Strand, in the Parish of St. Paul, Covent Garden, in the County of Middlesex.—Saturday, September 28, 1889.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW
OF
POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,771, Vol. 68.

October 5, 1889.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

ITALY AND "OUTIDANOS."

IT would be almost impertinent for outsiders to interfere in the family quarrel going on between different sections of Gladstonians as to the question whether "OUTIDANOS" of the Contemporary Review is Mr. GLADSTONE or is not Mr. GLADSTONE. A morning mouthpiece, and, if respectability be a qualification for representation, the most representative mouthpiece of the true faith (as per latest edition, to be changed when needful), is quite certain that no one but Mr. GLADSTONE could have written the article; an evening mouthpiece has insisted that Mr. GLADSTONE cannot have written it, and that it would be very wicked to admit it if he had. We have long and persistently maintained in these pages that it matters very much less who says a thing than what the thing is which is said, and what probability there is of its representing fact if it purport to be a statement of fact, or a considerable body of influential opinion if it be a statement of opinion. The article of "OUTIDANOS" (which we may explain, for the benefit of those persons who have either not enjoyed or have something forgotten a classical education, means pretty exactly "a fellow of no mark or likelihood") has, at any rate, been rapturously greeted as containing all things necessary to salvation in regard to the Triple Alliance, and as distinguished by specially Gladstonian marks. It is certainly distinguished by one such. It is not often easy to find a form of assertion respecting that remarkable man in which even the more calm and rational of his friends and his enemies respectively would agree. But such a formula, if it is to be found anywhere, would be probably found in the assertion that knowledge of and expertness in matters of foreign policy are not exactly the strongest points of Mr. GLADSTONE'S wide and varied mental equipment. The rude Conservative might put it that Mr. GLADSTONE'S knowledge of foreign policy is that of a child, and his judgment therein such as a child might be ashamed of; the devout Gladstonian, that the extensive and multifarious interests with which Mr. GLADSTONE'S great mind has been concerned have left him little time to devote to any but a few parts of this special subject. But the wise will see that even these extremer forms of the formula testify to a virtual agreement. And it is certain that the combined ignorance and misjudgment of this article are worthy even of Mr. GLADSTONE. Of another contention which has been advanced, that the article cannot be Mr. GLADSTONE'S because there are things in it which it would be very imprudent in Mr. GLADSTONE to say as an ex-Prime Minister and one vehemently hoping to be Prime Minister again, we had rather not speak. Recollections of some references to the Empire-Kingdom of Austria-Hungary might indicate a somewhat different deduction from the undoubted fact.

The fashion of giving in daily newspapers summaries of sensationally signed or more sensationally anonymous or pseudonymous articles in magazines has probably put most people who are interested in the subject in possession of the substance of this "Outidanic" discussion of "The Triple Alliance and Italy's Place in it." The author, whoever he is (and he sometimes writes so very much like two gentlemen at once, or one coached by another in a subject unfamiliar to him, that his sentences do not even follow on each other), writes as a very strong partisan and admirer of France, a less strong, but still strong, admirer of Russia, a non-intervention man as regards England, an alarmist as regards Germany, a half-contemptuous disliker of Austria, and an Italomaniac who is terribly afraid that Italy has entered on the bad way. He shares the doubts and qualms of Mr. LABOUCHERE as to the relations of England to the Triple Alliance; he pretty openly gives his opinion that, though war is a bad thing, a French war of revanche to get back Alsace-Lorraine would be just and right. He thinks that the League of Peace, so far from ensuring peace, can, at its utmost, only equal France and Russia combined, and must draw England in to be certain of victory; and he rates the military power of Austria very low. But, though he indulges in divers side-flings at Tory policy in England, his chief concern is with his beloved Italy, which is combining with bold bad men in Germany, and bad weak men in Austria, to do the things which are not for her peace, and to oppose his beloved France. He thinks that Italy has, or need have, no enemies; he urges, admitting incidentally that the much-prized unification has of itself saddled Italy with immense burdens, that the policy of large military and naval armaments is aggravating those burdens to a crushing extent. And even this seems to move him less than the conviction that Italy is, by partaking in the Triple Alliance, "opposing the cause of rational liberty and progress in Europe" and behaving ungratefully to good France, which has "promoted the cause and even fought the battle of liberty on more than one occasion" (a somewhat grudging testimonial, by-the-bye). All which things being so, the appearance of Italy in the Triple Alliance is "no better than a gigantic piece of political tomfoolery."

It would almost be an appropriate, though it might seem a flippant, answer to "OUTIDANOS" and those who agree with him to repeat any one of the numerous colloquial forms in verse and prose of the proposition that if certain things were different other things would be different likewise. If any Italian cares to defend his country and its statesmen from the charge of "tomfoolery," he will certainly begin by denying pretty nearly every one of the Outidanic majors, and he will not have much difficulty in supporting his denial with solid arguments and facts. He will point out that, so far from there being no cause of quarrel between France and Italy, there is the remembrance of the shabby honorarium exacted by France in 1859 and of the incompleteness of the service she rendered even on those terms. He will assert, and those who know will give him their corroboration, that ever since 1870, whether it be due to French anger at not being assisted then by Italy, or to discomfort at seeing a great Power growing up on the French frontier, or to anything else, the spirit of ill-will to Italy has been constantly growing in France. He will perhaps be unkind enough to point out that French interferences "on behalf of liberty," like French interferences on behalf of authority (for this uncourteous controversialist will probably remind "OUTIDANOS" that there was such a thing as a French expedition to Italy in 1849 as well as one in 1859), have always either resulted in a solid fee to the liberators or have coincided with some desire on those liberators' part to vindicate their own prestige, exercise their own forces, plant or water their own laurels, and grind their own axes in some way. He will have a good deal to say on the subject of the Mediterranean, and perhaps something to say on the violent and perfectly genuine popular jealousy between the inhabitants of the South of France and their Italian neighbours, which, not by any fault whatever of Italy, has grown up of late.

But his strongest reply would be a more general one, and one which we, who are no Italomaniacs, and have sometimes been accused of telling Italians uncomfortable truths, can fully endorse. "OUTIDANOS," like all sentimental politicians, thinks that he can make a nation, and a great nation, and that that nation can then maintain itself on non-combatant principles. Italy has no enemies; at any rate, she need have none; every one takes a sentimental delight in her; nobody wishes her ill; why should she spend her money on nasty warships, and turn her sons into soldiers, instead of building plenty of large hotels and steam gondolas, and teaching the said sons to be waiters and ciceroni? "That," good Mr. OUTIDANOS," our Italian will certainly say, "is, saving your reverence, precisely the way in which we came under the 'slavery' to which you are so proud of having helped to put an end thirty years ago; and, if you do not mind, or even if you do, we shall most particularly decline to go that way any more. A nation, as you English have shown, though you seem to have forgotten it a little, becomes a nation, and keeps itself a nation, by being ready and able to thrash any one who tries to take its liberties away, by helping its friends stoutly, and punishing its enemies heavily. That is what we are trying to do, or at least to get ready for doing, so as to save you the trouble of having to sympathize with our 'slavery' a second time. And if it is gigantic tomfoolery to do so, why, we are quite content to be gigantic tomfools."

TWADDLE ABOUT ETON.

AS if there were not enough, and too much, to write about, the Times has opened a correspondence on games at Eton. The usual flood of twaddle is in full spate, and there is not a halfpennyworth of fact in all the prodigious deal of amateur wit and eloquence. Somebody has told somebody calling himself "ETONENSIS" that fifth-form boys and others are compelled to play cricket fourteen times a week. How much do they play each time? Is it all matches, or are practising at a net and practising fielding included? Are they even made to play at all? These are matters of detail; the main questions are:—Should boys be made to play, and who should make them? As to the facts, Messrs. BROCKLEBANK and JONES say there is no cricket fagging at Eton; there is a certain amount of compulsory football, but "exemptions can easily be obtained." A sensible correspondent puts the case in a nutshell. Boys must be made to take exercise. If they do not play the usual open-air games, they must occupy themselves, under proper supervision, in the gymnasium. This the kind of boy who needs being made to use his arms and legs will particularly detest. Who the authority should be is another question. The self-governing system leaves it in the hands of the school. It could be managed, of course, by the masters, by athletic pions. Both courses have their merits and demerits. Compulsory exercise, however, is necessary, and must be enforced by boys, or by masters, or by a mixture of both.

People who object to compulsory exercise know nothing of the puerile character. In regard to games and sports, there are well-marked species of boy. There is the normal, natural boy, who likes to be hard at work, somehow, in the open air. He is Boy in the Hunter Stage. Like Colonel ANSTRUTHER THOMSON and his accomplice Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, he will roam the fields, shoot little birds with what weapons he may, and he will not be particular about setting lines and springes. He will also take his part in boating or cricket, and take it well; but he will not be crazy about either pastime. This boy needs no compulsion. Then there is the boy of athletic ambition. We have known one of these, a most unaffected lad, who had a sentimental passion for cricket. When exiled to the seashore, he bowled with round stones, and he plaintively observed that without cricket he did not care to live. He was killed by a fall from his horse in Australia. This kind of boy, far from needing compulsion, will rather compel others to come in. It is fellows like this who have carried the furor for athletic sports too far; their sentiment is contagious. Then there is the boy who plays because others do. He always does what the rest do, and often excels; but he lays down bat or ball without a sigh, and goes unregretting into the world of men. Next comes the very large class who hate exertion. They are not all vicious and effeminate, but many of them are, and it is obvious that schools must find some pastime still which these idle hands must do. It is unnecessary, and might be painful, to say what they will do when they are not obliged to run, row, field, and play football. Their least offensive diversion is eating pastry; they have a natural inclination to smoke, drink, tell evil tales, read bad books, drench themselves with scent, and make love to the daughters of the district. In very many cases they are not naturally bad, but idleness and ill company soon get the better of an indolent virtue. Not very much can be made of them at best, but to fatigue their bodies and direct their thoughts is the only medicine for their minds. It is absolutely necessary, for the sake of the school and of themselves, that they should be forced to exert their muscles; and, as we said, who is to force them? Either the traditions and rules of the boys, or the compulsion of masters. There are correspondents who complain that a good repute as bowler or bat is necessary to an under-master, as necessary as a good class in moderations. This would be an error if it were merely intended that the master should be a learned professional bowler, an erudite cricketing coach. But the preference for masters who, cæteris paribus, are athletes, is justified by the necessity of forcing idle, languid, greedy, and amorous boys to use their arms and legs. Such masters should assist and modify the truculent traditions of the schools. They can do this without becoming pions, spies, ushers in the old invidious sense.

There remains a class of boy who has a natural dislike of games, and who yet is not a loafer with a turn for vice. Some one amusingly maintains that GIBBON is the only great man who disliked sports at school; "a man like GIBBON is a worthless exception that need not be counted." So writes an "Unknown Public Schoolboy." We make him a present of HORACE WALPOLE, who could remember finer things than a match at cricket or a fight with bargees. BYRON, as all the world knows, bowled for Harrow, one SHAKESPEARE being in the same team. SHELLEY was of no account at games, and SHELLEY is a good representative of the boy of genius who hates school amusements. We have never read that Mr. SWINBURNE was a brilliant cricketer, and it is a fact that Mr. LOUIS STEVENSON was never in the Second Eleven—of the Edinburgh Academy. He seemed to have no ambition that way. But COWPER was a cricketer and proud of it, and CLOUGH was a jumper, so was Mr. CALVERLEY. Perhaps most of the public-school men who reach renown have been good at one sport or another. The small remainder of boys like SHELLEY ought not to be sent to public schools at all. They are already children of nature and prefer long walks, with a book perhaps, to any organized and social diversions. But schools are so large, and poetic genius so uncommonly rare, that rules cannot be made for budding poets. It is said that compulsory games prevent boys from studying literature. Now the truth is that Nothing, no institution of man nor boy, nor all that is at enmity with joy, can prevent a boy with a love of books from reading. How or when he reads is not apparent; but read he will, even when he seems entirely given up to acquiring a twist from leg. But it is useless to tell this in deaf ears. As a matter of fact, the literary boy is almost as rare as the boy of genius. The rest may read shilling stories now and then; but "what in the name of the Bodleian have they," any more than "the general public," to do with literature?

We are defending compulsory exercise on purely moral and sanitary grounds, not as an ideal institution. We do not expect to make STEELS and STUDDS out of lads who are forced to exert themselves. Their cricket will be as bad as their Greek probably is. True, we have known the necessities of the post, and the desire of self-preservation, turn a small and most reluctant fielder into a very good point. He had to keep his head and the ball stuck in his fingers. But this is the exception. "A' body kens they 'maun either" play cricket "or do waur," as the house-keeper of HENRY MORTON's uncle very wisely said. There remains the question of the How and the How Much, and in this matter it is highly probable that reform is necessary. It will not be promoted by dull twaddle from drivelling correspondents. The man who writes to the papers is usually ex officio an ass.

THE ROTTERDAM STRIKE—AND OTHERS.

IT appears that the strike at Rotterdam, which was probably started, and certainly fostered, by that in London, has terminated on what seems to be a fair enough compromise between the demands of the men and the offers of the masters. The progress of this dispute has offered a sufficiently mortifying contrast to that of the London quarrel—a contrast which is, we fear, due to the two simple facts, that the Dutch police did their duty, and that the English police did not do it. The hectoring crowds who in London were permitted to collect and browbeat honest workers, even if they were not allowed to proceed to forms of beating less metaphorical, were at once dispersed in Rotterdam. The threatening kind of "picketing" which, as a London police magistrate plucked up courage to say, though he afterwards qualified the saying, is undoubtedly illegal, was not permitted at all in Holland. Processions and assemblies were moved on quietly but firmly; and, in short, the whole thing was conducted in a rational manner. Nothing is truer than the proposition that you cannot stop a strike by police if there is any real ground for it; and we are not aware that any sane person denies this truth. What you can stop by the judicious use of police is the successful progress of a strike which is not justified—that is to say, which insists on a higher rate of wages than that at which other men are willing to work—and, even in the case of a strike which is justified, the disgraceful intimidation which characterized the late business at the London Docks. The reasonable philosophy of strikes is of the very simplest, and could never be questioned in any country where public opinion is in a healthy condition. Any man, any number of men, is or are at liberty to refuse to work; no man, no number of men, is or are at liberty to prevent any man who is willing to work from working. And, since combination to "persuade" is in itself intimidation, we agree with the wise first thought, and not with the unwise second, of the magistrate above referred to, that combination to persuade, which is in effect picketing, is not only against policy, but against law, whatever ambiguity the time-serving of the Legislature may have allowed to exist in the words of statutes. Mr. NORWOOD may not be possessed of that ironic self-possession without self-assertion which is so precious a gift; but his speech to the shareholders on Thursday was thoroughly sound in sense and thoroughly justified by fact.

The intelligent agitators who were to learn Dutch in order to keep alive the sacred flame of insurrection in Rotterdam have probably returned (at the expense of the Union or the Australian sympathizers) to their native East End. Work has been thoughtfully provided for them before their return by the arrangement, if not of a strike, of a "labour union" for the other sex, recommended by the usual names. The direct object of this movement is, of course, unexceptionable. It is to provide these underpaid women with "the incalculable advantages of self-help." Who, indeed, can refuse these? Who can fail to remember the harrowing, and unfortunately sometimes too true, tales about shirtmakers and bootmakers and the other slaves of the needle? No one surely; we must all rush to sympathize. And yet—and yet—. If it does not still remain quite as true as when Mr. CARLYLE wrote it forty years ago, that, with all this army of starving needlewomen, nothing is more difficult than to get needle or any other work done, it is not much less true. And then, whatever may be the case with effusive Canons and active Dissenting ministers and able editors on the philanthropic "lay," and candidates for Parliament, and so forth, there is no doubt what some of the agitators are about. They are not actuated by pure philanthropy or a desire to assist the starving. What they mean by the "incalculable advantages of self-help" may certainly be translated without want of charity as the advantages, calculable according to circumstances, of "helping yourself," in a well-known sense of that phrase. Very likely the public will rush at the call of its Canons and its editors to sympathize. Very likely it will feel highly virtuous in so sympathizing. And when—not so many years hence—it finds itself servantless, and with commodities dear, or not to be had, it will be the very last thought in its amiable head that it la voulu.

SCOTTISH DROLLS.

THE Scotch have taken the right way to remove an old reproach. Accused of lacking humour, they have cited their CHALMERS, their ROBERTSON, their GILFILLAN, with incomplete success. These, after all, were the cultivated or garden Scots, not the wild popular roses of wit. The editor of a certain Scottish paper observed his opportunity. He opened his columns to the Jokes of the People, by the People, for the People. All the world of Scotland, famous for its urbane badinage, was invited to add to "the rich vein of Scottish Wit and Humour." The output of japes demonstrates, once for all, that the Scot "jocks with-out deeficulty." The real deeficulty, for which he is not responsible, is to see the point of the "jock."

Here be examples :—

I.

Two boys, having met a man in white "spats," one of them said that he wore "white penter's breeks below his ither anes."

This is put in the forefront of the battle—'t is rare, what this boy said "in a waggery."

II.

A woman, having forsworn whisky in a glass, drank it out of a cup.

III.

A man took the hat worn by a scarecrow.

IV.

Whisky having been ordered for outward application, the patient drank it.

V.

A man, having eaten a herring at tea, wished also for some treacle, which was refused.

VI.

A boy, being asked if he had "passed the doctor" (in a medical examination), said "Yes, I passed him up at Cochrane's Corner."

VII.

A clergyman said that he would visit the families in his district, "embracing the servant-girls as he went along."

VIII.

An undertaker, being asked to pray at a funeral, said he would rather make a coffin gratis.

IX.

A woman in a shop, wishing to ask for a dolman, asked for a donkey.

X.

A horse falling down dead, a man asked, "Did it ever do that before?"

XI.

Heaven was defined as a place where "whisky is plentiful and policemen scarce."

XII.

"Have you seen TOM since he left?" "No; but I'm gaun tae write tae him tae speir his address."

These jokes are here given, not at prodigious length, but in the dry, curt manner of HIEROCLES. We thus reach the "bed-rock" of the witticisms. If they do not convince scoffers that the Scotch are a humorous people, that is not the fault of the editor of the paper referred to. But scoffers will, perhaps, be hard to persuade. They will reply that most of the jokes are mere unconscious puns, that most of the others are of an obviousness which could not escape even the Veddahs of Ceylon, believed to be the descendants of a lost tribe of Dundee men. Could anything be more like HIEROCLES than this?—"A boy, brought up in Egypt, laid snow before the fire to harden it." This narrative of the old Scholasticus is told in a whole page by the Scotch humourist. But the following, from SELKIRK, may be good when interpreted :—

The elder of two boys, going to bed, asked his father to "give him his prayer." The younger wept bitterly, sobbing out, "I'll hae a puckle prayer tae." What is a "puckle prayer"?

Such are the native, ungarmented jests, the Volksschwänke, of an intelligent people. They seem to show a deficiency somewhere. In any country these imbecilities might have been perpetrated; they could only have been published as jokes in one.

TWICE A QUEEN.

IT has long been evident to curious observers why the amiable Queen NATALIE, once of Servia (we call her Queen from politeness, and on the principle once a Queen always a Queen), has attracted, independently of her Russian sympathies, so much admiration from a certain class of our own shriekers. The sometime Mlle. DE KESCHKO (except that nobody, to our knowledge, has accused her of what is commonly called misconduct) is a really shining example—in fact as well as in name a Queen—of the exceedingly objectionable type of woman which has come to the fore in the course of this last thirty years or so. The great characteristic of this type, the characteristic distinguishing it from all its forerunners, is that the lovely, or unlovely, woman who conforms to it has not the least intention of foregoing the privileges which have been accorded to her own sex while it conformed, and because it conformed, to a type perfectly different. Queen NATALIE has forced her way into Servia, has nearly, if not quite, brought about riots in its capital, is subjecting its Ministers to the most ludicrous (if it were not also very serious) perplexity, and is actually compromising the peace of Europe. And she has been enabled to do this because she stands, so to speak, on two horses—the Old Woman and the New. As the Old Woman she urges the claims of her maternity and the claims of that personal immunity from voies de fait accorded to women by men in virtue of their supposed helplessness. It is needless to say that, if Queen NATALIE had been a man, she would never have been allowed to enter Servia, or, having forced her way in, would have been speedily conducted out, with a policeman's hand on her collar and, in case of resistance, a policeman's bâton applied sharply to her shoulders. These inconveniences she escapes by pleading the petticoat. But, taking up the New Woman game and, so to speak, pleading the breeches, she insists on being allowed to reside independently, to meddle in politics, to resist the orders of persons whom, if her own claim that she is not really divorced be sound, she is bound to obey, and so forth. There could not possibly be a better illustration of the delights of the New Womanhood, at least to the New Woman. "C'est la femme qui se bat et qui conseille," says she proudly in one capacity. "You cowardly wretch! Would you hit a woman?" she cries in the other. Indeed, the telegrams themselves put the contrasts of what the Laureate would call this twy-natured creature very pleasantly, as they describe her alternately announcing that she is "a Servian subject" and "indulging in hysterical laughter," alternately urging her maternal yearnings and declaring that she did very well without him at Yalta. The Servian Regents are not persons with whom it is possible to sympathize wholly, by reason of certain political games which they have been playing; but his must be a heart of steel who refuses them a certain amount of compassion as they face this specimen of the embodied Epicene.

Of Crete there is not much to say, except that the Athenian journalists, echoed by some of our own, still shriek out their lesson of atrocities, and that SHAKIR Pasha still continues to show himself, as far as can be seen, well able to deal with the situation. His principal dangers are of course two. The one is faint backing up from above and from the European Powers; but this is, or should be, the lesser. The Porte, long as it hesitated, must know that relapse into hesitation would be fatal, and no Power, not even Russia, need care particularly for the necessities of Greek parties, which are the only things really at stake. The other danger is that some injudicious subordinate may not sufficiently keep in check soldiers who may be irritated into trying reprisals upon the insurgents. In these sentimental days an army suppressing a rebellion is very much in the position of the unhappy policeman who is abused if he does not preserve order, and abused still more if he raises a contusion on the sacred numskulls of the disorderly. But SHAKIR is no doubt perfectly well aware of this, and is evidently doing his best to avoid giving the enemy any true occasion to blaspheme. That the said enemy will not thereby be prevented from inventing false occasions is inevitable; but these will not matter much.

RECENT SPEECHES.

IN the battle of the platforms which has been going on for the past ten days or so the Gladstonians have been decidedly overmatched. Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN at Hexham, and his strange new friends of the Irish National League of Great Britain at Manchester, cannot, on the most complimentary estimate of their powers, be pitted, even with Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT thrown in, against Lord HARTINGTON for weight or Mr. CHAMBERLAIN for "science"; least of all when these two performers are as well up to the mark as they are just at present. We could wish, indeed, that the latter would choose other ground than that which he too often selects for the display of his powers, and that he would a little less persistently re-argue the dead-and-gone issues involved in Mr. GLADSTONE's dead-and-buried Separation Bill. The hopeless dilemma in which the construction and the subsequent modification of that grotesquely ill-considered measure have entangled its author has been pointed out a score of times already, and every man of any intelligence behind Mr. GLADSTONE is perfectly well aware that even with a Parliamentary majority assured to them to-morrow this entanglement would inevitably trip them up. Every such politician knows that what his leader did in 1886, apparently without the slightest consciousness of what he was about, was, on finding objections raised to the amputation of Ireland, to promise, at a quarter of an hour's notice, that the whole United Kingdom should be "quartered" in the name of symmetry and to give the severed limb good company. That extraordinary passage in constitution-making is, we say, already so familiar to politicians, and its political bearings have been so fully discussed, that it can hardly serve the purposes of the platform any longer, at any rate until the time when, if ever, an attempt is made to combine its contradictions in practical legislation. No doubt the student of "Gladstonity" finds plenty of matter in it still. The great man's biographers, too, will, or should, have much to say about it hereafter, if only in order to explain to a reverent posterity how the "most illustrious statesman of the age" was equally ready to adopt either a new Constitution which would convert Ireland into a colony or one which would turn the entire United Kingdom into a federation of provinces; and how, more marvellous still, the illustrious one had evidently no inkling of a suspicion that when, to oblige Mr. JOHN MORLEY and others, he struck the Irish members off the roll of Parliament with one stroke of his pen, and to oblige a more feather-headed section he cheerfully offered to write "stet" against the erasure, he was starting a question of any particular constitutional moment whatever. All this, we admit, remains still the legitimate material of the historian and the biographer; but it has done its work, at all events for the present, as a subject for the practical politician. Much the same remark applies to all the other technical issues raised in the Gladstonian Home Rule Scheme of 1886, and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, by too constantly recurring to them, may produce the impression—we have no doubt a quite mistaken one—that his faith in his own Unionist creed is becoming uneasy, and that he feels it necessary to rehearse its articles for his own spiritual reassurance.

In the second of his two speeches at Newcastle, the one delivered at the complimentary breakfast given him by the local Liberal-Unionists of that city, he found a subject better suited to himself, and more calculated to assist his cause. The brace of barren platitudes which Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN and Mr. ASQUITH have recently attempted to pass off as fundamental "principles of Liberalism" afforded excellent game for Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, and he showed good sport in running them to earth. Mr. ASQUITH, that "rising young man" of the Gladstonian party, is of opinion, it seems, that, if that party do but hold fast to the great maxim that "only that government is satisfactory and safe that enjoys the consent and approval of the governed," they will be saved. And Mr. CHAMBERLAIN accordingly has to point out to him that, though this maxim contains all things necessary to salvation, so long as the governed demand no more than a form of government which Mr. ASQUITH and his friends are in favour of granting them, it will not be found so saving a doctrine when they go on to demand a form of government which Mr. ASQUITH and his friends are not only not in favour of granting them, but which they are bound by repeated and most solemn pledges to refuse them. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's reference to the loud-mouthed protestations of the Gladstonians of their resolve "never, never" to consent to the separation of Ireland from the British Crown, even though an independent Irish Republic may represent the only form of government which "enjoys the consent and approval of the governed," was cruelly effective. The attempt which has since been made on Mr. ASQUITH's behalf to represent his relentless adversary as insisting upon a mere theoretical inconsistency in his argument rests upon a ludicrous misconception of the true point of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's reply. For its real strength lies in this: that its reductio ad absurdum of Mr. ASQUITH's precious principle is distinctly not of an abstract or academic kind, but possesses a very obvious and very formidable actuality. The inference from his doctrine, which Mr. CHAMBERLAIN invites him to face, is one which has already been presented to his party by their own Irish allies. It is they who have in other times and under other circumstances declared that the complete independence of Ireland is the ultimate aim of their efforts, and that it is upon a future demand for such independence—a demand which will be put forward by them in virtue of an alleged mandate from the people of Ireland—that the Gladstonians will be hereafter called upon to decide by the light of Mr. ASQUITH's valuable "principle" that only that Government is satisfactory and safe which enjoys the consent and approval of the governed.

Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN's fundamental principle of Liberalism is a simpler form of Mr. ASQUITH's. It is to the effect that "people should govern themselves"; and it is disposed of with a simplicity equal to its own by a mere request for Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN's definition of the word "people." If that small portion of the QUEEN's subjects who inhabit Ireland are divinely entitled to govern themselves, why not, as Mr. CHAMBERLAIN inquires, that still smaller portion of them who inhabit the province of Ulster? The people of the United Kingdom do govern themselves; and, if that is not a sufficient recognition of Sir GEORGE's principle, it is for him to say where and how he proposes to limit a proposition which can be pushed forward without, at any rate, encountering any logical obstacle to the justification of the claim of a county, of a parish, of a family, of any chance group of citizens, down to the individual citizen himself, to set up a government of their own. It was, perhaps, superfluously severe of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN to remind Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN that this absolute assertion of the right of people to govern themselves comes very strangely from one who helped to defeat a Bill for enabling the majority of the people of Ireland to exercise that right, and who declared that, rather than assent to that measure, he would retire from public affairs to the "private life of an English gentleman." Six months of that life was enough, as Mr. CHAMBERLAIN mercilessly reminded him, for Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN; but those who can recall a certain memorable reply from a then Irish Secretary to the foul insinuations of the Parnellites will reflect with regret that the enjoyment of privacy is not the only or the most important matter on which Sir GEORGE has contrived to bring his preferences as an English gentleman under lamentably complete control.

Among the most vigorous and effective of the Unionist deliverances during the present week was the speech of Lord HARTINGTON at Aberdeen. The directness and force of its attacks upon his former chief have already attracted general notice, and it is not fanciful to regard it in this respect as marking the completion of another stage in Mr. GLADSTONE's downward descent from the position which he once occupied in the estimation of his former colleagues. Lord HARTINGTON's resolute abstinence from anything but good words about the leader whom for so many years he had followed has lasted long; but Mr. GLADSTONE's unceasing, his almost daily, multiplication of his offences has triumphed over it, as it has over every other restraint of remembered loyalty and attachment which more than one of his estranged followers have striven hard to observe. Even now, however, Lord HARTINGTON has endeavoured to confine himself as far as possible to an exposure of the offences, and to refrain from denunciation of the offender; but the driest possible recital of Mr. GLADSTONE's utterances and doings has of late years sufficed to constitute an indictment which can entirely dispense with the aid of rhetorical enforcement. His latest effort in revolutionary propagandism, on which Lord HARTINGTON dwelt with due emphasis, is a particularly illustrative example. If Scotchmen be not altogether destitute of the political qualities ascribed to them, they ought to need no further or other enlightenment as to the real character of their national idol than was to be found in Lord HARTINGTON's measured but incisive criticism of Mr. GLADSTONE's recent letter to the Secretary of the Scottish Home Rule Association. Of the many Scotchmen who have more or less enthusiastically supported Mr. GLADSTONE's Separatist policy in Ireland, there is probably not one in a hundred who desires Home Rule of the Gladstonian type for his own country; and surely the most enthusiastic of these must be a little staggered at the reckless levity with which Mr. GLADSTONE is now seeking to compass the severance of Scotland from the United Kingdom as a mere step in the prosecution of his designs against the Irish Union.

THE CHURCH CONGRESS.

THE Church Congress opened well on Tuesday at Cardiff, and has continued to prosper. Although we have not invariably approved of Archbishop BENSON's actions or of his tone of thought, this latter is not ill suited to occasions like the Congress where eloquent talk is rather looked for than judicious action. Nor can any fair critic deny that in the Archbishop's address on this occasion there was judgment as well as unction. It was, of course, to be expected that those whose most immediate and earnest desire is to take the goods of the Church in Wales first, and her life afterwards, or (for they are liberally indifferent on this point) her goods and her life at once, should be mildly indignant at even the faint disposition to "take it fighting" which appeared in the Archbishop of CANTERBURY's speech or sermon, still more at the more outspoken militancy of the Bishops of LLANDAFF and DERRY. It is very justly annoying to the thief in the night when the strong man prepares to keep his house armed, instead of sleeping comfortably or busying himself about other matters than house defence. "Why not attend to Sweating and the Housing of the Poor while we untie your portmanteaus, reduce you to apostolic poverty, and get the ropes conveniently adjusted on the nearest trees?" say the Liberationists with affectionate and almost mournful expostulation. The heads of the province and of the diocese respectively may be excused for not seeing things in the same light. The Archbishop, indeed, kept the mean between an ignoring of the situation, which would in that situation have been positively criminal, and a gratuitous bellicosity, very well, insisting chiefly on the affirmative side, on the historical continuity of existence and the spiritual identity of work. The Bishop had a right, and exercised it, to speak with the enemy in the gate more boldly and more directly, and to expose the misrepresentations (we are afraid that a very much harder name might be applied to them without injustice) of those who are bidding for the votes of the Welsh farmers and ministers, as to the actual condition of Welsh Churchmanship. Very good work was also done in one of the subsequent papers by Mr. HANCOCK, who attacked the historical lie as the Bishop had attacked the contemporary one, and showed that (as all historical students know) it was Nonconformity, and not Conformity, which was originally forced upon the Welsh people. But, though these historical falsifications, in regard to the Church in Wales as well as in regard to the State in Ireland, have to be exposed from time to time, it is not the exposure of them that will really settle the battle. That will be decided by the actual competence and strength of the Church rather than by its historic claims, and it is because the Liberationists know that this competence and this strength are growing yearly that they are in such haste to make an end. The particular discussion on the Church in Wales which followed on Wednesday brought this out very clearly.

It may, however, be readily admitted that to assign to this subject too great a part of the time and attention of the Congress would have been to commit as great a mistake as to pass it over. It cannot be said that this mistake was committed. The Welsh question came in, as it could not but come in, again with the Establishment paper of the Dean of MANCHESTER; but it formed merely an incident, hardly more than an illustration, of that paper to which may be added Mr. HANCOCK's, with its exposure of the curious Erastianism of Nonconformity, not only in the instance we have already cited. These Disestablishment discussions would be most excellent things if they led to a clearer comprehension of the subject among Churchmen, and we suppose this of itself justifies their introduction among the agenda of the Congress. But we are afraid that Mr. RAIKES's complaint of the constant confusion of terms which prevails on the subject is a very well-founded complaint, and we do not know that this confusion runs much chance of being disembroiled by such discussions as that of Tuesday. Take, for instance, the opening paper—that of the Dean of MANCHESTER. The Dean is in his own way an excellent Churchman, and he is a man of ability. But his opening sentence shows how strictly and almost hopelessly ditched and walled off he is from others on this subject. For, though not posing as a Disestablisher out and out, he says that "nothing could be gained by ignoring the plain fact that Disestablishment presented an inducement almost overpowering." After which the Dean was, indeed, good enough to point out other facts balancing this overpowering inducement, and so far weighing with himself as to induce him to retain his deanery a little longer on certain conditions. That is well; let us rejoice that we are not to lose the Dean of MANCHESTER. But unfortunately it is none the less clear that a man who can talk of Disestablishment as "presenting an overpowering inducement" must be absolutely ignorant of the Anglican position or, we should be very loth to think, must swallow the incompatibility of that position with his own views for this or that consideration. The Anglican position, put briefly, is that the Church is not only a branch of the Church Catholic, is not only the Church Catholic in this State, but is the Church Catholic of this State; that it does not matter whether not a single parishioner professes himself a member of it; that every parishioner is still a member, whether he will or no; that its services and its ministrations are open to him at all times, not in so far as he chooses to profess himself of its communion, but in so far as he is an Englishman; that, while it is subject, as everything secular and human must be subject, to the faults and the mistakes of particular incumbents of particular offices in Church and State, it is subject neither to the spiritual despotism of a pope nor to the more intolerable and loathsome tyranny of a "congregation," a body of "office-bearers," or what not. Every one of these advantages it would lose by Disestablishment, and it would receive in return what? The advantage of being a Great instead of a Little Bethel, a Salvation Army with the Generalate in commission, a "Connexion" without the binding force of antagonism to the Established Church to keep it connected. If these delights move the soul of the Dean of MANCHESTER, we can imagine that Disestablishment may present overpowering inducements to him; but in such a case we beg leave to tell him that his subsequent arguments for the retention of an Establishment of some kind are quite worthless and moreover certain to be quite inoperative. The enemies of the Church will not give him the liberty which he asks, and the best friends of the Church would not take it if it were given.

Of minor matters which the Congress has touched and which are, as usual, far too numerous to mention separately, the discussion, not directly, but indirectly, concerning the recent proposition for a sort of modified Anglican monasticism was perhaps the most interesting. It is, of course, fair to distinguish the scheme proposed by Canon MEDD, and approved to some extent by the Bishop of SALISBURY, from that recently aired under the very different names of Archdeacon FARRAR and the Bishop of ROCHESTER. The first may be roughly described as an attempt to make a "New Model" out of that at present very irregular arm of the Church-service known as curates. There is no objection that we can see to this scheme, which seems to interfere with the authority neither of the bishop nor of the incumbent, and which would enable force to be applied where it was most wanted. Only it should be disencumbered of engagements to celibacy for fixed periods, as it already is of vows for life. As long as a man does not want to get married he will probably do his work better under some such regulation, and it will certainly be easier to avoid the present anomaly of one parish whose clergy are breaking their hearts without being able to do the work, while in the next the work is a little too much for one and a great deal too little for two. But when a man wants to get married it is the opinion of Englishmen, supported by a catena of authority which goes back to the second chapter of Genesis, that the sooner he is married the better, and that long "engagements" are as bad in one way as in another. As for the other scheme, which was not mooted at the Congress, we should have to use very different language; but that is too large a subject to take up at the fag-end of an article.

MORE ABOUT FUSION.

THE Liberal-Unionist leaders have been working from the platform of late with remarkable assiduity and energy. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN speaks for the Radical section, Lord HARTINGTON for the Liberals, and rarely has either of them addressed the public with more frequency and vigour than within the last fortnight. And yet they must know that the main topic of their discourse has become tiresome extremely. That it has still a great interest for all who are or have been concerned with the machinery of parties is probably true; but the mass that makes up the parties themselves is tired of the old story of the Liberal "split," the personal recriminations of those who clung to Mr. GLADSTONE and those who broke off from him, and even of the Home Rule racket altogether. When the general election draws nigh, there may be some revival of apprehension that the Union is in danger and that the integrity of the Empire is imperilled. Nothing is more likely. Meanwhile, however, all fear of that sort has fallen out of date, and the loudest expression of it has become precisely the most tiresome.

On that account Lord HARTINGTON's speech at Aberdeen on Wednesday was particularly grateful. Ireland and the Home Rule question was in great part its theme; but the treatment of it was marked with freshness as well as vigour, and the whole course of the speech extended to wider applications. The later speeches from the Liberal-Unionist side have been searched with some anxiety for information on that point. For in one or two previous speeches from the same source a well-set scheme had been propounded for fusing the whole body of Unionists—Radicals, Liberals, Conservatives—into a single party; a single party, with a new name to cover all, the same organization for all, and a Joint-Committee Cabinet to appoint for all a common scheme of policy. This suggestion being boldly thrown out, it became at once a matter of general and lively discussion. Thereupon doubts and difficulties arose on all sides; but, as the propounders of the plan had got far enough with it to select a name for the party of fusion, the general inclination was to wait and hear how a scheme could be carried out which had so many strong attractions. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN was looked to more than anybody else for explanations; for the special reason that, while he had been urgent for the plan, he had himself put its adoption in extreme doubt. Even while he said, Let us come together into a harmonious whole, he seemed to declare an opinion that the entire mass of Conservatism in the country had been unionized out of its principles, that all that distinguished the Moderate Liberal from the Radical had evaporated during the conflict with Mr. PARNELL, and that the new National Party would naturally be harmonized—if at all—on the basis of good, old-fashioned Birmingham Radicalism. To most Conservatives this seemed a very strange sort of language of persuasion, and there was a desire for some explanation of it. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN has since delivered two speeches. In the first he rendered the fusion scheme absolutely impossible, and in the second he gave it up altogether. If we might be allowed to say "chucked it up," we should more accurately describe what happened.

It appears that, in proposing a vote of thanks to Mr. CHAMBERLAIN at Newcastle, Mr. LAMBTON (who had heard of the proposed fusion, no doubt) complimented him on a certain supposed change in his opinions. At once Mr. CHAMBERLAIN rejected the compliment in language of so much significance that we must quote it at length. He said:—

I do not think that my views upon policy have undergone the slightest change in the course of the three years he [Mr. Lambton] has referred to. I think the changes may be put in this way, as between the Conservatives and the Whigs on the one hand and myself on the other. I have found out that they are very good fellows, and they have found out that my measures are very safe measures. The point is important; it has something more than a personal bearing. We are continually being taunted with having become Tories. It all depends upon what you mean by Toryism. What I say is the present Government have carried out—well, to begin with, the whole, in principle at all events, of the unauthorized programme. That is to say, that the programme which in 1885 was too Radical, too extreme, not only for the Tories, not only for the Whigs, but for a great number of those soi-disant Radicals themselves—that policy has been carried out by what you call the Tory Government.

Then Mr. CHAMBERLAIN went on to justify this last statement in detail; adding that the Government proposed to continue the same course of legislation, and that he "didn't care what they called themselves, provided they carried out what he believed to be in the best interests of the country."

Now, since Mr. CHAMBERLAIN must have known that every word of this would be read by Conservatives as well as Radicals, it is amazing that he should talk of "fusion" at the same time. If he had meant to confirm the angry suspicions that have long been current amongst Conservatives that the Liberal-Unionists have demanded and been paid too much for an assistance which they could not deny, he could have said no more. If he had intended to say it in the most arrogant and irritating language at his command, there is nothing in any previous speech of his to warrant the opinion that he could have done better. He acknowledges that the Conservatives are by far the greater number in the Unionist connexion; and yet if his design had been to prove to them that his idea of a National Party is one in which they would be "sold" and their principles submerged, how could he hope for better success than he achieved by that one little speech?

But it is not necessary to suppose that it was a blunder. No doubt he had been informed from his own side in politics that the National-Party suggestion was not to be listened to on terms that implied any subjection of Radical ideas—the ideas of three years since, which he himself still holds. At the same time, he probably came to understand that the Conservative rank and file have not been unionized out of their principles, and are all the less likely to be now that they are confronted by a New Radical Party more violent and dangerous than any before known in England. The result of these discoveries?—the result was seen next day, when Mr. CHAMBERLAIN addressed another Newcastle meeting. He then said, speaking of the fusion proposed last week, or thereabout, “I quite agree that there is no ‘hurry whatsoever in such a matter. I do not think a ‘new party can be manufactured. It must come, if it ‘comes at all, by a process of natural evolution.” He had been invited, he went on to say, by a Conservative newspaper, to employ his ingenuity in “settling the conditions of such a new party as has been suggested.” His answer was that he must respectfully decline to undertake any such task. “Indeed” (and this was surely a very odd thing to say, under the circumstances), “it seems to ‘me rather to be the duty of the branch of the Unionist ‘party which is most numerous, first, to propose and to ‘consider the details of any new organization or combination if they should think it to be necessary.” (They should think it to be necessary!) “If they, on the contrary, are satisfied with the existing state of things, if ‘they think they can hold the fort under present circumstances, and hold it permanently, then I am quite sure ‘that none of us would wish to press for any change.”

Good. And so here’s an end of an attempt to hurry on “the processes of natural evolution” which only throws them back very considerably. What Lord HARTINGTON may think of the part which Mr. CHAMBERLAIN has played in the matter we shall never know perhaps.

THE MEDICAL SESSION.

THAT part of the speeches of the doctors at the opening of the medical session which may not unfairly be described as addressed to the public is not necessarily the most valuable; but it is, for obvious reasons, the most generally listened to. Of these reasons the least painful to our feelings is to be found in the rather brief style in which the addresses are reported. An hour or so might, we are sure, be profitably spent in reading Mr. WILLIAM ANDERSON’S “Historical Review of the Growth of Surgery ‘in Europe from the Beginning of the Sixteenth Century.” It is a subject which allows of the display of much curious learning and of the making of many sagacious observations. No doubt the learning and the sagacity were there, for the benefit of the students of St. Thomas’s Hospital, who also, without peradventure, will profit by them. The reports in the papers do not, unfortunately, enable the general reader to do much more than learn that such a speech was made. There is, as we notice with some regret, an inclination, not only among the outside public, but on the part of some doctors, to ask what the value of these traditional addresses can be, which means to doubt whether they have any value at all. The scepticism is characteristic enough of a time in which all knowledge seems in the eyes of students and instructors to be more and more becoming mere cram, and valuable for its direct practical results alone. From that point of view the addresses may be of little worth; but they may none the less be excusable on the ground that they tend to keep alive the very wholesome old tradition that a doctor is a member of a liberal profession. He can when he delivers one get out of a narrow speciality, and show that he has some of the training which makes a scholar. Again, they enable a veteran to remind the beginners that knowledge and progress did not begin with the last discovery or series of experiments, and also that the prevailing scientific belief of the year is not inevitably to be accepted as final. Mr. ANDERSON, for instance, to keep to the address we have mentioned already, gave the St. Thomas’s students an opportunity of reflecting on the fact that AMBROSE PARÉ and VESELIUS count for something in the surgical knowledge of to-day. He also hinted to them that these great men were as cocksure about some things which have been found to need revision as some of the scientific gentlemen who take their priesthood of science so desperately in earnest are to-day about other matters which have yet to stand examination. This is at least a part of his speech to be received with gratitude by a general reader who is sick of bullying scientific voices telling him to believe, or be —.

The public is—or thinks it is—able to understand the question of medical education and its difficulties better than scientific matters. It believes, too, with even more reason, that it is strongly interested in the training of its doctors. We, therefore, learn with some concern that certain of the chiefs of the profession are far from satisfied with the present condition of some of the training-schools. London is, as Sir ALBERT ROLLIT insisted, particularly badly off. The University will not meet the requirements of students and their teachers. At the same time “the London M.D. ‘degree had been, from a professional point of view, almost ‘unattainable, and hence an exodus of students took ‘place from London towards other Universities.” To judge from Sir ALBERT ROLLIT’S subsequent expression of a hope that the “present honour of the London M.D. ‘and M.B. degree would not be lost to the profession or their standard unduly lowered,” one gathers vaguely that the London University is habitually guilty of a well-known sin. If it does not give too little, it at least asks too much in the way of examinations. A public which is not conscious of a dearth of doctors may not at once see what is to be gained by passing more recruits for the profession in London, and may even think that, if entrance to the profession were made equally difficult in other Universities, no great harm would be done. On the other hand, there are some who dimly suspect that no great advantage is gained by making examinations too severe. The doubters have been brought by experience to the conviction that the difference between doctors is much less a matter of knowledge than a matter of manners and common sense, and that the best is he who, when he has to go beyond giving you blue-pill or quinine, is the readiest to advise you to go to a specialist. As for the specialist, he makes, and always did make, himself.

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE STRAND.

THE London County Council have no doubt done well to adopt the report and recommendations of their Improvements Committee and to resolve on applying next Session for Parliamentary powers to effect the removal of the south side of Holywell Street. Indeed, it may almost be said that they had no choice in the matter. They could hardly have dissented from their Chairman’s view as to the urgent necessity of doing something with the site, or have disputed the justice of his observation that they would seriously disappoint their constituents if they allowed their term of office to expire without taking any steps towards the execution of so conspicuously-needed a piece of metropolitan improvement. But to admit this was practically to admit that the report of the Committee ought to be adopted and acted upon. If it was imperative that “something ‘should be done,” then the only possible something was undoubtedly contained in the plan submitted to them. To reject its proposal while still acknowledging the necessity for taking some immediate decision in the matter would have been for the Council to hand itself over to those most fatal advisers—the advocates of a “complete scheme.” They seem to have been strongly represented at the meeting on Tuesday last, and the division on the amendment proposed by them was a close one. Fortunately, however, they were beaten on this, and outvoted by a still larger majority on the main question. The work of improvement, therefore, will be put in hand and carried out on that “piecemeal” principle odious everywhere to the prig and the doctrinaire, but which nevertheless has governed, and continues to govern, almost every rational and successful reform effected by the hand of man.

With London, as with many of our political institutions, it is never quite certain that reform, however necessary, will not remove something or other of the highest antiquarian interest, if not of national value. We should hesitate, therefore, to declare offhand that the fate of the south side of Holywell Street will bring down with it nothing that we need regret. But it may be said, with tolerable confidence, that a less sacrifice of architectural considerations to the convenience of locomotion will be entailed in the destruction of the particular block of buildings than would be incurred with respect to most other “bits of Old London.” Such claims to picturesqueness as it possesses is lost upon the main thoroughfare, the frontage towards which is essentially mean and commonplace; and certainly a generation which hardened its heart to the destruction of Middle Row, Holborn, can hardly be expected to show greater tenderness for Holywell Street. The only question is whether the consequent relief to the traffic will be worth the very large cost of the work. It is at least open to doubt whether the conversion of that piece of the Strand which lies between the churches of St. Mary-le-Strand and St. Clement Danes from a narrow thoroughfare into a broad one will have the great effect anticipated for it in some quarters. When it is remembered that this length of street is not very considerable, that a portion of the "gut" will still remain opposite St. Mary's Church itself, that the roadway already runs broad enough past St. Clement's Churchyard, and that it will still continue to narrow as before on reaching the site now occupied by the Griffin, some slight scepticism as to the extraordinary relief which the change is expected to afford to the traffic may at least be excused. Even now it must suggest itself to most of us on reflection that more blocks occur to the west of St. Mary's Church than to the east of it, and though it may be contended that they are the effect of the narrow piece of roadway acting at a distance, it is at least equally arguable that the intersection of the two streams of northward-southward and eastward-westward traffic at Waterloo Bridge has quite as much to do with it. For the abatement of this trouble we shall perhaps have to wait for the realization of the Napoleonic, or at any rate Haussmannic, project of the gentleman who has been fired by the thought that Somerset House and the British Museum exactly face each other, and who accordingly wants to unite them by a boulevard which shall be as magnificent and as characterless as the Avenue de l'Opéra at Paris. Meanwhile, however, and pending the allocation of the little handful of millions which would be required for this noble undertaking, its projector has his value, if merely as having "gone one better" than the advocates of the complete scheme in the County Council.

GENERAL FAIDHERBE.

THE death of General FAIDHERBE has removed the survivor of the only two French army officers who displayed the qualities of a commander-in-chief during the disastrous, and in the main shameful, war of 1870-71. They had much the same work to do. General CHANZY in the Orleannois and in Maine, General FAIDHERBE in Artois and Picardy, had alike to conduct a hopeless struggle against an enemy who possessed every advantage—numbers, organization, experience, training, and confidence. The utmost they could hope to effect was to struggle to the last, and be beaten with as much honour as the defeated can win. In the midst of so much failure and such widespread misconduct France had reason to be grateful to the two soldiers who proved themselves undeniably worthy of the great traditions of its army. The evil fortune of the country has lasted beyond the war. Seven years ago General CHANZY died while he was still at an age which would have permitted him to command in the field. The two naval officers—Admirals JAURÉGUIBERRY and JAURÈS—who distinguished themselves as divisional commanders on land—somewhat to the surprise of those who forget that the cool head and the stout heart have quite as much to do with making the general as technical knowledge—have died within the last few years. There are—unless the military faculty of Frenchmen is utterly lost, there must be—many hundreds of officers who fought in the last war, and have not forgotten its lessons, but no one who, having held high command, did not show himself unequal to it.

General FAIDHERBE had, it is true, been long disqualified by age and bad health for active command. It is, indeed, the most honourable fact in his career that all his service was performed in spite of physical sufferings which would have driven most men even of exceptional courage into retirement. While he was still a captain of Engineers in 1847, he was almost frozen to death during a winter campaign against the Kabyles. His life was saved by the devotion of a soldier, who carried him for miles. The result of the exposure was a locomotor ataxy, from which he suffered all his life, and a liability to nervous and muscular pain which finally crippled him and destroyed his intellect. In spite of this weakness, General FAIDHERBE applied for active service and actually volunteered to go to the pestilential climate of Senegal. His offer was accepted, and he spent many years as subordinate or as Governor in turning this establishment into the nearest approach to a successful colony which France can show. His services would have gained him high promotion; but, like many of his brother officers of the scientific corps, General FAIDHERBE was a strong Republican, and made no mystery of his principles. The Imperial War Office was not disposed to do much for him, and when the war broke out in 1870 he was holding a position of no great importance in Algeria. At the fall of the Empire his services and his political principles alike pointed him out to GAMBETTA as one of the officers whom he could most safely trust with an army in the field. He was appointed to succeed BOURBAKI in the Army of the North. Here by dint of desperate exertions he contrived to give the force under his command some of the qualities of an effective army. The game he was set to play proved to be a hopeless one; but he deferred the inevitable final failure for as long as possible. By dint of skilful movements he contrived to check the advance of General VON MANTEUFFEL's army into Normandy. When the somewhat unenterprising VON MANTEUFFEL was succeeded by the hard-hitting VON GOEBEN, he contrived for a time to avoid destruction by careful management. When the necessity of making an effort to raise the siege of Paris dictated the last combined offensive movement of the French armies against the Germans, General FAIDHERBE endeavoured to turn VON GOEBEN's position at St. Quentin. As, however, he had no cavalry, and his opponent, who had been amply reinforced, was well supplied, the French could neither observe nor escape observation. The result of the movement was unquestionable defeat; but General FAIDHERBE contrived to bring off a considerable part of his army in respectable order. He kept it unbroken till the end of the war, and was in so far more fortunate than General CHANZY, who saw his force dissolve into a mere mob. After the war General FAIDHERBE was mainly known as an ardent Republican. His services and his political opinions were rewarded by the Grand Chancellorship of the Legion of Honour, and his country did not allow him in his old age to sink into the obscurity which so commonly overtakes distinguished Frenchmen.

THE NEW LEADER.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT has been speaking at Salisbury and Mr. LABOUCHERE at Bexhill-on-Sea, in Sussex. There can be no doubt as to which of the two commands the closer attention at the present moment. In moral weight, in that magic of "character" which exerts, we are told, so much more powerful a spell over the English people than mere ability, the two men are as nearly equally matched as possible; and on this ground, therefore, there is nothing to choose between their respective claims to attentive hearing. Circumstances, however, have of late placed Mr. LABOUCHERE in a position which Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT does not occupy, and indeed has never, with all his efforts, succeeded in occupying. Even the splendid manner—so effusively extolled by Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN the other day, not without some indication of a desire to keep the leadership "in the Front Bench family," at all events and at any cost—even, we say, the splendid manner in which Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT led the opposition to the Tithes Bill at the end of last Session has not availed to recover for him his lost ground. Mr. LABOUCHERE in the earlier successes still bulked too largely in the public imagination. His open resistance to his illustrious leaders—on more than one question—while those illustrious leaders were exhibiting themselves in a ludicrous panic of indecision between their allegiance and their ambitions—had made too deep an impression; and when the House rose Mr. LABOUCHERE may be said to have walked away with all his winnings in his pocket. We are only, therefore, recognizing a plain and patent fact in devoting our attention to Mr. LABOUCHERE's Sussex speech, to the neglect of Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT's performance in Wiltshire.

We have no space to comment largely on it, nor any call to do so if we had. There is, in truth, hardly anything in it which calls for criticism or even remark; though it is, of course, from one point of view, all the more interesting on that very account. The speaker was, no doubt, so conscious of his responsibilities as the prospective leader of the real Radical party—as distinguished from the crew of baffled adventurers and played-out placemen who have adopted Radicalism as they have Parnellism, and with just as much conviction—that he has become—half-unconsciously, half-deliberately—dull. This, as we know, is no new feat for Mr. LABOUCHERE; but he has never attempted it with such complete success before. His speech might have been delivered by Professor STUART, or by Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL, or by Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, or by any member of the Gladstonian party who can be safely backed to speak for an hour or more on end, without provoking either the faintest thrill of interest or the most fleeting flicker of a smile. One dim gleam of the Laboucherian irony was to be detected in his speech, and one only—in that passage in which he “explained” the system of land-tenure in Ireland and defended the “Plan of Campaign as being the best method of settling the arrears question.” That is in his old manner, we admit. “Best method of settling the arrears question” is good, undeniably good; but, if we except a feeble and very, very stale joke at the expense—or intended expense, for we think the cost really falls upon the jokers in these cases—of the “CHAMBERLAIN family,” there is not an attempt to amuse from one end of the harangue to the other. Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT’S discourse, it is unnecessary to say, was punctuated with “laughter.” He literally bubbles over, we have been told by a recent pen-and-ink portrait-painter of him, with humour in private life, and his speech at Salisbury was as ebullient of “epigram” as could be desired. Well may he bubble, for in a now obsolete sense of the word he has himself been “bubbled.” He has been cleverly jockeyed out of the race for the leadership, and he has certainly a right to console himself in the best way he can.

KEW.

I.

MR. THISELTON DYER and his learned associates might choose their own day for proclaiming the second centenary of the Institution they direct, if so inclined. It is not recorded probably at what exact date Lord Capel laid out his famous garden at Kew; but, since he died in 1696, it must have been about two hundred years ago. Some of his trees survive, no doubt. Switzer says, in his quaint Ichnographia Rustica, 1718, “The earliness with which this lord appeared in gardening merits a very great place in my history, and a better pen than mine to draw it.” Kew has not ceased to be important in English horticulture since that day; and Lord Capel’s son-in-law, who succeeded, made it for a while the headquarters of English astronomy. But it was the Princess Augusta, mother to George III., who formed the notion of a scientific establishment—what they called a “Physic Garden” in those days. One is always delighted to give credit to the luckless Earl of Bute, and with a clear conscience we may gratify the feeling here. He it was who advised the Princess to render this great service to botany; nor did he fail to spend himself—as it may properly be expressed—in the same good cause. Those magnificent Botanical Tables which he published in 1785, in nine volumes quarto, cost 10,000*l.*, and he struck off only twelve copies. We feel bound to add that twelve copies proved more than enough. Smith, a sound botanist, criticized the work smartly. It was easier, said he, to paint Helen rich than beautiful, and so it is easier for a lord to prepare a rare and costly book than a useful one. It was after such remarks, no doubt, that the Earl declined to send a copy to the British Museum, cheerfully remarking that it was meant only for ladies. One of his descendants, however, took another view, and our national library is not bereft of this historic composition. Her Royal Highness employed William Aiton to carry out her plans and Sir William Chambers to do the decorative part. Science will ever be grateful to the one, and Taste will never forgive the other while his constructions remain. In 1768 Sir John Hill published a catalogue of the plants at Kew. There were fifty ferns, about six hundred trees and shrubs, and several thousands of herbaceous plants. The list was not greatly lengthened twenty-one years after, when Aiton issued the Hortus Kewensis, with the aid of Dr. Solander. But the collections made by Sir Joseph Banks in Captain Cook’s famous voyage were deposited here; then those of Robert Brown and Allan Cunningham, accompanying Captains Flinders and King respectively to Australia; then the plants of Brazil and the Cape of Good Hope, gathered by Messrs. Bowie and Masson; those of Caley, and Ker, and Menzies, and a host of smaller collections. In 1810, William Aiton the younger published a new edition of his father’s work, which contained nearly ten thousand descriptions. But evil days followed the death of Sir Joseph Banks, in whom Kew had a friend at Court. For all Aiton could do, the Gardens sank into ruin, until it was gravely proposed, in 1838, to disestablish and disendow them. Happily, the country rose in protest. Government found it had made a prodigious error, and hastily appointed a Committee to inquire and report. Those gentlemen showed their judgment by referring the practical question to Dr. Lindley, whose concluding remarks may be cited, since they contain, in brief, the programme which has been so admirably carried into execution:—

A national garden should be the centre round which all minor establishments of the same nature should be arranged. They should be all under the control of the chief of that garden, acting in concert with him, and through him with one another, reporting constantly their proceedings, explaining their wants, receiving their supplies, and aiding the mother country in everything that is useful in the vegetable kingdom. Medicine, commerce, agriculture, horticulture, and many valuable branches of manufacture would derive much benefit from the adoption of such a system. From a garden of this kind Government would be able to obtain authentic and official information on points connected with the founding of new colonies; it would afford the plants there required, without its being necessary, as now, to apply to the officers of private establishments for advice and assistance.

Every point and every forecast of this excellent scheme has been fulfilled. For the public Kew is the most magnificent of gardens; for the scientific it is a garden si l’on veut, but rather a manufactory, a vast trading establishment—where cash is not the “medium,” however—an international nursery-ground, a training school, a museum, the grandest of inquiry offices, a laboratory, the meridian accepted by botanists over all the world. Greenwich may be challenged and rejected; but no savant disputes the claim of Kew. Britons are proud of the institution, and doubtless they would be prouder if they knew more about it. But from the nature of these beneficent operations they make no show at home. Now and again a few lines appear in the newspaper, telling how this or that new departure in planting or economical husbandry, directed by Kew, is succeeding in some distant land. But the paragraph leaves no impression, we fear. A comprehensive Report is issued month by month; but the public does not read it much. We propose to show, in briefest summary, what world-wide labours are conducted in that establishment which the people regard as a holiday haunt. To tell truth, they are so many and so vast that we never undertook a theme with such anxious diffidence.

The traditions of Kew have been rarely broken by a change of Director, and to this fact doubtless much of its success is owing. From 1759 to 1886 the management rested in four hands only:—William Aiton from 1759-93; William Aiton, jun., 1793-1840; Sir W. J. Hooker, 1841-66; Sir Joseph Hooker, 1866-86. To him succeeded Mr. Theselton Dyer, the fifth in a space of one hundred and twenty-eight years. With Sir W. J. Hooker Lindley’s project began to take form rapidly. At that date it was the custom to draw up an annual report of “Progress and Condition,” which was laid before the First Commissioner of Works; the practice dropped in 1883, and was replaced by a monthly “Bulletin of Miscellaneous Information,” issued for the benefit of all the world. The early reports of Sir W. Hooker are interesting, besides their historic and scientific value, for the evidence they give of his sturdy, ceaseless battles with the Treasury. Authorities who had just been contemplating the abandonment of the Gardens were not likely to be liberal in extending them. The Director is pathetic, indignant, argumentative, by turns, and one way or other he contrived to “worry on” with fair success till better times. The struggle is not finished now, of course, nor ever will be, but it assumes a very mild form nowadays. In 1844 Sir William took the first serious step towards his object by petitioning for a grant of the Royal Fruit House, which he offered to fill with his private collection of plant-products. It was allowed in 1847, and thus the Museum of Economic Botany had its origin. This branch of the establishment now occupies three buildings, and its influence is felt, one may say, from Pole to Pole. Every tree and plant which is known to serve a useful purpose is represented there, with illustrations of the manner of its employment, if possible. This part of the collection amuses the holiday visitor; but any one can understand its value to an ingenious and thoughtful young mechanic or manufacturer, such as our Technical Schools will turn out, as we all hope. The Museum of Timber is very largely used already. Cabinet-makers and upholsterers quite recognize by this time what a store of hints for their craft is garnered here. And the utility of the economic section is by no means confined to the inhabitants of these islands. From every quarter samples of new products are forwarded for examination and report. In this present year, for instance, an inquiry has been held upon the comparative value of the different varieties of coca. Mr. Shipley’s methods of dealing with the rice-beetle in Burmah have been published. The Governor of Lagos has sent specimens of a new fibre, pronounced by those whom the authorities at Kew have consulted to be “distinctly superior to jute in many respects.” Dr. Schweinfurth’s method of preserving plants is considered and recommended. A starch-yielding Bromeliad from Brazil is noticed. An account of the fine Persian dye Zalil is prepared by Sir Joseph Hooker from the remarkable collections of Surgeon-Major Aitchison, C.I.E., F.R.S., now stored at Kew. Mr. Pelham L. Warren, Consul at Taiwan, sends an account of the lily flowers used as food by the Chinese. An analysis of the extraordinary P’u-êrh tea is furnished; and a report on the short-podded yam-bean. Jamaica cogwood receives careful notice, in time, we may hope, to prevent its extermination. The Governor of Lagos sends cocoa-nut coir fibre, which he believes to be exceptionally good; but the opinion of experts is divided. Mr. Shipley contributes a preliminary report upon a wheat pest in Cyprus. An article on the cultivation and curing of patchouli, and its adulteration, is reproduced for English readers from the Journal of the Agricultural and Horticultural Society of India. An interesting series of despatches from the Administrator of the Gambia Settlements upon agricultural prospects there is submitted to the Director of Kew, and answered by him in a series of comments more interesting still. The history, character, and treatment of a new plague, the Fluted Scale insect, are carefully summarized. The India Office forwards a tin case containing flowers of Calligonum, used as an article of food in North-Western India, which, when analysed, prove to be very rich in nitrogen, and therefore most valuable to a rice-eating people. The authorities at Kew applied some time ago for a specimen of the fine fish-nets used on Lake Ngami, said to be woven from the fibre of a cactus. Upon receipt it proves to be the Buáze fibre, noticed by Dr. Livingstone, and declared by experts so long ago as 1857 equal to flax worth 50*l.* to 60*l.* the ton. Nothing appears to have been heard of it since, but possibly our manufacturers will bestir themselves now. The vegetable productions of Central China, and reports on the Phylloxera in South Africa—not discouraging fortunately—complete the official record up to September. When so much and so varied correspondence is published, we may guess how busy must be the department, and how wide the interests served there.

So long ago as 1815 an Herbarium and Botanical Library had been projected at Kew. The king even raised a building for the purpose; persuaded by Sir Joseph Banks, no doubt, but it is creditable to that ill-used monarch, George III., that he was open to conviction. At Sir Joseph's death, however, the scheme lapsed, and after a time the building was granted to the King of Hanover. On his decease Sir William Hooker urged the fulfilment of the old design, and his prayer was granted when Mr. Bentham and Dr. Bromfield bequeathed their collections to the nation. It is needless to point out, for those who think, how all-important is a museum of this kind; others may be satisfied to know that it is as essential for the study of botany as foundations for a house. The Herbarium of Kew is certainly the best in the universe, the largest, and the most useful, because most admirably arranged. The number of specimens in our noble establishment is not on record, nor is the catalogue printed. It fills two gigantic volumes, continually "posted up"—for the collection grows at the rate of twenty thousand or so yearly. At Sir William Hooker's death, twenty-three years ago, a rough estimate of the number of specimens put it at a million, duplicates not included. They fill the large house, not unworthy of its purpose, in the north-west corner of the Green, and in 1876 a noble hall was added at the back, eighty-six feet long, fitted with two tiers of light iron galleries. In the space between each pair of the nine windows in each of the three floors stand twelve cases filled with dried plants in their portfolios, beginning with the Ranunculaceæ on the ground floor and ending with the grasses up aloft. All is arranged upon the system of Sir Joseph Hooker's great work, the Genera Plantarum; so the student, referring to that book, has but to give the number attached to the particular genus in which he takes interest and the case is unlocked, the portfolio laid before him in a moment. A table stands in each window for his convenience, and thus there is no need to carry the specimens about. On the lower floor here is preparing that grand catalogue of all plants known, for the issue of which Mr. Darwin left a bequest. It is, in fact, a new edition, completed to date, of Steudel's Nomenclator Botanicus (Stuttgart. 1821-4). Mr. Daydon Jackson, Secretary to the Linnean Society, with his assistants, has had the work in hand three years, and it is not nearly finished; he employs a staff at the British Museum also. There are no formalities to check the young scholar here. He has but to present his credentials to Professor Oliver, Keeper of the Herbarium, to sign his name, and get to work. Interesting points there are at every step in this noble collection; stories to be told in every room, at every group of cases which bears the name of some distinguished savant the fruits of whose lifelong labour are stored here. Of all these perhaps the herbarium of Dr. Lindley is most attractive. The enthusiastic stranger may be surprised to note that this renowned collection occupies but four small cabinets—with folios very close-packed indeed. But the contents will surpass his utmost expectations. To find Lindley a marvel for patience and exactitude as for knowledge will not astonish him assuredly, but to find that he could execute charming little drawings is pleasant news. He may see here also the earlier of those numerous works of Bauer's which persuaded Lindley at sight to devote himself to the study of orchids. There is no printed catalogue of the books, but a ponderous volume in the Keeper's room, the fellow to those huge tomes which record the Herbarium. It is a fine library, however, containing, of course, all modern works and pamphlets that relate to Botany. Besides these, a very great number of the antique curiosities which bibliomaniacs treasure are stored upon its shelves.

PUBLIC SCHOOL BULLYING.

IT is curious to observe how every year, without a single exception (usually during the summer holidays), the question of bullying at public schools comes to the front. The charges made in this direction are extremely varied in character. Sometimes the time-honoured institution of fagging is brought in question. Occasionally a general system of cruelty at one or other of our big schools on the part of big boys towards their unhappy juniors is denounced. In the present year a system of so-called "new tyranny" has been inveighed against in the columns of a contemporary by a gentleman signing himself "Etonensis." The Correspondent in question makes the excuse for sheltering himself under a nom de guerre on the ground that, if he signed his name, "the boy [whose cause he champions] would possibly be found out, and treated accordingly by boys and masters." The protégé of "Etonensis" complains that he is compelled to play cricket fourteen times a week in summer, and football five times a week in winter, and that "consequently he has no time to himself by daylight." In our judgment, the complaints put forward by "Etonensis" are so ridiculous, and the arguments he adduces in their support are so shallow, that we can only wonder at the prominence that has been given to the discussion. The majority of old Etonians will perfectly agree with "Etonian," who expresses "considerable surprise" at the letter of "Etonensis," and says that he can easily understand the circumstances which gave rise to it. "Similar circumstances," says he, "bring about the publication of most of the complaints concerning our public schools. A boy comes home for the holidays. He has—especially if low down in the school—a grievance against those in authority, boys or masters. This grievance is aired to sympathetic parents and friends. They suppose that the particular grievance of their boy must be universal. Hence these indignantly interrogative letters. If 'Etonensis' had had any experience in managing a house, he would have known that compulsory football is the best safeguard against abuse of the great liberty enjoyed at Eton, and that, during the summer term, when no physical exercise is compulsory [and here "Etonian" joins issue as to the fact with "Etonensis," inasmuch as the former denies that compulsory cricket exists at Eton], the tone of the school deteriorates owing to the enormous amount of 'loafing.'" The indictment preferred this year with reference to bullying at public schools is certainly the weakest that has ever come before the public.

Of course there are, and there always must be, isolated cases of bullying at public schools; but the main question is whether these can be prevented by increased supervision on the part of the head-master and his assistants. For our own part, we say that in the first place it is impossible, and in the second place wholly undesirable, that a school-master should always have his eye upon each and all of his pupils. He cannot follow them to the cricket-field, or to the football ground, or on their paper-chases; and it would be unfair in the last degree to hold him personally responsible for any particular act of misconduct or oppression on the part of a big boy towards a small one. One might as well attach blame to the colonel of a regiment because one of the privates under his command had taken too much beer and assaulted a policeman. Bullying at public schools is a topic of constant recurrence, and is always certain to be appropriated by some Jacob Omnium of the day. We may take it for granted that, wherever a hundred or more boys of various ages are herded together, there will be among them some of coarse fibre, or, to put it more plainly, black sheep. The theory of a private school is that the master exercises constant personal supervision. But it would be impossible for him to do so; and, as a matter of fact, he never attempts it. The bullying at private schools is often of the most aggravated kind, for much the same reasons as those which make the disputes of a "select boarding-house" more acrimonious and personal than the little difficulties that occasionally arise in a large hotel. A private school has, by the very conditions of its existence, no history, no traditions, and no prestige. It consequently has in it no public opinion. And it is public opinion among the boys themselves that is the only check to bullying.

To create and to maintain a high tone of public opinion is the first and most important duty of a head-master—far more important than the correction of Greek iambs or sound views on the subjunctive mood. Arnold gave a new impulse to English public-school life by emphasizing this fact. No doubt the opinion he created among his boys was his own opinion, and Arnold, although most conscientious and generous, was also dogmatic and unamiable. But the broad fact of his influence upon Rugby cannot be disputed. To name particular schools would be to name men of whom many are still alive; but any one who is acquainted with our great public schools—Eton, Harrow, Winchester, Westminster, Rugby, Shrewsbury, and others—will know that with a weak and indolent head-master a reign of bullying is certain to begin. So it is with an incompetent colonel. Before he has held his command a year his regiment is almost certain to get a bad reputation. Soldiers and schoolboys—we might add sailors, workmen, and generally all those who are subject to definite discipline—know perfectly well when a keen eye is being kept upon them. And with schoolboys, whose imagination is in proportion to their youth and impressibility, the influence of a strong personal will in the head-master is almost magical. Boys are extremely quick and sensitive. Treat them as if they were men, and they will consider themselves as men, and behave as men to the best of their experience. Nothing is easier than to put a boy upon his honour without formally telling him in set phrase that you are going to do so. Confidence in boys will do more than any code, however carefully enforced. At the French Lycée there is any amount of code, and no confidence. The result is lamentable. Most of the boys in French public schools are bullies, and we are sorry to be obliged to believe that many of them are sneaks, or would certainly be considered such in one of our great schools.

Bullying in public schools is much exaggerated. It is a subject over which humanitarians gush whenever they get the opportunity. It would provide a capital subject for a paper to be read at some "Congress." There is a good deal at public schools that is rough-and-ready. A boy is all the better for this, unless he be sickly or delicate. It does him good to be taught that his eyes were not made for crying. Nor are boys, as a rule, cruel or vindictive. They are fond of violent practical jokes, but it is very seldom, indeed, that they deliberately inflict pain upon the smaller boys. On the other hand, severe injuries are often inflicted both upon delicate and upon strong boys, not in wantonness, but in ignorance. It does not occur to a big boy when he hits a junior over the loins with a hockey-stick that the possible effect of the blow would be death from concussion of the spine. He probably does not even know where the spine is, or what concussion of it may mean, and has no more intention of inflicting injury or of causing lasting pain than if he had administered a stinging, sounding, temporarily distressing, and perfectly harmless blow with the palm of his hand.

A good head-master will take care that the bigger boys have some sort of general knowledge on these matters; and, if he is equal to his position, he will always have a good idea of how things are going on in the school. Isolated cases of oppression are of rare occurrence in a school where there is any public feeling; but systematic oppression may somehow grow up. Boys are very quick at creating usages, very conservative in abiding by them, and very loyal in obeying them. These usages are occasionally very bad. But a head-master who cannot make himself aware of their existence, and cannot suppress them without any needless commotion and disturbance, is not qualified for his position, although he may be a better mathematician than Clifford or a better scholar than Porson.

THE COTTON CORNER.

THE Cotton Corner in Liverpool, which collapsed on Monday last, has excited more general attention throughout the country than any of its predecessors during the past dozen years, and undoubtedly has aroused bitterer feeling in the trade generally. But, except in these respects, it differs little from previous corners. It was made possible by similar conditions, and it is likely to be imitated as long as those conditions remain unchanged. According to a statement made by the leading cornerer, Mr. Steenstrand, he began his operations in December. At that time he had convinced himself that the estimates of the American cotton crop then being gathered, which were accepted in this country, were excessive, and that it would not prove sufficient for the world's demand without a considerable advance in price. As the spinners generally took a different view, and were selling freely what they did not possess, in the hope of being able to buy back more cheaply, he began on a large scale to purchase "futures," as they are called—that is, cotton for future delivery. As his contracts matured he sold the cotton delivered upon the spot, and then began again to buy "futures." He continued these operations to the very end of the season. The spinners were equally obstinate in their policy. They went on selling, in the belief that they would ultimately corner him. The result was such a rise in the price of raw cotton that short time had to be resorted to in May. It was found that the prices of yarn and of cotton cloth could not be raised proportionately to the advance in the raw materials. Both spinners and weavers were consequently losing by their manufactures, and they were obliged to work short time, in the hope of checking the advance in the raw article and raising the price of the manufactured. The market for manufactured goods did not respond; but there was a slight decline in raw cotton, which, however, was only temporary; for in June the price again began to rise, and the position became so serious at the end of July that once more the spinners were obliged to have recourse to short time. This inflicted great losses upon mill-owners, and it threw multitudes of workpeople out of employment. Still the rise went on, and in August the price of raw cotton was actually higher than it had been previously since the close of the War of Secession. As September approached grave apprehensions were excited. It was believed that Mr. Steenstrand had bought very largely for September delivery. And it was feared that those who had sold would be unable to fulfil their contracts; would, therefore, have to submit to whatever conditions he chose to impose; and that many of them, consequently, might be ruined. September, it will be recollected, is the last month of the cotton year, when the old crop is nearly exhausted and the new crop is only beginning to be marketed, and when, therefore, supplies are exceptionally small. The apprehensions continued until Monday, the last day of the month. But on Monday morning it was found that Mr. Steenstrand was a seller, and not a buyer. The price dropped considerably, and the day closed without any difficulties, to the relief of the whole trade. It is now believed that the corner is at an end, and there is much speculation as to what will be the effect upon Mr. Steenstrand. It is said that he holds a very large stock of cotton which he has been as yet unable to sell; and if short time is continued for the next fortnight, as has been suggested, it is assumed that he will be compelled to sell at a great loss. It does not seem probable, however, now that short time will be continued; and, in any event, it is obvious that Mr. Steenstrand must have realized large profits by his operations since December last, and that his prospective losses can hardly exceed those past profits. However, Mr. Steenstrand's fate is of little interest to the general public. What is of concern to them is that measures should be adopted to prevent, as far as possible, for the future the recurrence of these manipulations, which throw into disorder a great industry, and inflict unmerited sufferings upon the working classes, entirely innocent of either bull or bear operations.

It is a remarkable feature of the late corner that it has roused the Trades-Union leaders to action. They have strongly urged upon both spinners and weavers to adopt short time universally for the purpose of promptly and effectually defeating the manipulators, and they have even recommended to their followers to strike in any factories whose owners refused to adopt short time. The advice has not so far been acted upon; but doubtless it had some influence upon the conduct of the cornerers. It has, however, not been altogether welcome to the manufacturers, who see in it an inclination on the part of the Trades-Unions to interfere in matters hitherto supposed to be entirely outside their province. The intervention, for that reason, if for no other, is significant, and supplies another motive to induce the manufacturers to adopt effective measures to prevent corners in future. From what has been said above, it will be seen that the spinners themselves have not been blameless in the matter. Adopting an over-sanguine estimate of last year's American crop, they have engaged in speculation instead of confining themselves to their legitimate business. Had the whole loss, then, fallen upon them they would merit very little sympathy. They proved less astute than their opponents, and they must take the consequences. Unfortunately, the consequences have to be shared by large numbers of innocent people and by the community generally. And it is to be hoped, therefore, that in future they will avoid speculation, and will endeavour to obtain more trustworthy information respecting the crops of the world. We have not very much confidence that they will as a body follow our advice; but we are glad to be able to say that recent experience has made reasonably certain one reform which will make corners more difficult. Hitherto only one kind of American crop—namely, Middling Upland—could be tendered in fulfilment of a future contract. It has now been agreed by the Cotton Brokers' Association and the Spinners' Committee that Good Ordinary may likewise be tendered. And it rests with spinners themselves to insist in the future that this shall be inserted in contracts. It is obvious that, by limiting to a single kind the cotton which makes a good delivery, speculators are encouraged to attempt a corner, for the supply of tenderable cotton is thus artificially limited. The change, therefore, is likely to be beneficial; but, of course, it will not put a stop to manipulation. It will probably be necessary by-and-by to still further increase the kinds of cotton that can be delivered. But even that would not be sufficient. The real cause of these recurring corners year after year is that the cotton manufacture at home and abroad is growing more rapidly than either the cultivation of raw cotton or the demand for manufactured goods. Owing to Protective tariffs abroad and to the increase of wealth and industrial skill, the cotton manufacture is extending itself upon the continent of Europe and in the United States, so much so that the demand in those countries for British goods does not increase. And British manufacturers consequently have to depend upon less advanced countries for a market. But the British manufacture has been growing at the same time, and hitherto there has not been a proportionate increase in the demand of our customers. Partly because of the very large exports to the Far East during the past few years, and partly because of drought in India and famine in China the Indian and Chinese markets are overstocked at the present time. Our manufacturers, therefore, have not been able to raise the prices either of yarn or of cloth sufficiently to enable them to go on working at a profit when the price of raw cotton rose so exceptionally.

The real problem, then, which our manufacturers have to solve is either to increase the supply of raw cotton or to stimulate the demand for manufactured goods. The supply of the raw material might be increased by an augmented use of Indian and other cotton. American is found by experience to suit our manufacturers best; but it surely cannot be impossible to improve the Indian cultivation, and it would seem worth the while of our manufacturers to turn their attention in that direction. But it is to the opening up of new markets that they must mainly look for the removal of their difficulties. The industry will continue to grow at home and abroad, and however the cultivation of the raw material may be stimulated, embarrassment will recur from time to time unless in some way the demand for manufactured articles can be steadily increased. Economies in manufacture may do something, though not much. The real remedy is larger markets. There is no doubt that the recent growth of the cotton industry in Bombay is seriously embarrassing our manufacturers. Not only are the Bombay mills competing with us in India, but they are also very keenly competing with us in China. They have the great advantage of being very near to the spot where raw cotton is grown. Still, if our manufacturers would pay more attention than they do at present to the habits and idiosyncrasies of foreign customers, they would undoubtedly be better able to sustain this and other competition. They are too much disposed to force upon their customers the kinds of goods they have been accustomed to make, and too little inclined to humour their fancies. That is not the way in which the industry was originally built up. But, however careful our manufacturers may be in adapting themselves to the requirements of existing markets, there is unquestionably a need for opening up new markets, and this year's corner will prove to be a blessing in disguise if it convinces manufacturers generally that the growth of the industry is more rapid than that of the cultivation of the raw material, or the demand for manufactured goods, and, therefore, induces them to turn their attention more seriously than heretofore to stimulating the demand of their old customers, and to opening up new markets. As yet they seem strangely unwilling to accept this view, insisting that the whole mischief has been worked by speculators. But surely it is impossible that any speculators, however powerful, could season after season for fully a dozen years succeed by manipulation in making a "squeeze" every August and September. Even now the stock of cotton in Liverpool does not very greatly exceed the stock at this time last year, although short time has been worked so long, and multitudes of factories have been closed altogether. It is clear that, if all the mills had continued working full time up to the present, there would have been a real scarcity of supply, and the price would have risen very much higher than it has done. Speculation in so great a market is possible only when circumstances favour it. No impartial observer will believe that speculation such as Mr. Steenstrand's could have been continued from December to the end of the following September if the supply of raw cotton had been fully sufficient for all the requirements of the world. Mr. Steenstrand saw that it was not. His opponents were blind to the fact, and hence he was able to continue his operations so long.

GUSTAVE FLAUBERT AND HIS WORK.

A COMPREHENSIVE account of Flaubert and of his place in French literature is yet to be written in his own country, while in England he is still hardly known even among those who have learnt French and who are more or less accustomed to read it. There is no nearer approach to a life of Flaubert than the recollections and anecdotes embodied in certain chapters of M. Maxime du Camp's Souvenirs Littéraires; and some of Flaubert's surviving friends would not advise us, we believe, to accept M. Maxime du Camp as an unimpeachable witness. In England an attempt has been made to familiarize our public with Flaubert by translation—yea, by two rival translations—of Salammô. We do not know what the English public has thought of it; but we do know that modern French prose is one of the most difficult languages to translate, Flaubert not the least difficult author in that language, and Salammô the very last of his works which we should commend to a new reader by way of introduction. If we are asked what we do commend to an English reader still unacquainted with Flaubert, we should be disposed to name the volume of letters to George Sand published a few years ago; not in a translation, of course, but we do not know that there is one. The reader cannot well help learning from these letters, if he knows anything of human nature, that Flaubert was far indeed from being a cynic or a mere coiner of phrases; and, if he knows anything of the French language, that Flaubert was among the writers (they are by no means a large number) who have been true and consummate masters of it.

More lately two other volumes of letters have appeared, the second of them in the present year (Gustave Flaubert: Correspondance, deuxième série, 1850-1854. Paris: Charpentier. 1889). They are of earlier date than those addressed to George Sand, and most of them are to a lady described as Mme. X., whose real name is easily known, but who never became so well known by her writings as Flaubert thought that she could and ought to be. Perhaps there is not quite so much human interest as in the later interchange of thoughts with a correspondent who (whatever Mme. X.'s possibilities may have been) was certainly greater than Mme. X. But there is exquisite observation, vigorous and sincere judgment, and brilliant accounts of travelling in the Levant and Egypt when Egypt was still almost untouched by European civilization. And for students of literature there is matter of more peculiar interest, the full and repeated exposition of the way in which Flaubert conceived the duty of a man of letters. If prejudices about French frivolity still haunt any English people who can read French, these letters ought to dispel them. It is the old story that genius is not an unaccountable power of doing great things without expending work on them; but, on the contrary, an infinite faculty of taking pains. We find in Flaubert a hard-headed and clear-headed Frenchman of the Northern kind, a severe but a just critic, and always most severe in dealing with his own work. Indeed, it was his misfortune to combine fastidious severity of judgment with a slowness and difficulty in production which almost amounted to a physical impediment. A sceptical intellect was added to all this. Flaubert could hardly put unreserved trust in anything or anybody, and he was least of all able to take refuge, as many professed critics do, in being satisfied with himself.

In this volume we see Flaubert at work on Madame Bovary; he is always rewriting, recasting, censuring his own performance.

Weeks pass during which he cannot frame as many pages to his liking. Whole scenes and chapters are condemned without mercy when they are at the point of completion. The episode of the Comices agricoles, which came out as one of the finest pieces of descriptive satire in modern literature, cost its author untold toil and trouble. In short, Flaubert protested stoutly against the conventions and the formalism which for two centuries have done their best to ruin the French language and letters; but he did so without the least expectation or desire of making things easier either to himself or to those who should come after. He set before himself a standard higher and harder than the old academical ones, higher because not limited by formulas, harder because not reducible to them. And this was also the essence of his uncompromising condition, often laid down in various forms, that an artist must work in and for his art alone, leaving external considerations of all kinds to those whose business it may be. It was no other doctrine than this of Flaubert's, expressed with a certain abundance of zeal still young, and a certain wilful delight in verbal paradox, that Mr. Swinburne (wherever he first found it) declared to the British public in his Essay on Blake, now many years ago, to the no small fluttering of the academic doves. Of course the doctrine is perfectly sound, and of course it is intolerable to the semi-literate people who think that the object and end of education is to avoid seeing with one's own eyes and hearing with one's own ears. If proof of it be required, it is enough to point to the fate of even the great ones when they violate the first law of art; Wordsworth is, perhaps, among ourselves the most conclusive example. Art, like nature, knows nothing of forgiveness, and is merciless to the just as well as to the unjust. Flaubert's contempt for ready-made opinions went to the length of holding that a man is already lost who sets out with the fixed intention of arriving at a decided opinion of any kind. The demand for conclusions at any price inevitably leads to a bad bargain. Towards the end of the earlier volume of letters this precept is condensed in the sentence, "La bêtise consiste à vouloir conclure."

One may admit that Flaubert's artistic conscience ran at times into fanaticism. He seems to have dreamed of an ideal style which would make the matter absolutely indifferent; "Le fait se distille dans la forme." He spoke now and again as if style were still in its infancy:—

Je répète encore une fois [he once writes] que jusqu'à nous, jusqu'aux très-modernes, on n'avait pas l'idée de l'harmonie soutenue du style . . . voilà mon opinion, plus je vais, moins je trouve les autres, et moi aussi, bon.

But it must not be supposed that this fastidiousness made Flaubert a pedantic or narrow judge of the great masters. Let us not pretend, he says, that the greatest writers or artists are faultless; let us acknowledge that they could afford their faults, and beware of thinking that we can afford the like. Of Shakespeare he says:—

Ce n'était pas un homme, mais un continent; il y avait des grands hommes en lui, des foules entières, des paysages; ils n'ont pas besoin de faire du style, ceux-là, ils sont forts en dépit de toutes les fautes et à cause d'elles; mais nous, les petits, nous ne valons que par l'exécution achevée. Hugo en ce siècle enfonce tout le monde, quoiqu'il soit plein de mauvaises choses, mais quel souffle! Quel souffle! Je hasarde ici une proposition que je n'oserais dire nulle part: c'est que les très grands hommes écrivent souvent fort mal et tant mieux pour eux.

We have been recommending Flaubert to students of French, of modern letters, and of human nature, rather than to the reader merely in search of amusement, who, nevertheless, may as well try Flaubert as not. Of Flaubert's own character—an extremely interesting one, both in itself and in relation to his work—we have said nothing; and of the still pending controversy as to the claims of certain living writers to represent his doctrine and method we do not mean to say anything.

NEWMARKET FIRST OCTOBER MEETING.

WE are not afraid of exaggeration in saying that the day on which the autumn campaign at Newmarket opened was one of the wettest and most miserable that can be remembered at a race-meeting on the famous Heath. So heavy was the rain during the first race that one of the jockeys weighed 2 lbs. heavier after his soaking than beforehand. That event was the Triennial Produce Stakes of 565*l.* for four-year-olds, which was run for from the Ditch to the old Cambridgeshire-course winning-post at the town end of the Heath, a distance of more than two miles. The race was chiefly interesting because it was understood to be a sort of indirect trial for Mr. Vyner's Cesarewitch filly, Fallow Chat, whose stable-companion, Countess Lilian, was now to run against the big and powerful, if somewhat roguish, Benburb, and Grafton, a horse that was said to have been purchased this year for 2,000*l.* Countess Lilian was the favourite, and she made the running to the point where the course across the flat joins the old Cambridgeshire course, and then she was eased up the hill; but more than a quarter of a mile from the finish she was again ridden to the front, and she won very easily by three lengths, Benburb being second, and Grafton a bad third. Fallow Chat's position in the betting for the Cesarewitch was not very greatly affected by this victory of Countess Lilian's, since its value as a trial was seriously diminished by the obvious deterioration (to say nothing of the rumoured roaring) of Grafton, who now at even weights finished far behind Benburb, whereas last year he had beaten Benburb twice, although giving him weight on each occasion; practically, therefore, all that could be said for the well-shaped Countess Lilian was that she beat Benburb, a horse that had only won one race out of seventeen during his three seasons on the turf. It was stated in a daily paper that she was sold after the race for a brood mare, and that she was already believed to be in foal to Riversdale. The tenth anniversary of the Great Foal Stakes brought out Pioneer, Wishing Gate, Swift, Gold, and Scottish Fusilier, whom we have named in the order of their favouritism. Pioneer, who at Ascot had given Swift 7 lbs. and beaten him by a length and a half, could now only beat him by a head when meeting him on 3 lbs. better terms; but Wishing Gate confirmed her Kempton Park form with Swift by beating him by three lengths. The probability is that the course was about a quarter of a mile too long for Pioneer, for he had shown himself to be a non-stayer in several other races this season. Wishing Gate, although a strong, deep-bodied filly, in short of the very stamp for a course so heavy as that traversed on this occasion, is nevertheless somewhat below the class of most winners of the Great Foal Stakes, among whom were Rayon d'Or, Robert the Devil, Dutch Oven, Ossian, Melton, Ormonde, Réve d'Or, and Ayrshire. It is reported that Wishing Gate has been occasionally lame, otherwise from her good looks more might have been expected of her; it is, however, but fair to say that in her two victories she has won 2,459*l.* The immediate effect of her last race was to make her first favourite for the Cambridgeshire. Semolina and Riviera spoiled the Boscawen Stakes and the Buckingham Stakes, as Riviera walked over for the latter; while Semolina, although nominally opposed, started for the former with 20 to 1 laid on her, and won it as she liked. Her winnings in stakes now amounted to 8,910*l.* 8*s.*

There was a great improvement in the weather on the Wednesday, when there was a heavy list of ten races on the card. The field for the first furnished an example of the uncertainty of breeding, as the only starters, two fillies out of the splendid mares Thebais and Belinda, with Isonomy and Lowland Chief as their sires, were a miserable-looking pair. The Granby Plate, for two-year-olds, was won by an American-bred colt imported by Mr. L. de Rothschild and called Polonius. He is by the Derby winner, St. Blaise, who has been a very successful sire in America, and the son is not unlike the father either in colour or in shape. This reminds us that Ormonde has at last sailed for South America, where he will stand at Señor Bocau's stud-farm. The Triennial Produce Stakes only brought out three competitors, Swift, Ormuz, and Cherry Bounce, of which Swift was the favourite; but it is probable that he had not recovered from his struggle with Pioneer for second place in the Great Foal Stakes of the previous day, as he never could reach the Duke of Westminster's strongly-built Ormuz, who gave him 7 lbs., made all the running, and won by a length. Lord Ellesmere, who has been out of luck this season, succeeded in winning two races in the course of the day; the first was a Nursery Handicap, which he won with Jungfrau, a fine filly with fired hocks, that started at 16 to 1, and the second was the Great Eastern Railway Handicap, which fell to his six-year-old mare Cataract, who had run seven times this year without winning a race, and was meeting St. Patrick, the fourth for the Lancashire Plate four days earlier, at an advantage of 20 lbs., at weight for age. Cataract ought to make a splendid brood mare, as she is one of the best shaped on the turf, with great length, and her sire is of Touchstone and Baron blood, while her dam was of Baron and Touchstone. The Hopeful Stakes unfortunately ended in a walk over, as nothing was brought out to oppose Baron Rothschild's Le Nord, the colt that had made such a fine race with Riviera for the Champagne Stakes at Doncaster. The Duke of Portland's Memoir, the Duke of Westminster's Orwell, and Lord Zetland's Fontainebleau finished in the above order (which was the same as that of the betting) for the Fifth Zetland Stakes. Memoir, who had been a 1,500-guinea yearling, was somewhat plain looking early in the season, but she has improved very much in the course of it.

In place of the mud of the Tuesday and the Wednesday there was actually some rather unpleasant dust on the Thursday. Backers laid odds too freely on Mr. Houldsworth's Carrick for the Rutland Plate for two-year-olds, as a favourite with 3 to 1 on him ought scarcely to have required pressing to win by three-quarters of a length. Sharp-eyed people thought that Mr. Combe's Bauble had run too well in the Breeder's Foal Stakes at Manchester, six days earlier, to be handicapped so low as 5 st. 11 lbs. for the Scurry Nursery, and they proved to be right; for, after starting first favourite, she won the race from sixteen opponents. But, if the handicapper was in the wrong, there was some excuse for him, as the best that Bauble had done at Manchester was to run forward until nearing the distance, before reaching which she was thoroughly beaten; nor did she finish in the first half-dozen. Lord Dudley's beautiful filly, Formidable, with 25 to 1 laid on her, won the Snailwell Stakes in the commonest of canters, although she was giving 25 lbs. each to two of her field and 22 lbs. to another. The critics were all agreed in their admiration of this white-legged chestnut, who has grown considerably since her first race in May, when she was considered much too small. The favourites had already won four races in succession when backers laid 5 to 2 freely on the Duke of Hamilton's Loup for the Triennial Produce Stakes of 658*l.* This time they were destined to meet with a reverse, for Loup was unable to give 8 lbs. to the Duke of Hamilton's Orwell, an extreme outsider at 33 to 1, that beat him by half a length. Less than twenty-four hours earlier Orwell had been easily beaten by Memoir, who had finished far behind Loup for the Chesterfield Stakes in July, when receiving 10 lbs. from that colt. It must not be forgotten, however, that Orwell ran Signorina to a head at Sandown in June, when receiving 12 lbs., or the equivalent of 15 lbs., at weight for sex, and he is well bred enough to please the most fastidious, being by Ormonde's sire and out of a sister to Ormonde's dam. It was reported that one "plunger" netted nearly 5,000*l.* by his victory. The October Handicap was won very easily by Mr. Clayton's St. Helen, whose merits, as we have hinted on more than one occasion, we are inclined to think Major Egerton has underestimated this season, much as we hesitate to pit our opinion against that of so consummate and unimpeachable a professor of the difficult art of handicapping. Lord Dudley's remarkably good-looking colt, Merry Monk, who had cost him 2,250 guineas as a yearling, was made the favourite for a Maiden Plate; but he ran in a rather cowardly fashion; for, after apparently having the race in hand, he allowed himself to be beaten by Mr. H. Milner's Shrine, a small and light, though wiry, daughter of the famous mare, Pilgrimage. At Stockbridge, Ormuz had beaten Pinzon by a neck at even weights for the Zetland Stakes, and now he had to give him 5 lbs. for a race of the same name. As the betting foretold, the weight turned the scale, and Pinzon won by two lengths.

The American Polonius, the winner of the Granby Plate on the Wednesday, started a strong favourite for the first race on the Friday. His extra weight, however, stopped him, and he only ran third to Lord Calthorpe's Woodnymph, a large-framed, if rather rough-looking, chestnut filly by Hermit that had been one of the nine yearlings which Lord Calthorpe purchased from Mr. Chaplin for (it is said) 10,000*l.* As was expected, Riviera won the Rous Memorial Stakes; but there was a grand race for second between Fear Disgrace, Carrick, and Barcarolle, who finished in a cluster; and although Riviera won pretty easily at last, she was rather fractious at the starting-post, and she had to be ridden out to win by a length and a half from Fear Disgrace. San Marino won her second race of the week and her fifth of the year, in a Selling Plate; indeed, all her victories have been in selling races. After nine unsuccessful attempts during the season, Mr. Hibbert's Parga at last won a race in the Moulton Handicap. She had "run the weight off her back," as the saying is, to such an extent that she was receiving nearly 3 st. from St. Symphorien, a colt of the same age, who started first favourite. Last year this hardworking filly ran in no less than nineteen races, of which she won five. Prince Soltyskoff's Gold, a winner of more than 3,000*l.* last season, met with his ninth successive defeat of this year in the Newmarket St. Leger, which was won by Lord Durham's Testator, who had been backed a good deal for the Cesarewitch. Both colts, as well as their jockeys, seemed thoroughly done at the end of their hard struggle over the long "Ditch In" course.

CROWN PATRONAGE IN SCOTLAND.

HOME Rule for Scotland has become a popular cry among the wilder Radicals and obscurer fanatics of the Northern kingdom. It is echoed in Dundee; it is repeated on the platforms from which Mr. Seymour Keay declaims those Socialistic platitudes for which his "great leader" assures him that not six men in the House of Commons will be found to vote.

What Home Rule for Scotland really means, what it would amount to, and by whom it would be conducted, are points on which its advocates give us no information. When a question is thus left in obscurity, it is always interesting and advantageous to have side-lights thrown upon it which help to illuminate its latent features. Such a side-light has been thrown on this question by a recent correspondence between the Secretary of State for Scotland and a leading luminary of the Scottish Church. Having considered the subject with the aid thus afforded us, we should be inclined to say that Home Rule for Scotland might be described, in one at least of its departments, as wrongheadedness tempered by fanaticism. It is no part of our business to defend Lord Lothian's administration of Government patronage in appointments to Chairs in the Scotch Universities. Among these were three appointments to Theological Chairs, two in the University of Aberdeen and one in the University of St. Andrews. The selection made in the first two cases met with general approval. In the first instance, Lord Lothian appointed to the vacant Chair of Oriental Languages in Aberdeen Mr. Kennedy, who, we understand, was beyond comparison the ablest and most promising of the younger Hebrew scholars in the Kirk. In the second, he appointed to the Chair of Church History in the same University Dr. Cowan, who, if not equally distinguished as a scholar, was understood to enjoy the support and confidence of a large and influential party in the Church. To the Chair of Biblical Criticism in St. Andrews he appointed Dr. Menzies, the translator of several highly important German theological works, a contributor of the article "Church of Scotland" in the last edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, and a man universally respected in the Church for his high character and thorough scholarship. The Rev. Dr. Flint, Professor of Systematic Theology in the University of Edinburgh, thought not well of Dr. Menzies's appointment. Dr. Flint is a man well known, far beyond the bounds of Scotland, for his philosophical and theological acquirements. Some one appears to have told Dr. Flint that Dr. Menzies was hard of hearing, and, like Moses, slow of speech; and from the correspondence we have seen in the Scotch papers we infer that the Rev. Professor had in reserve a candidate of his own, whom he wished to see promoted to the post of Professor at St. Andrews. Possibly Dr. Flint's information was correct, and there was no harm in his desiring the preferment of his own friend and protégé; but the remarkable fact, the fact throwing a lurid light on the possible administration of patronage under a system of Home Rule, which would give men like Dr. Flint a much directer influence than they can exercise under the existing régime, is that he should have thought it decent and proper to assume the position of Reviser-General of Crown Patronage, and angrily cross-examine Lord Lothian as to his reasons for appointing Dr. Menzies. He wrote in a very dictatorial tone, demanding if, previous to making the appointment, Lord Lothian had taken care to have a personal interview with that gentleman; and, on his correspondent most properly declining to inform him, he proceeded to criticize the appointment in perhaps the most singular letter ever addressed to a Secretary of State. It is a curious illustration of the pettiness of view from which a man moving in a small circle and occupied with the idea of his own importance is apt to suffer that in this letter Dr. Flint, while professing a high regard for the interests of Scotch theology, should have thought it appropriate, first of all to complain to Lord Lothian of his having had to pay twopence for his letter, and next to repeat the substance of the random gossip which had reached him about Dr. Menzies's "physical infirmities."

Not content with this, he proceeded to impugn the whole system of Crown patronage as applied to the Scotch Theological Chairs, and roundly charged the Scotch Secretary with being guided in his administration of it by merely personal and political motives. We believe that, in point of fact, there is not the slightest ground for this offensive charge, and that in at least two out of the three recent appointments Lord Lothian selected men whose political opinions were diametrically opposed to his own; but that the charge should have been brought, and brought by a man in a prominent position, shows how much Scotland has yet to learn ere its exercise of Home Rule would be salutary. Dr. Flint's letters are interesting in many ways; they show us that the race of the Habakkuk Mucklewraths and Ephraim Macbriars still survives north of the Tweed. No Covenanting martyr ever climbed the lofty ladder with a profounder conviction of the infallibility of his own opinions and the righteousness of his own cause than Dr. Flint entertained when he attacked Lord Lothian. He reprobated his exercise of patronage, not, he maintains, because of any personal interest in the matter, but because he knew that, in the cases he condemned, the right man had been passed over, and the wrong man had got the place. Dr. Flint knew it, and that was quite enough. The impropriety of a private person noisily challenging the action of a Minister of the Crown was a trifle of no weight; the feelings of Dr. Menzies, publicly accused of being deaf and inarticulate, were not to be considered. A wrong man had been chosen. Dr. Flint was bound to expose the mischief, and expose it he would. Nay, he promises to do so in future whenever an occasion occurs. "Any appointment," he says in his last letter, "any appointment to a Theological Chair which seems to me unjust, I shall not hesitate to endeavour to expose, whether it gives offence to the patron and pain to the presentee or not." One is astounded at the self-confidence which prompts such a declaration.

The administration of patronage in the Scotch Universities is of a rather mixed kind. One or two Chairs are still in the gift of private patrons; some, in Glasgow, Aberdeen, and St. Andrews, are in the gift of the University Courts; some, in Edinburgh, in the gift of the Board of "Curators"; and several, in all the Universities, are in the gift of the Crown. We venture to say that the appointments made by the Crown will bear a favourable comparison with those made by any of the other patrons. Dr. Flint characterizes the Crown patronage of Theological Chairs as a "mischievous absurdity," whose continuance his present correspondence with Lord Lothian is certain to abridge. He is egregiously mistaken. The only conclusion to which a perusal of that correspondence will lead all sensible men is that the Crown patronage is infinitely preferable to any substitute for it which would be more satisfactory to such a critic as Dr. Flint.

ICELAND.

WE learn from Iceland that a young geologist, Dr. Thorodd Thoroddsen of Reykjavik, who has before now distinguished himself in expeditions to little-known parts of his native country, has returned from a journey which has had results of a very important geographical nature. The magnificent survey map of Iceland has a peculiarity which must instantly strike the eye—namely, a vast patch of pure white nothingness in the centre of the eastern portion of the island. This is the district of the huge volcanic tableland, surrounded by glaciers, known as the Vatnajökull or Klfajökull, which has hitherto been absolutely impenetrable, and as wholly unknown to science as the centre of equatorial Africa or the northern confines of Greenland. It is this terra incognita which Dr. Thoroddsen has attacked this summer, and with remarkable success. He approached it, not, as has been the case with previous and unsuccessful explorers, from Husavik or any other port on the eastern coast, but steadily up the long incline from the west. To travel in the neighbourhood of the Vatnajökull is exceedingly difficult, partly on account of the rapidity of the volcanic streams, and partly because there is no fodder of any kind for the horses. After toiling for three days north of the rivers which form the watershed of the Hekla district, so avoiding having to cross the lower waters of the Thorsá, Dr. Thoroddsen found himself at last in the midst of three unknown streams of obsidian not laid down in any of the survey-charts. Further on he discovered a long and narrow lake, between thirty and forty miles in length, certainly the largest piece of inland water in Iceland. He christened this lake by the name of Langisjör, or Lake Long. It lies high up along the edge of the glacier, and its waters are of that peculiar milky-white colour which is generally found in glacier rivers. This was the most striking of Dr. Thoroddsen's discoveries; but he has added the course of several streams to the map of Iceland, besides gaining a great deal of valuable geological information of a novel character.

It strikes us as possible that the existence of this newly-discovered lake may have been known to the Icelanders of classic times, and that a trace of that knowledge may survive in the name of the mysterious mountain, Vatnajökull meaning the glacier of the fresh water, vatn. This latter term is used, no doubt, for streams, but less often and less characteristically than for lakes, vatnbátr, for example, being a lake-boat, not a boat to be used on all species of fresh water. We are not aware of any passage in the Sagas in which the Vatnajökull is mentioned. Probably from the earliest times its environment, if less inaccessible than at present, was extremely sterile and forbidding.

MONEY MATTERS.

AT the beginning of the week the money market was excited and anxious. Bill-brokers were running from bank to bank endeavouring to make up the amounts they required by borrowing a little wherever it could be obtained. They freely paid from $5\frac{1}{2}$ to 6 per cent., and in some cases as much as $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. was paid for loans for a month on the security of Treasury Bills. Yet the scarcity in the outside market was such that the Bank of England lent over 3 millions in the week ended Wednesday night at 6 per cent. Suddenly on Wednesday there was a complete change. Money, that had been so scarce, all at once became plentiful. The demand for it unexpectedly died away, and the rate of interest fell, first, to $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and then gradually, on the following day, to $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The rate of discount at the same time declined from about $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. to about $4\frac{1}{8}$ per cent. At the end of September there is always an outflow of coin and notes to the country, and this year it has been exceptionally large. At the same time there were withdrawals of gold from the Bank of England on a considerable scale for foreign countries, and it was rumoured that the demand for Brazil was likely to be enormous; while a considerable amount would be required also for South Africa, Egypt, and other places. On Wednesday the Bank of England unwisely, as we venture to think, decided to repay money it had borrowed, and thus added to the supply in the outside market. At the same time it was announced that, on the order of Messrs. Rothschild, 200,000*l.* in gold were shipped from New York either for London or for Rio de Janeiro; and that gold was coming from Australia, Holland, and Belgium. On Thursday, too, the Paris exchange upon London rose so as to inspire the hope that the metal would be received from Paris likewise. Therefore the fear of a great stringency all at once disappeared, and over-confidence took its place. Brazil is reforming its circulation. It requires for this purpose a large amount of gold, and it has the means of taking the gold from London. Nobody can be sure that it will not, therefore, withdraw so much of the metal as may seriously disturb the market. And it is almost certain that it will do so if the rates of interest and discount continue so low as they have now become. On the other hand, the amount of gold that can be obtained from New York, Belgium, and Holland is not enough. This market will not be safe until a considerable amount can be obtained from the Bank of France.

The flurry in the money market has for the moment stopped speculation on the Stock Exchange. When borrowers had to pay as much as $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the security of Treasury Bills, it became obvious that, were a scare to again occur, they might be unable to obtain accommodation on any conditions whatever on worse security. It is true that Messrs. Rothschild, in the midst of the apprehension, brought out a Brazilian Conversion loan of 20 millions sterling, but even they found it necessary to take measures to reassure the investing public. Smaller people have thought it wise not to increase their risks. The railway traffic returns are exceedingly good, but they attract few or no buyers. International securities are left to the care of the Continental Bourses. And though the New York Stock Market is remarkably firm seeing how agitated is the New York Money Market, yet London speculators are not tempted to deal in American railroad securities. Even Transvaal land shares, diamond shares, and gold shares are neglected, and prices have considerably declined during the week, though on Thursday there was a small boom in the shares of the Anglo-Asiatic Exploration Company, which were run up from 100 to 1,000, and closed at about 850. The whole of the capital of the Company is only 15,000*l.* In New York the stringency in the money market, according to all past experience, ought now to be at an end, since the coin and notes which went out to move the wheat crop ought to be flowing back. The indications, therefore, seem to point to an active speculation in New York in the immediate future. But here as long as uncertainty about money continues speculation will be too dangerous to be engaged in by many. The Liquidation on the Paris Bourse ends to-day. To-morrow the elections to the Chambers will be completed, and the Paris Money Market is exceedingly easy. There is expected to be an increase in business on the Bourse next week. But in Berlin the money market is troubled. The Imperial Bank raised its rate of discount on Thursday to 5 per cent. And, moreover, speculation has been carried so far that it is difficult to see how it can be carried further.

The Brazilian Government is acting wisely in availing itself of an opportunity when Conversion is in fashion to reduce the interest upon its debt. But the plan of Conversion adopted is very faulty. Practically the Four-and-a-half per Cents and the Five per Cents have for some time past stood at about the same price. Therefore, if the Brazilian Government had pledged itself not to convert again for a certain number of years, and had offered to exchange the Five per Cents into Four-and-a-half per Cents at par, it is highly probable that it would have been successful. If so, it would not have increased the capital of the debt, and it would have saved nearly 90,000*l.* a year; instead of doing this, however, it has proposed to convert the Fives into Fours; but the Four per Cents are brought out at the price of 90, and a bonus of 1½ per cent. is also offered. The result is that about 2½ millions sterling are added to the capital of the debt, and only about 75,000*l.* a year is saved. Thus the Brazilian Government puts it out of its power to effect further savings in the future. It actually saves less at present than it would have done by offering Four-and-a-half per Cents, and it increases its debt 2½ millions sterling. This is a small matter compared with other mistakes of the Brazilian Government. That Government is now entering upon a course which will involve it in the very gravest difficulties if it does not exercise the greatest care and judgment.

It is reported that the Italian Government has agreed with Herr Bleichröder of Berlin for the issue in that city of Italian Railway Obligations bearing 3 per cent. interest. It is said that Herr Bleichröder pays only about 50 for what he takes firm, and that the issue price to the public will be 3 or 4 points higher. The difficulties of the Italian Government are notorious, and it certainly has made a good bargain if the report be true. It has made more than one effort in London to place the bonds, but without success. In the present state of the relations between France and Italy, of course an Italian issue in Paris is out of the question, and, therefore, it has been fortunate in making so good an arrangement in Berlin. The loan, however, will only afford temporary relief. Unless the Government is to involve itself in inextricable difficulties, it ought without delay to effect retrenchment in every direction compatible with the national interests.

THE DEAD HEART.

A GREAT MANY suggestions have been made as to the source from which The Dead Heart was taken, and Maison Rouge has been quoted as if no one had ever heard of the famous situation at its end. As to this, however, it is worth further noting that in the play, as in the novel, it is the light-hearted young man (called Lorin in the play) who sacrifices himself for his friend. Yet, again, it may be that the piece owes something to one of the best-known novels in the world—Monte Cristo. (Zanoni has also been mentioned in this connexion.) Landry, with variations, of course, is the Count; Catherine Duval is Mercedes; and the other principal characters of both works will be found to match, allowance being of course made for the alteration and search for novelty that an adapter who wished to ignore the source of his inspiration would naturally introduce. It certainly seems to us in the highest degree probable that, if Alexandre Dumas had not been staying at Florence in 1841, and had not been requested by Prince Jerome Napoleon to take his son for a yachting expedition and “teach him France,” the stage of the Lyceum Theatre would now be occupied with something other than The Dead Heart. To show wherein the characters of the drama lack character would be a futile operation. Opportunities are sometimes missed; but a writer of Adelphi pieces thirty years ago had little thought of anything except of obtaining applause for “situations” which would be likely to prolong to the fullest possible extent the run of his play. Writers of the period, however, hit on excellent ideas, and The Dead Heart is rich in effective scenes, especially in those which surround the part of Landry. If we can refrain from inquiring too curiously into motives, Landry is throughout the play an extremely forcible part, and when Mr. Irving brings to bear upon it his power and extraordinary personality the result is of necessity deeply interesting and impressive. Sympathy is awakened for the young sculptor when it is seen how deadly and determined are the enemies upon his track; and Mr. Irving has never played with more lightness and ease than in the earlier scenes of this work. His opportune arrival in Catherine's chamber while she is repulsing the Comte de St.-Valéry, followed by his doubts of Catherine's fidelity—which ought not, it may be, to overtake a hero of melodrama about his heroine, for the blindness of their faith in each other is often the measure of the audience's approval, but are here telling enough—and his unexpected arrest by a file of soldiers led by the treacherous Abbé Latour form stirring episodes; and then we have the attack on the Bastille and the resurrection of Landry. Landry has had no mysterious friend in his dungeon, such as the hero of Dumas's novel found, to keep alive his mind and furnish the most terrible of lives with a strange interest. At the same time the sympathy of the audience is so surely enlisted on behalf of the victim, the “situation” is so strong, that an actor of very ordinary power could not well fail to make an effect. The awakening of Landry to mental life is a really great situation for a great actor, and Mr. Irving so treats it as to leave an ineffaceable picture on the memory. The danger of so striking a situation, such a piece of acting, is that there may be a disappointment after it. This is not so; Mr. Irving, in an astonishing degree, increases his hold on the spectator. Landry is certainly Monte-Cristo-like in his inflexible determination to deal with his enemies, and both men have about them the same indomitable resolve which presents each in the aspect of avenging Fate.

In two scenes Mr. Irving is simply sublime: he touches the limits of his art. These are the meeting with the Abbé Latour, whom he has summoned from his dungeon to the room in the prison where the victim of the Bastille now holds sway, and the interview with Catherine at the foot of the guillotine in the early morning of the day that is to end her young son's life. Latour, who would otherwise be executed, is to be allowed to fight for his life, to cross swords with the man against whom he has committed the deadly wrong; but one feels from the moment the treacherous Abbé enters the chamber that he is inevitably doomed. By what means Mr. Irving is able thus to impress his audience we cannot pretend to say. There is an unsurpassable dignity in his bearing, but more than dignity is needed. It is impossible to see the play, however, without experiencing the sentiment indicated; and the fight, when presently it comes, is of altogether startling reality. The weapons are the cut-and-thrust military swords of the period, and with these M. Bertrand, that past-master of stage-fencing, has devised a fight which we have never seen equalled for correctness and brilliancy. The swordsmanship both of Mr. Irving and Mr. Bancroft is as striking and as seemingly spontaneous as is M. Bertrand's invention. The Abbé's treacherous attempt before his adversary is on guard is a forcible touch, and nothing could be better than the final lunge which kills Latour. He has thrust at Landry and overreached, whereupon Landry, using a method once familiar in Italian fencing, plunges his sword into his enemy's breast. What is perhaps most remarkable in Mr. Irving's acting in this scene is the complete and masterly repose, which marks the highest control of the actor's art. The scene with Catherine before the scaffold is no less fine. The dim light, and the sudden glint of an early sunbeam on the knife of the guillotine as morning breaks—an hour after dawn the slaughter is to begin once more—greatly aid the effect, if it be not a species of injustice to comment on merely mechanical devices when speaking of such an actor and actress; and Mr. Irving's mysterious gift of dominating spectators, even when no word is spoken, is most strikingly displayed in the final tableau, where, having resolved to yield up his own life to save the son of the woman he loved, Landry stands erect on the platform of the guillotine, gazing for the last time upon the world he is to leave. No doubt the situation does much, but we recognize an inexplicable something in feature and attitude which proclaims the result of inspiration and skill combined. Miss Terry is winsome and charming in her early scene with her lover at the “Belle Jardinière,” and heartbroken at the suspicion directed against her when Landry finds St.-Valéry in her room. There is the genuine ring of pathos, again, in her prayer to Landry for her son's life. The character, it is needless to say, could not be better played. Perhaps the best study of the period is the Abbé Latour, and Mr. Bancroft, as was naturally to be expected, shows an excellent appreciation of the sentiments which would have swayed the aristocrat of that day—the eve and the fierce noon of the Revolution. It is not quite that the Abbé regards the people simply with contempt—he evidently does not suppose that they belong to the same order of created beings as himself and his equals; and this is the true reading. He is a brave man, and his complete indifference to the howls of the mob as his captors lead him to the Conciergerie is particularly well expressed. He condescends somewhat—perhaps a thought too much—when found in the cell under the wardship of Toupet; but the final scene with Landry is fully admirable. Brave as he is, for a moment he falters, for he feels his hour is come; but his courage revives, and he dies with a last struggle to cry “Long live the King!” The exhibition of the handkerchief he has pressed to his wound, stained with arterial blood, is an effective touch, quite permissible in melodrama. It is gratifying to recognize the merit of Mr. Gordon Craig's earnest and sympathetic performance of the younger St.-Valéry; and Mr. Arthur Stirling well understands what to do with the part of Legrand. Miss Kate Phillips's vivacious representation of Cerisette affords some relief; and Mr. Righton's Toupet, if not very comic, is at least not obtrusive. With what energy and reality the mob which attacks the Bastille and clusters round the gate of the Conciergerie conducts itself need not be described, seeing that Mr. Irving has himself drilled his people; nor can it be necessary to say that the piece is put upon the stage in the matter of scenery and costume with the most perfect taste and judgment. That is a matter of course at the Lyceum. Mr. Jacobi's music shows him to be possessed of more dramatic capacity than a hearing of his tuneful ballets suggests.

AN ETONIAN SYMPOSIUM.

"I'll sing you a good old song," he said, "to a wholly novel tune,
Of little boys compelled to fag the live-long afternoon"—
But scarce would he have sung that song had he but known how soon
And with what stern decision he'd be written down a spoon
By a "Well-known Old Harrovian," all of an unknown time.

Alas! poor "Etonensis"! he had talked, perhaps in joke,
Of some "new tyranny" that bowed his boy beneath its yoke.
How humbled then he must have felt, how sorry that he spoke,
When on his own devoted head he brought the crushing stroke
Of the "Well-known Old Harrovian" of a less well-known time.

Yes, when the W.-K. O. H.—the illustrious, though unnamed—
So rated and so rallied him, his weakness so proclaimed,
How must the wretched man have stood, confounded and ashamed
Of his absurd obscurity in presence of the famed,
The "Well-known Old Harrovian" of an unstated time.

But his defeat was our delight; for then we had them all,
The "Captain" and the "House-Master," the "Big Boy" and the Small;
The miserable whining "Sap," the Athlete strong and tall,
Came rushing headlong into print, responsive to the call
Of the "Well-known Old Harrovian" of the uncertain time.

Then did "Australiensis" to a listening world explain
Why our poor English athletes with Australia strive in vain,
And why our schools, corrupted by compulsory fagging's bane,
Can never, never hope to bless the stricken land again
With "Well-known Old Harrovians" at any future time.

Hear, too, the "Eton Parent"—him of the clever son,
That embryo Senior-Classic-rolled-with-Wrangler-into-one,
Whom cricket, fives, and football have so utterly undone
That dry-goods stores reject him even so as they might shun
Some "Well-known Old Harrovian" fallen on an evil time.

'Tis true that, here and there, we heard, as the debate went round,
An argument or two that had a half-familiar sound;
That, when dispute raged hottest, we sometimes even found
Some disputant encroaching on the controversial ground
Of the "Well-known Old Harrovian" of the problematic time.

Still, were it only for the fact that this discussion drew Forth from Oblivion's depths that quite forgotten aperçu,
The Iron Duke's reflection that the field of Waterloo
Was won in Eton playing-fields, our warmest thanks are due To the "Well-known Old Harrovian," whatever was his time.

REVIEWS.

REPORT OF THE INDIAN NATIONAL CONGRESS.*

INDIAN Blue-books, however lengthy and forbidding in aspect, are drawn up by officials with scrupulous care and on methodical principles, and the precedent set by the bureaucracy of India has been admirably copied by the President and the Committee of what is termed the Indian National Congress. For the modest sum of one shilling anybody can purchase a complete report of the proceedings of the above august body at their fourth meeting, held at Allahabad in December 1888. Speeches, resolutions, and, as the racing touts have it, the names, weights, and colours of the riders, are entered; in other words, the castes and professions of the native gentlemen who, backed by two or three Englishmen, are bent on the reconstitution of the government of India. The authors of the Report, following the example of Blue-books on meteorology, geology, and the railways, have kindly added a map of the Dependency, with Congress circles, electoral divisions, and the numbers of delegates from each Province.

* Report of the Fourth Indian National Congress, held at Allahabad on the 26th, 27th, 28th, and 29th December, 1888. London: Indian Political Agency, 28 Craven Street, Charing Cross; Talbot Brothers, 81 Carter Lane, E.C.; Hamilton, Adams, & Co., Paternoster Row. Edinburgh and Glasgow: Menzies & Co. Dublin: H. M. Gill & Son. Manchester: John Heywood. 1889.

That the population of India has never at any period possessed national elements or shown the smallest capacity for the assimilation and union characteristic of any nation, has been shown recently by some very able and well-informed writers. The Indian community is a medley of dynastic fragments, opposing creeds, rival factions, and ethnological scraps, all loosely held together but powerfully controlled by the strong and beneficent arm of the British administrator. It would be superfluous to discuss this question at length. But it is by no means unnecessary to look closely into the constitution of a body which claims to represent all India and which asserts for itself "a foremost position amongst Imperial public affairs"; and to show that the demands put forward are wholly incompatible, as Lord Dufferin has pointed out, with our original title-deeds and our very tenure of office. In the first place, in the whole of the Report there is no trustworthy evidence, such as would be indispensable in a court of justice to decide the smallest civil claim or to inflict the lowest penalty known to the criminal law, to show that the members of the Congress have really received any direct mandate from the unintelligent masses to stand forth as their representatives, to detail their grievances, and to expound their real or supposed wants. We find plenty of assertions to the effect that Committees and sub-Committees have laboured; that missionaries, as they are gravely termed, have travelled and preached; and that thousands of pamphlets and leaflets have been distributed in innumerable villages and towns. But, arguing from all past experience of strikes, movements for redress of burdens, refusals to submit to new forms of taxation, protests against the oppressions of Talukdars and the venality of the police, which from time to time have ruffled the smooth tenour of our administration, there is really nothing to show that the artisans of the towns and the agriculturists of the plains have the smallest appreciation of the objects of the Congress or are prepared to exchange the interposition of the Commissioner and the Magistrate for the effusive oratory of the pleader and the Baboo. To accept the vociferations of a congress made up of lawyers, attorneys, schoolmasters, medical practitioners, and proprietors of obscure journals as the voice of the people without further test or inquiry, would be simply for every Ruler and his practised staff of officials to sign a deed of abdication of office. Still, the Congress it may be said, is only another exponent of the blind forces and voiceless passions of the community. The independent and non-official utterance ought at least to be heard and considered before it is put aside. The purely official view has often been erroneous, one-sided, or imperfect. The Baboo, after all, can plead for the Bengalis out of court and in it. The Mussulman community may properly be represented by a retired native judge or an active Kazi. Let us, at any rate, examine the chief resolutions which are the result of a session lasting positively for four whole days. The principal resolution, first in order as well as in importance, is aimed at the Legislative Council of the Viceroy and the Provincial Councils at Madras, Bombay, Calcutta, and elsewhere. The members of the Congress coolly ask that the Councils be enlarged, and that one-half of the members henceforth be elected. In the case of the Provincial Councils the valuable privilege of electing is to be "conferred only on those classes and members of the community who are, primâ facie, capable of exercising it wisely and independently." The members so elected are in their turn to choose the members of the Legislative Council of the Viceroy. Still further, to these bodies are to be entrusted all legislative measures and all financial questions including the Budget; and any elected member is to have the right to put any question he thinks fit to the ex-officio member of the same body with regard to all branches of the administration, to call for papers and receive a reply, and to discuss the whole subject. It is true that an exception is graciously made in favour of foreign policy and strategy, or matters which for the sake of public interests should not be openly discussed. But it is perfectly easy to foresee to what any such privilege of interpellation tends. In anything that really concerns the whole community in regard to taxation, collection of the revenue, executive administration and amendment of laws, the Indian Government is quite prepared to take the natives into its confidence without the advice of the Congress. But it is obvious that, with the grant of such a permission or right as is sought for, it would be the interest of self-asserting and pushing members to ask every conceivable question, not with the expectation of an answer, but for the sake of getting a courteous refusal. This, of course, would furnish grounds for fresh agitation for more concessions, and for much virtuous indignation against a despotic Government which gave a privilege with one hand, and yet withdrew it with the other. To put the matter briefly, the demand for elected members in numerical proportion to nominees, for the control of legislation and finance, and for the right of interpellation, is one which no Indian Viceroy or Secretary of State would be justified in listening to for a moment. The makers of such a proposal must have an amazing trust in their own impudence and in the credulity of Englishmen. One of the simplest canons of Anglo-Indian administration is that power and responsibility must not be divorced, and that financial and political control must remain in the same hands. Our Indian Empire was not built by the Baboo's oratory, but by the Englishman's force of character, and it is for the builder and constructor alone to say under what conditions, guarantees, or safeguards, at what times and places, and in what proportions, natives shall be employed in hard, practical, executive, judicial, and legislative work. Some of the other resolutions are premature; others are unnecessary; and one or two may be harmless. There is a demand for competitive examinations for the Civil Service to be held simultaneously in England and India. As this proposal has already been fully considered and condemned by the majority of the Public Service Commission appointed by Lord Dufferin, and as the condemnation rests on clear and conclusive reasoning, we may at once put it aside. Next, the Congress think that the time has arrived for the extension of trial by jury into new districts. The answer to this is that the verdicts of native juries have been found as trustworthy as those of some juries in Ireland, and that notorious criminals have been acquitted in the teeth of clear evidence. A similar proposal that persons accused before magistrates should have a right of committal to the Sessions Court is one which hardly anybody, except a member of the Congress, would make; and we venture to say that there is not a cattle-lifter, cutpurse, pilferer in a native bazaar, or participator in a village row about a boundary or fish-weir, who has ever shown the smallest desire for any such privilege. The Resolution about the Excise and the intoxication of the people is a mere repetition of what has been put forward in Parliament and on clerical platforms. It can do no harm, and the Indian Government is fully alive to the necessity of some reform in liquor. To any one accustomed to the warlike proclivities of Sikhs, Pathans, and Rajputs, it must have been somewhat comical to listen to a Bengali gentleman pleading for the privilege of bearing arms, and to another inoffensive citizen of Lucknow talking about training his children in a new military college. A request that the limit of the Income-tax should be fixed at one thousand, and not at five hundred, rupees of annual income is meant in the interests of the poor. But poverty is a question of relative degree in India, and the comparison between five hundred rupees, or nominally fifty pounds, with the English limit of 150*l.*, is only misleading. When the speakers began to discuss the proposal of a Permanent Assessment of the Land Revenue for all India, under the precedent given by Lord Cornwallis to Bengal and Behar, they very soon found themselves out of their depth. The proceedings at this point were interrupted by noise and laughter, and the Resolution was dropped. This incident shows clearly how very far beyond the capacity and knowledge of these gentlemen are those measures which really form the foundation of all prosperity, progress, and contentment in India. A denunciation of the policeman as oppressive is nothing new. For the last hundred years we have been trying to stop torture, venality, and bribery in the police by every available means. Larger salaries, better education, fairer prospects of promotion, and English supervision have all been tried, and all have done some good. There was not the smallest necessity for the Congress to pass vague resolutions regarding a department which every magistrate and every Session judge criticizes before, during, and after every criminal trial. Moreover, we may remind the speakers that the Darogah and the Burkundaz, the Foujdar and the Kotwal, are also natives of similar castes and creeds vested with the authority which is indispensable if there is to be any investigation and punishment of crime. If policemen are what they are believed to be, with all this European supervision, what would they become when the Municipalities and the Baboos had control of the whole force? The subject of education seems to have caused some dismay. Government having shown to the wealthy and respectable classes what education can do for them, is now very anxious to spend less money on the higher, and more on the village and local schools. Higher education, henceforth, is to depend more on private means and public spirit. But though the professional spouter likes power and salary, he does not like to pay for Colleges and University education. The language of one speaker is really worth quoting:—

In this country, especially in Southern India, there is as yet but little public spirit; there are comparatively few wealthy men, and these chiefly intent on keeping their wealth for their own private purposes; the endowing of schools and colleges is not a popular form of beneficence.

With this lamentable lack of public spirit on the part of the community, is not this fussy desire for electioneering and representation a little premature?

Another speaker does not at all like the idea of Government handing over the management of district and station schools to Lord Ripon's new municipalities. These bodies, it would seem, may toy with sanitation, spend local rates on bridges and roads; but it is for the Government to pay for and look after the education of the people.

That all these Resolutions and others for which we have no space, were propounded with a profusion of lip-loyalty and a noisy appreciation of the priceless blessings of the British rule, may be readily conceived. One or two allusions to the circulation of seditious and disloyal pamphlets were decidedly inconvenient and unpleasant, and a stray Raja who asked for their suppression was listened to with impatience, and was ruled out of order. But for all the cheers given for the Queen and for the assertions that the concessions asked for meant the permanence of English supremacy, we come on some very questionable opinions and some new views of history. It was not the English regiments who put down the Sepoy Mutiny, as they "were tardily dribbled into India," but "the new Indian soldiery sprung from the bosom of the people to uphold their benefactor's cause," who restored peace and order. This will be new to the sons of Sikhs who did help us to retake Delhi in 1857. Another speaker would like to see the number of English regiments reduced, and a portion of the Report—written we may presume after some reflection—contemplates with ill-concealed satisfaction a time when the Englishmen will be massacred by Russian hordes, and the native army will die away for want of recruits. After this it is not necessary for us to lay much stress on the discontent caused by the perverse action of the military authorities, who actually refused permission for the Congress to hold its meetings within the limits of the Allahabad cantonment. We in England have not yet heard of Socialists preferring Chelsea or Wellington Barracks to Trafalgar Square for one of their field-days.

It may now fairly be asked how are such meetings and Resolutions to be dealt with in future? Not certainly by legislative or executive prohibition, nor by throwing impediments in the way of any annual meeting at Bombay or Lahore, unless such assemblies should eventually give rise to unexpected complications. It may not always be right and proper for a Government, though conscious of its integrity and power, to allow an excitable population to be too liberally fed with promises, rumours, and vague anticipations of change. But not the less will it be the positive duty of the present Viceroy and of the Secretary of State to endorse every word of warning contained in Lord Dufferin's celebrated parting speech. The members of the Congress may be at liberty to meet, orate, resolve, and discuss as much as they please. But they ought to be told, once for all, that the British Government does not recognize them as the elected of the people; that they really represent no one but themselves; and that while there are scores of social and domestic reforms which natives can carry out without asking impertinent questions in or out of Council, the administration will continue to be carried on in the spirit and on the foundations laid and developed by English statesmen, whether they belong to the school of Wellesley and Dalhousie, of Bentinck and Canning, or Lawrence and Mayo. The Government will not hand over to an irresponsible body the power of initiating reforms, removing abuses, and spending money; nor will it deliberately place itself in the position of having to refuse answers to questions which should never be put. We do not wish to be personal, but the caste, education, and social position of the members of Congress does not entitle them to speak either for the aristocracy or the masses. We have far too much of the legal and the professional element. Of the large landholders of Bengal not a single representative came to the Congress. One Behar Raja was invited; but, like many of his countrymen, he judiciously pleaded illness. There were half a dozen Sikhs, and not one Rajput. To make up for this deficiency, we find more than four hundred Vakils or pleaders in the law courts, and a good sprinkling of professors, members of Boards and municipalities, printers, clerks, journalists, the secretary of Patchiapa's Charity, and the Store Clerk of the D. T. Superintendent's office. And it is significant that whereas Bengal proper is fully represented in the list, gentlemen of pure Bengali race and caste have managed to get themselves sent as delegates from the Central and other Provinces with which they can have no sort of connexion or link. We have endeavoured, in this analysis of the proceedings of the Congress, neither to minimize nor to exaggerate its importance. The India which some Englishmen pass half their lives in governing, and over which many other Englishmen now flit for months in search of recreation, sport, or dry facts, was not created out of chaos by anything at all resembling this Congress. And its Government is a much too sensitive, delicate, and dangerous machine to be subjected to priggish and visionary reforms recommended by the self-elected leaders of a nation which has no existence except on paper.

NOVELS.*

MISS CAROLINE FOTHERGILL is a clever average writer, who may be trusted to turn out good and careful work; and so far her recent novel will sustain her reputation, but we doubt if it will add to it to any great extent. Diana Wentworth is a beautiful, high-spirited girl, who, at the death of her father, finds herself faced by the alternative of either living on semi-charity with her mother among her mother's people, or else going out into the world alone. As she and her mother possess absolutely antagonistic natures, and as Diana has all the longing of a caged wild bird to stretch her wings, it is not surprising that she elects to see the world; and, in order to widen her horizon of experience, she accepts the post of governess in a German family living in Jacewo, in Poland. On arriving there she is saved from an awkward predicament by a young English engineer, and as he is the solitary Englishman in the desolate little Polish town, they soon become fast friends,

* Diana Wentworth. By Caroline Fothergill. 3 vols. London and Edinburgh: Blackwood & Sons. 1889.

Steadfast. By Rose Terry Cooke. Boston: Ticknor & Co. London: Trübner & Co. 1889.

Featherstone's Story. By Johnny Ludlow (Mrs. Henry Wood). London: Richard Bentley & Son. 1889.

A Summer in a Dutch Country House. By Mrs. Arthur Traherne. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co. 1889.

and indeed have, despite quarrels and disputes without end, drifted into something more than friendship, when a cousin of Diana's suddenly arrives on the scene to take her back to her mother, who is reputed to be dying. Diana returns to Garshill Abbey, without having had an opportunity of seeing John Garthwaite, the engineer, before her departure from Jacewo. She feels that she has been drawn from a perilous position, for Diana is intensely proud and aristocratic, and the fact of the sturdy engineer, who in his way is every bit as proud as she, being a self-made man, is an offence and an irritation to her. After living amongst her stiff-necked uncles and cousins at Garshill Abbey, however, by degrees John Garthwaite's sterling qualities become more vivid to her by force of contrast. When she finds herself the object of a cabal on the part of her whole family to marry her to the scampish cousin, simply because he has too disgraceful a past to allow of a marriage being made for him with any one outside the secret councils of the family, Diana's eyes are at last opened, and, after many difficulties and unnecessary delays, which seem to be created solely to fill up the required three volumes, the book ends happily. The story is a good one, and the characters are well drawn; but the whole book suffers from being spun out in a way that taxes the patience of the reader a good deal.

Miss Cooke is to be congratulated; her last novel, Steadfast, is an admirable picture of country life in New England in the last century. In this "Story of a Saint and a Sinner" we must confess, in all humility, that our affections go with the sinner, Esther Dennis, though our admiration is certainly claimed by the steadfast endurance of Philemon Hall. But Esther is so truly a creature of flesh and blood—in her petulance, in her passionate devotion to her absolutely worthless cousin Philip Kent, in her blind unselfishness when for his sake she burns the will made by his father in her favour, in her abasement, her repeated "falling away," until finally she wins the battle over herself and is left happy in the love of her husband—that one cannot help being fond of her. If there is a fault to be found with the book, it is that there are too many minor characters in it to confuse and obscure the main issues of the story; but they are all well drawn and individual. The description of the religious intolerance of the time is excellent. The author need hardly tell us in her short preface that everything "relating to the acts of the consociation of congregational churches of 'Newport' county is strictly historical fact, and that, as far as his experience with that consociation goes, Philemon Hall was a living man," for no one can read this part of the story and not feel that it is drawn from life.

Featherstone's Story, the latest contribution from the once-fertile pen of the late Mrs. Henry Wood, is a harmless ghost-story in one volume. Nancy Preen, the younger of two middle-aged spinster sisters, runs away with a cashiered army-captain, Edwin Fennel, to the great indignation and sorrow of her sister Lavinia. Captain Fennel, who has only married Miss Preen to have a roof over his head, is infinitely disgusted when he finds that what he thought was the amount of her income is in reality the joint income of the two sisters—a very different matter in his eyes. However, he finds comfort in the knowledge that if the elder sister dies his wife inherits both shares; and not long after the Fennels return to live with Lavinia at Sainteville, a little town on the sea-coast of France, Lavinia does die suddenly in great and mysterious agony. Mrs. Fennel, who loved her sister, is heart-broken at her death, and is still more distracted at the doctors expressing a wish to make a post-mortem examination. She opposes this idea so strenuously that they give way, and Lavinia is promptly buried. But, though her body is laid to rest, her spirit is not, and Lavinia's ghost haunts her brother-in-law according to the accepted manner of the Spook tribe, waiting for him in dark passages, treading on his heels as he goes up and down stairs, until she finally drives him out of the house. How the story ends and the Spook is appeased it would not be fair to disclose; but, in our opinion, Lavinia's spirit was too easily satisfied.

There have been, and will be, many discussions as to the best cure for insomnia. Here is a simple one: Try Mrs. Arthur Traherne's book.

A TEXT-BOOK OF PATHOLOGY.*

NO department of inquiry has enlarged the scope of its operations during the past decade with such ever-accelerating speed as has that which is broadly and comprehensively designated the science of medicine. Embracing as it does something of almost every named section of science, it has become in these days a mighty and complex cosmos, expanding on all sides with a rapidity of growth which, while it affords evidence of vigorous vitality, is apt to provoke the question, "Where are the minds that are capable of mastering to the utmost points of present knowledge all the branches of the science of medicine of to-day?" If "Ars longa vita brevis" was wisely said in the days of old, still more is its truth accentuated to-day; and, assuming that the present rate of expansion continues unabated, he would be rash indeed who ventured to predict how the physician of next century will be able to meet the charge that in some, if not indeed in many, branches of medical science, his knowledge is not up to date. Even now men who are yet in their prime find that not a few of the precepts and doctrines instilled into their minds in earlier years by renowned teachers and writers are now as obsolete as the Natural Philosophy of pre-Newtonian days; and that the many sciences, Chemistry, Physiology, Histology, &c., of which when they graduated they believed themselves to possess an adequate knowledge, have ever since been extending like the radii of a circle of which their acquirements may be taken as the fixed centre. Or if they have diligently pursued any one of these radii up to date, it is perfectly obvious that they must have proportionately turned their backs upon and neglected the rest.

We have only to turn to the work before us, which is but the first of two volumes, for proof of how much of a man's life and energies are nowadays demanded in the pursuit of a single one of these many radii—Pathology. This monument of patient labour, study, selection, and original thought consists of more than seven hundred pages, and contains quotations from or references to no less than three hundred and seventy-one other publications. Professor Hamilton is evidently an enthusiast, and pursues his subject with ardour. It is impossible to gainsay his opinion expressed in the preface regarding its importance to the student; but we confess to no little commiseration for the latter, who, after having duly studied the works of perhaps equally copious and enthusiastic teachers of botany, chemistry, natural history, natural philosophy, anatomy, physiology, surgery, &c., is told that Morbid anatomy and pathological histology will not carry the earnest inquirer beyond a certain point. In order to arrive at a solution of the great problems of disease, many accessory means of investigation must be adopted. Experiment must be largely resorted to, exact methods of physical research must be drawn upon, animal chemistry must be called in to assist, comparative pathology must contribute largely, and, lastly, the whole record must be controlled by the results of clinical observation.

There can be no mistake as to the magnitude of the task, and there is none as to its imperativeness; but the "earnest inquirer" need certainly have no difficulty in choosing his guide to the study of pathology. The work before us is conspicuous throughout for method and orderly arrangement, qualities most essential to, but too often absent from, medical literature, and much of the information contained in it is of quite recent date.

Beginning with the rudiments of his subject, the author devotes the first three chapters to a precise and practical exposition of the sectio cadaveris, of the scientific method of examining each individual organ, and of the proper mode of taking notes and compiling medico-legal reports. The instruction thus conveyed is of the utmost importance and value, and we are not aware of any other published work in which the proper routine of post-mortem examination is so lucidly laid down. It is doubtful, to say the least, if more than a select few medical men are as well up in this duty as in the interests of the public every registered practitioner ought to be; and it would likewise be greatly to the public benefit if coroners as well as doctors were required to give some proof that they were equally well qualified to criticize intelligently the details of post-mortem reports brought before them as evidence. Unfortunately no such guarantee is exacted; and it would be hard to estimate the numbers of miscarriages of justice, active or passive, which yearly result from public apathy as to this ignorance.

The succeeding chapters deal with the preservation of specimens, both macro- and microscopic, and include a very practical, though short, dissertation on the microscope. We can thoroughly endorse what the author says of the respective merits of the objectives of the English and foreign lens-makers mentioned by him, having, with scarce an exception, worked with them all. The first, or technical, portion of the work concludes by two chapters on bacteriology, which, like the preceding, are eminently practical, both as regards laboratory work and the highly important question of disinfection. It would be well if the public could be made to comprehend the sinister tenacity of life possessed by morbid spores, and how ludicrously futile are their complacent efforts to eradicate them by means of perfunctory fumigations and the use of so-called "antiseptic" soaps or solutions. At p. 147 it is stated that the well-known fact of an attack of any contagious disease so often conferring immunity for the remainder of a lifetime is as yet unexplained; but we think that mention might have been made of the theory of M. E. Metschnikoff, hypothetical though it may be, that the cells of any organism which survives the invasion of a given contagion acquire an increased repellent power against that one specially, although not against others. It is undoubted that some persons are seemingly proof against a particular disease, or, if attacked, throw it off without suffering severely, and it would appear that this resisting force is stimulated and increased by a non-fatal invasion, although liable to a gradual enfeeblement in the course of years, so that the person becomes again susceptible.

Part II. is devoted to General Pathological Processes. The definitions of health, disease, growth, &c. in Chapter X. are admirably expressed, as the following passage on "Health and Utility" suffices to show:—

What we designate the normal or healthy structure or function of an organ is not necessarily that which is of the greatest conceivable value from the utilitarian point of view. Perfection of adaptation to a purpose is no doubt one of the grand results of evolution, but it must be remembered that this perfection has not as yet been attained in all cases. We consider the brain of man as the typically perfect brain. It is, however, quite possible to conceive a being gifted with a brain of powers so vastly greater than the happy possessor would be able to transcend by far the ordinary limits of human thought. Such a condition would, however, be considered so abnormal as to be actually reckoned something morbid. We say that "genius" or the over-development of a particular faculty "is akin to madness"—that is, it borders upon the diseased. It is not therefore the highest conceivable development of structure or function which is termed health, but it is the fulfilment of a certain constant standard of excellence.

* A Text-book of Pathology, Systematic and Practical. By D. J. Hamilton, M.B., F.R.C.S.E., F.R.S.E., Professor of Pathological Anatomy, University of Aberdeen. Vol. I. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

Chapter XI. is devoted to the Infiltrations and Degenerations, and in it the illustrations, which are of a high standard throughout the work, reach a point of merit that it would be hard to surpass. In Chapter XII. the author, while quoting Burdon Sanderson, wisely refrains from attempting to define inflammation in a single comprehensive sentence; but nowhere does he show to greater advantage than in his masterly exposition of the vascular phenomena and tissue-changes incident to it—an exposition which of itself would suffice to place the book in the very front rank of medical scientific literature.

While the work of necessity contains much debatable matter, it is throughout characterized by breadth of view and true liberality, and cannot fail to be highly valued by all who are capable of appreciating it.

BOOKS ON DIVINITY.*

THE edition of the Vulgate text of St. Matthew's Gospel, by the Bishop of Salisbury, assisted by the Rev. H. J. White, is the first instalment of a work of great labour and the highest interest, which is probably destined to take rank among the classic productions of British erudition. No pains have been spared, as none ought to be spared, over so grand an object, the restitution to its original purity of the Latin Version, which Dr. Westcott calls "the most venerable and precious monument of Latin Christianity." The text of the Gospel, as here given, rests mainly upon twenty-nine great manuscripts, many of them specially copied or collated for the purpose. In addition to these, twenty Bentleian manuscripts, twelve others, and three correctoria, or collections of different readings, are cited in the notes. For comparison of Jerome's Vulgate with the Old Latin Version twenty-seven manuscripts of the latter text have been employed, and no fewer than thirty-eight printed editions of the Latin Bible are quoted more or less frequently. When upon the top of all this mass of materials we pile a mountain of monographs, * Novum Testamentum Domini Nostri Jesu Christi. Latine. Secundum editionem Sancti Hieronymi. Partis prioris fasciculus primus. Evangelium secundum Mattheum. Ad codicum MSS. fidem recensuit Johannes Wordsworth, S.T.P., Episcopus Sarisburiensis, in operis societatem adsumto H. J. White, A.M. Oxonii: E typographeo Clarendoniano. 1889.

The Book of Revelation (Expositor's Bible). By William Milligan, D.D., Professor of Divinity and Biblical Criticism in the University of Aberdeen. London: Hodder & Stoughton. 1889.

The Epistles of St. John (Expositor's Bible). By William Alexander, D.D., D.C.L., Lord Bishop of Derry and Raphoe. London: Hodder & Stoughton. 1889.

The Epistles of St. Paul to the Galatians, Ephesians, and Philippians. With Notes, Critical and Practical, by the Rev. M. F. Sadler, Prebendary of Wells and Rector of Honiton. London: George Bell & Sons. 1889.

Unspoken Sermons. Third series. By George MacDonald. London: Longmans & Co. 1889.

The Incarnation as a Motive Power. Sermons by William Bright, D.D., Canon of Ch. Ch. Oxford, Regius Prof. of Eccl. History. London: Rivingtons. 1889.

Ethical Religion. By W. M. Salter. Boston: Roberts Brothers. London: Brentano's. 1889.

An Introduction to the Creeds. By the Rev. G. F. Maclear, D.D., Warden of St. Augustine's College and Hon. Canon of Canterbury. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

The Divinity of Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. The Bampton Lectures for 1866. By H. P. Liddon, D.D., D.C.L., Canon and Chancellor of St. Paul's. Thirteenth edition, with Preface. London: Rivingtons. 1889.

The Children's Faith: Instructions to Children on the Apostles' Creed. By Edward Osborne, Mission Priest of the Society of St. John Evangelist. With Illustrations. London: Rivingtons. 1889.

Deans Rural: the History of their Office and Duties. By the Rev. J. B. Hughes, M.A., Vicar of Staverton and Rural Dean of Totnes. With an Introduction by the Rev. S. Baring-Gould, M.A., Rector of Lew Trenchard. New and revised edition. London: Skeffington & Son. 1889.

The Vision at Corinth. A Sermon preached in the Cathedral Church of Christ at Oxford, on behalf of the Ch. Ch. Mission at Poplar, East London, by H. P. Liddon, D.D., D.C.L., Canon and Chancellor of St. Paul's, and Student of Ch. Ch. London: Rivingtons. 1889.

Ritualism. A Paper read before the Clergy of the Rural Deanery of Westminster by the Rev. C. W. Furse, Canon of Westminster and Rector of St. John the Evangelist. London: Rivingtons. 1889.

Sunlight and Shadow in the Christian Life. Sermons preached, for the most part in America, by W. J. Knox-Little, M.A., Canon Residentiary of Worcester and Vicar of Hoar Cross. London: Rivingtons. 1889.

Gatherings from Notes of Discourses. By the late Rev. T. T. Lynch. Second series. James Clarke & Co. 1889.

Die Geschichte des Rabbi Jesus von Nazareth. Von Dr. H. K. Hugo Delf. Leipzig: Friedrich. 1889.

The Text of the Thirty-nine Articles of 1553, 1563, 1571. Interleaved. London: Rivingtons. 1889.

A Charge delivered to the Clergy and Churchwardens of the Diocese of Worcester, at his Visitation in June 1889, by Henry, Lord Bishop of Worcester. London: Rivingtons. 1889.

excursuses, and dissertations, the general reader will begin to have some faint idea of the acumen, judgment, and indefatigable patience that underlie every syllable and every symbol of such a work as this. The plan of the work is admirable, and, except in one point to be shortly noticed, leaves nothing to be desired. The prefaces are full, clear, and interesting. In the body of the work, beneath the revised Vulgate text, is given the full text of the Brescian MS. of the Italic Version, selected as the best representative of that older translation, which Jerome had before his eye. The Notes give all variants with what may seem unnecessary minuteness. But the Bishop has here a double object to serve, not merely to justify his text, but to promote the interests of Latin philology, to which he has rendered distinguished service in other fields. The work which Bishop Wordsworth has here undertaken has long been anxiously desired, but has never till now been possible. More than three centuries ago the Council of Trent, alarmed by the influence of popular versions of Scripture and the hostile doctrines which they seemed to foster, insisted upon the "correct printing" of the Latin Bible. It is to the rise of Protestantism that we owe the Sixtine and Clementine editions of the Vulgate. How Pope Sixtus staked his infallibility on the correctness of his unscholarly work, and how Cardinal Bellarmine endeavoured to save the infallibility by the pious fraud of ascribing the Pope's blunders to the carelessness of the printers, we have been recently told by Dr. Salmon. In truth, the time was not ripe for such a work, and the methods by which alone it could be carried to a successful issue were not yet invented. The task proposed was one of the greatest intricacy. There are three distinct editions of the Latin Version, the Old Latin which grew up rather than was made in the second century in the Africa of Tertullian; what is known as the Itala, made by some sort of authority in North Italy, in the early part of the fourth century; and, finally, what we now entitle the Vulgate, the work of the great Jerome, dating from the closing years of the fourth century. Jerome's work was much superior to the older texts, but it was greatly disliked, as all revised translations are, and did not conquer universal acceptance much before the time of Bede. Then, again, in those days books were not the stereotyped things they are now. Each copy was almost like a living creature; it was the child of the copyist, and reflected all his peculiarities. It will readily be understood, then, what confusion might and did arise. Phrases from the older versions crept into the new or from one Gospel into another. Sometimes a scribe with a little knowledge of Greek presumed to correct Jerome's reading; sometimes from pure fatigue or carelessness he wrote something different from what he meant. Hence arose the need for continual revisions of the text. Alcuin, by command of Charlemagne, Theodulf, Lanfranc, and others, issued editions as correct as they could make them, stamped with the authority of their names. In this way there arose groups or families of MSS., circulating for the most part in particular countries; the Irish, Spanish, and French Bibles having each peculiarities of their own. It will be seen then that, before Jerome's text can be precisely ascertained, we have to detect and eliminate all these sources of error, to ascertain in fact to what group each MS. belongs, and what special corrupting influences affect that group. Till this has been done, and it is the most arduous part of an editor's business, MSS. can be numbered, but not valued. Now Bishop Wordsworth tells his readers that he has selected his MSS. as representative of different groups, but does not appear to have finally settled upon any canons or definite rules for estimating their respective value. He postpones to the end of his work a full statement of the considerations that have guided his judgment. Hence he seems sometimes to act in an arbitrary way. Thus in the famous passage Matt. xxi. 31, "Whether of them twain did the will of his father? They say unto him, The first," about half the MSS., including nearly all those that the Bishop pronounces the best, have the startling variant "the last." Jerome has a note on the passage, in which he himself leaves it doubtful whether he wrote "first" or "last." Yet the Bishop decides that "first" is here right and "last" wrong, apparently in the teeth of his evidence. This is a good example of the perplexities that beset an editor of the Vulgate. The same variant exists in the original Greek, and the question to be settled by an editor of the Greek text is, "What did the Jews really say?" But in the case of the Vulgate a further element of uncertainty creeps in. The Greek text may have become corrupt, as indeed we know that it did, and Jerome, who was exceedingly anxious to avoid giving offence by changes not absolutely indispensable, may have thought it safe to preserve a reading which he did not like, but still judged capable of explanation. The question here then is, not what is right, but what Jerome wrote; and the Bishop's mind may have been biased against his own witnesses by the desire to keep to what is no doubt the correct reading in the original Greek. If this be so, if he has not yet settled in his own mind his principles of selection, his text cannot possibly satisfy the requirements of modern criticism, and his work will be nothing more than a splendid foundation for others to build upon. But probably when the time comes for him to put on paper the formulated results of his experience, we may find that these suspicions are vain, and we heartily trust that this will prove to be the case.

The Apocalypse combines two most powerful attractions. In one point of view it is in a peculiar sense the Christian's book, written by a saint for saints, not to convert, but to console and inspire. It is a vision culminating in the supreme revelation of the New Jerusalem, "where there is neither sorrow nor crying." But it is also a prophecy, and has tormented beyond measure the ingenuity of commentators. There is a marshalling of events, with names and dates. The signs of the coming of the end are detailed with great minuteness, though in symbolical form. Many attempts have been made to find the key to this hieroglyph. Most interpreters have allowed themselves a free range over the whole course of history. Any event that powerfully impressed their imaginations—the irruption of the Northern barbarians, the Reformation, the French Revolution—has been forced, often with great ingenuity, into some sort of conformity with the dark sayings of St. John. Latterly the tendency has been to find the solution in the history of the Apostle's own times. Reuss and Renan detect the number of the Beast in the name and title of Nero, and regard the book as a veiled description of the persecution of the Church by that Emperor. Dr. Milligan abandons the historical solution as hopeless, and regards the Apocalypse as a figurative representation of the sufferings, trials, and triumph of the spiritual Church. Under this treatment all difficulties disappear; but the prophecy itself evaporates, and what remains is merely an elaborate allegory. Thus the significance of the number of the Beast rests on the mystic meaning of six. Seven is the sacred, perfect number. Six falls short of perfection and is a type of sin. Its triple repetition gives us "a potency of evil than which there can be none greater." The first Resurrection, so fraught with meaning to Edward Irving, is the regeneration of the saints in this life. The harlot Babylon, throned upon her seven hills, is not Rome, but "the degenerate Church, or that principle of degenerate religion that allies itself with the world." In fact, nothing definite is left. We do not propose to criticize Dr. Milligan's method, which is certainly tenable, and is elaborated with much skill and patience. The reader must judge for himself. The style is clear and scholarly, but too tame and level to do justice to the extraordinary sublimity of the theme.

The Bishop of Derry, in his exposition of St. John's Epistles, follows a plan somewhat different from that of other writers in the Expositor's Bible, inasmuch as he endeavours to provide a moderate pennyworth of bread for the student. Thus at the beginning of each paragraph he gives five parallel texts—the Greek, the Vulgate of the Codex Amiatinus, the Authorized and Revised Versions, and a translation of his own. And to each section are appended notes on special points of text, grammar, and exegesis. There are some slips that should be corrected. Thus (p. 34) we are told that "Augustine endowed the Church with the Nicene Creed"—a statement which can hardly be a sample of compositor's composition. The homiletic expansions of the text are, for the most part, admirable. Fine literary criticisms, striking illustrations, and pieces of high-wrought eloquence might be quoted in profusion. Let us take the Bishop's answer to a captious attack of Mr. J. S. Mill:—"To say that Christian legislation is negative, a mere string of Thou Shalt Nots, is just such a superficial accusation as might be expected from a man who should enter a church upon some rare occasion, happen to listen to the Ten Commandments, and fall asleep before the Epistle and Gospel."

Mr. Sadler's Commentaries are not so novel in form and showy in substance as those of the Expositor's Bible, but they will be found more valuable helps to the understanding of Scripture. The present volume contains Galatians, Ephesians, and Philippians. Mr. Sadler's work is so modest and unpretentious that readers unfamiliar with the history of interpretation may easily fail to do justice to its real depth and originality. There are several very striking notes in this little volume—on the historical difficulties at the beginning of Galatians, on the "Robbery" passage in Philippians, on the title of the Epistle to the Ephesians, on the Pauline Conception of Faith, and others. The famous verse about the mediator (Gal. iii. 20) has received, according to the computation of the Master of Balliol, four hundred and thirty different explanations. Mr. Sadler does not shrink from adding another to the list. What he has to say will be found worthy of study, though his view of this particular passage must, we fear, be added to the four hundred and twenty-nine.

It is a pity that Mr. Macdonald's Sermons are "Unspoken," for this reason, that, if he were condemned to get up and deliver them in the regulation way, he would be in a better position for appreciating the sorrows of the professional clergy. He has many exasperating tricks. One is that of discovering what everybody knows. "I do not believe," he tells us, "that the Lord spoke Greek." Another is that of picking up a false reading, and proving it to be true by arguments that have nothing to do with its truth or falsity. Another is that of finding deep meanings which are not in his text at all. Another is a queer kind of devout irreverence, which has come to be part of the make-up of the pious Highland body of fiction, and is beginning to pall. Yet another is one that he shares with other vendors of cheap divinity—that of taking phrases in the very worst sense that was ever attached to them, and then "swearing at large" on the subject. If he would ask what people really think, he would find that such words as "vicarious suffering" and "orthodoxy" have meanings that are not really ridiculous. The book is one that might have been written by Enoch Arden if he had picked up a Bible in his desert island. It will be read, not, as Mr. Macdonald would wish it to be, for its teaching, but for its sentiment. In his random course he throws out many a beautiful saying. The "orthodox" will pick up his gifts with gratitude, and submit to his castigations with meekness unconvinced.

Canon Bright's The Incarnation as a Motive Power is a moderate-sized volume containing thirty sermons, all brief, many exceedingly brief. At the end is, what many readers will find acceptable, a note on the Kenosis or Exinanition of Our Lord, a subject on which there has been of late a good deal of wild speculation. Canon Bright's sermons are always worth reading. There is no better preacher for young men; not that he treats specially of their difficulties, but because his general tone is just that which a sensible young man ought to appreciate—clear, firm, and terse—learned and eloquent, yet making no parade of either gift, always quick to comprehend and respond. The sermons are of the good old Anglican type, always based upon positive dogma, which no one can state more clearly and persuasively. The brief sketches of the relation of faith to reason are admirably done. What can be better put than what is here said about the doctrine of the Three Persons? "We can never think so vividly, so worthily, so affectionately of Him, or seem to get so near a sight of Him, as when we consider that within the One Infinite Life itself there has been from all eternity this activity of love, this communion of thought and will, this fulness of inward relations, this unspeakable richness of moral perfection." The bearing of faith upon conduct, the "application," is not so elaborately drawn out. Canon Bright speaks to educated people who can draw their own conclusions, and need but a suggestion. But there is plenty of food for reflection, especially for those who know that their life is not quite worthy of their belief. Especially good are the sermons on Spiritual Dimness, and the difference between seeing and hearing God. There is not a word of exaggeration in either, but few can read them without a qualm.

Mr. Salter's Essays come to us from Chicago, and breathe throughout that freedom whose home is in the setting sun. They are a manifesto of the great Ethical Movement, which we are assured "has a serious aim." The aim is to extend to religion the benefits of the protective tariff, "since a true nation loves its vernacular tongue, and will not import its religion, as we have ours, from Judea." Mr. Salter exhibits some very choice specimens of this vernacular tongue. "The religion of Unitarians," he says in one place, "is too near this world, it offers too few contrasts with it, it does not rap our souls away with the vision of an eternal beauty that lies beyond it." This is a real pearl.

Dr. Maclear's new handbook on the Creeds will be found exceedingly useful to students in theological colleges, and candidates preparing for ordination. It is the work of a skilled teacher, who means to bring his pupils to the desired end by the shortest cut, but it has all the merits that a class-book ought to have; it is clear, full, and well arranged; it has good indices, and numerous references are given in the notes to the best modern works on special points. An intelligent student who uses it, as we feel sure the author intends it to be used, as a preparation for more extended reading, will find it an excellent introduction to dogmatic theology.

The lapse of twenty-three years does not appear to have detracted from the freshness and popularity of Canon Liddon's famous Bampton Lectures On the Divinity of Our Lord. The present edition, the thirteenth, appears to be merely a reprint as regards the body of the work, but prefixed will be found a striking Preface on what calls itself the New Reformation, though it is in truth neither new nor a reformation.

The Children's Faith is a set of little addresses on the Creed suitable for children's services, but homiletic instead of catechetical in form. This appears to us to be a mistake, but Mr. Osborne clearly understands a juvenile audience. Deans Rural, an exhaustingly learned pamphlet by Messrs. Hughes and Baring-Gould, traces the origin and function of those useful officials from the Chorepiscopus downwards. It would have been better if the authors had been less anxious about the keeping of the parish terrier, and dwelt more upon practical suggestions for deepening the spiritual efficacy of Deans Christian. The Vision at Corinth is a Sermon on behalf of the Christ Church Mission at Poplar, by Canon Liddon. Ritualism, by Canon Furse, is a plea for symbolical worship on general grounds, but does not enter into practical difficulties. We have received also a new volume of Sermons by Canon Knox-Little; a collection of short sayings and selected paragraphs from the sermons of the late Mr. Lynch, an American preacher; a German Life of Jesus, by Dr. Delf; a useful interleaved text of the Articles (Latin and English); and the recent Charge of the Bishop of Worcester. It is marked by the calm, good sense which distinguishes that Prelate. Perhaps the most important feature in it is the Bishop's declaration against compulsory attendance at schools.

AN ADVENTUROUS LAWYER.*

MR. CLAMPITT, "Counselor [sic] at Law," tells us that he has "the frame of a Hercules and a will of iron," and that he has scarcely had a day's sickness in his life save "the customary diseases of childhood and occasional attacks of cholera and smallpox." It was perhaps naturally to be expected that a person so exceptionally gifted should prefer an adventurous life among primæval rocks to a lucrative partnership with one of the leaders of his own profession in an older and more settled State of the Union. He gives us very full information in regard to the famous Lewis and Clark's expedition, of the formation of the Pony Express, the Pike's Peak gold excitement, the Overland Mail, and the Pacific Railroad, and the rapid progress of material success in the Far West. Of the pioneers of the great movement he speaks in terms of rapturous admiration. We only regret that his eloquence is, like the oratory of a famous English statesman, as "stupefying as it is magnificent." The words are sometimes very "hard to understand." He tells us that the "broadest field of romance and of chivalry has been opened up to the unconquerable spirits of the age," and that neither the age of Arthur nor Charlemagne, nor Amadis of Gaul, nor the barons of the feudal times, nor the knights of the middle ages, with their traces of stoic philosophy, nor the heroes of Chaucer, of Germanic traditions, or classical antiquity, nor the knights of the Crusades, crowned with their religious orders, nor the legends of the poets, from the days of Trojan heroes to the troubadours, can obscure by comparison the chivalrous and romantic deeds of the American pioneers. . . . Not since the walls of Rome fell beneath the Imperial blows of Tudor and Plantagenet has such a scene been presented as the crumbling of mountain walls beneath the prowess and genius of their descendants. . . . Wherever they are they will be recalled as heroes of the storm beaten heights—gods of the solitude greater than a Spartan band—through whose mountain passes run the electric wires of memory, stretching along the lines of the centuries, and whose blood-dyed walls loom up grander in thought than ancient Thermopylae.

* Echoes from the Rocky Mountains. By John W. Clampitt, Counselor at Law. Illustrated. London, Paris, and New York: Brentano's.

Never were "prayer 'ords at the pridge" than these, if we had only grammar and history enough to parse and understand them. Further on we read of these pioneers as "tall spirits," and we have a description of "Time's mausoleum." Of the mountains traversed by these royally descended pioneers we are told that beyond the primæval period, lying back of the misty past, before the years that lie back of the ocean of time—back of the lines of century waves which blend beyond the horizons of remote antiquity—before History was born or legend had painted on the canvas of time the grandeur of departed ages, before the walls of Damascus had risen, with its 4,000 years of hoary antiquity, or the foundations of Baalbec had been laid, or the gates and the spires of the Temple of Ephesus and Thebes had shimmered in the sunlight—these ancient mountain walls had stood as towering sentinels on the pathway of time, crumbling from age to age to enrich the sleeping valley.

In similar transcendental language we are made to admire the "sympathy which proclaims that a brother's suffering demands a brother's pity, and seeks solace from the great heart of nature, that chart of God mapping out his attributes in the shadow of His wisdom." Mr. Clappitt is ecstatically eulogistic of a Western woman, "whose dark lustrous eyes beamed from their soulful depths, and whose raven tresses fell in graceful folds upon her rounded arms and shoulders. I will not attempt to describe her beauty, save that it reveled [sic] in both her face and form." He talks of a miner "sleeping in a quiet grave, delivered at last from the bondage of a gold slave, released by the jailor of his soul from the demons that scourged him to his rest like a quarry slave into the freedom of the soul and the kingly reign of a kind and generous nature." But unintelligible as they may be to persons who have been taught to parse their sentences, Mr. Clappitt's rhetorical flights are less displeasing to us than his occasional descents into familiar colloquialisms, and we cannot away with his jocosity. The book bristles with accounts of murders and of rapine. We read of one man shooting another dead, because he did not like the "style of his speech"; of a Mormon who murdered his own son-in-law, screaming out as he did so, "So die all damned Gentiles, enemies of the Latter-Day Saints of Jesus Christ"; of another man who fixed this placard on the breast of his slaughtered victim, "I shot him because he stole my mule." Another ruffian, "with a courage as sublime as the bride of Collatinus, and the fortitude of a Roman soldier, saved the lives of eleven human beings, and died an ignominious death by the halter for robbing a stage coach." Mr. Clappitt has a fixed certainty that Mormon bishops, and the great Brigham Young himself, were active ringleaders in the hideous Mountain-Meadow massacre, that they are very generally addicted to assassination, and that their system of polygamy is detestable. Yet he has almost a blind admiration of these people; and he seems to have enjoyed few things in his life more than a Mormon ball, in which the bishops of the Latter-Day Saints performed entrechats with all the vigour and vivacity of Frenchmen. In his remarks on the Salt Lake people he reminds us of the Scotch member of Parliament who, when an Englishman expressed to him his surprise that a Professorship at one of the Scotch Universities had been bestowed on a man suspected of more than common heterodoxy, replied:—"Na, na, sir, Mr. — does not believe perhaps in revealed religion, or in the immortality of the soul, but in every other respect he's a most excellent Prasherian." According to our author, the sons of Joseph Smith, the founder of Mormonism, have strenuously repudiated the practice of polygamy as a concomitant of their faith, and have loudly censured the teachings of Brigham Young in this respect. It is only fair to say that, if Mr. Clappitt seems to admire his own poetical style, he is very generous in his quotations from recognized poets; he speaks approvingly of the person whom he calls "Avon's bard," and of Joaquin Miller he writes as "a minstrel unto the manor [sic] born, whose first vision fell upon nature's majestic works, and whose songs are the pictures of its splendour. Long may he live to wield his master pen."

Mr. Clappitt's remarks on the Western American love of dress are shrewd and truthful. He says:—"Have you never noticed that the further a man removes from civilization, the greater the distance he penetrates the wilderness, the more he approaches the savage idea of splendour of dress and accoutrements? Men who in the crowded marts of the East would never think of clothing themselves in aught but the simplest garb, when removed to the wilder regions of mountains and plains array themselves in gaudy dress, wear the brightest colours, and adorn their persons with the richest jewellery." Mr. Clappitt would not have agreed with Charles X. of France, who told his cousin, the Duke of Orleans, that a gentleman should never wear gloves except when riding or driving or to keep his hands warm in exceptionally severe weather. He mentions the fact that a certain Colonel Stone always wore gloves, "for he was a man of great refinement both of mind and person." Some of the American terminology used in this book cannot but provoke a smile in English readers, as when we are told of the remark of a preacher to his wife, "Well, my dear, we will take every precaution, and the balance we will leave in the hands of Providence." It is a pity that Mr. Clappitt's publishers have done what he would probably call "their level best" to make the book as cumbrous and uncomfortable in shape and form as possible.

THREE MEN IN A BOAT.*

TWENTY years ago many young persons, who are no longer very young, used to be fond of a swashbuckler lyric of Mr. Swinburne's which has for refrain the lines—

While three men hold together
The kingdoms are less by three.

These were certainly "three in a boat," for they were instructed to "push, for the wind holds stiff, And the gunwale dips and rakes." Mr. Jerome's three men, however, are of a less exacting order. They have no wish to master the Devil's riddle, and, happily, show no inclination towards those "kisses that sting," a commodity which seems to have gone out of fashion since 1866. They are without any other mission than that of enjoying themselves innocently, vaguely, lazily, ignorantly, like other clerks from banks and lawyers' offices.

To tell the truth, we hardly know what to make of Three Men in a Boat, of which we have no desire to make much, either good or ill. It is not a piece of fiction, as might be supposed, since the author goes out of his way to say in a preface that "its pages form a record of events that really happened." Again, "George and Harris and Montmorency"—that is the dog, a fox terrier—"are not poetic ideals, but things of flesh and blood." There can be no meaning in these words unless we are intended to understand that the book is a more or less realistic account of what it professes to describe—a week's trip, in early summer, on the Thames. The events are, obviously, exaggerated for purposes of humour, but they seem to be real events. "Other works," says Mr. Jerome, "may excel this in depth of thought and knowledge of human nature; other books may rival it in originality and size; but for hopeless and incurable veracity nothing yet discovered can surpass it." On the whole, after reading Three Men in a Boat, we come to the conclusion that this is not intended for irony. These are what French novelists call "documents"; this is the genuine relation of a passage in the lives of actual people. We are face to face with a British species of the genus which has produced Amiel and Marie Bashkirtseff. Let not Mr. Jerome think us unkind in making a few reflections on his volume from this point of view. It is the only point of view from which it appears to us to be interesting; and if we do not consider it as "documents" we shall not consider it at all.

The whole chronicle is an account of how the author and two young friends went up the Thames from Kingston to Oxford, and back so far as Pangbourne, in a double-sculling skiff. It reproduces all the minute adventures of such a summer outing, mildly describes, for the thousandth time, but in a novel spirit, the objects on the shore, and is written entirely in colloquial clerk's English of the year 1889, of which this is an example taken at random:—

She was nuts on public-houses, was England's Virgin Queen. There's scarcely a pub. of any attractions within ten miles of London that she does not seem to have looked in at, or stopp'd at, or slept at, some time or other. I wonder now, supposing Harris, say, turned over a new leaf, and became a great and good man, and got to be Prime Minister, and died, if they would put signs over the public-houses that he had patronized. "Harris had a glass of bitter in this house"; "Harris had two of Scotch cold here in the summer of '83"; "Harris was chucked from here in December 1886."

This is not funny, of course; to do Mr. Jerome justice it is not intended to be particularly funny; but it is intensely colloquial, and, as an attempt to reproduce, without any kind of literary admixture, the ordinary talk of ordinary young people of to-day, it seems to us remarkable, especially as the whole book is kept at the same simple and yet abnormal level of style. It will be observed that in this short passage just quoted there are no less than six phrases which would be wholly unintelligible to a foreigner thoroughly conversant with the English of books, and yet not one of the six is in the least strained, or, though vulgar, would offer the least difficulty to a Londoner. For the future student of late

* Three Men in a Boat (to Say Nothing of the Dog). By Jerome K. Jerome. Illustrations by A. Friderics. Bristol: J. W. Arrowsmith.

Victorian slang, Three Men in a Boat will be invaluable, if he is able to understand it, and if, by the time he flourishes, the world of idle youth has not entirely forgotten what a "bally tent" and "sunday-school slops" and "a man of about number one size" are. In some of the sporting newspapers slang of this kind, and indeed of a much worse kind, may be discovered, but we do not recollect to have met any other book entirely written in it. In a sense, too, Three Men in a Boat is a much truer specimen of lower middle-class English than are the paragraphs in the coloured newspapers, because they are exaggerated and non-natural, while Mr. Jerome is amazingly real. That it was worth doing, we do not say; indeed, we have a very decided opinion that it was not. But the book's only serious fault is that the life it describes and the humour that it records are poor and limited, and decidedly vulgar. It is strange that a book like Three Men in a Boat, which is a tour de force in fun of a certain kind, should leave us with a sigh on our lips at the narrowness and poverty of the life it only too faithfully reflects. The illustrations, which are reproduced in some ineffectual modern process, go very well with the text, and are not less modern or faithful or incongruous. The figures in the really clever design on p. 71 give with complete accuracy, and without the least caricature, the outward appearance in the present year of grace of the sort of young men who figure in the pages of Three Men in a Boat. How droll and old-fashioned both will seem before the twentieth century opens!

MAITLAND'S DARK AGES.*

IT was not two years from the beginning of the Oxford Movement when the first of the Essays contained in this volume appeared in the British Magazine. The aim of the editor of the Magazine, the Rev. H. J. Rose, and his friends and supporters, was to counteract the attacks which were then being made on the Church by instructing people as to its history and character, and interesting them in matters connected with it. Some effort of the kind was, indeed, urgently needed, for the tendency of the day was decidedly anti-ecclesiastical, and the general ignorance of the clergy as well as the laity with respect to the foundation of the Church's claims, the prevalence of Erastianism, and the habit of regarding the Church as a mere machine created by the State for the regulation of public worship, gave an immense advantage both to its declared enemies, and to those dangerous friends who would have served it by surrendering vital principles. Ignorance of the ecclesiastical history of the middle ages was justly recognized by the early leaders of the High Church revival as one of the chief difficulties with which they had to contend; for historical misrepresentation was freely used to lower the dignity of the Church in the eyes of the world. On one side Hume, whose dislike of Christianity led him to sneer at the religion and learning of the middle ages, had many followers who adopted his prejudices though they were unable to imitate his skilful advocacy, while on another there had risen up a tribe of Protestant writers who represented Western Europe as steeped in ignorance until it was enlightened by the Reformation. Both parties agreed in speaking of the middle ages with contempt; they were the "dark ages," a "time of universal ignorance"; the monks were slothful and illiterate, and clergy and people alike knew not the Scriptures. The effect of this high and mighty manner of treating the past was that men came to think of themselves as wholly cut off from it. The Church of England was in their eyes a foundation of Henry VIII., with no antiquity, Catholicity, or Apostolic succession, and, as they believed that it had been called into existence by the State, so they considered that it had no rights independent of the will of its creator. They robbed it of its heritage of noble deeds and noble names; St. Anselm and Robert Grosseteste, Roger Bacon and Occam, were, if they ever heard of them, reckoned as members of another Church.

In these Essays Maitland points out the absurdity of the popular idea that the "dark ages," as they were called, were almost wholly destitute of spiritual religion, learning, and literature, and examines and holds up to ridicule the sweeping statements and ill-considered arguments of Robertson, in the opening pages of his History of Charles V., of Henry, Jortin, Milner, and others, who, either from prejudice or ignorance, had done much to foster this silly and mischievous error. He selects as the specially "dark ages" the period between 800 and 1200, and investigates how far it deserved to be so called, discussing, among other matters, the state of learning, the number of books then in existence, and the estimation in which they were held. Robertson had supported one of his attacks on the religion of the middle ages by an extract, copied incorrectly, and taken at second-hand from a homily of St. Eloy, or "Egidius," as the historian—knowing, no doubt, as little of St. Giles as he did of St. Eloy—also wrote the name. This is made an opportunity for giving a charming narrative of the saint's life, as well as an accurate translation of the homily in question. In another place Robertson, in descanting on the scarcity of books, says, "Even monasteries of considerable note had only one missal," and adds an impossible reference to the Antiquitates Italice of Muratori. Maitland hunted up the passage, which had probably been loosely quoted by some other author and from him still more loosely paraphrased by Robertson, and found that it referred to a single church, that it was written by Bonus, Abbot of St. Michael's at Pisa, and that it was part of his description of the miserable condition of his church before a monastery was founded there. Several of the essays are directed against the vulgar notion, even now by no means entirely eradicated, that the Bible was almost wholly unknown during the "dark ages," and numerous instances are given and many pleasant stories which illustrate the author's position. Other essays deal with the rise of the Cluniac and Cistercian Orders and the lives of some of the more famous abbots, and specially of Peter the Venerable, Abbot of Clugni, whom Milner presumed to call an "ignorant and trifling writer." The essays as a whole are delightful. Although they are full of learning, no one can find them dull or heavy; they abound in well-told stories, amusing quotations, and clever sarcasm. Sometimes diffuse and almost rambling, they read for the most part like the easy talk of a witty and accomplished scholar. It would, of course, be absurd to expect to find them as sound in every particular as they would be were they the production of an historian of the present day as eminent as Maitland was in his generation. For example, if Maitland were living now he would not quote the Chronicle of the pseudo-Ingulf with respect. Yet, even if judged by the present standard of knowledge, his Essays will be acknowledged to be the work of a well-equipped historical scholar as well as of a man of considerable literary ability. Their effect was widespread and immediate. The degree to which they galled ultra-Protestant writers abroad as well as at home may be estimated by the violence of a letter sent to the Record newspaper by Merle d'Aubigné, the author of a History of the Reformation, which was once, and perhaps still is, widely read in Evangelical families. A nobler and more lasting result of their publication was a general awakening to the interest and importance of the history of the Church during the Middle Ages. Although they are not specially concerned with the Church of England, they did much to correct the mistaken ideas which many of its members entertained with reference to it; they were led to study its history, and so were brought to a truer knowledge of its character and the foundation of its claims. We welcome the republication of this famous book for many reasons, and not least because it is eminently stimulating. Whatever the previous knowledge of a reader may be, he will, we think, be stirred up by these Essays to seek to learn more of a subject which they treat so pleasantly.

* The Dark Ages: Essays Illustrating the State of Religion and Literature in the Ninth, Tenth, Eleventh, and Twelfth Centuries. By S. R. Maitland, D.D., F.R.S., F.S.A., sometime Librarian and Keeper of the MSS. at Lambeth. New edition, with an Introduction by Frederick Stokes, M.A. London: John Hodges. 1889.

NONSENSICAL BOOKS.*

NONSENSICAL books must not for a moment be confounded with the immortal Book of Nonsense and its supplements. If there flourishes in the United Kingdom a man or woman of a greater age than four years who has no knowledge whatever of the Book of Nonsense, that individual is much to be pitied. A striking contrast may be observed by contemplating the enormous mass of merriment and wisdom which Mr. Lear's inimitable volumes of avowed nonsense have added to the gaiety of these islands, and then casting a horrified eye over such works as these, which pretend to lay before the cultivated public the results of peculiar and esoteric wisdom. The casual beholder of such books is, in the first instance, tempted to raise a clamour of protest against the dispensations of Providence whereby the printing press was permitted to become known to a race capable of using it in so appalling a manner, and the art of writing to become the affliction of many instead of the accomplishment of few. "We must not overlook," such a person might say in his haste, "the circumstance that, thanks to the spread of writing and printing, folly which, perhaps, better deserves to be styled madness, can now spread itself abroad like a rabid dog, seeking whom it may infect. In unfortunately bygone days these cranks—to use a civil term—would have been constrained to consume their own imbecility. Those who had the misfortune to be their neighbours would have left them to rave unheeded, locked them up in disused cellars, or knocked them on the head, as convenience might have dictated. Now they force themselves upon the world, endangering all the weak minds whose owners may happen to stumble upon their productions, and fanning the flames of their own folly by the seductive process of gibbering in printed books, which, to the corporal eye, look just the same as they would if they were full of profound wisdom and genuine research." Such blasphemy against human progress is not without plausibility, yet it is probably not to be accepted without qualification. It is pretty certain

* The Secret Doctrine: the Synthesis of Science, Religion, and Philosophy. By H. P. Blavatsky, author of "Isis Unveiled." London: The Theosophical Publishing Company.

The Influence of the Stars: a Book of Old-World Lore. By Rosa Baughan, author of "The Handbook of Palmistry" &c. London: George Redway. 1889.

Light and Colour, Emblematic of Revealed Truth. By the late Major R. W. D. Nickle. Edited by Sarah Sharp, author of "My Jewels" &c. London: Hodder & Stoughton. 1889.

A Handbook of Cartomancy, Fortune-telling, and Occult Divination. By Grand Orient. London: George Redway. 1889.

that there were wonder-workers before Madame Blavatsky, monomaniacs before Major Nickle, and false prophets before "Grand Orient." When their follies were less likely to be written and certain not to be printed, their oral announcements probably carried more weight, and, if they can now lay their utterances before a much larger audience, that audience has much less excuse for not knowing what rubbish their utterances are.

Nevertheless, when all is said and done, the existence of four such new books as those now under consideration ought to give pause to the most enthusiastic supporter of the mental superiority of the present age to past times. They would certainly produce profound melancholy in one of those ingenuous magistrates who from time to time express astonishment at the fact that a servant-girl will pay a week's wages to a vagrant fortune-teller, or the mother of a large family pay five shillings to a local sorcerer to perform grotesque incantations for the benefit of a sick child. For it is certainly a remarkable collection. First we have two massive volumes containing a gigantic instalment of the philosophy of Mme. Blavatsky. The covers, of handsome grey cloth, nicely worked, measure ten inches by six. They contain together no fewer than 1,474 closely printed pages of text, besides lxxvii. of introduction and index. They treat, rather exhaustively, of man, the world, and the universe; and, like the other works about to be enumerated, they consist of nothing but sheer, absolute, unadulterated nonsense. Following this we have a handsome volume, bright yellow, with red lettering and ornamentation outside, and red edges to the leaves, wherein Miss Rose Baughan sets forth the principles of "astrology," "chiromancy," and "physiognomy," under the title of The Influence of the Stars. It contains nearly two hundred pages. Next, hardly less expensively got up, is the magnum opus of the late Major Nickle, who appears to have been an amiable lunatic with a strange turn of piety. It is enthusiastically edited by Miss Sarah Sharp, and sets out the religious significance of the primary colours, and some others, in a sufficiently astonishing manner. It contains a vast number of texts, and many brightly-coloured plates. Finally, there is a little black book, humble in appearance and strictly business-like in style, which tells you your fortune, and teaches you how to tell other people's, in more than a score of entirely different ways, each more childish than the other. The author styles himself "Grand Orient." Individually, perhaps, these works hardly deserve notice. Collectively, they are edifying as a testimony to the gigantic proportions and widespread ramifications of human folly in the present wise and cultivated era.

Mme. Blavatsky's book is considerably the most impressive of the four. Conscience will hardly permit the critic to pay Mme. Blavatsky the compliments which her industry so well deserves, because "the two volumes now issued do not complete the scheme," and "should the present volumes meet with a favourable reception, no effort will be spared to carry out the scheme of the work in its entirety. The third volume is entirely ready; the fourth almost so." A favourable reception of the work would, therefore, be cruel to its author; and for once the voices of justice and mercy plead on the same side of the question. Though Mme. Blavatsky is certainly the author of The Secret Doctrine, she modestly prefers to be considered the editor only of the assertions comprised in the work. "For what is contained in this work is to be found scattered throughout thousands of volumes embodying the scriptures of the great Asiatic and early European religions, hidden under glyph and symbol, and hitherto unnoticed because of this veil." Besides being numerous, the volumes constituting Mme. Blavatsky's authorities are miscellaneous in their character. They comprise MSS. of indescribable antiquity, which may have been found in caves in Thibet or elsewhere, or may have been carefully treasured by generations of esoteric "adepts" and recently permitted to be partly or wholly published. They also comprise the works of all manner of philosophers, historians, speculators, and impostors at all periods of history. The work consists of two parts, of which the first is called "Cosmogogenesis" and the second "Anthropogenesis." The former explains how the world was made, and why, and when, and where, and by whom, and how often, and the same for as many other worlds as are considered to be important enough to be worth mention. The latter does the same for the races of men, past, present, and future. To give a notion of the sort of thing, each volume shall now be opened twice, honestly at random, and the result recorded. (Vol. i. p. 187.) "Every Round repeats on a higher scale the evolutionary work of the preceding Round. With the exception of some higher anthropoids, as just mentioned, the Monadic inflow, or inner evolution is at an end till the next Manvantara." (Vol. i. 450.) "'The Dodecahedron lies concealed in the perfect Cube,' say, the Kabalists. The mystic meaning of this is that the twelve great transformations of Spirit into matter (the 12,000 divine years) take place during the four great ages, or the first Mahayuga." (Vol. ii. p. 248.) "Before other Stanzas could be explained, it was, as seen, absolutely necessary to show that the sons of 'Dark Wisdom,' though identical with the Archangels which Theology has chosen to call the 'Fallen,' are as divine and as pure and more so than all the Michaels and Gabriels so glorified in the churches." (Vol. ii. p. 561.) "Now, the primordial system, the double glyph that underlies the idea of the Cross, is not 'of human invention,' for Cosmic ideation and the Spiritual representation of the divine Ego-man are at its basis." Of course, both volumes contain an immense deal of disquisition about reproduction, which wobbles along the margin between pseudo-science and ta enda. The best thing Mme. Blavatsky could do with the product of her researches would be to fetch as many glyphs and symbols as might be necessary, and cover it all up again.

The Influence of the Stars is also the work of a lady, but is far less ambitious than Mme. Blavatsky's. Miss Baughan sets forth with touching earnestness all the well-established astrological lore, both simply, and in connexion with the lines on people's hands and the shapes of their faces. "Saturn in the first house, or ascendant, shows melancholy and many sorrows, and if near the ascendant probability of early death," and so on, and so on. Has it never occurred to Miss Baughan that if, instead of telling other people how to prophesy with the aid of the stars, she would turn to and prophesy a little herself, it would be much more effective? It would be difficult to say very much about the late Major Nickle's discourse upon the significance of colours, save at the expense of dealing in an undesirable way with religious topics. The book comes to this, that Major Nickle was persuaded that the three primary colours were in some way or other "typical of" or otherwise appropriate to the Three Persons of the Trinity, and that the other colours of the rainbow somehow indicated divers abstract qualities. This theory he supported both with reason and authority, and any one who feels interested in the subject can buy his book and see what he has to say. But as far as manner and style go the Major is not at all attractive.

The Handbook of Cartomancy is far the most pleasing of the present batch of literature. There is no "fooling around" with explanations, nothing but the barest statement that "You will love many, deceive some, and meet your match in marriage after all," that "You will succeed by dealing in ornamental goods, buying and selling small articles, or in any ingenious line such as paintings or engravings," that "a cheat will confront you," or as the case may be. In a word, it is simply the servant-maid's vagrant fortune-teller in the shape of a little book. The interesting thing is, that the little book is so well got up and contains so much matter that it must have cost something to publish, and that it clearly can be of use only to people who can read. Among other matters, the reader may learn the art of "prediction of things to come by the grounds in a Tea or Coffee Cup," Divination with Needles, Divination with Onions, Margaritomancy or Divination with a Pearl, and many other occult and surprising mysteries. And this is 1889!

CONTINENTAL HISTORY.*

CONSIDERING the difficulty of producing in a small compass a summary of the affairs of Europe during the last hundred years, which shall be at once fairly readable and full of facts, no one should hesitate to commend Mr. Rose's attempt. He begins with the period immediately preceding the French Revolution, and divides his work into subjects, paying less attention to mere chronological sequence after 1848 than when treating of earlier events. In one or two cases the wisdom of his arrangement is certainly open to question; here and there, though by no means often, he writes allusively about a matter which needs a plain statement of fact—his reference to the Spanish Marriage dispute is an instance of this—and, of course, every one with a fair knowledge of European affairs may find some matters treated more cursorily and others more at length than he would himself have treated them. Nevertheless, the book as a whole is extremely well put together. It is accurate, fair, and moderate in tone, and, though necessarily somewhat closely packed, is not uninteresting. A teacher may use it with profit, if he knows how such a book ought to be used, and can supplement it from other sources, and it will be found very serviceable for purposes of reference, as it gives plenty of dates and is furnished with a sufficient index.

TOWNSHIPS AND COUNTIES.†

AS a matter of fact, the local institutions of the United States are, with certain differences, copied from analogous institutions in the parent country. A right understanding of them may therefore be gained without any previous knowledge other than an acquaintance with the system of local government in England in the seventeenth century and with the conditions which have led various American States to adopt modifications of it. Modern, however, as the American arrangements are, their descent may, of course, be traced through their models to those primitive Teutonic institutions, from which the local constitutional system of England is itself descended. An admiration for antiquity, natural to the citizens of a comparatively new country, has, especially of late years, caused a considerable number of American professors of history to expound their local systems by referring them back to early Teutonic customs. This method, which has been followed here by Professor Howard, is in some respects excellent; it enables the student to grasp the principles which underlie an organization perfectly familiar to him, and at the same time illustrates the past by the light of the present. It is, however, rather an academic way of treating the subject, and is apt to divert the attention from a more instructive line of inquiry. It would, we contend, be sounder to start with an investigation as to the forms and spirit of local government in England in the seventeenth century, and then to proceed to examine the circumstances which led the colonists, when in their new home, to introduce changes in institutions familiar to them, and which brought about further modifications in later times. While such inquiries have not been entirely neglected by Professor Howard, we do not think that they hold their rightful place in his book; they are made subordinate to matters which, as far as his special task is concerned, can scarcely be regarded as of the first importance. However, he keeps clear of a failing sometimes to be met with in the works of authors who adopt the same method; he does not speak as though the colonists consciously copied early institutions. Indeed, he distinctly recognizes that the changes which they made in the English system of local government were simply the effect of circumstances, and exhibit what he expresses as the "revival of organs and functions on recurrence of primitive environment." His book, valuable as it certainly is, seems to lack unity of purpose. If we look at it as a study in political science, we do not grudge the space devoted to the Mark, the Völkerschaft, the Shire, and the Gau, and the like, but find it deficient as regards the influences which determined the special developments of constitutional principles in local politics in the various colonies and States, and redundant in particulars about petty offices and other matters of small moment. If, on the other hand, his book is to be judged according to its title, as a Local Constitutional History of the United States, we complain of the same deficiency, and further consider that it enters at far too great length on questions which have only a remote bearing on its subject. Nor is the arrangement of his work—which is, of course, decided by his method of treatment—free from inconvenience. The main divisions of the book are headed the Township, the Hundred—which is of scarcely any importance in this connexion—and the Shire. Under these headings we have, first, a discussion as to the character and significance borne by each of these institutions in the earliest times, and the changes which they subsequently underwent in England; and then a treatise on the special point in the local government systems of the various States which more or less represent each of these primitive institutions. This arrangement is irritating, for it prevents the reader from getting a complete and coherent view of any one local constitution. It would, of course, be difficult to deal with Professor Howard's subject in an attractive manner; his book is certainly heavy reading, and is not improved by his habit of using long and hideous words.

* A Century of Continental History, 1780-1880. By J. H. Rose, M.A., formerly Classical Scholar of Christ's College, Cambridge. London: Edward Stanford. 1889.

† An Introduction to the Local Constitutional History of the United States. By George E. Howard, Professor of History in the University of Nebraska. Vol. I. Development of the Township, Hundred, and Shire. Baltimore: Publication Agency of the Johns Hopkins University. 1889.

Professor Howard's chapters on the ancient Township, Hundred, and Shire present, in a fairly concise form, and with abundant and exact references, the opinions of the most eminent English and German writers on early Teutonic institutions; he quotes Bishop Stubbs with becoming respect, and leans much on his authority. In New England the town, which is, of course, a rural community, appears as the constitutional unit in the three important particulars of rating, militia organization, and representation. Its affairs were managed by the town-meeting, an assembly copied from the English vestry, with some important differences, due both to the circumstances of the early colonists, and also, no doubt, to their desire for self-government. One or two of these differences had the effect of bringing the meeting into a certain degree of conformity with the ancient town-moot; the circumstances of the settlers were analogous to those of their remote forefathers, and accordingly the institutions which they brought with them from the England of the seventeenth century naturally assumed on transportation some features which were conspicuous at an earlier stage of their development. The town-meeting, which consisted of all male inhabitants of full age, appointed local officers, levied rates, made by-laws relating to the common land of the town, and other kindred matters, and provided for education and public worship. Administrative business was transacted by a small Board, the members of which were elected annually, and were called Selectmen; their office was copied from the Select Vestry of an English parish, but they were not allowed to encroach on the prerogative or sphere of action of the Primary Assembly. In the town-meeting the colonists found an opportunity for political training; and it is, Professor Howard remarks, "difficult to understand how without it the English race in America could have grown into an independent nation." Certainly the town-meeting of Boston, under the leadership of Sam Adams, played a great part in the organization of the revolt of the colonies. Compared with the town, the New England county is of small constitutional importance; it is little more than an area for judicial, and in the case of Massachusetts for some fiscal, purposes. Professor Howard considers that the county system of New England has been unduly slighted; but we fail to see that it has any characteristics which make it specially interesting to the student of political science. The county was more prominent in the Southern colonies, and was employed in all the chief functions of government. It was, however, merely an artificial division used by the State for certain purposes of government, and does not, perhaps, even in Virginia, afford quite such "an interesting and profitable" subject for study as Professor Howard would have us believe. The history of the local institutions in the Middle colonies presents some remarkable features which are well drawn out here. In the New Netherlands, for example, under the Dutch rule the local government resided in the "manors, villages, and chartered towns." By the Duke of York's Laws a system was introduced closely resembling that of the New England colonies, in which the town was the constitutional unit, though with some considerable differences, for the town-meeting seems to have had no other powers than that of electing officers. Counties were formed in the province before the end of the seventeenth century, and a few years later a mixed system "of representative township-county government was introduced which now constitutes the highest type of local organization in the United States." It was provided in 1703 that the fiscal administration of the county should be vested in supervisors elected annually by the freeholders of each town. Pennsylvania arrived at the township-county administration by a different process; for throughout three-quarters of a century of proprietary rule its county was a remarkably independent institution, and it was not until "the later portion of that era that there was gradually developed a practice of co-operation in the administration of local affairs," which takes the form of the "commissioner system."

The character of local government in the West was decided by the systems worked out in New York and Pennsylvania. Professor Howard, who has treated this part of his subject with special care, considers that the "Western township-county plan is the most advanced phase of local institutions," and notes the existence of three distinct types of township organization. The lowest of these is exhibited by the States which have adopted the "Pennsylvania plan," Ohio, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, and Missouri, where the township has for the most part the power of levying rates and electing its own officers, but can do little besides. The next type in the ascending scale is afforded by Minnesota and Dakota, where there is a town-meeting held each year for the election of officers and some other business. The township, however, is subordinate to the county board, and the members of the board are not township representatives, but are elected by the county itself. Lastly, the "highest form of local organization is that usually styled the New York plan," which prevails in Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Nebraska, where the township is subordinate to the county, but sends representatives to it. Under this system the town-meeting certainly exists, but in a far less perfect form than the old New England meeting. Professor Howard, who belongs at least by residence to Nebraska, sees "no occasion to regret that the excessive publicity and obtrusive functionalism of primitive New England have not been perpetuated." Dr. Bryce, on the other hand, evidently considers that the somewhat artificial character of the town-meeting of the West is a drawback to the "Illinois and Michigan system." The rise of the Commissioner system in the North-west Territory is traced in a section of unusual interest, and this is followed by an equally good account of the gradual development of county organization down to the introduction of the representative township-county administration on the New York plan. While this mixed system of local government, "the result of a fusion of the social elements of New England and the Middle States," was adopted in some cases quietly enough, it was not settled in others without a sharp struggle. A curious illustration of this is found in the history of Illinois, where the inhabitants were for some years almost exclusively immigrants from Virginia and other Southern States, and the entire business of the counties was placed in the hands of County Commissioners. After 1820, however, when Missouri was admitted as a slave-State, the Southerners ceased to settle in Illinois, and the population of the northern district was recruited from the Eastern and Middle States. The new settlers demanded township organization, and a struggle ensued, which ended in a piece of permissive legislation—each county was allowed to form townships. At first the northern counties only took advantage of this permission; but their example has gradually been followed by nearly all the rest. There is much that is worthy of note in Professor Howard's work which we cannot enter upon here, such as his remarks on the relation of the school district to the township, the rise and decay of the hundred in the American colonies, and the character of the parish in Virginia, Maryland, and the Carolinas. It is a pity that, master as he evidently is of his intricate subject, he has not treated it as it has been treated by Dr. Bryce in the necessarily small space allotted to it in the second volume of The American Commonwealth—that he has not adopted a better system of arrangement, and written what he had to say in simple words.

DON QUIXOTE.*

THE completion of Mr. Watts's translation of Don Quixote gives us the most carefully-equipped and the handsomest of the versions of that work which we possess. Whether there is a handsomer and better edition in any other tongue we shall not undertake to decide, but we doubt it greatly. This first edition of Mr. Watts's version has even—in our copy, at least—one of those slight defects which have been found to attract the true book-collector. It is on p. 285 of the third volume, and is in a mild way a mix—being, in fact, the transposition of a line from the top to the foot of a page. With this exception, however, which is, after all, of the nature of a mole or patch, the five volumes are such as a writer or publisher of books may be satisfied to put his name to. The size is convenient without being little, the type clear, the margin sufficient, the paper pleasant to the feel, and not, as so much modern paper is, heavy. Finally, we greatly commend all books which are bound in vellum and blue paper.

* The Ingenious Gentleman, Don Quixote of La Mancha. By Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra. A new edition done into English; with Notes, original and selected, and a new Life of the Author, by Henry Edward Watts. London: Bernard Quaritch.

When we noticed the first two volumes of Mr. Watts's five, we proposed to leave a detailed examination of the text of his translation till we had seen them all. Now, however, that we have them all before us, there seems to be nothing to add to what we have already said. It would be quite possible to go through this, or, indeed, any translation, doubting and differing over every third sentence. But, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, these doubts and differences would be little better than cavils or varieties of taste. In the hundredth case the right path is commonly obscure. The essential thing about every translation is that it should give the meaning of the original. Now this Mr. Watts's does. How far it gives or can give more than that is another matter. If anybody having some previous conception of the meaning of the words "language" and "style" will ask himself what possibility there is that a Teutonic language, as it is spoken in the latter part of the nineteenth century, can give the real equivalent of a Latin language as it was spoken in the sixteenth, he will be prepared to believe that a great deal must be missed in any translation of Don Quixote. All that part, that very great part, of Cervantes's masterpiece which is the Castilian of his time is lost. What remains, however, has been found sufficient to attract many generations of Englishmen. This Mr. Watts gives in good and readable English. We shall not imitate the very bad example set us by the Cervantists themselves (or most of them), and begin to make comparisons, to dwell on the blunders of So-and-so, and the want of humour of this other. We shall not stop to inquire whether Mr. Watts's version is better or not better than Mr. anybody else's. Enough that he who reads it may feel tolerably certain that he is getting the meaning of Cervantes. How far the reader of translations troubles his head about their accuracy is, to be sure, a matter of obscurity, and we know of no more idle speculation than the inquiry whether the verbal accuracy of the translation avails the reader aught. Except when he uses it as a crib (not the worst use to put it to), its accuracy is a thing he cannot estimate unless he knows the original; but translations are a weariness to him who can go to the source. Not the worst faith is the old one, that the first duty of a translation is to be literature in the language in which it is written, and that fidelity to the original is only the second of its virtues.

The elaborate apparatus of notes and appendices with which Mr. Watts has furnished his translation is an interesting feature of the work. We do not include in our praise the largish percentage of footnotes devoted to informing the reader that Clemencin says this, and is possibly right, or that he says that, and is a dull dog. What is the English reader to Clemencin, or Clemencin to the English reader, that he should care for him? Neither do we think it an addition to the value of the translation that it should contain so many notes written for no other apparent purpose than to inform us that various sinners have held opinions not acceptable to Mr. Watts, and are, therefore, anathema. The Cervantist Church is, as regards the number of its schisms and the limitations of its orthodoxy, very absurdly like the remarkable religious body which had the privilege of containing Douce Davie Deans. But, putting these aside, there is much in the notes which is really explanatory of the text; the appendices containing much more. As we think we have said before, the reader may possibly learn from Mr. Watts to speak of tales of chivalry with "more familiarity and less contempt" than he has commonly done hitherto. It is quite true, as Mr. Watts points out, that the Amadis is more readable than not a little modern romance. In these times, when we are for ever professing to have an open mind for all the good of the literature of all time, somebody ought really to say a word for the Tales of Chivalry. Mr. Watts's own analysis of the story of Amadis may perhaps show the way. We cannot, however, agree with him that "all internal evidence tends to confirm the hypothesis that the original and typical romance which is Amadis of Gaul grew into being with the arrival of the English contingent in Spain in 1367 under the Black Prince." If Lopez de Ayala, who was thirty-five at this time, had read the Amadis in his youth, it must have been a known book long before the coming of the Black Prince. Neither are we quite sure that Mr. Watts is right in dismissing the claim of the French to have originated the Amadis with contempt. It is at least antecedently probable that whatever Christian art and literature there was in Spain at that time was of French origin. The relations between Castile and France had been close for many generations. French Churchmen and architects had been brought in by Castilian kings. French crusaders had assisted in the reconquest. It is highly probable, therefore, that France exercised influence on Castile as on all her neighbours. The growth of the tale of chivalry out of the chanson de geste is, at any rate, more probable than its growth out of nothing. It is not necessary to suppose that there was an Amadis in French, though its absence is no proof that it did not once exist. The Castilian version which Vasco de Lobeira is plausibly supposed to have turned into Portuguese is not to be found; but is there a Spaniard who doubts of its existence? Still, even if there was no French original, it would not follow that the inspiration was not French. The Spaniards took all the forms of their chivalry from their neighbours to the north of the Pyrenees, and may have taken their stories also. It is, to be sure, all a matter of supposition as far as the literature is concerned. How completely the chivalry was a copy Mr. Watts enables his readers to see by his appendix on the curious Bell's Life account of the famous "Paso Honroso," the tournament at the bridge of Orbigo. A carefully annotated and illustrated translation of this document would make a good pendant to Mr. Watts's translation.

ESSAYS IN LITERATURE AND ETHICS.*

ALTHOUGH, except locally, this book may not command any very large circle of readers, we think that Mr. Axon was well advised in collecting some of the literary remains of the late Rev. William Anderson O'Connor. Mr. O'Connor had no great reputation outside Manchester, the place of his later residence, yet those who only knew him through his books (and it is from such knowledge only that this review is written) must have been able, if they chose, to detect in him ability and character decidedly out of the common. His theological work was not unimportant; but it was, we think, inferior in interest to his work on Irish history, which has been more than once noticed in these pages. Mr. O'Connor was not by any means devoid of the national wrongheadedness; but his treatment of Irish questions was marked by an honesty which is unfortunately not so invariably a national characteristic, and which is never less generally remarkable than in those Anglican divines who have at one time or another taken upon themselves to urge the wrongs of Ireland, standing on the safe vantage-ground and wrapped in the good warm cloak of Anglican endowment and privilege. Mr. O'Connor's work in this department had a peculiar, if a melancholy, interest as showing, under the most favourable circumstances, what those characteristics of the Irish temper or temperament are which make Irishmen equally unable to bear autonomy or government by others. Mr. Axon complains of the scanty preferment which his subject received; but the complaint, though natural, is hardly just. It is a common, but an erroneous, conception of the endowments of the National Church to regard them either as primarily a series of prizes or a cadre of promotion. Besides, even the hints that Mr. Axon gives show that Mr. O'Connor, though an excellent and able man and a hard worker, was probably a little difficult at times to get on with. He was, says Mr. Axon, "a man of marked individuality, and at times of morbid temperament." It is not difficult to put a comment on this text.

The work which this volume contains is, with one exception, neither theological nor political, but literary and miscellaneous. We understand that few, if any, of the papers were published in any ordinary way, and that they were mostly written to be read before the Manchester Literary Club. Five are purely literary—on Mr. Browning's "Childe Roland," on the "Palace of Art," on the Prometheus (Æschylean and Shelleyan), and (of course) on Hamlet. One on the Book of Job, the exception noted above, is both theological and political, and puts the author's views (which are not ours) on these matters rather eloquently. One on "Fables" is itself a kind of fable or parable, and has running through it a vein of rather bitter, though not ill-natured, satire. And, lastly, there is a sort of Voyage Humorstique, "From Lancashire to Land's End" (it should be "the" Land's End), in which the Irish humour, though sometimes a little schoolboyish, is pleasant enough. All these papers are decidedly above the level of the kind of work among which for the most part they must have found themselves—in saying which we intend no discredit to the Manchester Literary Club. They have a slight touch of amateurishness about them, and perhaps here and there another touch of a well-known kind which may be called the pulpit-exegetic. Mr. O'Connor seems to have been by no means a desperately clerical cleric, but it is curious how hard it is for a parson to avoid (even Kingsley did not avoid it) the "and-now-my-brethren-we-may-see-from-these-words" tone. As a literary critic, too, Mr. O'Connor seems sometimes to have lacked insight. We at least see in Lord Tennyson's exquisite "Flow down, cold rivulet, to the sea," something not in the least like "a feeble shrinking from death"; indeed, we do not see where the idea of death comes in. It is the far different idea of separation, in life, from scenes associated with some passionate passage of life—the "regret pensif et confus D'avoir été et n'être plus." Nevertheless, the general merit of the essays is considerable, and justifies at once their publication and a regret that their author, whose life was not a short one, had not a more direct and, so to speak, professional connexion with literature.

* Essays in Literature and Ethics. By W. A. O'Connor. Edited by W. E. A. Axon. Manchester: Cornish.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

M. ALBER JHOUNEY'S Livre du jugement (1) (which bears no publisher's name, but which is imprinted, and very well too, by MM. Trabuc and Raviolo, of Marseilles, and has, if not a publisher, yet a dépositaire at Paris in M. Sauvaître) is one of a class of books which have an odd attraction for some persons, though others, and the great majority, fly from them as from the pest. M. Jhouney undertakes to tell in verse "the dramatic history of the human Soul and its destiny, recounted by the light of occult tradition and the Kabbala." The verse in which he tells it may be gnostically, if not to the general reader very intelligibly, described as standing to the verse of M. Leconte de Lisle very much as the verse of M. Leconte de Lisle stands to that of Victor Hugo, possessing also echoes of older models, notably Du Bartas. The opening five lines have a strong flavour of the Sepmaine:—

Terrible Amour, Soleil infini, Loi première,
Créateur Océan dont la blanche lumière,
Immobile éternellement, remplit les cieux,
Puis au-delà déborde en flots mystérieux,
Père, Néant, Vie Innombrable, Solitude.

It is, at least, very fair of M. Jhouney (who, it will be observed, has a certain sans-gêne as a prosodist) to give such an unmistakable foretaste. His readers are thus in a position at once to repeat the immortal words "O dear poet! if all thy dear book be like this, it is no use our reading any more, for we shall not understand it!" They certainly will not. The piece from which we have taken the extract is headed "Ensof"; whence we proceed to "Jod Heva O Elohim," and thence to "Sacrifice," "La Révolte des Anges," "La Nébuleuse," and a great many other sections, in composing the matter of which M. Jhouney has drawn on science and Christianity as well as on the occult traditions and the Kabbala. His language is often as odd as his prosody; at least, the all-embracing Littre does not, even in his supplement, recognize the word allowir, to "wolfen"—

("Sous les lilas géants de l'immortalité Hurlaient vers le désir mes forces allowies")—

and he has been happy enough to disinter other more legitimated but scarcely less unusual terms, such as "cerne," in the sense of a magician's circle. This style tourmenté and the nature of the subject do not always prevent, and perhaps sometimes assist, a certain grandiosity; but the "Queen of Sheba" style in poetry, the style which "comes from the ends of the earth," is seldom other than a fault.

The work of that exceedingly ingenious and fertile writer, M. Charles d'Héricault, always presents so many elements of goodness that one wonders why on earth (we refer, of course, only to his work in fiction) it is never quite good. He explains in his preface to Fou d'amour (2), almost with tears in his eyes, that "ce roman ne peut pas, comme ceux que j'ai faits jusqu'ici, être offert aux jeunes filles chrétiennes." We fear, however, that if any old man heathen procures it with a horrid joy on the strength of this announcement he will be dreadfully disappointed. It talks, indeed, of things which are not permitted to be offered, in fiction, to the young girl Christian in France, with the result, says scandal, that she is particularly prone to offer them to herself, in fact, at the expense of her husband later. But, as M. d'Héricault says, "the light is pure," and so it is. Whether, as in his odd way he also says, "le style est chaud, le récit est haletant, le drame est poignant," must be left to readers to decide. We can only repeat that, if M. d'Héricault has not yet written a good novel, we cannot for the life of us put into brief shape the reasons why he has not. L'âge de papier (3) is a book of some power. It deals, indeed, as its title may hint to the knowing, with that society (half, or, let us say, one quarter real, the rest conventional) of fashionable journalists, financiers, and the like, which has occupied the pens of so many French novelists of late—a worthless and uninteresting society, out of which it is difficult enough to make worthy and interesting books. But it deals with its subject in a manner worthy of what, we think, old-fashioned people used to call a better cause—with too much parabasis, indeed, and talker-talker about the New Revolution, and all the rest of it, but with a lively touch of phrase, and a certain grasp of human and not impossible character; of character drawn from the ordinary street and room, and not from the lazar-house or the lunatic asylum. The tales (for there are three) which are contained in Andrée de Loze (4) are, like most of the work of their author, pleasant enough, well enough written, and generally turned out in workmanlike fashion.

Mr. Smith's Modern French Readings (5) is a good enough book for its purpose, though Mr. Smith seems to have an exaggerated idea of the special excellence or novelty of its plan. Berquin and the Ami des Enfants, indeed, figure rather oddly among "modern" extracts, but we care very little for that. It is the genesis of the book, or rather the account given of it, which seems to us unsatisfactory. Mr. Smith says that he is "indebted for the selection of the extracts" to Professor Knapp of Yale College, and that he has "in some cases borrowed" from Mr. Knapp's notes on the text. This seems to be an odd sort of editing or collaboration. Modern French literature is surely wide enough for an English editor to make his own selections from it, and if American or other work be borrowed, it had better be left as it is, with distinct additions, if such appear necessary. However, as we have said, the Smith-Knapp, or Knapp-Smith, work will be useful enough in its way. The Helps for Composition (these, we think, are Smith, not Knapp) are sound enough, and the notes also, though they sometimes show a little deficiency of information or judgment. For instance, Mr. Smith says that Royer-Collard was "a French philosopher and orator [which he certainly was], famous for the retired, studious life which he led for many years." Would this, if said of an Englishman, suggest to the student that the subject had been for many years an extremely active politician, and for some time Speaker of the House of Commons?

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

THE good old times—"all times when old are good"—are pleasantly suggested to readers of antiquarian taste in Mr. J. A. Sparvel-Bayly's New Studies in Old Subjects (Elliot Stock), a volume of articles obviously intended to amuse and interest the numerous class of persons who, though neither antiquaries by profession or temperament, are gifted with an archaeological disposition. Mr. Sparvel-Bayly is a diligent gleaner in many fields, and without any claim to original research, though evidently the antiquities of Kent and Essex are familiar to him, his book may be opened anywhere and be found easy and agreeable reading. Diverse as the themes are, the writer is no discursive commentator. On such subjects as implements of war, the pilgrim and the shrine, beer and brewers, pipes and smoking, pews, church bells, monumental brasses, Mr. Sparvel-Bayly is a collector of curious and entertaining facts, concerning the origin of which he is never keenly speculative, but seems rather, having set them forth in a pleasing form, to wish the reader a happy digestion. And surely this easy way is better than falling into a vagrant irrelevance. Whether weapons of offence or of defence are of superior antiquity is one of the not insoluble questions touched somewhat too lightly in the opening chapter. Did wooden clubs precede flint implements? and do we owe, as Mr. Sparvel-Bayly thinks, the use of gunpowder to the Spaniards, who learned it of the Arabs? Was artillery, as we now understand the term, commonly employed in Edward III.'s reign, or known at all before that period? Mr. Skeat has pointed out, while demolishing the supposed "anachronism" of an editor of Chaucer, what kind of artillery that was which is mentioned in the spirit-stirring account of the Battle of Actium in the Legend of Good Women. Similar questions are again and again suggested by these New Studies in Old Subjects, the subjects of study being, in truth, too vast for discussion within the limits set by the author. Nevertheless the harvest of archaic lore is plentiful, and the suggestiveness of the book will commend it to the general reader. Beer and pipes, church bells and pews and brasses, still happily exist among us, and it is always pleasant to be reminded how our forefathers lived and what beer they drank, and how they took their ease in their pews in sermon-time. The "fairy pipes" they smoked, pleased with the mere whiff it would seem if they smoked them, are still dug up, and are called "Roman" in some parts, and the monumental brasses are still piously preserved—despite the too sweeping statements of recent newspaper correspondents—and Mr. Sparvel-Bayly has a good word to say of the modern sentiment for the venerable and the beautiful in such memorials. His remarks on this subject seem to be an anticipation of the recent letter of an indignant vicar, who rebuked an amateur antiquary who had visited his parish church this holiday season, and not finding the brasses he looked for, erroneously declared they had been removed. Great, no doubt, has been the destruction or defacement of artistic work in our churches, yet a good deal, fortunately, remains for reverent preservation.

The new volume of "Knickerbocker Nuggets," the prettiest of the many reprints in pocket form now in progress, is a selection of stories by a German author once very popular with English readers. Tales by Heinrich Zschöke (Putnam's Sons) comprises four characteristic examples, three of which were translated in 1845 by Mr. Parke Godwin, and appeared in "Putnam's Library of Choice Reading." These are "A New Year's Eve," "The Broken Pitcher," and "Jonathan Frock." The fourth, "Walpurgis Night," now first done into English by Mr. W. P. Prentice, a capital specimen of Zschöke's fantastic adornment of a moral tale, is altogether worthy of association with the three better-known stories. Before Mr. Godwin undertook his translation English writers were busy with German fiction, and Zschöke received, with others, the attention due to his very individual work. Carlyle, of course, did more than any other translator to establish the taste for German fiction, which was decidedly fashionable before he rendered a page of Jean Paul. For a while there was something like a rage for "tales from the German," and Zschöke proved to be a rich mine. In that curious miscellany of Gothic romance, "The Romancist and Novelist's Library," a newspaper of rich and rare fiction, Zschöke finds a place in the

(1) Le livre du jugement. Par Alber Jhouney. Édition de l'étoile. 1889.

(2) Fou d'amour. Par Ch. d'Héricault. Paris: Perrin.

(3) L'âge de papier. Par Ch. Legrand. Paris: Kolb.

(4) Andrée de Loze. Par A. Gennevraye. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

(5) Modern French Readings. Edited by A. J. Smith. London and Boston, U.S.A.: Ginn & Co.

goodly company of Mrs. Radcliffe, Schiller, Brockden Brown, Clara Reeve, M. G. Lewis, and other wonder-workers. The mine, well worked once, has been long neglected, though it ought to prove still productive and decidedly popular in the attractive form of a "Knickerbocker Nugget."

Mr. W. H. Davenport Adams has been at considerable pains in compiling his narrative of "the great war of the English in France," The Maid of Orleans (Hutchinson & Co.) He cites his authorities, and appends documentary and other evidence that may throw light upon his story of Jeanne Darc. The story itself is scarcely told with the simplicity and directness so impressive a story requires. Mr. Davenport Adams promises too much when he says in his introduction, "I am about to tell the story of Jeanne Darc, or as she is popularly but uncommonly called Joan of Arc." He is too fond of interpolating remarks of a reflective kind. And what, by the way, is the meaning of "popularly but uncommonly" in the sentence quoted? The narrative style of the author is none of the clearest. A common blunder is perpetrated on p. 213, where we read, "They had aroused the fury of the soldiers; and the Frankenstein they had created would not be satisfied without a victim." Mr. Davenport Adams would have been better employed if he had held to his original intention as a story-teller, instead of attempting to rewrite history.

Mr. Alfred H. Miles edits a collection of stories by many well-known writers, Fifty-two Stories for Boys (Hutchinson & Co.), reprinted from various sources—English and American. The book is strong in the charm of variety. There are stories of the sea and sailors, of travel ashore, of adventures of all kinds, of school days and camp-life, of American backwoods and Indians. Mr. Miles, whose own contributions justify his share in the volume, is entirely successful in his attempt to compile a representative collection of short stories for "boys of all ages." A better book of its class we do not know.

We have also to acknowledge the Second Part of Henry the Fourth, edited by A. D. Innes, M.A., with Introduction and Notes, for the "Falcon" edition of "Select Plays of Shakspeare" (Rivingtons); The Elements of Physiography, by John J. Prince, Part I., seventh edition (Heywood); a new edition of Outlines of French History, by Henry Ince and James Gilbert (Allen & Co.); a second edition of the List of Bibliographical Works in the Reading Room of the British Museum, originally compiled by the late Mr. G. W. Porter, now revised by Mr. G. Fortescue; and the Fifth Report of the European and Anglo-Indian Defence Association for the current year.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we cannot return rejected Communications; and to this rule we can make no exception, even if stamps for return of MS. are sent. The Editor must also entirely decline to enter into correspondence with the writers of MSS. sent in and not acknowledged.

ADVERTISEMENTS intended for the SATURDAY REVIEW should be addressed to the MANAGER of the ADVERTISEMENT DEPARTMENT at the OFFICE, 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON. A printed Scale of Charges can be obtained on application.

THE UNITED STATES.

The Annual Subscription to the SATURDAY REVIEW, including postage to any part of the United States, is £1 10s. 4d. or $7 39, and may be forwarded direct to the Publisher, Mr. WILLIAM BOYCE, at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, or to Mr. B. F. STEVENS, American Agency, 4 Trafalgar Square, London. International Money Orders can be sent from any office in the United States, and Subscriptions, payable in advance, may commence at any time.

The SATURDAY REVIEW may be had in Paris every Saturday from Veuve J. BOYVEAU, 22 Rue de la Banque (near the Bourse); also at Le KIOSQUE DUPERRON, Boulevard des Capucines, and Le KIOSQUE MICHEL, Boulevard des Capucines, by whom also Subscriptions will be received.

The SATURDAY REVIEW is duly registered for transmission abroad. Nearly all the back Numbers of the SATURDAY REVIEW may be obtained through any Bookseller, or of the Publisher, at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW Bill of Contents will be forwarded every Friday Evening by post, prepaid, to any Newsagent in Town or Country on application to the Publisher.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW may likewise be obtained in Paris every Saturday of Messrs. GALIGNANI, 224 Rue de Rivoli.

For CONTENTS see page 394*

SCOTTISH PROVIDENT INSTITUTION

No. 6 ST. ANDREW SQUARE, EDINBURGH.

COMBINES THE ADVANTAGES OF

Mutual Assurance with Moderate Premiums.

THE PREMIUMS are so moderate that an Assurance of £1,200 or £1,250 is generally secured from the first for a yearly payment which elsewhere assures (with profits) £1,000 only—equivalent to an immediate Bonus of 20 to 25 per cent.

The WHOLE PROFITS go to the Policyholders, on a system at once safe and equitable,—no share being given to those by whose early death there is a LOSS. On this principle large additions have been, and will be, made to the Policies of those who live to participate, notwithstanding the lowness of the premiums.

The SURPLUS at last Investigation was £1,051,035, of which £350,345 was reserved for future participation. The number who shared was 9,384. First shares were (with a few unimportant exceptions) from 18 or 20 to 34 per cent., according to age and class. Other policies were increased 50 and 80 per cent.

The SOCIETY has taken a leading part in the REMOVAL OF FORFEITURES.

POLICIES, as a rule, are WORLD-WIDE, and free from Restrictions on Residence after five years—provided the Assured has attained age 30.

Surrender Values compare favourably with other first-class Offices.

June 1889.

JAMES WATSON, Manager.

BRANCH OFFICES:

GLASGOW, 29 St. Vincent Place.
ABERDEEN, 259 Union Street.
BRISTOL, 31 Clare Street.
LIVERPOOL, 25 Castle Street.
NEWCASTLE, 3 Queen Street.

DUBLIN OFFICE: 16 College Green.
BIRMINGHAM, 95 Colmore Row.
LEEDS, Royal Exchange.
MANCHESTER, 10 Albert Square.
BELFAST, 23 Donegall Place.

Secretary in London—J. MUIR LEITCH,

OFFICE, 17 KING WILLIAM STREET, E.C.

RESULTS for 1888.

NEW ASSURANCES COMPLETED £1,163,000.

Being for the 15th year in succession above a million.

PREMIUMS IN YEAR £558,875.

TOTAL INCOME £855,886.

CLAIMS (including Bonuses*) £328,530.

* Averaging 49½ per cent. on Policies Participating.

REALISED FUNDS, £6,516,468

(the Increase in year being £401,212).

PREMIUM FOR £100 AT DEATH:

With Profits.

Age next Birthday	Payable during Life	Limited to 21 Payments
25	£1 18 0	£2 12 6
30*	2 1 6	2 15 4
35	2 6 10	3 0 2
40†	2 14 9	3 7 5
45	3 5 9	3 17 6
50	4 1 7	4 12 1

* A man of 30 may secure £1,000 at death by the yearly payment of £20 15s., which generally assures £800 only.

Or he may secure £1,000 by twenty-one yearly payments of £27 13s. 4d.—being thus free of payment after age 50.

† At 40 the Premium ceasing at 60 is, for £1,000, £33 14s. 2d.—about the same as most Offices require during the whole of life. Before these Premiums have ceased the Policy will have shared in at least one division of profits. To Professional Men and others, whose income is dependent on continuance of health, this limited payment system is specially recommended.

Subject, by special Acts of Parliament (1848 and 1884), to the jurisdiction of the English and Irish Courts.

Copies of Annual Report containing Tables of Rates and Full Information may be had.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 1,771, OCTOBER 5, 1889:

Italy and "Outidanos."
Twaddle about Eton. The Rotterdam Strike—and Others.
Scottish Drolls. Twice a Queen.
Recent Speeches. The Church Congress.
More about Fusion. The Medical Session.
Improvements in the Strand. General Faidherbe.
The New Leader.

Kew—I. Public School Bullying.
The Cotton Corner. Gustave Flaubert and his Work.
Newmarket First October Meeting.
Crown Patronage in Scotland. Iceland. Money Matters.
"The Dead Heart." An Etonian Symposium.

Report of the Indian National Congress.
Novels. A Text-Book of Pathology.
Books on Divinity. An Adventurous Lawyer.
Three Men in a Boat. Maitland's Dark Ages.
Nonsensical Books. Continental History. Townships and Counties.
Don Quixote. Essays in Literature and Ethics.
French Literature. New Books and Reprints.

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

DRURY LANE THEATRE ROYAL.—AUGUSTUS HARRIS, Lessee and Manager.—This Evening at 7.30, THE ROYAL OAK. Misses Emery, Neilson, Grey, V. Atherton, and Brough; Messrs. Neville, Arthur Dacre, Lablache, Lorraine, Dobeil, Lyons, Thomas, Stephens, and Nicholls.

LYCEUM.—THE DEAD HEART.—Every Evening at Eight o'clock. THE DEAD HEART: Mr. Henry Irving, Mr. Bancroft, Mr. Arthur Stirling, Mr. Righton, Miss Kate Phillips, and Miss Ellen Terry. Box Office (Mr. J. Hurst) open daily 10 to 5. Seats also booked by letter or telegram. Carriages at 11.—LYCEUM.

CRYSTAL PALACE. SATURDAY CONCERTS.—The Thirty-Fourth Annual Series of these world-renowned CONCERTS will COMMENCE on October 19 at Three o'clock. Vocalist: Mr. Edward Lloyd. Pianoforte: Madame Roger-Miclos. Conductor: Mr. AUGUST MANN. Transferable tickets for Reserved Seats for the Twenty Concerts, Two Guineas. Prospectus, post free, on application to the MANAGER, Crystal Palace, S.E.

THE ARTS and CRAFTS EXHIBITION SOCIETY, the NEW GALLERY, Regent Street.—The SECOND EXHIBITION will OPEN Monday, October 7. WALTER CRANE, President. ERNEST RADFORD, Secretary.

TOUR in the MEDITERRANEAN.—The ORIENT COMPANY will despatch their large full-powered steamship "CHIMBORAZO," 3,847 tons register, 3,000 horse-power, from London on the 9th of October, for a Thirty-eight Days' Cruise, visiting Lisbon, Gibraltar, Algiers, Palermo, Naples (for Rome), Leghorn (for Pisa and Florence), Genoa, Nice, Malaga (for Granada), and Cadiz (for Seville). The "CHIMBORAZO" is fitted with the electric light, hot and cold baths, &c. Cuisine of the highest order. Managers..... { F. GREEN & CO., and ANDERSON, ANDERSON, & CO., Fenchurch Avenue, London, E.C. For terms and further particulars apply to the latter firm, or to the West-End Agents, Grindlay & Co., 55 Parliament Street, S.W.

EDUCATIONAL.

NEW SOUTH WALES.
UNIVERSITY OF SYDNEY.
 (1) CHALLIS CHAIR OF ANATOMY.
 (2) CHALLIS CHAIR OF LAW.
 (3) CHALLIS CHAIR OF HISTORY.
 (4) CHALLIS CHAIR OF LOGIC AND MENTAL PHILOSOPHY.

The Senate of the University of Sydney, having decided to establish the above Chairs in accordance with the Bequest of the late Mr. John Henry Challis, invite Applications from Gentlemen qualified to fill the same.

All particulars as to tenure of office, salary, &c., may be obtained from the Agent-General for New South Wales, 9 Victoria Street, S.W., to whom applications, stating Candidate's age, and accompanied by eight copies of testimonials, should be sent on or before October 19, 1889.

SAUL SAMUEL,
 Agent-General for New South Wales,
 September 16, 1889. 9 Victoria Street, London, S.W.

UNIVERSITY of LONDON.—SPECIAL CLASSES.
 LONDON HOSPITAL MEDICAL COLLEGE.
 SPECIAL CLASSES are held in the subjects required for the Preliminary Scientific and the Intermediate M.B. (London) Examinations.

Fee for the whole Course, to Students of the Hospital 8 Guineas.
 To others..... 10 "

A SPECIAL CLASS is also held for the Primary F.R.C.S. Examination.
 These Classes will commence in October, and are not confined to Students of the Hospital.
 MUNRO SCOTT, Warden.

ST. CLARE COLLEGE, WALMER, KENT.
Head-Master—The Rev. E. D'AUQUIER, M.A. Clare College, Camb.
 One of the Examiners to the Irish Board of Intermediate Education, late Head-Master of South-Eastern College, Ramsgate, with a staff of Assistant Masters (Graduates).
 The College is situated in a delightful spot, close to the sea, and contains teaching and boarding accommodation, chapel, sanatorium, infirmary, playroom, laundry, gymnasium, tuckshop, workshop, &c., 14 acres of well-timbered and beautiful grounds, cycle path, cricket and football fields, tennis-courts, &c., sea-bathing and boating.
 The school year is divided into three terms; each term consists of about thirteen weeks.
 Inclusive fees, Eighty Guineas per annum. Exhibitions and Scholarships, of £10, £15, and £21, are annually thrown open for competition.
 For further information, apply to the HEAD-MASTER.

MARLBOROUGH COLLEGE.—In December next there will be an examination for SIXTEEN FOUNDATION SCHOLARSHIPS, of the value of £30 per annum each, tenable with any other Scholarship except "House Scholarships" during continuance at the School. The Scholarships are confined to the sons of clergymen, being nominees of Life Governors.
 Also a Scholarship of the annual value of £16, confined to the sons of clergymen who have served for five years as missionaries or chaplains in India. No nomination required, tenable with a Foundation Scholarship.—Apply to the BURSAR.

LIVERPOOL INSTITUTE.—HIGH and COMMERCIAL SCHOOLS.

The DIRECTORS desire to receive applications for the HEAD-MASTERSHIP of these Schools. The salary consists of a percentage of the pupils' fees, expected to amount to between £650 and £750 per annum. No residence is provided. Preference will be given to candidates who are between 30 and 40 years of age. The selected candidate will be required to devote the whole of his time to the duties of his office. Printed particulars may be obtained by applying by letter only to the undersigned, to whom candidates are requested to send in their applications, with copies (not originals) of their testimonials, headed "Head Mastership," on or before the 31st of October.
 Mount Street, Liverpool, Oct. 1st, 1889. CHARLES SHARP, Secretary.

THE Misses S. and R. ALLEN-OLNEY (formerly Head-Mistresses respectively of Blackheath and South Hampstead High Schools), residing in the healthy suburb of Hampstead, receive a few YOUNG LADIES to board and educate. The arrangements are those of a refined home. Large playground and full-sized tennis-court. Preparation for University examinations and degrees. Reference kindly permitted to parents of present and former pupils.—41 Belsize Park Gardens, London, N.W.

THE Rev. W. ALMACK, M.A., BRUCE CASTLE, near TOTTENHAM, prepares PUPILS wanting special help for the Universities, Army, Legal or Medical Preliminaries, or the ordinary requirements of business life. Excellent house in Park of 20 acres, containing Cricket and Football grounds. References, the Head-Masters of Charterhouse, Cheltenham, and Marlborough.

PRÉ SCILLA, LAUSANNE.—Miss WILLS, late Head-Mistress of the Norwich High School, has a very comfortable English HOME for Elder GIRLS. Garden and full-sized Tennis-court. Numbers limited. Subjects taken:—French, German, Italian, Music, Singing, and Painting.

MILITARY COMPETITIVE.
 Colonels B. A. WILKINSON and W. J. SHAW,
 FARNHAM, SURREY, and VICTORIA HOUSE, ALDERSHOT.

Results of 1888 and 1889 to date:

A. C. Going.	E. T. James.	C. L. Graham.
C. H. Bennett.	T. S. Smith.	E. S. Smith.
F. L. Richardson.	S. F. Legge.	A. J. Ralph.
N. C. MacLachlan.	C. H. Corbett.	A. F. Owen Lewis.
J. S. Dallas.	H. B. Galloway.	J. P. Law.
H. G. Heneage.	R. H. Pitcairn.	J. A. McLean.
G. D. E. Fullerton.	D. A. N. Lomax.	H. G. W. Wayne.
C. W. Howard.	J. M. F. Hiddings.	G. C. B. Weld-Forester.

Separate Department for Woolwich and Sandhurst Candidates.
 Classes for the March Military Competitive now forming.

BELL FARM, CLEWER HILL, WINDSOR.

BOYS prepared for ETON and other PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—Address Miss HIBBARD.

MORNING PREPARATORY CLASS for the SONS of GENTLEMEN (exclusively), 13 Somerset Street, Portman Square. Miss WOODMAN will be at home for Visitors on and after October 2. SCHOOL BEGINS October 5, at the usual hour.

EDUCATION, PARIS.—An ENGLISH LADY, residing at Neuilly, receives a limited number of YOUNG LADIES of good family. Qualified French and English governesses. Professors for all accomplishments. French is the language of the household. The house stands in its own grounds. Large garden, tennis court. Highest references. For particulars apply to Rev. G. G. W. CLEMENGER, the Rectory, Alwalton, near Peterboro'.

ILFRACOMBE.—ILFRACOMBE HOTEL. Thoroughly furnished, equipped, and decorated. 250 Rooms. Eight Lawn-Tennis Courts, Large Swimming Bath, Private Baths. Descriptive Tariff of Manager.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS'
 UPRIGHT IRON GRAND PIANOFORTES.
 Prices from 40 Guineas upwards.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Pianoforte Makers by Special Appointment to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales, 1889.—18, 20, and 22 Wigmore Street, W. Lists free.

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL, Strand, W.C.—The COUNCIL earnestly appeal for DONATIONS and ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS. £20,000 required for new Nursing Establishment, enlargement of Medical School, the Convalescent Home, and current expenses. Bankers: Messrs. Drummond.
 ARTHUR E. READE, Secretary.

BRAIN FAG, SHATTERED NERVES,
 Sleeplessness, Nervous Exhaustion, Rheumatism, Gout, Torpid Liver, Nervous Dyspepsia, &c. yield like magic to the healing influence of mild continuous currents of Electricity, generated, without any shock or discomfort whatever, by wearing

HARNESS' ELECTROPATHIC BATTERY BELT.

This world-famed guaranteed genuine Electric appliance has cured thousands of sufferers, and should be worn by all in search of HEALTH, STRENGTH, and VITAL ENERGY. Write for descriptive pamphlet, containing copies of hundreds of unsolicited testimonials, or call, if possible, and personally consult Mr. C. B. HARNESS, Consulting Medical Electrician (President of the British Association of Medical Electricians), 52 Oxford Street, London, W. (corner of Rathbone Place). Advice free, personally or by letter.

THE GREATEST of all PIANOFORTES.

THE STEINWAY PIANOFORTES, New York & London.
 Steinway Hall, LOWER SEYMOUR STREET, Portman Square, London, W.

MEL ROSA, the CERTAIN SAFE CURE for COUGHS, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, Hooping Cough, Hoarseness, Incipient Consumption, &c. In Bottles, 1s. 11d. and 2s. 9d.; post free, 1s. 4d. and 3s. Prepared only by the Proprietor, HERBERT POTTER, Chemist, M.P.S., Sutton, Surrey.
 NOTE.—Insist on being supplied with Potter's "Mel Rosa."

CARDINAL AND HARFORD,

The oldest established Importers of

ORIENTAL

CARPETS.

THE LEVANT WAREHOUSE,

108 & 109 HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

Catalogues post free.

TONGA, the SPECIFIC for NEURALGIA.

"Tonga maintains its reputation in the treatment of Neuralgia."—Lancet.
 "Invaluable in facial Neuralgia. Has proved effective in all those cases in which we have prescribed it."—Medical Press.

2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. Of all Chemists.

ROWLANDS' MACASSAR OIL.

Prevents and arrests baldness and produces luxuriant and glossy hair. Also prepared in a GOLDEN COLOUR. Bottles, 3s. 6d., 7s., and 10s. 6d.

ROWLANDS' ODONTO.

A non-gritty Tooth Powder. Whitens the Teeth and prevents decay. Ask Chemists for Rowlands' Articles.

SCHWEITZER'S COCOATINA.

GUARANTEED PURE SOLUBLE COCOA. This Old-established Article retains its position as "the finest Cocoa in the market." It is unequalled in purity and flavour, bears the strictest Chemical test, and keeps in all Climates. THE MOST NUTRITIOUS AND ECONOMICAL.

FRY'S PURE CONCENTRATED COCOA.

Lancet—"Pure, and very soluble."
Medical Times—"Eminently suitable for Invalids."
Sir C. A. CAMERON, President of the Royal College of Surgeons, Ireland—"I have never tasted Cocoa that I like so well."

SUTTON'S BULBS

GENUINE ONLY DIRECT FROM SUTTON & SONS, READING.
For full particulars see SUTTON'S BULB CATALOGUE. Beautifully Illustrated, 6d. post free. Complete Priced List of Bulbs gratis and post-free.

GOOD MORNING!

Have you used

PEARS' SOAP?

FOR THE DECORATION OF THE HOME visit THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY'S Gallery, 74 New Oxford Street, W.C. A noble display of Copies of THE GREAT MASTERS, framed and unframed.

The Chef-d'œuvres of THE NATIONAL COLLECTIONS of London, Paris, Rome, Dresden, St. Petersburg, Madrid, &c. &c.

Catalogue of 186 pages, Sixpence, post-free. A descriptive Pamphlet free by post on application to

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY.

SHOPPING BY POST. Before purchasing their DRESS MATERIALS elsewhere, Ladies are requested to write to H.Y. PEASE & CO.'S Successors for a box of their New Patterns of DARLINGTON DRESS FABRICS. Which include the celebrated Gold-Medal Merinos, Cashmeres, Cross-Warp Serges, and an immense variety of new goods for Autumn wear. The Patterns are sent free on approval by return of post to any address in Town or Country. Telegrams: "SUCCESSORS," DARLINGTON. H.Y. PEASE & CO.'S Successors, THE MILLS, DARLINGTON.

LIFE ASSURANCES, &c.

GUARDIAN FIRE and LIFE OFFICE.

HEAD OFFICE—11 LOMBARD STREET, LONDON, E.C.

LAW COURTS BRANCH—21 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Established 1821. Subscribed Capital, £2,000,000.

Directors.

Chairman—JOHN B. MARTIN, Esq.

Deputy-Chairman—HENRY JOHN NORMAN, Esq.

Henry Bonham-Carter, Esq.

Wm. Hill Dawson, Esq.

Charles F. Devay, Esq.

Granville F. R. Farquhar, Esq.

Alban G. H. Gibbs, Esq.

James Goodson, Esq.

John J. Hamilton, Esq.

Thomson Hankey, Esq.

Richard M. Harvey, Esq.

John Hunter, Esq.

George Lake, Esq.

Rt. Hon. G. J. Shaw Lefevre, M.P.

Beaumont W. Lubbock, Esq.

David Powell, Esq.

Augustus Prevost, Esq.

John G. Talbot, Esq., M.P.

Henry Vigne, Esq.

Actuary and Secretary—T. G. C. BROWNE.

Manager of Fire Department—A. J. RELTON.

Share Capital at present paid up and invested £1,000,000

Total Funds upwards of £4,179,000

Total Annual Income over £850,000

N.B.—Fire Policies which expire at Michaelmas should be renewed at the Head Office, or with the Agents, on or before October 14.

PRUDENTIAL ASSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED,

HOLBORN BARS, LONDON, E.C.

FOUNDED 1848.

INVESTED FUNDS £10,000,000

CLAIMS PAID £12,000,000

LONDON ASSURANCE CORPORATION.

Established by Royal Charter, A.D. 1720.

7 ROYAL EXCHANGE AND 43A PALL MALL, S.W.

Marine, Fire, and Life Assurances have been granted by the Corporation for more than a century and a half. Funds in hand exceed £3,500,000.

NATIONAL PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

FOR MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE.

Financial Year ends November 20.

All persons now insuring will receive an additional Share of Profit at the Next Division in 1892.

48 GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON.

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY,

Established 1836.

LONDON—1 MOORGATE STREET, E.C. ABERDEEN—1 UNION TERRACE.

INCOME and FUNDS (1888).

Fire Premiums £615,000

Life Premiums 203,000

Interest 149,000

Accumulated Funds £3,581,000

ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH LAW

LIFE ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION (Established 1839).

12 Waterloo Place, London. 120 Princes Street, Edinburgh.

Whole Life Bonuses never less than £1 10s. per cent. per annum.

Annuities. Loans. Liberal Conditions.

ARTHUR JACKSON, General Manager

FRANCIS E. COLENSO, F.I.A., Actuary

CITY OFFICE—11 LUDGATE HILL, E.C.

JOHN MUNRO, City Secretary.

PHENIX FIRE OFFICE

LOMBARD STREET and CHARING CROSS, LONDON.—Established 1782.

Moderate Rates. Absolute Security.

Liberal Loss Settlements. Prompt payment of Claims.

W. C. MACDONALD

F. B. MACDONALD

Joint Secretaries.

Losses paid over £17,000,000.

IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Established 1803.—1 OLD BROAD STREET, E.C.; and 22 PALL MALL, S.W.

Subscribed Capital, £1,200,000. Paid-up, £300,000. Total Invested Funds, over £1,600,000.

E. COZENS SMITH, General Manager.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane.

THREE per CENT. INTEREST on DEPOSITS repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS when not drawn below £100. The Bank undertakes, free of charge, the Custody of Securities and Valuables; the Collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Shares, and Annuities. Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued. THE BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free on application. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK.

ISSUE of £371,320.

(Authorized by the Sheffield Corporation Acts, 1883 and 1889.)

The CORPORATION of SHEFFIELD give NOTICE that they are prepared to receive applications for the above sum of SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK. Minimum price of Issue £100 per cent.

Interest payable half-yearly, on March 1 and September 1, at the Sheffield and Hallamshire Bank, Sheffield, or by their London Agents, Messrs. GLYN, MILLS, CURRIE, & CO., 67 Lombard Street.

No sum less than £50 of Stock will be allotted, and any amount in excess of that sum must be a multiple of £10.

Under the Trust Investment Act, 1889, recently passed, this Stock is an available investment for every Trustee who is not expressly forbidden by the instrument creating his trust to invest in Corporation Stock.

Forms of Prospectus, &c., and all information required, will be supplied by

Borough Accountant's Office,

Bridge Street, Sheffield,

August 16, 1889.

W. FISHER TASKER, Registrar.

BENGER'S FOOD

FOR INFANTS, CHILDREN AND INVALIDS.

GOLD MEDAL, HEALTH EXHIBITION.

EXTRACT FROM PRIVATE LETTER.—"The infant was very delicate; our medical adviser ordered your Food. The result in a short time was wonderful; the little fellow grew strong and fat, and is now in a thriving condition—in fact, 'the flower of the flock.'"

BENGER'S FOOD is Sold in Tins, at 1s. 6d., 2s. 6d., 5s., and 10s., by

Chemists, &c., everywhere.

THE TRADE SUPPLIED BY ALL WHOLESALE HOUSES.

BOOKS, &c.

ASHDOWN EDITION

STANDARD PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

VOL.	NETT s. d.
1. CHOPIN'S TWENTY-SEVEN STUDIES	2 6
2. STEPHEN HELLER'S ALBUM. Op. 138	1 6
3. HENRI ROUBIER'S TWENTY MELODIES OF FRANZ SCHUBERT	2 0
4. STEPHEN HELLER'S TWENTY-FOUR PRELUDES. Op. 81	1 6
5. CHOPIN'S EIGHTEEN NOCTURNES	2 0
6. CZERNY'S ONE HUNDRED AND ONE EXERCISES	1 0
7. CZERNY'S ÉTUDE DE LA VÉLOCITÉ	1 6
8. SCHUMANN'S PHANTASIESTÜCKE. Op. 12	1 6
9. SCHUBERT'S EIGHT IMPROMPTUS	1 6
10. LISZT'S SOIRÉES DE VIENNE	2 6
11. CLEMENTI'S SIX SONATINAS. Op. 36	1 0
12. STEPHEN HELLER'S THIRTY-TWO PRELUDES. Op. 119	1 0
13. RUBINSTEIN'S SOIRÉES À ST. PÉTERSBOURG (SIX MORCEAUX). Op. 44	1 0
14. CHOPIN'S FORTY-THREE MAZURKAS	3 0
15. SCHUMANN'S ALBUM FÜR DIE JUGEND. Op. 68	1 6
16. DUSSEK'S SIX SONATINAS. Op. 20	1 0
17. GOTTSCHALK. Selection No. 1 (Six Pieces)	1 0
18. KUHLAU'S SIX SONATINAS. Op. 55	1 0
19. CHOPIN'S EIGHT WALTZES	1 6
20. KULLAK'S YOUTHFUL DAYS. Twenty-four Characteristic Pieces	1 6
21. KESSLER'S TWENTY-FOUR STUDIES	2 6
22. CLEMENTI'S SIX SONATINAS. Op. 37 and 38	1 6
23. CHOPIN'S TWENTY-FIVE PRELUDES	1 6
24. CLEMENTI'S GRADUS AD PARNASSUM. 28 Studies	2 6
(Selected and edited by Walter Macfarren.)
25. JOHN FIELD'S SIX NOCTURNES	1 0
26. LOTT'S CIRCLE OF DIATONIC SCALES	1 6
27. DIABELLI'S SEVEN SONATINAS. Op. 168	1 0
28. KULLAK'S LES FLEURS ANIMÉES. Seven Characteristic Pieces	1 6
29. MENDELSSOHN'S THIRTY-SIX LIEDER OHNE WORTE	1 6
30. CZERNY'S FORTY DAILY STUDIES	1 6
31. W. S. BENNETT'S SIX STUDIES. Op. 11	1 0
32. STEPHEN HELLER'S RESTLESS NIGHTS. Op. 82	1 6
33. KUHLAU'S FOUR SONATINAS. Op. 88	1 0
34. F. HILLER'S SEI CAPRICETTI. Op. 35	1 0
35. BERTINI'S TWENTY-FIVE STUDIES. Op. 29	1 0
36. MAYER'S SIX ÉTUDES MÉLODIQUES. Op. 149	1 0
37. SCHUMANN'S SCENES IN THE FOREST. Op. 82	1 0
38. CHOPIN'S FOUR BALLADES	1 6
39. STEPHEN HELLER'S PROMENADES D'UN SOLITAIRE. Op. 78	1 0
40. KALKBRENNER'S TWENTY STUDIES. Op. 169	1 0
41. SCHMITT'S LINDISPENSABLE. Op. 16	1 0
42. BENNETT'S SUITE DE PIÈCES. Op. 24	1 6
43. CZERNY'S 50 ÉTUDES. Op. 740. Book 1. Studies 1 to 24	1 6
44. CZERNY'S 50 ÉTUDES. Op. 740. Book 2. Studies 25 to 50	1 6
45. MAYER'S SIX ÉTUDES. Op. 31	1 0
46. STEPHEN HELLER'S PROMENADES D'UN SOLITAIRE (2nd Set. Wanderstunden.) Op. 80	1 6
47. SCHUBERT'S POSTHUMOUS WORKS	1 0
48. BACHE, F. E. FIVE CHARACTERISTIC PIECES	1 0
49. LOTT. SELECTION No. 1 (Six pieces)	1 0

To be had of all Musicsellers, or sent post free to all parts of the world at prices quoted by

EDWIN ASHDOWN, HANOVER SQUARE, LONDON.

NEW WORKS OF FICTION.

JUST READY, BY THE AUTHOR OF "NEAR NEIGHBOURS."
PAUL'S SISTER By F. M. PEARD, Author
of "The Country Cousin" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DR. EDITH ROMNEY."
HER OWN COUNSEL. By the Author of
"An Old Man's Favour" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A DAUGHTER OF THE PEOPLE."
DIANA. By GEORGIANA M. CRAIK (Mrs. May).
3 vols. crown 8vo.
"An excellently constructed novel, wholesome in feeling, well written, and with touches here and there of genuine humour."—Saturday Review.

SECOND EDITION, ready this day.
AN IRISH COUSIN. By GEILLES HERRING
and MARTIN ROSS. 2 vols. crown 8vo.

"One closes the second volume with mingled feeling. Gratitude to the authors for their excellent story is united to a sense of disappointment that the all too brief entertainment is at an end."—Spectator.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "WORTH WAITING FOR."
THE SCOTTS of BESTMINSTER. By
J. MASTERMAN. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.

H. SOTHERAN & CO.

BOOKSELLERS, BOOKBINDERS, AND PUBLISHERS.
GENERAL AGENTS FOR PRIVATE BOOKBUYERS & PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS
IN AMERICA, INDIA, THE COLONIES, AND FOREIGN PARTS.
A MONTHLY CATALOGUE OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS, published over forty years; Specimen No. gratis and post-free.
Telegraphic Address: BOOKMEN, LONDON. Established 1816.
136 STRAND, W.C. AND 36 PICCADILLY, W.

HURST & BLACKETT'S
NEW NOVELS.

A HARDY NORSEMAN. By EDNA LYALL,
Author of "Donovan," "We Two," &c. 3 vols.

MY LORD OTHELLO. By HENRY CRESSWELL,
Author of "A Modern Greek Heroine," "A Willy Widow," &c. 3 vols.

GEOFF. By GERTRUDE FORDE, Author of "In
the Old Palazzo," "Driven before the Storm," &c. 3 vols.

THE FREAKS of LADY FORTUNE. By
MAY CROMMELIN, Author of "Queenie," "Orange Lily," &c. 2 vols.

THE TREE of KNOWLEDGE. By G. M.
ROBINS, Author of "Keep my Secret," "A False Position," &c. 3 vols.

BOTH OF THIS PARISH. By ALGERNON
GISSING, Author of "Joy Cometh in the Morning," 2 vols.

LONDON: HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED,
13 GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET.

CHAPMAN & HALL'S NEW BOOKS.

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW

For OCTOBER.

Edited by FRANK HARRIS.

THE LABOUR PROBLEM. By D. F. SCHLOSS.
PLAIN WORDS ON THE WOMAN QUESTION. By GRANT ALLEN.
THE ARMED STRENGTH OF FRANCE IN 1889. With Map.
PROGRESS IN CHINA. By R. S. GUNDRY.
SOME OF BALZAC'S MINOR PIECES. By GEORGE MOORE.
EASTERN WOMEN. By HORACE VICTOR.
IN THE FORESTS OF NAVARRE AND ARAGON. By the Rev. JOHN VERSCHOYLE.
LAST DAYS OF THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE. By JOHN WELSH.
AFRICAN DEVELOPMENT: THE SOUDAN. By Sir SAMUEL BAKER.
RUSSIAN CHARACTERISTICS. Part II. By E. B. LANIN.

PROBLEMS of the FUTURE and ESSAYS.
By SAMUEL LAING, Author of "Modern Science and Modern Thought."
Demy 8vo. 3s. 6d. [This day.]

BEHIND the SCENES of the COMÉDIE
FRANÇAISE, and OTHER RECOLLECTIONS. By ARSÈNE HOUSSEY.
Translated and Edited, with Notes, by ALBERT D. VANDAM. Demy 8vo.
[October 10.]

THE HABITS of the SALMON. By Major
TRAHERNE. Crown 8vo. [October 7.]

THE HIGHLANDS of CENTRAL INDIA ;
Notes on their Forests and Wild Tribes, Natural History and Sports. By Captain FORSYTH. With Map and Coloured Illustrations. New Edition.
Demy 8vo. [October 7.]

INNOCENCIA: a Story of the Prairie Regions of Brazil. By SYLVIO DINARTE. Translated from the Portuguese and illustrated by James W. Wells, F.R.G.S. Crown 8vo.

MY "HANSOM" LAYS: Original Verses,
Imitations, and Paraphrases. By W. BEATTY-KINGSTON, Author of "Monarchs
I have Met," &c. &c. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. [This day.]

THE CHUMPLEBUNNYS and SOME OTHER ODDITIES. By W. BEATTY-KINGSTON. Sketched from the Life.
Illustrated by Karl Klietsch. Crown 8vo. [October 7.]

LONDON: CHAPMAN & HALL, LIMITED.

Now ready, New Edition, price 2s. 6d.
THE HISTORY of the PIANOFORTE. By EDGAR
BRINSMEAD.
London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, E.C.; and
JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, 18, 20, and 22 Wigmore Street, W.

OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE LOCAL EXAMINATIONS.
CHAMISSO'S PETER SCHLEMIHL. With copious Notes and a Vocabulary by M. FOERSTER. Crown 8vo. cloth, 2s.

MOLIÈRE'S BOURGEOIS GENTILHOMME. Introduction and Notes, by LÉON DELBOS. Crown 8vo. cloth, 1s. 6d.
WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London; and 20 South Frederick Street, Edinburgh.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the 1s.—HATCHARDS, 187 Piccadilly,
London. All the New and Standard Books. Bibles, Prayers, Church Services, &c.
Post Orders promptly executed. Libraries arranged and catalogued.

A NOVEL COMMENDED by Mr. GLADSTONE and by Dr. GEORGE MACDONALD.
FOR the RIGHT. Now ready, New Cheap Edition. 3s. 6d.
GEORGE MACDONALD:—"I have seldom, if ever, read a work of fiction which moved me with so much admiration."
London: JAMES CLARKE & Co., 13 and 14 Fleet Street, E.C.

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON, & CO.'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

BIOGRAPHICAL AND HISTORICAL WORKS.

BISHOP FRASER'S LANCASHIRE LIFE.

By JOHN W. DIGGLE, M.A., Vicar of Mossley Hill, Liverpool; Hon. Canon of Liverpool; Author of "Godliness and Manliness," "True Religion," &c.; also Editor of "Bishop Fraser's Sermons." 1 vol. Illustrated, demy 8vo. cloth, price 12s. 6d. [Shortly.]

THOMAS WILLIAM ROBERTSON, The

PRINCIPAL DRAMATIC WORKS of. With Memoir by his Son. Illustrated with 6 Photogravure Portraits of J. Hare, Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft, F. A. Sothorn, H. J. Montague, and George Honey. 2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, 21s. [Shortly.]

THE QUEEN'S PRIME MINISTERS: a

Series of Political Biographies. Edited by STUART J. REID, Author of "The Life and Times of Sydney Smith."

The Volumes will contain Portraits, and will be published at periodical intervals. Size, crown 8vo. bound in cloth, 2s. 6d. each. Full particulars on application.

LOUISA MAY ALCOTT: her Life, Letters, and Journals. Edited by EDNAH D. CHENEY. With 2 Portraits of Miss Alcott, and a View of her Concord Home. Cr. 8vo. 450 pp., cloth, 6s. [Ready.]

MEMORIES of FIFTY YEARS. By LESTER

WALLACK. Large-Paper Edition of Fifty Copies, printed on extra plate paper, small 4to. boards, cloth back, Autograph in gilt letters, £3 3s. net; Ordinary Edition, crown 8vo. cloth, 7s. 6d. [October.]

OLIVER CROMWELL and his PROTEC-

TORATE: an Elucidation drawn from Contemporary Evidence. By REGINALD F. D. PALGRAVE, C.B., Author of "The Chairman's Handbook" &c. Crown 8vo. cloth. [Shortly.]

LIFE of HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.

Edited by her Son, Rev. CHARLES E. STOWE. 1 vol. crown 8vo. about 500 pp. cloth. [October.]

REMINISCENCES of a BOYHOOD in the EARLY PART of the CENTURY: a Fragment of a Life. A New Story by an Old Hand. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s. [Ready.]

GEORGE WASHINGTON. In the Series of

"American Statesmen." By HENRY CABOT LODGE, Author of "Alexander Hamilton" and "Daniel Webster" in this Series. 2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 12s. [Ready.]

SYLVANUS REDIVIVUS (Rev. John Mitford)

With a Short Memoir of his Friend and Fellow-Naturalist, Edward Jesse. By Mrs. HOUSTON. 1 vol. crown 8vo. cloth. [October.]

MY LIFE as an AUTHOR. By MARTIN

FARQUHAR TUPPER, D.C.L., F.R.S., Author of "Proverbial Philosophy" &c. With a Portrait of the Author. New and Cheaper Edition, 8vo. cloth extra, 7s. 6d. [Shortly.]

RANDOLPH CALDECOTT: a Personal

Memoir of his Early Art Career. By HENRY BLACKBURN, Author of "Academy Notes," "Breton Folk" &c. With 172 Illustrations. New and Cheaper Edition, with Portrait, 7s. 6d. [Ready.]

THE THREE GERMANYS: Glimpses into their History. By THEODORE FAY. Fully Illustrated. 2 vols. demy 8vo. cloth, 35s. [Ready.]

LIFE of GENERAL LAFAYETTE: with a Critical Estimate of his Character and Public Acts. By BAYARD TUCKERMAN. 2 vols. crown 8vo. with Collotype Portrait, 12s. [Shortly.]

NEW NOVELS.

BLACKMORE (R. D.)—KIT and KITTY: a

Novel. By R. D. BLACKMORE, Author of "Lorna Doone," "Springhaven," &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo. [November.]

BLACK (WM.)—IN FAR LOCHABER. By

WILLIAM BLACK, Author of "The Strange Adventures of a House-Boat" &c. New and Cheaper Edition, 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s. [October.]

BYNNER (E. L.)—AGNES SURRIAGE.

By EDWIN LASSETTER BYNNER, Author of "Damen's Ghost," "Penelope's Suitors," &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s. [October.]

CLARKE (PERCY)—THREE DIGGERS:

a Tale of the Australian Fifties. By PERCY CLARKE, LL.B., Author of "The New Chum in Australia" &c. 1 vol. crown 8vo. cloth. [Shortly.]

EARL (H. P.)—RANDALL TREVOR. By

H. P. EARL, Author of "His Sisters." 2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, 21s. [Ready.]

EASTWOOD (F.)—IN SATAN'S BONDS.

By F. EASTWOOD. 2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, 21s. [October.]

RUSSELL (W. CLARK)—BETWIXT the

FORELANDS. By W. CLARK RUSSELL, Author of "The Wreck of the 'Grosvenor'" &c. 1 vol. Illustrated, crown 8vo. cloth, 10s. 6d. [November.]

TYTLER (SARAH)—DUCHESS FRANCES

By SARAH TYTLER. 2 vols. crown 8vo. 21s. [November.]

TRAVEL AND ADVENTURE.

FRIESLAND MERES and THROUGH the NETHERLANDS: the Voyage of a Family in a Norfolk Wherry. By HENRY MONTAGU DOUGHTY, Author of "Summer in Broadland." With about 50 Illustrations. Crown 8vo. cloth extra, 8s. 6d. [Ready.]

AUSTRALIA TWICE TRAVERSED: the

Romance of Exploration, being a Narrative compiled from the Journals of Five Exploring Expeditions into and through Central and Western Australia from 1872 to 1876. By ERNEST GILES, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Geographical Society, London. With 6 Maps and numerous Illustrations. 2 vols. demy 8vo. cloth extra, 30s. [Shortly.]

THE LAND of an AFRICAN SULTAN:

Travels in Morocco. By WALTER B. HARRIS, F.R.G.S. ("Al Aissoni"). With numerous Illustrations by Aleck Berens. Crown 8vo. cloth, 10s. 6d.

A Large-paper Edition, limited to 200 Copies, at 31s. 6d. net. Full Prospectus on application. [October.]

JOURNAL of VOYAGE of H.M.S. "ENTER-PRISE" in SEARCH of SIR JOHN FRANKLIN. As Recorded by Admiral Sir RICHARD COLLINSON. With Introduction by his Brother, Major-General COLLINSON. Demy 8vo. cloth. [Shortly.]

THROUGH ATOLLS, and ISLANDS in the GREAT SOUTH SEA. By FREDERICK J. MOSS, Member of the House of Representatives, New Zealand. Crown 8vo. with numerous Illustrations, cloth, 8s. 6d. [October.]

TROOPER and REDSKIN. Recollections of Life in the North-West Mounted Police, Canada. By JOHN G. DONKIN. With Map, and Portrait of the Author. Crown 8vo. cloth, 8s. 6d. [October.]

BLACKS and BUSHRANGERS; or, Adventures in North Queensland. By E. B. KENNEDY. With 8 Original Illustrations by Stanley Berkeley. Crown 8vo. cloth, 7s. 6d. [Ready.]

TWO KINGS of UGANDA; or, Life by the Shores of the Victoria Nyanza. By ROBERT P. ASHE, M.A., late of the Church Missionary Society's Nyanza Mission. With Illustrations and a new Map specially drawn of Eastern Equatorial Africa. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

THROUGH DAVID'S REALM. By Rev.

E. S. DE GROTE TOMPKINS. With 200 Illustrations by the Author. Demy 8vo. cloth, 10s. 6d.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

LAW RELATING to ELECTRIC LIGHTING.

Second Edition, being the Electric Lighting Acts, 1882 and 1888, with a General Introduction, a Continuous Commentary, and Appendices, consisting of the Rules, Regulations, and Model Form of Provisional Order issued by the Board of Trade. By G. SPENCER BOWER, B.A. (Oxon.), of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law, and WALTER WEBB, Solicitor of the Supreme Court. An entirely Re-written Edition. Crown 8vo. cloth, 12s. 6d. [Ready.]

PHILOSOPHIA ULTIMA; or, Science of the Sciences. An Historical and Critical Introduction to the Final Philosophy as issuing from the Harmony of Science and Religion. By CHARLES WOODRUFF SHIELDS, D.D., LL.D., Professor in Princetown College. 2 vols. demy 8vo. cloth, 21s. [Ready.]

CITY LEGENDS. By WILL CARLETON, Author of "Farm Ballads," "Farm Legends," "City Ballads," &c. Special Edition, Illustrated. Royal 8vo. cloth, 12s. 6d. [Ready.]

THE TRAGEDIE of MACBETH. By WILLIAM

SHAKESPEARE. With 27 Etchings on Copper, and other Text Illustrations, by J. Moyr Smith. (Prospectus on application.) [Shortly.]

ARTIST'S PROOF EDITION, limited to 125 Copies, each copy signed by the Artist, with Illustrations in Colours, royal folio, half-bound best morocco, £5 5s. net. ORDINARY EDITION, imperial 4to. cloth gilt, gilt top, £2 12s. 6d. net.

THE RIVALS. By RICHARD BRINSLEY SHERIDAN

Illustrated by Frank H. Gregory. (Prospectus on application.)

ARTIST'S PROOF EDITION, limited to 50 Copies, numbered and signed, imperial 4to. appropriately bound, £5 5s. net. ORDINARY EDITION, imperial 4to. cloth, gilt top, £2 12s. 6d. net. [Shortly.]

RANDOLPH CALDECOTT'S SKETCHES.

A Collection of about 200. With an Introduction by HENRY BLACKBURN, Editor of "Memoirs of R. Caldecott," "Academy Notes," &c. Demy 4to. picture boards, 2s. 6d. [Shortly.]

SIR LUDAR: a Tale of the Days of Good

Queen Bess. By TALBOT BAINES REED, Author of "The Fifth Form at St. Dominics," "The Willoughby Captains," &c. Crown 8vo. with numerous Illustrations, cloth, 6s. [Ready.]

ADRIET in the PACIFIC. By JULES VERNE.

Author of "Around the World in Eighty Days," "The Clipper of the Clouds," &c. Over 60 Illustrations. Crown 8vo. cloth, gilt edges, 7s. 6d.

THE CONQUEST of the MOON: a Story of the Bayoula. By ANDRE LAURIE. Numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo. cloth, gilt edges, 7s. 6d.

LOST in AFRICA: a Tale of Adventure. By

F. H. WINDER. Crown 8vo. with 8 Illustrations, cloth, 6s. [Ready.]

FULL LIST OF OUR NEW BOOKS POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

LONDON: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON, SEARLE, & RIVINGTON, LIMITED,
ST. DUNSTON'S HOUSE, FETTER LANE, FLEET STREET, E.C.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE,

No. 360, for OCTOBER, price 1s., contains:—

1. MAROONED. By W. CLARK RUSSELL. (Concluded.)
2. VERDI'S "OTELLO."
3. ARCHIBALD PRENTICE. By R. DUNLOP.
4. A SCHOLASTIC ISLAND. By J. THEODORE BENT.
5. ENGLISH BIRDS OF PREY.
6. KIRSTEEN. By Mrs. OLIPHANT. Chapters 7-9.
7. CANADA AND THE JESUITS. By GOLDWIN SMITH.

MACMILLAN & CO., LONDON.

A New Volume of

THE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE

Begins with the OCTOBER Number. Several new changes have been introduced, a Prospectus giving full details may be obtained from any Bookseller. The Magazine is now printed on thicker paper, a new and bolder type being used, and the letterpress is printed across the page.

THE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE

For OCTOBER, Profusely Illustrated, price 6d.; by post, 8d., contains:—

1. PORTRAIT OF A MAN. After FRANS HALS. Frontispiece.
2. ON THE SOUTH COAST. (To THEODORE WATTS.) By ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE.
3. CHILDREN IN THEATRES. By Mrs. JEUNE.
4. CEYLON. By Sir FREDERICK DICKSON, K.C.M.G. With Illustrations.
5. ENGLISH GIRLHOOD. By Mrs. MOLESWORTH.
6. THE WHITE AND SILENT NUNS. By HENRY W. LUCY. Illustrated.
7. PAMELA. By the Hon. Mrs. ANSTRUTHER.
8. FALLEN MAN. By B. MIDDLETON BATCHELOR.
9. THE EMBOSSED OF METALS. By W. A. S. BENSON. Illustrated.
10. RONDEAU. By WALTER CRANE. Illustrated.
11. A HOMELESS LOVE. By VIOLET FANE.
12. WAGNER IN BAYREUTH. By GEORGE BERNARD SHAW. With Illustrations.
13. THE RING OF AMASIS. A Romance. (To be continued.) Chaps. I. and II. By the Right Hon. the EARL OF LYTTON.
14. THE LABOURS OF THE XII. MONTHS: OCTOBER. A Design. By HEYWOOD SUMNER.

* Single Numbers, 6d.; by post, 8d. Yearly Subscription, including Double Number, 6s. 6d.; or if by post, 8s. 6d.

MACMILLAN & CO., LONDON.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

OCTOBER. 2s. 6d.

THE ATTACK ON THE NATIVE STATES OF INDIA. By MOHSIN-UL-MULK (Mehdi Ali).
 THE UNIVERSITIES IN CONTACT WITH THE PEOPLE. By J. CHURTON COLLINS.
 ROME IN 1839. By Mrs. HENRY ADY.
 JOURNAL DE MARIE BASHKIRTSEFF. By the Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE, M.P.
 A RÉSUMÉ OF THE IRISH LAND PROBLEM. By T. W. RUSSELL, M.P.
 THE COMPARATIVE INSENSIBILITY OF ANIMALS TO PAIN. By Dr. W. COLLIER.
 ON SOME WAR-SONGS OF EUROPE. By Miss LAURA A. SMITH.
 OLD COUNTRY HOUSES. By Sir EDWARD STRACHEY, Bart.
 MENTAL AND PHYSICAL TRAINING OF CHILDREN. By Mrs. JESSIE WALLER (née HUXLEY).
 LADY TOAD. By Professor MAX MÜLLER.
 THE CITY OF LHÁSA. By GRAHAM SANDBERG.
 WATER POACHERS. By JOHN WATSON.
 THE MIDDLE CLASS AND THE NEW LIBERALISM. By the Rev. J. GUINNESS ROGERS.

LONDON: KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.

Pp. 128, ILLUSTRATED, PRICE ONE SHILLING.

THE

NEWBERY HOUSE MAGAZINE.

A Monthly Review and Family Magazine for Churchmen and Churchwomen.

CONTENTS OF No. 4 FOR OCTOBER.

CHURCHMEN AND THE MAKING OF THE NEXT PARLIAMENT. By the Rev. T. MOORE, M.A.
 THE SIGN OF THE CROSS REGARDED AS A PROFESSION OF CHRISTIAN FAITH. By PÈRE HYACINTHE LOYSON.
 WINCHESTER COLLEGE. (Illustrated.) By H. J. HARDY, M.A.
 THE RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF AN ANGLICAN RELIGIOUS ORDER. By the Rev. C. H. SHARPE.
 THE DEMOCRATIC METHOD IN MODERN FRENCH ART. By ROSE KINGSLEY.
 THE INHABITANTS OF EAST LONDON. By Canon GREGORY.
 THE PUBLIC WORSHIP ACT OF 1874 AND ITS RESULTS. Part II. By Judge HOMERSHAM COX.
 FATHER DAMIEN AND THE "MEMORIAL" FUND. By the Rev. M. M. BEN-OLIEL.
 ST. AUGUSTINE'S VISIT TO A MODERN CHURCH. (A Short Story.) By the Rev. W. S. LACH SZYMA, M.A.
 THE BISHOP'S BIBLE. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY and H. HERMAN.
 BOY. (Illustrated.) Concluded. By HELEN MILMAN.
 LAY AND CLERICAL CONFERENCES—SERMON OUTLINES FOR OCTOBER—INSTRUCTIONS ON THE CREED—BIBLICAL QUESTIONS FOR COMPETITION—NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS—REVIEWS AND CORRESPONDENCE, &c. &c.

GRIFFITH, FARRAN, OKEDEN, & WELSH, NEWBERY HOUSE, LONDON, AND SYDNEY.

MISS BRADDON'S NEW NOVEL.

In 3 vols. At all Libraries.

THE DAY WILL COME. A Novel. By the Author of "Lady Audley's Secret" &c.
 London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO.

THE BUILDER of October 5 contains Illustrations of Blackheath, Friston (The Hall); Reredos in Elvetham Church; "Pugin Tour"; Sketches by R. W. Paul; Sketches about Golden Valley, Gloucestershire, by Ralph Neville, F.S.A.; &c. &c. Also articles on Roman and Medieval London; One Lesson of the Recent Strike, &c., &c. 4d.; by post, 4½d. Annual subscription, 19s.
 Office, 46 Catherine Street, London, W.C.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 888. OCTOBER 1889. 2s. 6d.

CONTENTS:

MASTER OF HIS FATE. By J. MACLAREN COBBAN.
 THE ART OF SHOOTING. By T. E. KEBBEL.
 ST. DYFRIG'S CITY.
 LADY BABY. Chaps. XXXIII.-XXXVI.
 THE CROFTERS—
 I. THE CROFTER COMMISSION. By REGINALD MACLEOD.
 II. THEIR CONDITION AND PROSPECTS. By AN ISLESMAN.
 THE LIBERAL PARTY. By Lord BRABOURNE.
 LOOKING BACK IN YARROW. By J. B. SELKIRK.
 THE NAVAL MANŒUVRES OF 1889.
 MURDER IN A DREAM. NOTE TO "SCENES FROM A SILENT WORLD," No. V.
 LEPERS AT THE CAPE: CORRESPONDENCE AND EDITORIAL COMMENTS.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

BLACKWOOD'S NEW SERIAL.

Part IV. this day, price 1s.

TRAVEL, ADVENTURE, & SPORT.

From "BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE."

No. IV. CONTAINS:—A PERSONAL NARRATIVE OF A JOURNEY FROM HERAT TO ORENBURG, ON THE CASPIAN, IN 1840. By Captain Sir RICHMOND SHAKESPEAR—THE INLAND SEA OF JAPAN. By ANDREW WILSON—A RUN TO NICARAGUA. By LAURENCE OLIPHANT—UP STREAM: ON THE RED RIVER.

* Each Part, containing several Sketches, will be uniform in size and type and will be issued on Alternate Months with the "TALES FROM BLACKWOOD."

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

THE NATIONAL REVIEW.

OCTOBER. 2s. 6d.

CONTENTS:

THE ENDOWMENT OF A ROMAN CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY IN IRELAND. By F. C. CONYBEARE, M.A.
 FICTION—PLETHORIC AND ANÆMIC. By WILLIAM WATSON.
 THE EMPIRE:—
 1. THE IMPERIAL FEDERATION LEAGUE. By WILLIAM GRESWELL.
 2. THE CROWN AND THE COLONIES. By EDWARD SALMON.
 THE GENESIS OF THEOSOPHY. By Colonel OLCOTT.
 WOMEN AND TOBACCO. By J. D. HUNTING.
 THE BRITISH WORKMAN. By G. ROME HALL.
 WILD DUCKS AND DUCK-DECOYING. By J. WATSON.
 THE EDUCATION OF THE BLIND AND DEAF. By C. E. D. BLACK, Secretary to the late Royal Commission.
 POLITICS AT HOME AND ABROAD.
 CORRESPONDENCE.

LONDON: W. H. ALLEN & CO., 13 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

Monthly, price Sixpence.

KNOWLEDGE.—An Illustrated Magazine of Science,
 The OCTOBER Number contains:
 THE MOON AS SEEN THROUGH THE LICK TELESCOPE. By A. C. RANYARD. Illustrated by 5 Photographs of the Moon taken with the Lick Telescope.
 THE DRAGON TREES OF TENERIFFE. By R. CAMPER DAY. With Photographs of Old Dragon Tree.
 THE COMMON COCKROACH. By E. A. BUTLER.
 SKETCHES IN EVOLUTION. By JOHN WATSON.
 DOGS AND BEARS PAST AND PRESENT. By R. LYDEKKER.
 PRINTERS' PRANKS. By the late R. A. PROCTOR.
 THE ECONOMICS OF FOG. By R. BEYNON.
 THE FACE OF THE SKY. By H. SADLER.
 CORRESPONDENCE, WHIST, CHESS, &c.

London: W. H. ALLEN & CO., 13 Waterloo Place. And at all Booksellers' and Railway Bookstalls.

NEW VOLUME BY R. L. STEVENSON.

Just published, crown 8vo. cloth, 5s.

THE MASTER OF BALLANTRAE.

By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON,

Author of "Treasure Island," "Kidnapped," &c.

"In 'The Master of Ballantrae' we have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Stevenson surpasses all his former performances."—Times.

"Mr. Stevenson has done it at last; in 'The Master of Ballantrae' he has produced something very like a classic."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"'The Master of Ballantrae' is one of those few books of which even a poor man says to himself, when he has finished it, 'I would give a guinea never to have read it, that I might read it again for the first time.'"—Illustrated London News.

CASELL & COMPANY, LIMITED, LUDGATE HILL, LONDON.
 AND ALL BOOKSELLERS.

STAMMERERS and STUTTERERS should read a book by a gentleman who cured himself after suffering nearly forty years.

Post free for 13 stamps, from
 Mr. B. BEASLEY, Sherwood, Willesden Lane, Brondesbury, London.

2 vols. 8vo. with numerous Illustrations, price Two Guineas.

THE DIARIES OF SIR MOSES MONTEFIORE AND LADY MONTEFIORE, 1812-1883,

With the Addresses and Speeches of Sir Moses; his Correspondence with Ministers, Ambassadors, and Representative Bodies; full accounts, in his own words, of all his Missions in the Cause of Humanity; Firmans and Edicts of Eastern Monarchs; his opinions on Financial, Political, and Religious Subjects; Anecdotes and Incidents related by him, and referring to Men of his Time. Edited by the late Dr. L. LOEWE, Member of the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland, of the Société Asiatique of Paris, of the Numismatic Society of London, &c., one of the members of the Mission to Damascus and Constantinople under the late Sir Moses Montefiore, Bart., in the year 1840.

Crown 8vo. cloth, with Portrait, 10s. 6d.

ROBERT BRETT, OF STOKE NEWINGTON:

His Life and Work.

By T. W. BELCHER, D.D.

"A biography that we doubt not will be read with intense interest in all Anglo-Catholic families."—Observer.

LETTERS FROM DOROTHY OSBORNE TO SIR WILLIAM TEMPLE, 1652-1654.

Edited by E. A. PARRY.

Love Letters of a Bygone Age.

"What most surprised me in these charming letters (which you must not merely order from the Library but buy as a classic) is the modernness of their style, sentiment and humour. You can hardly believe you are reading letters written in Cromwell's day, so different is their tone and style from those of the rugged, harsh, involved letters of most of her Commonwealth contemporaries."—Truth.
"The pleasantest book imaginable."—Saturday Review.

Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

EENA ROMNEY; or, Word Pictures of Home Life in New South Wales. By MYRA FELTON.

"It is well written and has an interest not commonly attached to pictures of home life. It will please everyone who has recollections of Australia."—Scotsman.

Crown 8vo. pp. 320, cloth, 6s.

THE STAR of GEZER: the King's Daughter.

By SYBIL.

"Is a book sure to be eagerly sought for."—Manchester Examiner.

Crown 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.

A GLOSSARY of BIOLOGICAL, ANATO- MICAL, and PHYSIOLOGICAL TERMS. For Teachers and Students. By THOMAS DUNMAN. New Edition, revised and extended by Dr. V. H. WYATT WINGRAVE.

POKER; How to Play it. With a Sketch of the Game; with its Laws and Rules. By ONE OF ITS VICTIMS. Fcp. 8vo. cloth limp, 1s.

EUCHRE; How to Play it. With its Laws and Rules. By the same Author. Fcp. 8vo. cloth limp, 1s.

GRIFFITH, FARRAN, OKEDEN, & WELSH,
NEWBERY HOUSE, LONDON, & SYDNEY.

Now ready, price 4s.

A BID FOR THE LAUREATESHIP: Poems.

By T. J. MACARTNEY.

LONDON: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, & CO., STATIONERS'-HALL COURT.
PLYMOUTH: W. H. LUKE, 8 BEDFORD STREET.

TO TRAVELLERS IN INDIA.

WHITWORTH'S ANGLO-INDIAN DICTIONARY:

A Glossary of Colloquial and Official Terms;

Of the names of Divinities, Festivals, Religions, and Sects; of Races, Tribes, and Languages; of Castes and Occupations; of the different Eras and Systems of Chronology; of seasons, Crops, and Land Tenures, and generally of all Indian terms used in English, and of English words peculiarly used in India. Price 12s.

"Well designed, well printed, and handy."—Saturday Review.

LONDON: KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.

Now ready, Fifty-seventh Edition, 2s.

THE CHILD'S GUIDE to KNOWLEDGE. By A LADY. The Original Authorized Edition, brought down to the Present Time. London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, & CO.

SMITH, ELDER, & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW EDITION of the POETICAL WORKS OF

ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.

To be completed in Six Monthly Volumes. Small crown 8vo. 5s. each.

This Edition will be uniform with the recently published Edition of Mr. Robert Browning's Works. It will contain several Portraits of Mrs. Browning at different periods of life, and a few Illustrations.

There will also be a Large-paper Edition of 125 Copies, printed on Hand-made Paper. This Edition will only be supplied through Booksellers.

Volume I. will be published on October 26.

POCKET EDITION OF MRS. GASKELL'S WORKS.

To be completed in Eight Monthly Volumes, bound in cloth, with cut or uncut edges, price 1s. 6d. per vol.

Vol. I., containing WIVES and DAUGHTERS, is now ready.

NEW VOLUME OF THE "DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY."

Now ready, royal 8vo. 15s. in cloth; or in half-morocco, marbled edges, 20s. VOL. XX. (FORREST—GARNER) of the

DICTIONARY of NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY

Edited by LESLIE STEPHEN.

* * Vol. XXI. will be published on December 23, and the subsequent Volumes at intervals of three months.

NEW NOVELS.

At all the Libraries, in 2 vols. post 8vo.

THE COUNTY:

A STORY OF SOCIAL LIFE.

On October 15, in 3 vols. post 8vo.

THE PARIAH.

By F. ANSTEY, Author of "Vice Versâ," "The Giant's Robe,"
"A Fallen Idol," &c. 3 vols.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

THE CARISBROOKE LIBRARY.

NEW VOLUME.

In large crown 8vo. cloth, cut or uncut edges, 2s. 6d.;
or Roxburghe binding, gilt top, 3s. 6d.

ENGLISH PROSE WRITINGS OF JOHN MILTON.

Edited by HENRY MORLEY, LL.D.

Volumes already issued:

EARLY PROSE ROMANCES. Edited by HENRY MORLEY, LL.D.

THE EARLIER LIFE and WORKS of
DANIEL DE FOE. Edited by HENRY MORLEY, LL.D.

TALES of the SEVEN DEADLY SINS.
Being the Confessio Amantis of JOHN GOWER. Edited by HENRY MORLEY, LL.D.

THE TALE of a TUB; and other Works.
By JONATHAN SWIFT. Edited by HENRY MORLEY, LL.D.

"Of the 'Carisbrooke Library' we have nothing to say but praise. . . . We must further do Me-srs. Routledge and Mr. Morley the justice to say that the form which they have chosen for their venture is very nearly all that can be desired. Good margins, uncut edges, excellent type, fair paper, decent binding, and four hundred and fifty octavo pages for half-a-crown, are things that we never could refuse in our life or receive with ingratitude."—Saturday Review.

"So far as can be judged from the first volume, the 'Carisbrooke Library' promises to hold its own among its ever-multiplying rivals. It is well printed in clear legible type by the Ballantyne Press; the paper is fair, the edges rough, and the binding modest and tasteful."—Athenæum.

"The handsome type, pleasant paper, and substantial appearance of the half-a-crown 'Carisbrooke Library' will commend the series even to the most fastidious reader. . . . If the succeeding volumes are as good as the first there need be no doubt as to the result."—St. James's Gazette.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, BROADWAY, LUDGATE HILL.

W. H. ALLEN & CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Crown 8vo. pp. xi. and 388, with a Plate and Plan, cloth, 7s. 6d.

OUT-DOOR SPORTS in SCOTLAND; their Economy and Surroundings; Deer Stalking, Grouse Shooting, Salmon Angling, Golfing, Curling, &c. With Notes on the Natural and Sporting History of the Animals of the Chase, and Estimates of their Economic Value. By ELLANGOWAN.

CONTENTS:—Introduction—Scotland's Deer and Grouse Grounds—Deer—Stalking—The Game Supply—Game in Larder, Kitchen, and Dining-Room—Salmonia—Coursing: Hares—Rabbits for Sport and Food—The Grouse Family—Natural Troutiana—Trout and Sport in the Borders—Vermin of the Moors and Manors—Economy of a Grouse Moor—The Political Economy of Sport—On the Heather—The Fox: Fox-Hunting—Golf—Curling—Patrons and Parasites of Sport. £ s. d.—Pheasants and Partridges—Other Birds of Sport—Poaching—Gamekeepers

"The captious critic will be charmed into silence in spite of himself if he have in him any love of fresh air and Nature."—Glasgow Herald.

1 vol. 4to. with 67 Illustrations, 15s.

HEARTS of OAK. By Rear-Admiral H. F. WINNINGTON INGRAM.

"We must not part from our author without thanking him for the pleasure we have derived from reading his simple, straightforward narrative."—Academy.
 "Hearts of Oak' ought to become a nineteenth-century classic. No book could prove more clearly the power and ubiquity of the English flag."—Athenæum.
 "A welcome book—a gallant, cheerful, wholesome review of forty years of life passed among many men and many lands."—World.

1 vol. crown 8vo. 5s.

THE MILITARY CAREER. A Guide to Young Officers, Army Candidates, and Parents. By Lieut.-General Sir W. BELLAIRS, K.C.M.G., C.B.

Crown 8vo. pp. 284, cloth, 5s.

LITERARY INFLUENCE in BRITISH HISTORY. An Historical Sketch. By the Hon. ALBERT S. G. CANNING.

CONTENTS:—Literary Influence of Judea, Greece, and Rome—Early British Writings—The Early Tudors—The Elizabethan Era—Spenser and Raleigh—Shakespeare—The Stuarts—The Revolution—The Hanoverians—Hume—Robertson—Adam Smith—Doctor Johnson—Sir Walter Scott and his Contemporaries—Lord Macaulay—Charles Dickens—Green and Buckle—Recent Writers—Concluding Remarks.

"Mr. Canning's book reveals a liberal temperament and an impartial judgment."—Echo.
 "The little work is valuable as giving a broad general view of a subject elsewhere infinitely diversified in detail, enjoyable in no common degree."—Scotsman.
 "This is a standard work and deserves to have a place in every good library."—Ulster Gazette.
 "May be read with pleasure and profit even by those who are acquainted with more extensive works on the same subject. The style is good, and sound judgment and acute discrimination characterise the volume from beginning to end."—Londonderry Standard.

Fcp. 8vo. One Shilling.

THE CANARIES for CONSUMPTIVES. By E. PAGET THURSTAN, M.D., B.A., M.R.C.S.E., &c., Author of "Southborough: its Chalybeate Springs, Climate, and Attractions as a Health Resort."

Fcp. 8vo. One Shilling.

A FEW HINTS to TRAVELLERS in INDIA. By AN ANGLO-INDIAN.

A NEW WORK BY GEORGE GRESSWELL, OF KELSEY HOUSE, LOUTH.

1 vol. demy 8vo. Illustrated, 15s.

THE DISEASES and DISORDERS of the OX. With some Account of the Diseases of Sheep; and Additions on Human and Comparative Pathology, by Dr. ALBERT GRESSWELL.

2 vols. crown 8vo. with Frontispiece, 12s.

THE LONDON STAGE: its History and Traditions from 1576—

1888. By H. BARTON BAKER, Author of "Our Old Actors" &c.

"This is really a delightful book—a book to be carried off to the seaside or the mountain hut, or taken into the smoking-room or the boudoir.....In these pleasant volumes Mr. Baker gives not only jest and anecdote, but a whole series of graphic and interesting sketches of all the chief actors and actresses of the last century."—Pictorial World.

"Mr. Baker has succeeded in retaining enough of anecdote to make his two volumes entertaining, whilst as a concise and reliable history they will be quite invaluable."—Yorkshire Post.

"Will be of great value to all who take something deeper than a mere transitory interest in the stage.....As a compilation of facts alone, apart altogether from their literary merits, these volumes are remarkable, and the book undoubtedly deserves a prominent place on the library shelves of every student of the stage."—Sheffield Telegraph.

IN THE PRESS.

1 vol. demy 8vo. with Map and 2 Portraits, 18s.

SIR JOHN LOGIN and DULEEP SINGH. By Lady LOGIN. With Introduction by Colonel G. B. MALLESON, C.S.I.

[This day.]

Crown 8vo. with Portrait, 7s. 6d.

CHRISTINA, QUEEN of SWEDEN. By F. W. BAIN, B.A., late Junior Student of Christ Church, Oxford.

[This day.]

1 vol. crown 8vo. Illustrated, 6s.

AN ACCOUNT of the NEW CHAPEL at MARLBOROUGH COLLEGE. By Rev. NEWTON MANT. With Appendix by Rev. J. S. THOMAS, Bursar of the College; and an Introduction by the Ven. F. W. FARRAR, Archdeacon of Westminster.

1 vol. crown 8vo. Illustrated, 6s.

THE ROMANCE of MODERN INDUSTRY. By J. BURNLEY, Author of "Romance of Life Preservation" &c.

THE STATESMEN SERIES. Forthcoming Volumes. Each 2s. 6d.

LORD DERBY. By T. E. KEBBEL.

THE PRINCE CONSORT. By CHARLOTTE YONGE.

FOX. By H. O. WAKEMAN.

1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

WITH the HARRISES: Seventy Years Ago. Novel by the Author of "The Subaltern,"

"The Chronicles of Waltham," &c.

1 vol. crown 8vo.

FAMOUS ELIZABETHAN PLAYS. Expurgated and adapted for Modern Readers by H. MACAULAY FITZGIBBON, Editor of "Early English and Scottish Poetry," Campbell's "Gertrude of Wyoming" (Clarendon Press Series), &c. &c. Selected from the Works of Dekker, Beaumont, Fletcher, Jonson, Massinger, and Ford. Each Play provided with a reading-table and a short account of its author.

LONDON: W. H. ALLEN & CO., 13 WATERLOO PLACE.

VOLUME IV. WILL BE ISSUED ON OCTOBER 15.

CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA
ENTIRELY NEW EDITION.

TO BE COMPLETED IN TEN VOLUMES, IMPERIAL 8VO. ISSUED AT INTERVALS OF A FEW MONTHS.

Price 10s. each cloth; 15s. each half-morocco.

- VOLUME I. Containing Three Thousand One Hundred Articles, 313 Wood Engravings, and 12 Maps.
VOLUME II. Containing Three Thousand Three Hundred Articles, 384 Wood Engravings, and 5 Maps.
VOLUME III. Containing Three Thousand Seven Hundred Articles, 336 Wood Engravings, and 2 Maps.
VOLUME IV. Containing Two Thousand Nine Hundred Articles, 359 Wood Engravings, 6 Maps, 1 Plate.

The Work is also being issued in Monthly Parts, price 1s. each.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS ON VOL. I.

Times.—"For many, probably most, people, this work contains all they are ever likely to require."
Daily Telegraph.—"The advent of a new edition, accurate, liberal, and cheap, will be welcomed with a very general approval."
Standard.—"Almost every subject likely to interest an intelligent person is here."
Daily Chronicle.—"We have consulted it constantly, with increasing admiration for its uniform accuracy."
Literary World.—"The New Encyclopædia is no mere tasteless compilation, but apart from the fulness and accuracy of its information, it has a distinct literary value of its own."
Knowledge.—"So far the work has been well and thoroughly done; and never did an undertaking more nobly redeem the promise of its preface than this first volume of the new edition. The typography is perfect."
Nature.—"Messrs. Chambers are to be congratulated upon the issue of a work which, from its merits, deserves to find a place in every home."

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS ON VOL. II.

Saturday Review.—"The second volume is full, brief, clear in printing, and copious in illustration. Let the reader take it for granted that everything between Beaugency and Cataract which ought to be there is there. Neither will he be far wrong if he also believes that the necessary quantum of information, followed by a proper list of authorities, is given for all of them."
Spectator.—"The leading literary, political, scientific, and artistic subjects included in this volume have been entrusted to specially qualified writers, whose articles are, as a rule, entirely new. It is already evident that the new edition of 'Chambers's Encyclopædia' will reflect the highest credit on its editor and its publishers."
Pall Mall Gazette.—"For practical utility these volumes could hardly be exceeded."
St. James's Gazette.—"In this, as in the preceding volume, great care has been taken to keep the articles within readable and profitable limits. The result is that for many purposes 'Chambers's Encyclopædia' is the best modern book of reference."

CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA. VOL. IV.

Among the more important Articles in this Volume are the following:—

DIPHTHERIA	George Gilray, M.D.	ETRURIA	Rev. Canon Isaac Taylor.
DIPLOMACY; ENEMY	J. A. M. Irving.	EUCLID	J. S. Mackay, LL.D.
DIPPING-NEEDLE	A. C. Mitchell.	EUPHRATES; FAYYŪM	Stanley Lane-Poole.
DISTILLATION; ETHER	W. Inglis Clark, D.Sc.	EURIPIDES	F. B. Jevons.
DIVINATION	Thomas Davidson.	EVIDENCE	G. P. McNeill.
DIVING; DYNAMITE	E. G. Carey.	EVOLUTION	Professor Patrick Geddes.
DIVISION OF LABOUR	Thomas Kirkup.	EXCAVATORS	Charles Fairbairn.
DIVORCE; ENTAIL	Thomas Raleigh.	EXCOMMUNICATION	Rev. Dr. R. F. Littledale.
DOCK	D. & T. Stevenson.	EXHIBITIONS	H. Roscoe Dumville.
DOG; FOX	Wm. E. Hoyle.	EYE	Dr. R. A. Lundie.
DOGMA; ECCLESIASTES	Rev. A. P. Davidson.	FACTORY ACTS	W. C. Smith.
DOMICILE	Henry Goudy.	FALCONRY	J. E. Harting.
DOUAY	T. G. Law.	FALLOW; FENCES	Professor Wallace.
DOUGLAS	Joseph Robertson, LL.D.	FAMILY	D. M'Lennan.
DRAINAGE; FARM	J. Macdonald, of the Farming World .	FARADAY	Professor Tait.
DRAMA; DRYDEN	George Saintsbury.	FASHION	Emily Stevenson.
DRAYTON; FORD	A. H. Bullen.	FAST; FESTIVAL	Emanuel Deutsch.
DREAMING; EPILEPSY	Dr. Alexander Bruce.	FATS; FIBRINE	Dr. Noël Paton.
DREDGE	John Gunn.	FAWCETT, HENRY	Mrs. Fawcett.
DRUIDISM	Professor Rhys.	FENCING	Major Dunlop, R.A.
DRUSES	Laurence Oliphant.	FÉNELON	Very Rev. Charles W. Russell, D.D.
DUBLIN	Ulrick R. Burke.	FERMENTATION	Cosmo Burton.
DUELLING	Percy Fitzgerald.	FERNS; FLOWER	Professor Patrick Geddes.
DUFFERIN	Lloyd Sanders.	FEUDALISM	J. W. Brodie Innes.
DUKE; EARL; FLAG	George Burnett, LL.D.	FICHTE	W. Smith, LL.D.
DUMAS	W. E. Henley.	FIELDING	Austin Dobson.
DÜRER	J. M. Gray.	FILTER	W. Mattieu Williams.
DYEING	Alexander Galletly.	FINLAND	J. W. Cooke, Helsingfors.
DYNAMOS; ELECTRIC LIGHT AND RAILWAY	Professor J. A. Ewing.	FIRDAUSI	W. A. Clouston.
EAR	Dr. McBride.	FIREARMS	W. W. Greener.
EARLY ENGLISH	D. Macgibbon.	FIRE-BRIGADE	Revised by Captain Shaw.
EARTH	Dr. Hugh Robert Mill.	FISHERIES	J. T. Cunningham.
EARTHQUAKE; EUROPE	Professor James Geikie.	FISHES	J. Arthur Thomson.
EASTER; FAIRIES	Rev. T. F. Thistleton Dyer.	FITZGERALD, EDWARD	Professor E. B. Cowell.
ÉCARTÉ; EUCHRE	Henry Jones ("Cavendish").	FLAUBERT	George Saintsbury.
ECKHART	J. T. Bealby.	FLINT IMPLEMENTS	Joseph Anderson LL.D.
ECLIPSES	Rev. E. B. Kirk.	FLOORCLOTH	Alexander Galletly.
ECUADOR	W. Dundas Walker.	FLORENCE	Enrico Lemmi.
EDGEWORTH	F. Hindes Groome.	FLYING	T. C. Hepworth.
EDINBURGH	John Harrison.	FLY-WHEEL	Professor T. H. Beare.
EDUCATION	Dr. J. G. Fitch.	FŒTUS	Dr. Milne Murray.
EDWARD I.-V.	Thomas Davidson.	FOLKLORE; FAUST	Thomas Davidson.
EGYPT	S. Birch, LL.D., and S. Lane-Poole.	FOOD	Professor Haycraft.
ELECTRICITY	Professor Cargill G. Knott.	FOOT	Dr. Hepburn.
ELIOT, GEORGE	Richard Holt Hutton.	FOOTBALL	C. J. Butcher, of the Field .
ELIZABETH	William Wallace.	FOOT-ROT; FOUNDER	Principal Williams.
ELLIPSE; FRICTION	R. E. Anderson.	FORCE	Professor Tait.
ELM; FIR	W. Sutherland.	FORGERY	A. Wood Renton.
EMBROIDERY; ENAMEL	James Paton.	FORSTER, W. E.	G. Barnett Smith.
EMBRYOLOGY	J. Arthur Thomson.	FORTIFICATION	Major Dunlop, R.A.
EMERSON	Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes.	FOX, GEORGE	Rev. W. W. Tulloch.
EMIGRATION; FLI	C. P. Lucas, Colonial Office.	FOX, JOHN	Sidney L. Lee.
ENCYCLOPÆDIA	H. A. Webster.	FOXHUNTING	W. C. A. Blew, M.A., Oxon.
ENERGY; ETHER	W. Peddie, D.Sc.	FOURIER	Thomas Kirkup.
ENGLAND (History)	Rev. J. Franck Bright, D.D.	FRANCE (Geography)	Prince Peter Kropotkine.
ENGLAND, CHURCH OF	Rev. Dr. R. F. Littledale.	FRANCE (History, Language and Literature)	F. F. Roget.
ENGLISH LANGUAGE	Henry Sweet.	FRANCIS, SIR PHILIP	W. Fraser Rae.
ENGLISH LITERATURE	Professor Henry Morley, LL.D.	FRANKLIN, BENJAMIN	Hon. John Bigelow.
ENGRAVING	J. M. Gray.	FRANKLIN, SIR JOHN	John S. Keltie.
ERASMUS	P. Hume Brown.	FREDERICK THE GREAT	Findlay Muirhead.
ESKIMO	Dr. Henry Rink.	FREDERICK III.	G. Barnett Smith.
ETHICS	Professor W. R. Sorley.	FRÆE CHURCH	A. Taylor Innes.
ETHIOPIA	Rev. Professor A. B. Davidson.	FREEMASONS	D. Murray Lyon.
ETHNOLOGY	Professor A. H. Keane.	FREE TRADE	Professor J. S. Nicholson.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

THE BADMINTON LIBRARY.

Edited by the DUKE OF BEAUFORT, K.G., and ALFRED E. T. WATSON.

FENCING, BOXING, and WRESTLING.

By WALTER H. POLLOCK, F. C. GROVE, WALTER ARMSTRONG, E. B. MICHELL, and M. PRÉVOST. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d. [In November.]

THIRTY YEARS of COLONIAL GOVERN-

MENT: a Selection from the Official Papers of the Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FERGUSON BOWEN, G.C.M.G., D.C.L., LL.D., &c., successively Governor of Queensland, New Zealand, Victoria, Mauritius, and Hong Kong. With Portrait on Steel. Edited by STANLEY LANE-POOLE. 2 vols. 8vo. [In November.]

The HISTORY of PHœNICIA. By GEORGE

RAWLINSON, M.A., Canon of Canterbury, &c., Author of "The History of Ancient Egypt" &c. With numerous Illustrations. 1 vol. 8vo. 24s. [In October.]

FRANCE and HER REPUBLIC: a Record of Things Seen and Heard in the "Centennial Year," 1889. By WM. HENRY HURLBERT, Author of "Ireland under Coercion." 1 vol. 8vo. [In the press.]

The SKIPPER in ARCTIC SEAS. By

W. J. CLUTTERBUCK, one of the Authors of "Three in Norway." With numerous Illustrations. 1 vol. crown 8vo. [In the press.]

EAST AFRICA and its BIG GAME: the Narrative of a Sporting Trip from Zanzibar to the Borders of the Masai. By Capt. Sir JOHN WILLOUGHBY, Bart., Royal Horse Guards. With Postscript by Sir ROBERT G. HARVEY, Bart. Illustrated by G. D. GILES and Mrs. Gordon Hake. 1 vol. royal 8vo. [In the press.]

CARDINAL LAVIGERIE and the AFRICAN

SLAVE TRADE. Edited by RICHARD F. CLARKE, S.J., Trinity College, Oxford. 1 vol. 8vo. [In October.]

The BLUE FAIRY BOOK. Edited by

ANDREW LANG. With numerous Illustrations by H. J. Ford and G. P. Jacob Hood. Crown 8vo. 6s. [In a few days.]

* 113 Copies are being printed on Large Paper, containing an Introduction by Mr. Lang on the literary aspect of Nursery Tales. Price through all Booksellers.

NEW BOOK BY THE AUTHOR OF "SUPERNATURAL RELIGION."

A REPLY to DR. LIGHTFOOT'S ESSAYS.

By the Author of "Supernatural Religion." 1 vol. 8vo. 6s.

SUPERNATURAL RELIGION: an Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. 3 vols. 8vo. 36s.

WATTS' DICTIONARY of CHEMISTRY.

Revised and entirely Rewritten, by H. FORSTER MORLEY, M.A., D.Sc., and M. M. PATTERSON MUIR, M.A., F.R.S.E., assisted by Eminent Contributors. (To be published in 4 vols.) 8vo. Vols. I. and II. Two GUINEAS each.

The THEORY of CREDIT. By HENRY

DUNNING MACLEOD, M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge, and the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law; selected by the Royal Commissioners for the Digest of the Law to prepare the Digest of the Law of Bills, Notes, &c. Two vols. 8vo. Vol. I. 7s. 6d. [Vol. II. in the press.]

The ROTIFERA or "WHEEL-ANIMAL-

CULES." By C. T. HUDSON, LL.D. and P. H. GOSSE, F.R.S. With 30 Coloured and 4 Uncoloured Plates. In 6 Parts. 4to. 10s. 6d. each; Supplement, 12s. 6d. Complete in 2 vols., with Supplement, 4to. £4 4s.

* The Plates in the Supplement contain figures of almost all the Foreign Species, as well as of the British Species, that have been discovered since the publication of Vols. I. & II.

NATURAL RELIGION. The Gifford Lectures

delivered before the University of Glasgow in 1888. By F. MAX MÜLLER, K.M., Foreign Member of the French Institute. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

THREE LECTURES on the SCIENCE of

LANGUAGE and its PLACE in GENERAL EDUCATION. Delivered at the Oxford University Extension Meeting, 1889. By F. MAX MÜLLER. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 2s.

HANDBOOK of COMMERCIAL GEOGRA-

PHY. By G. G. CHISHOLM, M.A., B.Sc. With 29 Maps. 8vo. 16s.

"It has a wider scope than any book of the kind we have seen."

Saturday Review.

A PRACTICAL PLAN for ASSIMILATING

the ENGLISH and AMERICAN MONEY as a STEP towards a UNIVERSAL MONEY. By the late WALTER BAGEHOT. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

* This little book has been long out of print, and is republished in view of the Monetary Congress which was held in Paris during September.

No. 84, 8vo. price Sixpence.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE.—OCTOBER.

CONTENTS:

THE BELL OF ST. PAUL'S. Part II. Chaps. 23-26. By WALTER BESANT.
THE DRAMATISATION OF NOVELS..... By BRANDER MATTHEWS.
THE DEVIL'S DUE..... By E. NESBIT.
WAITING FOR THE "KHIVA"..... By M. ROWAN.
THE FÖHN..... By HENRY HARRIES.
MRS. FENTON: a Sketch. Chaps. 7-9..... By W. E. NORRIS.
AT THE SIGN OF THE SHIP..... By ANDREW LANG.
THE "DONNA" AND THE STRIKE..... By THE EDITOR.

The LIFE of LORD JOHN RUSSELL. By

SPENCER WALPOLE, Author of "A History of England from 1815." With 2 Portraits. 2 vols. 8vo. 36s. [Early in November.]

RUSSIA in CENTRAL ASIA in 1889. and the ANGLO-RUSSIAN QUESTION. By the Hon. GEORGE N. CURZON, M.P., Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford. With Illustrations, Maps, Appendices, and an Index. 1 vol. 8vo. 21s. [On October 14.]

The MELBOURNE PAPERS. Being a Selection from Documents in the possession of Earl Cowper, K.G. Edited by LLOYD C. SANDERS, B.A. With Preface by Earl COWPER. 1 vol. 8vo. [In October.]

The WORD. By the Rev. T. MOZLEY, Author of "Reminiscences of Oriel College and the Oxford Movement." Crown 8vo. [In the press.]

FLORIDA DAYS. By MARGARET DELAND,

Author of "John Ward, Preacher," "The Old Garden," &c. With 12 Full-page Plates (2 Etched and 4 in Colours), and about 50 Illustrations in the Text, by Louis K. Harlow. 8vo. 21s. [In the press.]

* This Volume will be Copyright.

EAST COAST DAYS and MEMORIES. By the Author of "Recreations of a Country Parson." Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. [In October.]

"TO MEET the DAY" THROUGH the CHRISTIAN YEAR: being a Text of Scripture, with an Original Meditation and a Short Selection in Verse, for Every Day. By the Author of "Recreations of a Country Parson." Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.

NEW BOOK ON GRAHAM OF CLAVERHOUSE.

CLAVERS, the DESPOT'S CHAMPION:

a Scots Biography. By A. SOUTHERN. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

CRICKETING SAWS and STORIES. By

HORACE G. HUTCHINSON. Consisting of scraps of advice to duffers (chiefly on points of cricketing culture) by one of them—of saws not sharp enough to hurt anybody, and of stories picked up between the innings. With rectilinear Illustrations by the Author. 16mo. sewed, 1s.

NEW NOVELS.

CLEOPATRA: being an Account of the Fall and Vengeance of Harmachis, the Royal Egyptian, as set forth by his own hand. By H. RIDER HAGGARD, Author of "King Solomon's Mines," "She," "Allan Quatermain," &c. With 29 Full-page Illustrations by M. Greiffenhagen and R. Caton Woodville, and numerous Initial Letters. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

BY the WESTERN SEA: a Summer Idyl.

By JAMES BAKER, Author of "John Westacott" &c. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s. "There is much to read and to think of in this well-written tale.... The beauties of the Devonshire coasts are painted with a delicate yet vivid touch that brings into relief their special characteristics."—Morning Post.

WILD DARRIE: a Story. By CHRISTIE MURRAY

and HENRY HERMAN. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s. "Will be heartily welcomed by every one who can appreciate good, wholesome fiction.... The heroine is finely drawn. There is nothing mawkish in the sentiment that surrounds her; on the contrary, there is a fine, healthy, manly tone in the book from first to last."—Scotsman.

GOBI or SHAMO: a Story of Three Songs.

("The Great Desert of Gobi or Shamo."—Cornwall's Geography.) By G. G. A. MURRAY, Fellow of New College, Oxford, and Professor of Greek in the University of Glasgow. 1 vol. crown 8vo. [In the press.]

SUCH IS LIFE: a Novel. By MAY KENDALL.

Author of "From a Garret" and "Dreams to Sell"; Joint Author of "That Very Mab." 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s. "The characters are drawn with delicacy and insight, often with touches of quiet humour."—St. James's Gazette. "The cleverness of this story is manifest on every page."—Athenæum. "A book that may be read with genuine pleasure."—Scotsman.

The TANGENA TREE: a True Story from

Madagascar. By AGNES MARION. Fcp. 8vo. sewed, 1s.

No. 5, 8vo. price Sixpence.

THE NEW REVIEW.—OCTOBER.

Edited by ARCHIBALD GROVE.

CONTENTS:

"THE THROSTLE"..... By LORD TENNYSON.
THE GREAT STRIKE..... By CARDINAL MANNING and JOHN BURNS.
THE NEW JOURNALISM..... By T. P. O'CONNOR, M.P.
WEAK POINTS IN OUR INDIAN EMPIRE. By Sir RICHARD TEMPLE, Bart., M.P.
A BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF OPORTO..... By OSWALD CRAWFORD.
WHITECHAPEL..... By the Rev. SAMUEL A. BARNETT.
THE SHAH'S IMPRESSIONS OF EUROPE.. By Professor VAMBERY.
COMMERCE AND WAR..... By FREDERICK GREENWOOD.
IN THE OLD MUNIMENT ROOM OF WOL-
LATON HALL..... By the LADY MIDDLETON and CONSTANCE F. GORDON-CUMMING.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO., Paternoster Row.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW
OF
POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,772, Vol. 68.

October 12, 1889.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

THE FRENCH SECOND BALLOTS.

IT is a constant and, on the whole, a sufficiently just reproach to France that she has lost the political sense of late years—has, indeed, been losing it more and more during the last century. To judge, however, from some, perhaps from most, remarks made on the result of the second ballots last Sunday, the confusion and misjudgment implied in this reproach seem to have spread from France to at least some of her critics. These critics perceive, or affect to perceive, a great triumph for what is called “the Republic” in the recent elections; but it is the most difficult thing in the world to see, even from their own statements, where this triumph lies. It may be at once and of course admitted that the Republic, or rather the actual Republican Government, has not incurred the crushing defeat which was at one time augured for it. The total nominal Republican majority is considerable, though not so large as it was after the last general election. The Exhibition has been in its way a success, and has unquestionably brought a very great deal of money into France—a result to which few nations are indifferent, and to which Frenchmen are least indifferent of any. President CARNOT has made a good mechanical head of the State. If Frenchmen have no particular confidence in their present governors, there is no other pretending group of governors, or single pretender, in whom they have more. Further, it may be admitted, for reasons which are easily explicable, and to which we may return, that the chief nominal foe of the Republic—Monarchism—has received a very heavy blow, the Monarchist party, apart from Boulangists and Bonapartists, numbering barely a sixth, or very little more, of the whole Chamber. Lastly, it is claimed, and with some justice, that though some of the most prominent members of the Republican party have been unseated, the “Moderate” section or sections of that party are much stronger than they were—a strength which should strengthen the whole Republican side.

This is the satisfactory side of matters; now let us look at the others. The wildest pæans are being sung over the defeat, death, and destruction of Boulangism. The Correspondent of the Times is sure, for the *n*th time, that the General is mort et enterré; there is, he thinks, no Boulangist party any longer. The facts are that the Boulangists have doubled their numbers and more in the Chamber (borrowing the increase chiefly from their kind friends the Royalists), that General BOULANGER has carried nearly half Paris as far as seats go, and apparently has mustered more than half the total votes. This is an odd sort of vanquishment, a very curious kind of annihilation. But it is not really so important as the relative position of the various sections of the Republican party. That party, in the mass, is set down at the mystic number 365, and so outnumbers the three parties opposed to it—Royalist, Boulangist, and Bonapartist—by about 140. But it is as far as possible from being a homogeneous party. The general rough estimate is that two-thirds of it belong to moderate shades, and one-third to immoderate, or Radical, shades. Now even on this estimate the Moderates, though the most powerful party in the Chamber, fall far short of a positive majority. The three Anti-Republican parties would require only a small contingent of Irreconcilables, or a small wavering in the Moderates themselves, to exceed these Moderates in numbers. The Radicals and Royalists together very nearly equal them. Further, the likelihood of even all the Moderates acting together is by no means very strong. The minuter analysts of the composition of the Chamber allow for thirty or forty Republican nondescripts—persons whose politics are practically unknown, or at any rate extremely uncertain. Rejoicings have been indulged in over the growth of M. LÉON SAY'S fraction from a mere “group” of half a dozen into a respectable “section” of half a hundred. These rejoicings are well justified in one sense; for anything that raises the tone of the average French deputy is a gain. But he must be strangely ignorant who does not know that moneyed doctrinaire Liberals of this type have long been the most unpopular of all parties in France, and are far more likely to cause splits than to be a bond of union in any party to which they attach themselves. Lastly, the question may be put, “Do those who anticipate quiet times forget that this “newly-elected Chamber will have to face questions of revision, questions of foreign policy, questions of all kinds, “which will infallibly redistribute any seeming majority, “just as greater majorities have been redistributed before?” No new statesman has yet been given by these elections to France, and it is excessively improbable that France thinks any better of her old statesmen than she did a few weeks ago.

One thing, however, cannot be denied, and that is that, whether or no the Republic has received a fresh lease of life by the muster of a positively decreased body of adherents after a general election; whether or no Boulangism has received a fresh (the *n*th) sentence of death by more than doubling its Parliamentary strength, the official representative of the principle of Monarchy in France has experienced a very heavy reverse. Not only has the Count of PARIS a less numerous following in this Chamber than he had in the last, but he has lost honour as well as forces. If it be true that, as the inimitable M. DE BLOWITZ remarks, he has “had to reconcile the worst hankerings,” much allowance must, no doubt, be made for the incumbent of an office the attributes of which would be wholly incomprehensible if it were not dimly certain, at least, that it must be a very disagreeable one. Whether the Count really endeavoured to reconcile hankerings can never be known. But it is too evident that he endeavoured to pursue that course of political attorneyism which has been the curse of the house of ORLEANS. “There is always,” said a severe critic of the greatest novel-heroine of the eighteenth century, “something which CLARISSA prefers to the truth.” There is always, it has been said by critics as unkindly, something which an ORLEANS King prefers to straightforward conduct. The talk about the Count having “plotted” against the Republic is, of course, absurd. He owed the Republic no allegiance, and he was and is entitled to bring it under his sovereignty in any honourable and reasonable way he chose and could arrange. But it is impossible to see that the recent disastrous—in every sense disastrous—compact with Boulangism was in any way honourable or reasonable. It was in the nature neither of an alliance between partners on equal terms, nor of the open hiring of a condottiere to do service for a consideration, nor of the acceptance of a proffer of loyalty. In fact, it is extremely difficult to find a form of words accurately describing the confederacy (though perhaps that single term does it well enough) which has resulted so disastrously for one confederate and in such barren gains for the other. It appears to have partaken of the nature of an agreement to wink at the bubbling of third parties by each partner and of a much less distinct undertaking to “pool” the gains afterwards—something not unlike the immortal transaction of the Honourable ALGERNON DEUCEACE with Messrs. BLEWITT and DAWKINS, with, however, the result that, though Mr. DEUCEACE has won from Mr. BLEWITT, he has not won from their intended pigeon. To those who believe that until France comes to some intelligent acceptance of the monarchical principle there can be no salvation for her, this new illustration of the way in which the general political dry-rot has affected the monarchical as well as other French parties must be sufficiently deplorable. In this sense, if in no other, the Republic may be said to have received the new lease of life so much talked of; in the sense that a fresh demonstration has been given of the incompetence of the monarchical candidate en titre to pursue a game at once intelligent and uncompromising, at once constant to principle and observant of fact. Again and again during the last sixty years have the chances of the Monarchy been thrown away, now by timidity, now by unseasonable obstinacy, now by want of comprehension, now (as in this instance) by the fatal attempt to be too clever by half, to nobble and jockey and knock-out, instead of riding straight and making honest bids. Fortunately the monarchical principle is too well founded in reason and in human experience not to prevail in the long run; but the day of its prevalence in France must almost certainly have received a fresh postponement from this lamentable blunder.

DIODENES HARCOURT.

THE literature of search, if we may so call it, is tolerably copious and varied. JAPHET in search of a father exhibited an audacious confidence in his own faculty of recognition which does not always characterize even the Audax Iapeti genus. THOMAS MOORE and BLANCO WHITE sent two Irish gentlemen on competitive travels in search of a religion. Sir GEORGE STEPHEN went in search of a horse, Mr. STANLEY of LIVINGSTONE, and JEROME PATUROT of a Republic. Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT has recently added himself to the list of anxious inquirers. He has been on the look-out for an honest man, not among his contemporaries, but among the Irishmen who at the close of the last century supported the Parliamentary Union with England. He has been more unfortunate than the Jewish investigators into the census of righteous people who were to save the doomed city. He has not only been unable to find one righteous man in a thousand, but he has not found a righteous man at all. Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT appears to think that in making this statement he is paying a tribute to the Irish character. If it were true, the Island of Saints would be more properly designated the Island of Knaves. On his own showing, the country was betrayed by her own sons. To take a bribe to sell one's native land is surely a graver offence than to offer a bribe for its sale. There may be corruption in both cases, alike in the vendors and in the vendees, but there is moral treason and parricide in addition on the part of the sellers.

Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT's personal qualifications for ethical judgment are exemplary. Who drives fat oxen should himself be fat. The man who is on the look-out for political honesty should himself be politically honest. The principle of setting a thief to catch a thief has its converse application. An upright man is alone qualified to detect an upright man. The mind can see only, as CARLYLE was fond of insisting, that which it brings with it the faculty of seeing. It can recognize without it only that which is within it. It requires dishonesty to detect dishonesty. If Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, as the result of his historic inquiries, had declared that everything was perfectly just and patriotic on both sides in the transactions which led to the Union, we should have had no difficulty in understanding the conclusion to which he had arrived. To the pure all things are pure. A simple and ingenuous nature cannot understand baseness and intrigue. The dishonest are the surest to get on the trail of dishonesty. The opposite phenomenon, as exhibited by Sir W. HARCOURT, is with difficulty explicable.

It is a touching spectacle that of Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, like a nineteenth-century DIODENES, exploring the dark places of history for an honest man, and returning disappointed from his quest. Mr. PICKWICK, in one of his many nocturnal adventures, so managed the dark lantern with which he was equipped that, while it shed a bright and dazzling light upon himself and the spot on which he stood, it left all surrounding objects immersed in the deepest gloom. This, we are inclined to think, has been the fortune of Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT. The lantern with which he explores the past is his own pure and ingenuous spirit, and, in contrast with that, everything else appears dark and stained. Its brilliant light blackens every blot. He applies too high a standard. Ordinary human nature cannot reach the level by which he judges it.

Another circumstance requires to be taken into account. Not only is Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT's standard high, but his knowledge of history, and especially of Irish history, is imperfect. Apparently he knows less of it even than Mr. GLADSTONE himself—that is to say, he knows less than almost nothing at all. His knowledge of it is drawn, as it would appear, from an early book of Mr. LECKY's, written when that eminent historian had scarcely passed the years of boyhood, and when he was in the impassioned and rhetorical stage of his intellectual development. The volume entitled Leaders of Public Opinion in Ireland gives promise of many of the admirable qualities which have characterized the later writings of its author. A generous spirit, a chivalrous disposition to espouse the weaker and the vanquished cause, a pure and lofty ethical temper mark it. These things, no doubt, have recommended it to Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT. But the faculty of weighing historical evidence, the instinct of correct political judgment, which are conspicuous in Mr. LECKY's later writings, were almost necessarily undeveloped in this book of his boyhood, which smacks rather of the debates of the Historic Society of Dublin than of sober and patient inquiry. These very defects recommend it to the generous and impulsive temper of Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, always prompt to sympathize with the weak and oppressed.

If we must speak seriously on this subject, we can only say that the statement of Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT that every honest man in Ireland was opposed to the Union is too silly for serious refutation or for serious discussion. Except that he has made it, we should have thought it too silly for any one to make. It is certainly too silly for any one deliberately to refute. On a grave question of policy such as this, it is inevitable that there should be two sides among honest men. As a matter of fact, the expediency of a Parliamentary Union with England had often been agitated before Mr. PITT and the rebellion brought it within the sphere of practical politics. It had been urged as the only efficient means of liberating the great bulk of the Irish people from the ascendancy of the Anglo-Irish caste. The fact is notorious that it was the ascendancy party—the party which was in possession of office and power in Ireland—which mainly opposed the Union, and that it was the necessity of buying off their hostility which led to the means which have since been described as morally invalidating it. There were honest men who resisted the Union to the last, and who have given to that resistance an aspect of patriotism which, taken as a whole, it by no means deserves. But the methods by which the original opposition was overcome show what was its character. The "blackguardism" of Mr. PITT is the correlative of the "blackguardism" which he combated on the principle similia similibus. The Catholic priesthood and the educated Catholic laity looked to the Union for emancipation. The venal "undertakers" who were the log-rollers of the Irish Parliament opposed it. If Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT had reversed his assertion, it would have been still absurd and wide of the truth; but it would have been a shade less absurd and a degree less wide of the truth than that which it has pleased him to make.

THE ELECTIONS OF THE WEEK.

THE election in North Bucks will not have been decided at the time we write, and its result may not be known till after these words are published, so that nothing can be said about it except to hope that Mr. HUBBARD may get the better of a party which enlists such advocates as the well-known Mr. TUCKWELL. But two elections have already been decided in the present week, and the decision of both constituencies has been adverse to the Government. Although only one of these is a positive loss, we are not at all disposed to attempt to minimize or pooh-pooh these reverses. Of one at least it would be impossible to say anything to match the King CAMBYSES style of the other side. We have no truth, however undoubted, that we can advance to match the solemn assertion of the chief organ of the Separatists (made in "double leads" and as who should advance a novel and immortal truth) that the event at Peterborough "will count on a division as two votes against the Government." It will; and the news that this is the result of winning, as distinguished from keeping a seat, may be news to Gladstonians. Nor can we attempt to imitate the ecstasies of this organ:—

The wild kiss when fresh from war's alarms
Its Hercules, its Clapham Antony,
Its mailed Morton leapt into its arms Contented there to—be informed that his success would count as two votes on a division. We may, however, mildly remark that the jubilation which has been made over Peterborough overlooks two things. In the first place, that city has been ever since the first Reform Bill a Radical stronghold till Mr. FITZWILLIAM, to the great surprise of the knowing, carried it over to Liberal Conservatism the other day. Almost all sorts and conditions of Tories have attacked it in vain in the past, and it was so little nice in its choice as to be contented for many years with the late Mr. WHALLEY. Further, we wrote here four weeks ago that, "if the seat is lost, it will be lost by want of preparation." It is notorious that there was no candidate ready when Mr. FITZWILLIAM met with his accident, that much valuable time was lost in search of one, that the reluctance of the FITZWILLIAM family to fight the place exposed the Unionists to the greatest danger of all, the danger of apparently hawking about the constituency (a thing which a constituency always resents), and that Mr. PURVIS, of whom we desire to speak with all honour, who fought the losing fight gallantly, and may fight a winning one another day, was a mere "carpet-bagger." Mr. MORTON was a carpet-bagger, too; but he had packed his bag long before, had ground-baited the place, and had a valuable start. The lesson is as old as the history of elections for at least the last sixty years, but it is apparently not yet learnt by either party, and unfortunately the Conservative party is even slower than its rivals to learn it. Even as we write, two days after the other accident (more lamentable even than Mr. FITZWILLIAM'S) which has created a vacancy at Brighton, it is announced that the Conservative leaders there have not yet selected a candidate, and are unlikely to come to any conclusion immediately. And yet it is not many years since Brighton Tories had the sharp lesson of losing two apparently safe seats, not indeed by want of preparation, but by sheer mismanagement and over-confidence.

To us the result of the Elgin and Nairn election seems far more discouraging than that of the Peterborough contest, although in this case the event does not "count two on a division," but, on the contrary, leaves matters as they were. Some local reasons might probably be assigned to help out the explanation of Mr. LOGAN'S defeat; but though these ought not to be neglected, they are of the less public importance that they, or something like them, apply in all cases, and probably neither benefit nor injure one side more than the other in the long run. Other considerations are more disquieting. It is the custom of some persons when they are beaten to find comfort in extolling the formidableness of the enemy. We cannot pay any such compliment to Mr. SEYMOUR KEAY. He is, with the possible exception of Mr. CONYBEARE (who, by the way, seems to have come out of prison in a singularly crabbed temper), the nearest approach to the legendary black footman of the legendary boroughmonger that can be imagined. He possesses neither ability, nor distinction, nor public services, nor great wealth, nor local interest, nor family connexion. Except the recommendation of Mr. GLADSTONE, and a collection of heterogeneous and partly self-contradictory fads huddled up at secondhand, he had absolutely no claims on the electors. Nor is this all. An examination of the figures confirms certain prophecies of the CASSANDRA kind which have been made here and elsewhere about Unionist candidatures in many places, and particularly in Scotland. The 1886 contest, when also a Gladstonian candidate beat a Liberal-Unionist, but by a smaller majority and on a much smaller poll, is not particularly instructive; for no Tory stood, and there were evidently large abstentions on both sides. But in 1885 a Tory and two Liberals went to the poll, the latter very fairly representing the moderate and the extreme sections of the Liberal party. Against them the Tory, the late BRODIE of Brodie, polled 1,566 votes; and, as between his two opponents every Liberal of any shade had a chance of voting for a candidate of his own colour, it is improbable that BRODIE polled a single Liberal vote. There were, therefore, four years ago between fifteen and sixteen hundred pure Tories in Morayshire and Nairn. Nor is there any reason of any kind for supposing that there are fewer now. But Mr. LOGAN, the Liberal-Unionist candidate, polled on Tuesday only 2,044, or less than five hundred more than the separate Tory vote of four years ago. We do not see that any conclusion but one of two is possible from these facts. Either the Liberal-Unionists, for some reason or other, refused to support their own candidate—one of themselves, a local man, a popular man, and of unblemished Liberal record—or it was found impossible to bring anything like the full Tory strength to the poll in support of a Liberal, even though that Liberal was agent for the greatest Tory landowner of the district and fully accepted by the party leaders. Abstention on the part of one section or of the other must have been the case; and, if so, it is only a fresh illustration of a difficulty which has occurred over and over again in Scotland, and notably at Ayr. The repugnance of individual voters to support or combine with the men, the colours, the side against which they have often fought, and hope to fight again, is too strong to be vanquished, especially in the modified excitement of a bye-election. The determination of voters—the ignorant, blind, but still honest determination—to "back their side" leads them to support even such a candidate as Mr. KEAY. That Mr. KEAY'S wild promises and wilder theories may have attracted fishermen and crofters, labourers and artisans, to some extent is possible. It seems to be believed by those who are on the spot and should know: and it is a very disagreeable possibility. But it cannot have been this alone that seated him.

This is a very serious matter, and it is one which ought to engage earnest attention, all the more so that the cry of "Home Rule for Scotland" is not unlikely to prove a serious difficulty before long, and will put a fresh lever in the hands of Gladstonian candidates, whether they be political adventurers or honest, if absurd, "cranks," such as we believe Mr. KEAY may be pronounced to be. The progress of time has not lessened the difficulty; it has rather increased it. The mismanagement of Scotch electioneering, which Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL followed all those who know in commenting upon, has, no doubt, something to do with the matter. It must be remembered, indeed, that the more effective the party machinery on the Tory side becomes, the greater will be the jealousy on the Liberal. But this must be faced. The irrational charm with which the name of Mr. GLADSTONE works on Scotchmen has probably weakened the force of the Liberal-Unionist party among them more than elsewhere; certainly nowhere have they recently made so bad a fight. Perhaps some good might be done by providing candidates not local, so that local jealousy and the memory of old contests might be avoided, but of sufficient distinction to reconcile both parties to their support. Unfortunately the supply of such candidates is neither inexhaustible nor even large; and they can hardly be expected to contest risky seats in Scotland when safe ones in England are open to them.

MR. PARNELL AND IRELAND.

CONSIDERATIONS of health may, as Mr. PARNELL says, have "prevented him from crossing to Ireland for the opening of the new Tenants' Organization in Tipperary"; but they certainly could not have compelled him to administer a douche so liberal in amount and so low in temperature as he has just poured upon the undertaking to which he is unable to lend his personal assistance. Anything more chilly and discouraging than the statement of views which Mr. PARNELL has requested Mr. SEXTON to "lay before the Convention" on his behalf it is not easy to imagine. The very proposition from which he starts—namely, that "the working of the movement should, he advises, be limited to defensive action"—is a departure from the original principle of that movement, which was to be one, not for defence, but for reprisals. It was, indeed, as good as admitted, almost by the Parnellites themselves, that there was nothing against which nor anybody against whom the Tipperary tenants required to be defended. They were to be invited to make common cause with tenants in other parts of Ireland for whom such defence was required by themselves assuming the offensive. It is true that Mr. PARNELL goes on to say that "special regard should be paid to certain objects," which he proceeds to enumerate, and that the first of these is described, in English leaving something to be desired, as "the duty of protecting tenants from the landlord conspiracy, and who are prevented by this cause from availing themselves of the benefits intended by Parliament for the tenant's advantage." This, however, as it stands must appear to a faithful follower somewhat disagreeably vague. Protecting what tenants from the landlord conspiracy? he may ask. If Mr. PARNELL only means that the organization is to protect those particular tenants who are menaced by a direct attempt on the part of one of the conspiring landlords—their own—to oppressively and unjustly extract from them the rents they have agreed to pay, then the new and pretentious "Tenants' Organization" is simply the old Plan of Campaign writ large, and its programme is a much smaller affair than its promoters set out with when they proposed to get Tipperary tenants to rise against a Tipperary landlord with whom they had no quarrel, in order to punish him for belonging to a "landlord conspiracy," which was at that moment prosecuting its machinations against defaulting debtors in another county altogether. There is, in fact, nearly as important a difference between the original and the reduced programme as there was between the limited strike which Mr. JOHN BURNS succeeded in organizing and the "general strike" which, until he thought better of it, he contemplated getting up. Add to this that the very redundancies of Mr. PARNELL's grammar appear to suggest a further limitation of his advice. To protect tenants "from the landlord conspiracy, and who are prevented by this cause from availing themselves of the benefits intended by Parliament for the tenants' advantage," seems intended to limit the intervention of the new League to the case of those tenants alone who are unable to take the benefit of the Land Acts either of 1881 or 1887, which would be to restrict the action of that organization within even narrower limits than that of the Plan of Campaign.

Nor in Mr. PARNELL's further exposition of what he conceives to be the object of the new movement is there anything which the agitators of his party can regard as much more to the purpose. He proposes to them as another main end of their undertaking "the assertion of the rights of freedom of speech and public meeting now so wantonly assailed by the horde of unscrupulous partisans who administer much of the executive and judicial function of the country." Talk of this kind does well enough for the English Radical gallery; and of course Mr. PARNELL always has to speak with the consciousness that his utterances must be made pleasing to these far from all-wise gods. But as a leader of Irish agitators addressing his followers he is talking what he and they alike know to be the emptiest bunkum. Freedom of speech and right of public meeting can be asserted, they are both perfectly well aware, by anybody who chooses to refrain from open incitement to breaches of the law; while they are equally conscious of the fact that the action of "the hordes of unscrupulous partisans" has been almost invariably sustained, whenever there has been an opportunity of challenging it, by the highest tribunals in Ireland. There must be mighty little satisfaction to be got out of the exchange of these calumnious platitudes between persons who neither deceive nor are deceived by them; and we may be quite sure that the militant section of the Parnellites would much rather have heard from their leader some practical suggestion for carrying on the war against the Government than have listened to mere hollow abuse of removable magistrates. The same species of criticism applies to Mr. PARNELL's definition of the third object of the movement—which he says is to be the vindication of "the same facilities for combination and organization which are secured to English working-men by the Trades-Union enactments." Now there is no more about confiscating rent or shooting tenants in the legs in the Trades-Union enactments than there is, teste Mr. Midshipman EASY, about a bread-bag in the Articles of War; and of course Mr. PARNELL knows equally well with those whom he is addressing that, if combination and organization among the Irish tenants stopped short of the above-mentioned developments, the facilities therefor would be as unrestricted in Ireland as they are in England. We have said that Mr. PARNELL knows this as well as those whom he addresses—as a matter of fact, he knows it better, since he is clearer-headed than many and cooler-headed than any of them. And he surely must have been bent upon adding a perceptible touch of irony to his letter when he closes it with the remark that "these aims"—that is, the three objects enumerated—"will, if governed and regulated by the rules and constitution already suggested at the meeting of the Irish party, sufficiently meet the crisis which has called the new organization into existence." His followers must feel, we should think, that, if "the crisis" can be really met by any operations of so limited a scope as those above defined, it must be a crisis of too mild a description to justify it in calling any new organization into existence.

It is little to be wondered at that this singularly uninspiring letter of Mr. PARNELL's has been passed over by the whole party, English and Irish, in total silence. One hardly sees, indeed, how they could well comment on it without calling public attention to certain facts which they would much rather should escape notice altogether. There seems every reason, on the face of matters, to believe that Mr. PARNELL's real attitude towards the new organization, of which he speaks in terms of such coldly distant politeness, is much the same as that which he assumed from the first and maintained throughout towards the Plan of Campaign; only that, if anything, to put the matter colloquially, it is "more so." What he thought of the Plan was stated by him with much frankness on one well-remembered occasion in the House of Commons. He did not approve of its principle; and had he been consulted, which he was not, about its adoption, he would have opposed it. These, however, being his opinions on the subject of that notable conspiracy of "public plunder"—to use an expression which Mr. GLADSTONE sometimes dreams that he employed in a former state of existence—we may fairly suppose that he holds similar, but even more decided, views with regard to the new movement. For this second enterprise of Mr. O'BRIEN's conception was determined upon and set on foot in apparently just as complete independence of Mr. PARNELL's ideas and wishes in the matter as was the case with the Plan of Campaign; and, whereas the Plan did here and there work after a fashion which, by a little manipulation of the facts, could be represented as successful, the new movement opened with a ludicrous fiasco. Its complete collapse on Mr. SMITH BARRY's estate was sufficient of itself to ruin the prospects of any agitation; and, as a matter of fact, until the appearance of the letter from Mr. PARNELL the public had almost forgotten the very existence of the new organization, which was to combine all the tenants of Ireland against all the landlords, and which was to command the services of an indefinite number of tenants ready to withhold rents with which they were perfectly satisfied and to get themselves evicted from holdings which they had no desire to quit, whenever that magnanimous act of self-sacrifice should be required of them in the interests of some other tenants, hundreds of miles off perhaps, who happened not to be satisfied with their rents or to have been bullied or cajoled by agitators into courting eviction by withholding them. These heroes do not seem to have been forthcoming in the expected abundance, and, in consequence, the "new organization" has receded of late a good deal into the background. This somewhat frigid benediction of Mr. PARNELL's recalls attention to it; but only to show in the act of doing so, not merely that the Nationalist leader has got tired of the work of agitation himself—for that has been his condition this long time—but that he evidently entertains a considerable doubt, to which he perhaps feels that it would be impolitic to give expression, whether the game of agrarian agitation itself is not played out so far as the English public is concerned, and whether it would not be the best thing for the agitator to sit down and whistle patiently for a Home Rule wind from some other point of the compass.

SCHOOL STRIKES.

NOTHING in the French Revolution was more pleasing, to a liberal eye, than the spectacle of children decapitating birds with a toy guillotine. In 1830, as the Laureate says, "The little boys begin to shoot and stab," and "a kingdom topples over with a shriek." Now, in England, the little boys begin to shout and strike, like their elders; a beautiful proof of what imitation can do, and most hopeful omen of the future. The children are striking for Free Education, No Home Lessons, No Punishment, One Free Meal, and so forth. These are advanced demands; but who can call them unnatural? If the whole artisan class were to strike for Three Free Meals no doubt they would have sympathizers; and perhaps they might as well do this at once, and save bother with pitiful details. In some districts—some backward, benighted districts—the children on strike are whopped by their very parents, who are not in the modern movement. We understand that they have, however, no trouble with "blacklegs"; that few boys insist on going to school on the old oppressive terms, and, therefore, have to be kicked into a more honourable frame of mind. Probably most sympathy will be felt among the ranks of the New Journalism for the boys who strike against Grammar. It is plain that many eminent writers in the more active portion of the press really had private strikes of their own against this intolerable infliction; just as ST. AUGUSTINE and Sir WALTER SCOTT struck against Greek, and wholly declined to learn τύπρω. Master HARRY FAIRCHILD also struck against Latin, refusing to master its earliest rudiments, not that he could not easily do so, but because, as he said, there would be no end to it if once he began. This strike, as being isolated, was readily settled by Mr. FAIRCHILD. He lived in times of government and order; but we presume that the striking children will carry their point. Their methods differ from those of their ancestors. Of old, in Miss EDGEWORTH's time, boys barred the master out. Now they refuse to go in, which is a far better plan. If their parents are on the side of law and order, the strike of the schools will soon be ended. But, when they take the part of their offspring, as is natural in the ὑστάτη δημοκρατία, then, we presume, Grammar must be abolished, and Free Meals must be paid for at once by the non-striking portion of the population.

We welcome the new agitation the more gladly as it seems to bring us a step nearer to childhood suffrage. To give a vote to every infant who has learned to speak plainly (however ungrammatically) is only a rational and normal development of our present system. Any intelligent child is just as fit to make up his mind on many questions of foreign and domestic policy as a great proportion of the actual constituencies. At a very early age a child can throw stones with accuracy and address; even girls are by no means incapable of this argument, whatever the opponents of female suffrage may declare. Reforms are invariably won by stone-throwing; and this boon, perhaps, ought to be conceded before the windows are broken, especially as the movement may coincide with a strike of glaziers. We are in favour of directing and pretending to lead a genuinely popular movement rather than in making concessions after having our eyes and teeth knocked out. That the school strike is the result of the delay in conceding Home Rule is so obvious that we have not thought it necessary to dwell on the point. But it may be agreeable to Mr. GLADSTONE to have this frankly and freely acknowledged before he asserts it himself.

CRETE.

AT last the shriekers about Crete have succeeded in getting what, in their own innocent way, they regard as "evidence" of Turkish barbarities in Crete. That is to say, they have procured an ex parte statement containing a certain number of names of persons and places and a very few dates. On examining this statement it is found that, as usual, violent and highly coloured language is used to drape exceedingly vague and slender facts. The inclusion in the list of "persons escaped to Greece" is typical of its character—unless, indeed, it be admitted that the fact of one side having run away is a proof that the other side committed brutalities. The statement that "the knout works terribly" should be of interest to Russians rather than to Turks. The statement that, "if the Imperial troops cannot find any [bread], they demand it," is not of itself indicative of very terrible or atrocious tyranny. Of the class of outrages out of which, justly enough, most capital can be made absolutely no particulars are given, and the accusation is confined to the statement, worthy of a seventeenth-century Postboy or Newsman, that "the last advices from the district of Apokorona report that soldiers have violated Christian women." The names of unarmed persons given as "killed" amount to exactly three, which, even if it were true (and of this not a shadow of evidence is offered), is surely no very large butcher's bill for the suppression of an armed insurrection, where the innocent are sure to suffer with the guilty. In short, the whole indictment, when examined, resolves itself into the usual tissue of accusations hollow within and unsupported from without, which never would be entertained against any thing or person in this world except a lodging-house cat or a Turkish Commissioner, and would never be entertained at all by any person in this world less gullible or less unscrupulous than a Gladstonian journalist.

Let it be most distinctly understood that we have not the slightest intention of denying that rough treatment may have been in some cases inflicted on the Cretans, or of defending oppression. It is true that there is as yet absolutely no evidence of any outrages; and SHAKIR Pasha's repeated denial is, considering the character and intelligence of the speaker, conclusive, as far as it goes—that is to say, as to any widespread or authorized "atrocities." But it is far too likely that isolated acts of misconduct have occurred, and some respectable, though still vague, testimony seems to show that they have. It would have been very strange indeed if they had not. The unscrupulous eagerness of the Atrocity-mongers to implicate SHAKIR Pasha, and the loathsome hypocrisy which makes the party of Mr. MORLEY and Mr. BRADLAUGH raise the cuckoo cry of persecuted Christianity in regard to Cretan Caravats and Shanavests, no doubt magnify in all cases, and in many cases invent, hardships. But whatever these hardships are (and it is most earnestly to be hoped that the Turkish authorities will take trouble not only to prevent them in future, but to disprove those falsely alleged in the past), it is certain, in the first place, that the Cretans have brought them on themselves, and in the second place, that they are not due to SHAKIR Pasha's orders. A correspondent, writing from the very hotbed of lies—from Athens itself—can find nothing to say against SHAKIR except that he "has apparently determined, if possible, to arrest all those who were in any way compromised in the late rising." A plain man would suppose that this was exactly what SHAKIR Pasha ought to do; but Atrocity-mongers are not exactly plain men. It is SHAKIR's duty to bring to justice those who were guilty of the rising, to punish those most guilty with moderation but firmness, to let the rest off with a warning, and to re-establish the SULTAN's authority throughout the island. In doing this it is inevitable that some hardships to innocent persons, and perhaps some excessive punishment to guilty ones, should occur. It is the insurgents' fault that a large force of partly undisciplined and uncivilized troops, commanded by officers no doubt in some cases ignorant and bigoted, has had to be drafted into the island. SHAKIR Pasha cannot be everywhere, and his orders are doubtless sometimes disobeyed where he is not. But he cannot possibly exercise too much vigilance over his subordinates, or explain too clearly to them that any unnecessary violence will play the insurgents' game. Meanwhile the Powers will gladly support him and his master in defeating foreign machinations and in punishing proved offenders by due form of law; and fair allowance will, of course, be made for the incidents of what is practically a state of siege, provoked by those who are suffering from its effects.

OCEAN OXEN.

ANY person under whose eyes come most of the new books that are published would surmise, with little hesitation, that nobody had ever been cured of stammering except by his own efforts, and that everybody who had ever cured himself of stammering had written a book explaining how he did it. It seems that this surmise would not be borne out by the facts. Mr. A. G. BERNARD, a gentleman with some medical qualifications, has published his experiences of that nature (London: J. & A. CHURCHILL), partly because, "so far as the author knows, there is no reliable manual on the subject." It is terrible to think how many such manuals that are not "reliable"—assuming, without prejudice, that anything could be—must be scattered about in unconsidered corners of the world. Anyhow, Mr. BERNARD "for many years stammered badly himself," and he cured himself by a strict observance of nine rules, which are printed in his book for the benefit of stammering mankind. It is only necessary to add that, in Mr. BERNARD's opinion, when stammering is caused or aggravated by "irregularities in or absence of the teeth," these misfortunes "ought, when possible, to be seen to by the dentist." The advice is cautious, and might be extended to the general reader without any great harm. One cannot say the same of another piece of advice on the same page, which is that the stammerer should fortify his nervous system by the consumption of "one teaspoonful twice daily, after meals," of a cheerful mixture of arsenic and strychnine.

Of course Mr. BERNARD begins by explaining how speech is produced. Then he gets on to his rules, which are nine in number, and provide substantially that the patient is to repeat the "exercises" which follow, "slowly, deliberately, and distinctly, six times," and then learn them by heart, and thereafter go on repeating them to himself, "or some friend, slowly and distinctly, three or four times a day." It is astonishing what obliging friends some people seem to have. For general purposes of conversation the main rule is, "Do not attempt to speak unless you know exactly what you wish to say. Then weigh your words, and utter them in clear and measured tones." Also two dodges are taught. The first is, if it is absolutely impossible to speak the exercises without stammering, to begin by intoning them; and the other is to avoid difficulties where you can by running the preceding word into the difficult one. Thus, if you cannot manage the p in "cumb'rous" "pomp," you go on hissing at the end of "cumb'rous" so as to say "cumb'rous—spomp." Spomp is a pleasant word in itself, besides being easier than pomp; but why "cumb'rous" instead of "cumbrous" does not clearly appear.

The exercises consist half of standard works—or standard dwords—and half of original rhymes. The former are, of course, more or less maimed—for instance, "Gray's Elegy" is relieved of the flower that blushes unseen—but the latter are charming. The patient learns lines like these:—"Dee, devil, diver, dive, Drain, drivel, driver, drive"; and these:—"Inner, idiot, is. Woe, wither, was. Over, ocean, ox. Honey, haven, hiss." These are to be learnt by heart; and "then whenever you have a moment's leisure go over them again, slowly, audibly, and distinctly." Then we get to longer lines, such as "Blowing, blighted, blatant, blot," and "Dirty, daughter, dapple, dose," and eventually cast off the shackles of alliteration, and become vigorously rhythmical, as in "Responsive, harmonious, unwomanly, prance, Detective, disgusting, disorderly, dance." There is a great deal more of it, and it all appears to be open to the objection of being too nearly sense. How can a stammerer concentrate his attention upon articulation when his mind is distracted by speculation as to whether there is any and what difference between a Dee devil and an Ocean ox? The address to the blot, which might be used by any hasty writer, is simply an essay in expletion, so suggestive of still more violent and unseemly expressions that even persons of the softer-spoken sex could hardly refrain from improving upon it, while the prance and dance of the couplet last quoted can hardly fail to set the ill-regulated mind roving in the footsteps of Councillor MACDOUGALL. Altogether Mr. BERNARD's method seems to us too exciting for the patient and too disagreeable for his neighbours, and we cannot unreservedly commend it.

THE STRIKE MANIA.

THE good seed sown by Cardinal MANNING and Lord Mayor WHITEHEAD appears to be germinating with the rapidity of good seed—and also, according to the proverb, of ill weeds. The movement for creating Unions among women prospers, and an apt illustration of what follows upon Unions has been given by the gas-stokers' strike at Bristol. It is satisfactory to know that even the wise promoters of the former movement do not for the present propose, as it was falsely reported, to include domestic servants in it. It may be confidently said that, if there is a single class of wage-earners in the world who are as a class in clover, it is the class of female domestic servants in England. Such a thing as a good servant who is for any length of time out of place is practically unknown. Competing mistresses jump at any one who is even a decent cook of the "plainest" description; and no girl of tolerable physique who has learnt to put a dish on the table without hitting the heads of more than two sitters thereat, or to carry a tray of cups and saucers without shedding it on the kitchen-stairs more than once out of six times, has the slightest difficulty in obtaining a situation where everything she can want except dress is provided, and a money payment not very much smaller than that on which some agricultural labourers have to lodge and maintain their wives and families is added. The sole purpose for which a Union is really required among domestic servants is that of a friendly Society to encourage them to economize—with a view to marriage, old age, or sickness—the wages on which they have so little real call, and on which they are probably more extravagant, and more foolishly extravagant, than any other class. The sole result which a Union would, as a matter of fact, be likely to bring about would be, not the material benefiting of the class in any way, but the removal of that little remnant of decent behaviour to their employers which still differentiates them from their sisters in Australia and America. If the Bishop of BEDFORD had really had any such scheme in view he had better, at the same time that he drew up the rules for his Union, have spent a minute or two on the revision of the Church Catechism.

Meanwhile it is agreeable to turn from theory to practice, and observe the real as distinguished from the paper blessings of strikes. The Bristol gasmen, it seems, in order to obtain an advance of wages, not merely from the not exactly starvation rate of thirty shillings a week, but from the five-and-thirty already offered them, threatened their fellow-citizens with darkness tempered by paraffin. That, according to our modern principles, they had a sacred right to do. But, adopting and bettering Mr. MONRO's views as to intimidation, they have gone further, and taken measures in order to stop the importation of persons to supply their places which even Mr. MONRO would probably regard as fair subjects for, let us say, a report. They picketed all the railway-stations, the gas-works, and the main roads before they themselves left work. They stoned the first batch of blacklegs. They mobbed the railway-station platforms. They barricaded Bristol Bridge with vehicles. They seem, in some cases, to have carried, if they did not use, firearms. The directors, in admiration of men so well "in touch with modern thought," have knuckled down. Had they not done so, it would only have remained for Cardinal MANNING—or, rather, for the so-called Bishop of CLIFTON, together with the Mayor of BRISTOL, and, in a half-hearted kind of way, the Bishop of GLOUCESTER—to bestow blessings, aid, and co-operation upon persons who have so thoroughly demonstrated their understanding of the rights and duties of labour. The inhabitants of Bristol, if their pleasures and business (except in the case of such of them as pursue the employment or vocation of burglary with its kindred crafts) had been hampered by darkness, would have held, of course, that it was the fault of the brutal obstinacy of the directors. And so things will go on, until some day or other one of those relapses of common sense which come (generally assisted by some sharp pinch of experience) to all nations opens the eyes of Englishmen generally to the fact that the aggressive, rampaging striker is a public enemy of the worst kind, and that he must be put down at all costs. If that ever happens, the irony of history warrants the expectation that it will happen when a Radical-Democratic Government is in power.

THE SONGS OF THE COUNTY COUNCIL.

FLETCHER of Saltoun, in one of his early leading articles in the Daily Telegraph, made a remark about songs which it is needless to repeat. The London County Council goes further than the Scotch gentleman whose fame depends on a single saying. It wishes to make both the songs and the laws of a people, or, at least, to interfere with both. What the L.C.C. will not have is vulgarity and "excessive kicking," which, it seems, in music-halls accompanies the song. Who is to be the judge of what kicking is excessive? The "blackleg" who is kicked in the higgling of the market may think that excessive which a County Councillor looks on as merely adequate. Yet that very amount of kicking might, by the same Councillor, be thought redundant on the lyric stage. Then as to vulgarity, who is to draw the line? If the public may spend its pence and halfpence on the New Journalism, why not on the new comic song? At that haunt of a doomed but profligate aristocracy, the "Rosemary Branch," Camberwell, a song called "A Way they have in the Navy" is chanted. "Mr. ELLIOTT said that, in the opinion of hon. members" (of the L.C.C.), "it might be considered somewhat suggestive." What an indefinite offence is this! In the opinion of hon. members Measure for Measure may be "somewhat suggestive." As Mr. ELLIOTT remarked, in the interests of the "Rosemary Branch," it "was very difficult for a proprietor to draw the line." It is very difficult, and we would venture to suggest a method by which the line may be drawn. Do not let the Councillors go about, like HAROUN ALRASCHIDS, to spy on the amusements of the people. Let every song be submitted to them in Council before it is sung in public, and let the singer be on oath to give the lyric as it will be given on the stage. Then a majority of the County Council can "draw the line," and save the proprietor from his legitimate anxiety. This æsthetic censorship will occupy the time of the Council harmlessly and in the interests of taste. We certainly have no wish that the people, or any of the minority of the population, should take joy in dull or dirty songs. Nothing would please us better than if the Council published Mr. BULLEN's Elizabethan song-books with the music, and restricted music-halls to these when they are not suggestive. The privately-printed volume may be suggestive; we do not ask the Council to insist on "A Dialogue between Castodorus and Arabella." The Council might be more eclectic, might give us "The London County Council's Book of Songs," and include DIBDIN, when he does not write of MOLL and MEG. "The Lass of Richmond Hill," as Mr. POLAND said, might be included, and some of BURNS's, in compliment to the name. "Why don't they do it?" as the song says—the song of disputed elegance. Mr. HURLEY, of the "Rose and Crown," is quite prepared to give only such songs as the Council really appreciates and recommends. Perhaps the Council might write its own songs, because then vulgarity would be quite out of the question. Lord ROSEBURY might try his hand with a chorus, "Dalmeny, O Dalmeny!" It might advocate Land Nationalization. Mr. BURNS might adapt his namesake's verses to the demands of Labour. Even if the time of mere statesmen is too much occupied, if they cannot write their own songs, they might superintend a kind of County Council Hymnal, licensed to be sung in music-halls. There seems to be no other perfect way in which the County Council can absolutely eradicate vulgarity. Yet is it not a pretty thing to hear them de vulgarity (it will not scan, but it makes excellent sense) querentes?

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL.

IF Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL were only sensible of his advantages and disadvantages, and, being aware of them, did firmly and consistently regulate his conduct in accordance with the knowledge, he would be a happier man, a more fortunate man, and useful to his country beyond anything that he can boast of yet. Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN is reported to have said of himself, at a critical juncture in his own affairs as well as the affairs of the United Kingdom, that he had as much personal ambition as anybody. So, no doubt, he thought; but in that case he could hardly have cast an observant eye on Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL. There stands one whose personal ambition—which of course may be closely joined to ambitions of a different and a nobler kind—manifestly exceeds that of any other politician of the time. Now personal ambition, if it is to be of much use to its possessor, should be associated with a willingness and a capacity for self-appraisal; and perhaps it is one of the reasons why student-politicians fail so often that they study everything but themselves. Lord RANDOLPH is not the student that Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN is, or Mr. MORLEY, or even as Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE; but he reads, he works, he is capable of grubbing even; and yet he seems never to have turned his attention to the prime inquiry, What is my strength and what are my limitations? If he would only grub a little in that field of inquiry, taking fair account of such advantages as some may call adventitious and the equally real disadvantages that he may consider accidental, a chastened but still abounding ambition might carry him to solid ground at last. It is not too late for that investigation, but neither is it too soon; because those upon whose judgment he depends for success have been at work on the same inquiry for a long time, and he is in some danger that a general capacity for failure may be inferred from what is really misdirected effort and the distraction of unguided energy.

That Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL has many qualifications for success is certain; and certain it is, too, that those qualifications are precisely the most serviceable for personal ambition. Other aspirants for a high place in the world may be more fortunate in the charm that radiates on all alike and is denied by few or none. But political power is no longer the gift of coteries; a change which Lord RANDOLPH himself has done more than any single individual to bring about. The only charm that works to much effect nowadays is that which is exerted in speech from public platforms; and it would be difficult to name any new man of the time who is better equipped with that rare and inestimable faculty than Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL. True, it has never been properly trained in him. The use of it as a kind of musical instrument he has never achieved with the mastery of some other men of a past or passing day, and it is often marred in his hands by a passion miscalculated and the very reverse of artistic. There it is, however; a great endowment. It is not a small matter that a man with so many subtle platform-attractions should be "my lord." It is more that he should be industrious, if the industry is sometimes heedless; more still that he should be gifted with swift perceptions, instant readiness, great courage, a complete audacity. To two of these qualities he owes his sudden uprising from the low horizon to the zenith of political power a few years ago. He saw that the whole body of rank-and-file Conservatives, together with some who hardly come into that description, were on the brink of revolt against the traditional habit of their leaders to treat the party as a kind of private property, to be directed by subordinate agents from a central office in London. Putting their own interpretation on his cry of Tory Democracy, the party "rose at him" when he lifted that cry with all the courage of his character. That made him; and in itself it was as fortunate a stroke for the party as for Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL. Into what followed we need not enter. The great success of his life is merely recalled in illustration of qualities which he may yet make serviceable, to his own renown, if he will follow the advice tendered herewith in all becoming modesty. If he had never needed such counsel he would never have fallen into the prodigious errors that confounded and destroyed what was almost a complete dictatorship for the moment, and which he fancied a dictatorship assured and unassailable. Had he known himself then, he would have known that he really is not equal to the direction of every department of State at the same time. Had he searched his bosom for fixed principles, he would have found none that were likely to shine through all the storms that some other weaknesses were likely to bring about him. Moreover, reason and observation would have stepped in to inform him that the absence of fixed principles is soon detected where there is no Gladstonian glamour (which is unique) to conceal it, and when detected proves surely if slowly fatal. If these discoveries and deductions had been made at the right time, how much of suicidal error would have been avoided when Lord RANDOLPH was Chancellor of the Exchequer and leader of the House of Commons—not to speak of some other mistakes, since committed, which we will set down to the disorders of impatience and irritation!

But, as we have said, "too late" is not yet a word of fatal significance for Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL; or so we may reasonably think after reading the speech which he recently delivered at Perth. True, this is not the first time since his out-fling from the Ministry that he has come forward as a steady, sober politician, willing to conform to the doctrines of the true Church; but only to break out again in raging heresy. Some such explosion there was not many weeks ago. That, however, we may pass. It need not be always thus, and at any rate there can be no doubt of one thing: the Perth speech was a very good one. Even those who look upon Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL with suspicion and dislike must acknowledge that (as a friendly commentator put it) the Perth speech displayed, not only loyalty to the cause of the Union, but a considerate and even generous attitude towards the Unionist Government; though of course (and here the friendly commentator is equally right) he did not conceal his belief that he would himself have carried out the policy that has been pursued somewhat differently, and more successfully. True; but we need not mind that much. The speech was a good one and a bold one. Its courage, indeed, was the most remarkable thing about it. Addressing a Scotch audience, not every public speaker, however confident, would have ventured on exemplifying the blessings of the Irish connexion with England by reminding his hearers of the poverty, the debasement, the sheer barbarism that prevailed in Scotland before that country was brought into union with more civilized regions in the South. The venture was not too much, however, for Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, who scrupled not to scourge the tenderest feeling of human nature—the amour propre of the Scotch—in enforcing a significant political illustration. Exception might be taken to its aptitude, no doubt; for one reason, because the Lowland Scotch are not of different blood from the English, as the Irish are, and because the Scotch race has flourished in Ireland under English rule already, while the Irish have not—or not as much by far. However, it was by no means a bad argument in its way; indeed, the speech all through was argument of a steady, sober kind. It has been said that Lord RANDOLPH made it so because the Scotch people like that mode of address best, being a hard-headed people with a taste for reasoning. Could he not be persuaded to try the same method in England? If it failed to do an English audience as much good as a Scottish one, good to himself it would certainly do. Discipline is the one thing needful for Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL; discipline of pride, discipline of temper; the cultivation and ordering of principle; the adjustment of ambition to the particular gifts and capacities at his command, and the withdrawal of it from ground to which they do not extend; and if he would govern his speech generally by the thought, reading, and reasoning which he bestowed on the Scotch the other day, he would help himself somewhat to the discipline and the reforms that are needed to replace him in his lost position in English statesmanship.

LORD DERBY ON EVENING SCHOOLS.

THERE are occasions when the least impassioned form of appeal is the most effective, and it is probable that the case for recreative evening schools has never been put in a manner more calculated to impress the judgment, as distinct from the emotions, in its favour than the manner adopted by Lord DERBY the other night at Manchester. Of the "three separate, but not unconnected objects, which the promoters of these classes have in view," Lord DERBY insisted most, and very wisely so, on the third—for it is the third which is really responsible for the schools' descriptive prefix—and, as their advocate frankly admitted, it is this prefix which is calculated to give pause to the judicious. If merely to provide amusement, even harmless amusement, had been the object of this movement, "I should," he said, "have wished it well; but I think you would not have seen me on this platform." We have rather too much amusement in these days. "It seems to be thought that nobody can possibly be expected to do what is wearisome, and that to be entertained is one of the first necessities of life." "Personally," added Lord DERBY, "I do not see things in that way." Nor do we. And it is for that reason that any mere attempt to gild the pill of education has to be called upon to give a strict account of itself. Now its account of itself as regards the first two out of the three objects specified by Lord DERBY is not altogether satisfactory. The evening school which is to "help in the extension of technical instruction" may only too probably turn out to afford a doubtful assistance to a project of which the merits are themselves not free from doubt. Again, the evening school which is to "help young men who have a turn for culture, whether scientific, literary, or artistic, to develop their faculties," is an institution which, if it is to contribute to that object at all, ought, in these days at any rate, certainly not to be "recreative." If, or in so far as, the evening school is conducted on the culture-made-easy principle, it will be about one of the worst places to which a boy who has left school with "a turn for culture, whether scientific, literary, or artistic," could betake himself of evenings. The best thing such a boy can do—in fact, the only thing he can do to discover how much the "turn" aforesaid is really worth, and whether his ambition is or is not a mere "Will-o'-the-Wisp" luring him fatally aside from his true vocation in life—is to test himself by the old-fashioned methods of hard private study and patient private trial and practice of his own "scientific, literary, or artistic" powers. To go anywhere for the avoidance of the "wearisome," to seek the combination of "amusement and instruction," is for this class of youth, at any rate, to set foot in a snare.

In fact, the pertinent question "Why recreative?" can only be said to answer itself at all in the case of the third object which the evening school proposes to itself; and in that case the answer is, we think, sufficient. This last of its functions is, as Lord DERBY describes it, "to help boys of the ordinary sort—not exceptionally bright or exceptionally studious, but boys with a good deal of human nature in them—to find some decent, harmless, and pleasant occupation for the hours which are not taken up by work, and which, in the absence of such occupation, will almost certainly be wasted in idleness, and very probably wasted in mischief." Considered from the point of view of this function, it is, of course, evident that the evening school may be as "recreative" as you please; and, indeed, that it must be recreative enough to please the boys, or they will not come to it. How their scholastic recreation is to be made compatible with the maintenance of that amount of serious study which could alone make the school serviceable to the "extension of technical instruction," or to the needs of the young man with the turn for culture, scientific, literary, or artistic, is obviously a problem not easy to be solved; but it is certainly not for us to pronounce it insoluble. Inasmuch, too, as we have no overwhelmingly strong faith in the utility of the evening schools for these two last-mentioned purposes, we are the less concerned to dwell upon that part of the subject. There can be no doubt that "What to do with our boys in the evenings" is, as Lord DERBY says, a grave question in all classes of life, and one which deepens in gravity as you descend the social scale. And we are certainly disposed to hold that an evening school which did no more than compete successfully—even if it sought the, perhaps illicit, aids of draughts and bagatelle—with the gas-lit streets and the refreshment-bars would justify its existence more fully than many a more ambitious institution.

MORE POLICE MAGISTRATES.

IT is not many weeks since the contents-bills of some of the less scrupulous evening newspapers bore the legend, "Loss of a Magistrate," and it was made known to the world that a police-magistrate who had left his home for the purpose of attending at a police-court, in the place of one of his colleagues, had not since been heard of. The public anxiety was on this occasion quickly appeased; for before long the missing gentleman appeared, and explained that he was not to blame for the confusion which had arisen. More recently similar troubles have occurred. A magistrate is requested to take some other magistrate's duty. Not being a bird, and having had his own work to do first, he arrives late. Then, we are told, "only the night charges could be taken. All the summonses had to be adjourned, and many of those having business at the court stated that, in consequence of the delay, they would lose their situations. Solicitors, doctors, and other professional men have also had to go away without being able to transact their business, and insane patients have been kept for hours in a cab in the prisonyard waiting for a magistrate's sanction to effect their removal to an asylum."

All this is much to be deplored, and the cause of the evil and its remedy are alike obvious to any one who has any acquaintance with the circumstances. The moving statement about persons who said they would lose their situations may be a romantic touch, or the persons who said so may have been of unnecessarily despondent temperaments; but the idea of a melancholy row of lunatics in four-wheelers waiting to be locked up ought to melt the hardest and most officially hide-bound hearts. The truth is that there are by no means enough metropolitan magistrates. Since the establishment of the present system there has been an increase in their number of about four; while the population for whose needs their services are required has perhaps doubled, and all manner of new duties have been put upon them, some of them of a complicated and arduous kind. They are, on the whole, a hard-worked body of men, and to expect them to do efficiently both their own work and that of any of their colleagues who may be accidentally prevented from attending their courts is unreasonable. As there is rather more than work enough for them all, no margin is left for accident, and the consequence is that the whole machine is thrown out of gear whenever anything unexpected occurs. Not only is one day's magisterial work enough for one magistrate, but when he has to do two, a large fraction of the available time is spent in going from one court to another, as the distances between them are in almost every case considerable. Experiences such as those recorded above show clearly that the existing staff ought to be increased sufficiently to make it practically certain that a magistrate will always be able to attend wherever and whenever a court is appointed to sit. It is to be hoped that the attention of the Home Office will be given to the matter before the meeting of Parliament.

"THE LUCK OF CONYBEARE."

MR. CONYBEARE is to be congratulated on the unbroken run of luck which he has lately had. His obtaining the advertisement of a conviction and sentence under the Crimes Act was not, of course, altogether a

"fluke." He played for it, in a certain sense; but those who remember the circumstances of his offence and the proceedings against him will recollect that he only just "brought it off." It was, in fact, so near a thing that some malicious people professed to suspect him of having intended to keep on the windward side of the law, and to win the honours of the agitator without having to undergo the discomfort of the martyr. This, however, we believe to be a calumny, and we entirely acquit Mr. CONYBEARE of having got himself imprisoned only by pure accident, and against his own wishes or preference on that behalf. Still, as we have said, there was undoubtedly an element of luck about his conviction and imprisonment, and the same vein of good fortune has attended him ever since. No sooner, for instance, is he out of prison than he gets an opportunity, although Parliament is not sitting, of making a wholly gratuitous and unprovoked display of rowdiness in a public assembly. He has been able to give the London School Board a taste—and the first taste—of his House of Commons quality; he has been as rude to the Chairman as he would always be if he dared, or as he is when he can be with safety, to the Speaker; he was able to pose as the champion of a violated right, challenging abashed official Tyranny to remove him by force; and to actually taste the delight of having the hand of a sort of inferior Serjeant-at-Arms "laid on him" by the School Board messenger. We might be in full Parliamentary Session instead of in the dead unhappy recess. No "Scene in the House," we can fancy Mr. CONYBEARE reflecting with a thrill of proud satisfaction, could give him a finer column in Friday's newspaper:—

Mr. Conybeare then shouted, "You will best preserve the dignity of the Board by acting legally." (Cries of "Order.") "If you want to get rid of me by force —" —cries of "Order" and "Chair" and other remarks drowned the rest of Mr. Conybeare's words, but the purport of them was to the effect that he would not go, that he would insist on speaking as a member.

The Chairman said he did not want to force Mr. Conybeare out of the room. The force he should use would not be such as to bring about a personal conflict.

Mr. Conybeare said he was there by right, and should speak.

The Chairman then asked Mr. Conybeare to retire. This he refused to do, and persisted in speaking.

The Chairman then directed the messenger to lay his hand on Mr. Conybeare with a view to removing him, and this was done. . . . Mr. Conybeare again entered his protest, and made some declaration about taking proceedings against the messenger.

What magnificent "copy"! Especially the scene with the messenger, whom Mr. CONYBEARE, unheard amid the uproar, was probably addressing in these historic words:—"Go, Monsieur, tell him who sent you [the Rev. J. R. DIGGLE] that I am here by the will of the People, and "that nothing but the force of bayonets [or of circumstances] shall send me hence."

Would it have been possible, one wonders, for the School Board by any line of action to have deprived Mr. CONYBEARE of the opportunity for self-display which he has so splendidly utilized? Because there are some people of so oppressive a temper as to desire—quite in the spirit of the Balfourian prison rule—to deprive Mr. CONYBEARE of all such opportunities; which, since they are meat and drink to him, is cruel in the extreme. We are not sure, however, whether, even if these tyrannical considerations could have influenced the minds of the School Board and its Chairman, there would have been any way of giving practical effect to them. The Board clearly could not help taking legal opinion on the question whether Mr. CONYBEARE'S conviction and imprisonment had vacated his seat. Nor, when they received Mr. POLAND'S unhesitating opinion in the affirmative, could they escape the duty of acting on it. At the same time, they afforded Mr. CONYBEARE ample facilities for raising the question in a law-court. All they could do, in short, to deprive him of any reasonable, any decent excuse for "making a scene" at the Board they did. But deprive him of the power of making such a scene they could not. They did their utmost in putting him in a position in which any man with the slightest pretension to good sense, good feeling, or good manners would have behaved himself quietly. And to say that is to explain all that followed.

EDESSA TO ALEPPO.

A SHORT five-hours' march from the khan at the edge of the Mesopotamian desert brings the traveller to the gates of Edessa with the first beams of the morning sun. Leaving the caravan outside the walls, he rides through the narrow alleys of the town in search of a khan where we may rest for the day.

The Zaptiehs, rich in the possession of a few pieces of silver, go off to revel in the unbounded delights of the bazar. The narrow, tortuous lanes that wind between the grim walls of the houses are roughly paved with large, uneven flags, and down the centre of each alley runs an open drain. The horses flounder on the slippery stones and splash through the black, liquid abomination that oozes through the open channels. There is the usual inquisitive crowd in the bazar, lounging, smoking, and drinking coffee, and the strangers are bidden to go hither and thither, but find the khans full of native traffickers and travellers, with all their beasts and belongings about them. Returning hot and weary, they find the muleteer has picketed the animals in the ruinous courtyard of a khan outside the gates, where they are glad to share with the mules and horses the shelter, at least, of four walls and comparative privacy.

So this is Edessa—Edessa of the Romans, Callirrhœ of the Greeks, Urfa of the Turks—which only seems to live in the records of its stormy history and hides the forgotten splendour of its name under the squalid obscurity of a fifth-rate Turkish provincial town. Syrian and Persian, Roman and Greek, Crusader and Saracen have ruled it in turn; they have vanished from the scene and the Osmanli remains in possession, the political spendthrift of a ruined inheritance. The crumbling ruins of the noble old castle that overhangs the town will continue to crumble, the encroaching desert will continue to advance and beleague the useless walls, poverty like an armed man will continue to despoil a poverty-stricken race. And to the end of the chapter the Turk will continue to utter his futile "Inshallah" as long as it is the will of Heaven that these long-suffering lands shall bear the punishment doubtless of their sins; for in all human seeming no help or remedy is destined to come from any wit or wisdom or greed or philanthropy of civilized man. When will that much-talked-of Euphrates Valley Railway be laid?

The landlord or lessee of this Asiatic hostelry, with its somewhat mixed accommodation for man and beast, is (or was) an Armenian. As a rule, one would rather not in Turkey have transactions of a pecuniary nature with individuals of this oppressed and downtrodden "subject race." If his master, the Osmanli, insists on governing him after the fashion of the laws of the land, without fear and without favour, he is apt with an Englishman to remember it in the bill. It is somehow the duty of the Englishman to take the Turk by the throat and make him drop the Armenian, while all the other Armenians look on and applaud at a safe distance from the scrimmage. Meanwhile, our fellow-Christian, the Armenian, if a little lacking in loyalty to the laws that protect him, or in a manly resolution to fight his own battles, has wits—where gain may be got. The odds in Turkey are one Greek to two Jews, one Armenian to two Greeks, which makes one Armenian=four Jews. In a remote part of Asiatic Turkey dwelt once a noble old Arab of ancient lineage and reputed wealth. One need not detail here how it all came about; but this gentlemanlike old Hajji, together with a venerable Jewish Rabbi, came to fill the principal characters in a little drama or tragedy in which the poor old Hajji was made to bear the buffets of an undeserved and outrageous fortune which bowed his upright, manly form with sorrow and disgrace. The Rabbi, hardly more fortunate, came damaged (not in sanctity, but in that more worldly reputation which is the breath of the nostrils to all his tribe) out of the closing act where Shakespeare's Moor and Jew of Venice seem to have become inextricably mixed up in the course of a revival which brought them on the scene in remote Asia. The Iago of the piece (a certain Hagob, aptly named!) was an Armenian; the scene, unshifted from the rising of the curtain to its fall, a deserted stable at night; and Iago's weapon was the throw of the dice, on which were staked the money and the reputation of an insatuated Arab and a wily Jew, and Iago won. Which is a parable, whereby we may perceive that, on their own ground, Iago is still more than a match for the Moor and the Jew; and that in Turkey, if he complains of kicks, he knows how to make sure of the halfpence.

The Armenians, on the borders of their own land, form a considerable part of the population of Urfa, where, under the same laws as the Turk, they manage to "live and thrive," following, unhindered, the petty trades they most delight in, and not seldom, by dint of speculation and thrift, accumulating the wealth which they may enjoy unmolested—so long, indeed, as they do not too openly plot against the Government under whose protection they have acquired it. The Armenian church, the day being Sunday, had the merest sprinkling of worshippers, who squatted or lounged on the carpeted floor, and listened or not, as the case might be, to the crowd of black-robed priests and surpliced men and boys inside the "sanctuary" chanting in a vociferous and irregular manner. The large and handsome "Protestant" place of worship was better filled by an apparently devout congregation. An Armenian layman, in European frock-coat, was preaching fluently and lengthily in his own tongue, to the apparent edification of his attentive audience. How this Presbyterian place of worship comes to be known in Urfa as the "English Church" is quite unexplained; unless the American missionaries, to whose labours it owes its existence, are able to reconcile the anomaly. Threading the steep and narrow alleys that lead to one or other of the gaps in the ruinous wall north of the town, we emerge on the rough and precipitous hill-side, dotted with innumerable white graves. Where the tall black cypresses cast their lengthening shadows little groups of natives, chiefly Armenians, sit and smoke in placid enjoyment of the evening air, not, perhaps, particularly struck with the scene which the English stranger finds so charming, the sight of the picturesque town spread out below. A jumble of ruined walls, of flat-roofed houses, of graceful minarets, of white or painted domes; the ruined walls of the old citadel glowing a rich crimson brown in the rays of the setting sun; dark groves of cypresses overtopping the walls of many a secluded and shady garden, where Moslem women and children may stroll secure from every prying eye; the low range of barren hills stretching away to the left, and away beyond the green and patchy circle of cultivation the open desert to the south receding in a pearly haze, deepening into rosy pink, with the crimson glory spreading from the west. Let us return to our Armenian host before the short twilight closes. A stranger in foreign garb might meet with adventures (if in quest of them) in those obscure and winding alleys after dark.

Skirting the walls of the town, along the edge of the deep and precipitous moat, over the rocky bottom of which rushes the little rivulet that issues from the famed fountains of Edessa, with their sacred fish, which gave to the town its Greek name of Callirrhœ, or "the Beautiful Waters," the road to the west ascends over stony and desolate heights, until, after seven hours' weary and difficult riding, a halt is called where two rock-hewn reservoirs on the sloping side of a rocky hill furnish a welcome supply of cool and discoloured water. The cool shadow of the rocky walls of a reservoir offers a grateful refuge from the burning mid-day heat, and a two hours' leisurely ride in the evening brings us to the Kurdish village of Char Malik, where neither for love nor money will the churlish villagers give food or fodder to man or beast. In the early morning hours, with the inhospitable race of boors a good seven hours behind, the travellers behold from the summit of a rocky gorge the old Euphrates shining through the haze far below. The naked limestone ridges, descending in sharp precipitous declivities to the river-bed, shine white and glistening, as though overlaid with a mantle of newly-fallen snow. Two hours' patient and weary toiling downwards through deep and dusty valleys winding among broken ridges and fantastic cones, and Biradjik, the picturesque old town at the ford of the Euphrates, is reached at last. The steep chalk cliffs rise almost sheer from the river, terrace upon terrace. The walls of the ancient town clamber over the rocks, on the crown of which, seen from below, their crenellated outline, broken by frequent towers, stands out bold and sharp against the sky. These are the "muris sinuosis et cornutis" of Ammianus. In the sides of the cliffs and away up on the precipitous ledges the soft, white stone is pierced with numerous and spacious caves, some of them the abodes of man, others used as stables for horses and cattle, and others vast and empty—quarries, probably, from time immemorial, whence the stone has been excavated for castle and houses that crowd every available spot within the walls. The khan, where strangers and pilgrims may find a fairly comfortable shelter, is built against the entrance of one of these vast and gloomy caverns, which is large enough to house a little army, with beasts and baggage to boot. Biradjik, a bustling little place, where caravans assemble to cross the ford, is the BIRTHA or VIRTHA of the Roman itineraries, also the old Apamea of the Euphrates, and by ancient historians has been misnamed Zeugma "at the pass of the Euphrates." It was the seat of a bishopric under the Christian patriarchate of Edessa. Baldwin, Count of Flanders, held it with his crusaders to keep communication between his principality of Edessa and Antioch, but Saladin speedily recovered it for Islam about 1180. Towering at the height of a hundred feet above the town rises the square keep of the castle from its broad platform, reached from below by a subterranean passage.

One must wait for daylight to cross the river, for the ferry-boats will not ply before sunrise. Under a gloomy archway beneath a favourite coffee-house, hard by the embattled walls that skirt the water's edge, the two huge boats lay moored in the rushing stream. Camels and asses, horses and cattle, men, women, and children, crowd or clamber into the unwieldy "Saffinas," the brawny boatmen bend to the long and ponderous poles, and, with much shouting and strenuous labour, the deeply-laden boat is swung round to the current, the boatmen strain every nerve at the labouring oar, the boat shoots obliquely across the rapid current, and it is half an hour before the further shore is gained a mile below the starting-place on the other side. Now one may turn for a last look at the beautiful old town cresting the craggy heights above the broad expanse of the river. Above the tiers of domes and flat-roofed dwellings and climbing walls, dark arches and embattled towers, the rocky gorges in the background are clad with groves and gardens, the dark-green vegetation standing clear and cool against the white and burning cliffs. The noble river in front adds the charm of its mirroring expanse to a scene which, for picturesque details, is hardly matched in the memory of long years of travel in many lands.

The solitude of the rolling plains, broken by rare and distant caravans, is enlivened to-day by the long and straggling procession of the retinue of a Turkish Pasha going to take possession of the governorship of Edessa. Scribes and secretaries, slaves and domestics pass in straggling groups, and those closely-curtained and closely-guarded mule palanquins hide the charms, no doubt, of the fair inmates of his Excellency's harem. The Pasha himself, surrounded by a well-appointed and well-mounted escort of Turkish troops, courteously returns the Englishman's salutation, and then sends a good-looking officer of cavalry to make inquiries and the offer of his services—if he can have the honour to be of any assistance to the English stranger travelling under the protection of his master the Sultan? The mid-day halt is by a Kurdish village again, where the traveller and his men are hospitably allowed to draw water from the village well; but that is all in the way of supplies that can be had from the villagers, and we are perforce content. The night, again, alas! must be passed at a village of Kurds further on, and the same reception awaits the strangers. Woe betide the wayfarer who must depend for his supplies on boors such as these, whom money cannot tempt to be hospitable! The writer has travelled through the wildest regions of Kurdistan, and has had to live on bread made of a mixture of millet and chopped straw. It was the food of the natives, and what they had to spare money could purchase. But what had come to brutalize the boorish nature of these Kurdish peasants, living amidst a surrounding Christian population, that neither for gold nor favour would they spare a crust to a Christian stranger, if but to save him from starvation? May be the Armenians among whom they dwell could solve the problem. One long day's journey on the morrow—a repetition of the toil and monotony of the preceding day. A halt, after dark, on the reedy banks of the Kuweik, the Chalus of Xenophon, where fleas and all manner of creeping abominations will make the unlucky traveller whose lot it is to camp in the open on such a spot yearn with a fervent longing for the steaming and cleansing Hammam that awaits him on the morrow. For on the morrow comes Aleppo and civilization. Six hours more in the saddle and the fragrant orchards of Aleppo begin to cast their welcome shade over the path. Then on through the city of the dead that encircles every Oriental city—Christian graves on the right, Mussulman tombs on the left, the hostile faiths divided in death as in life—then through the well-built and handsome Christian suburb of Al Jadeidah, and the travellers ride under the archway of the Bab-ul-Faraj into the clean and well-paved streets of the city of the living, into the welcome bustle and life of the crowded bazaars. "In crowded mart and busy street" where men mingle and human life is throbbing and surging, they may forget for a while the long and lonely hours in the fearsome and bandit-haunted desert. The lonely solitude of the long march is over. First, to seek a khan where we may unload and house the uncomplaining beasts that have been our companions for many a long day and night; and then the nearest Hammam, where the attendant demon may scrub and belabour and shampoo our weary limbs to his heart's content, and wash off with a foaming ocean of soap the stains of travel.

KEW.

II.

NEARLY ten years ago Mr. Thiselton Dyer read an essay upon "The Botanical Enterprise of the Empire" before the Royal Colonial Institute, which necessarily resolved itself into a broad and luminous survey of the operations directed from Kew. At the outset he laid down a principle:—"We make it a special point to grow every plant which is known to have any useful application, and these we yearly distribute, as they are wanted, to the different Indian and colonial gardens with which we are in correspondence." This would be a grand programme even if it comprised the whole work undertaken by the department. From time to time the authorities publish a list of new plants, which at this present date seem to average five hundred to six hundred per quarter, including those renamed for scientific purposes. From time to time, again, they publish a list of the seeds matured in the Royal Gardens, which are exchanged, on application, with all regular correspondents. Taking the first of such detailed statements as comes to hand, we remark that it occupies forty-two pages of the Bulletin, with eighty to a hundred names upon the page—say, four thousand species. This magazine of seeds is collected, nominally, for the benefit of institutions which may be able, at some time, to return the favour on a small scale; but in practice it is open to all who show that their application is made with a serious purpose. The same rule holds good with plants. No one is sent empty away from Kew if he have due license to beg, and many curious requests are made sometimes. The object constantly held in view is to multiply and enlarge the means of livelihood—in this country and its colonies first, then over all the world. Kew is not a pleasure garden for those who direct it, but an institution of practical philanthropy. They, indeed, seem to be permeated with a sense of their responsibility. In his striking review of "Some Botanical Statistics of the British Possessions," Mr. Baker insists upon this point beyond all others. The population of the globe is increasing daily. In these islands, at least, it has far outrun the means of support. How, he asks, are the millions of the future to be supplied with food and clothing? The authorities of Kew believe that the problem falls specially within their department. They welcome every vegetable product which is reported to have qualities that will serve the great purpose, whether directly as an article of food or indirectly as a medicine, a convenience, or a substance useful in manufactures. They are glad to receive any specimens of the kind, to report upon them, or to obtain the report of trustworthy experts. And we may add that their readiness to oblige in this way is very well known to those who can take advantage of it—too well known, as they think sometimes. When colonists and travellers write from the other side of the world putting questions which could be perfectly well answered at the local Botanic Gardens, it is somewhat trying to the temper of hard-worked officials. But all genuine inquiries receive attention. Debate has been gravely held, opinions even have been formed and reported, "On Her Majesty's Service," upon such matters as a South African cane which some gentleman in those distant parts thought adapted for fishing-rods; upon the value of West African palm-kernels as material for coat buttons; upon a pithy stem which the government of a West Indian island believed suitable for razor strops.

It is the distracting variety of interests and functions which makes it difficult to keep such a steady eye on the operations of Kew as enables one to deal with them in a short article. The authorized list of those operations will show how vast is the field, perpetually interrupted by curious incidents, large or small, which draw one's attention away. In the first place, officially, stand the botanic interests—to study new plants, and class them. Next, where plants are wanted for cultivation, which cannot readily be obtained in the market, or which the service of the public demands, the Royal Gardens will supply them, if possible. Where diseases, vegetable or animal or insect pests, threaten the local plantations, Kew will look into the matter, and consult with experts at home. This is a very important function. The white fly, which has done such mischief to the coffee-trees of the West Indies, and the still more deadly Hemileia of the East; the Borer which attacks the sugar-cane in Demerara, and the Rust which cripples it in Queensland; the Fluted Scale, the Cushion Scale, the coco-nut beetle, the Phylloxera, and many more have received close attention, and the best methods of dealing with them have been communicated to those whom it concerns. Kew is ready also to report and to obtain advice upon new industries which those upon the spot suggest. Furthermore, it keeps an eye on all institutions of the same class throughout the Empire. Dr. Lindley's ideal has not taken shape in the form he understood, nor is it to be desired, seeing how overworked are the officials already, that "all minor establishments of the same nature should be under the control of the chief of Kew." At this present day the notion seems grotesque. But the object which Dr. Lindley proposed to gain by his centralized system is achieved. Such minor establishments do "act in concert" with the great model at home, "and through it with one another." They "report constantly their proceedings, explain their wants, receive their supplies, and aid the mother-country in everything that is useful." Not only they, indeed, but foreign institutions do all this, occasionally. Further still, governors of the smaller colonies which have not yet a Botanic Garden of their own keep up a brisk and interesting correspondence. They describe with spirit perhaps the melancholy purloins of their official residence, where a young alligator has been habitually wallowing; they detail the personnel of their gardening staff, two ancient soldiers pensioned off twenty years ago upon the ground of old age and debility; they tell with pleasing garrulity how the seeds flourish—too often how they die by inches. And, besides all this, there is the scientific work, in which every member of the staff has his part; the thoughtful study, the laborious research, the endless, though delightful, task of building bit by bit, from day to day, that structure of recorded learning which will be the monument of Kew.

Amidst this orderly confusion of detail it seems best to follow certain paths which may be described as beaten. If we trace an operation here or there from the beginning to the point it has yet attained, that will give a reader some distinct impression of the system. The story of the cinchona plantations is a good instance. Some forty years ago both the English and the Dutch authorities in the East took alarm at the growing price of quinine. They made inquiries in Peru, and the information received by no means lightened their anxiety. The forests of cinchona were disappearing at such a rate that in no long time, unless a remedy were found, quinine must cease to be a staple export. In 1852 the Governor-General proposed to make plantations in India, but the Dutch first carried out this excellent scheme. They imported a great number of seeds and seedlings in 1855, and successfully "established" them, at a heavy cost, in Java. But the march thus stolen proved disastrous. We may be allowed to think that it was because they had no Kew to advise them that the Dutch chose C. Pahudiana, a species hardly worth growing; those plantations have been long since uprooted. For some years the English Government confined itself to importing seeds and plants, which died on the passage to India. This was evidently futile, and Sir William Hooker urged a systematic course of procedure. Mr. Clements Markham had lately been exploring Peru in the interests of archaeology, and in 1859 he went back with a commission from the Government to collect seeds and young trees. The narrative of his adventures, troubles, and triumphs is published. He received the best aid and advice from Kew, but the active participation of the establishment began when Mr. Markham returned with his precious stores. They were received at the Gardens, nursed, and transmitted to India in such admirable condition that the loss was trifling. It is hardly needful to recite the public advantages which have followed. In the plantations of Bengal, laid out and managed by officers recommended by Sir William Hooker, there were about five million trees, at the date of the latest Report, which, including the expense of the manufactory attached, have cost about 100,000*l.* This sum returns five per cent. interest from the sale of quinine, besides the saving effected in the hospitals and the medical service, which represents at least ten per cent. in addition. Having thus provided for India, Kew began forthwith to distribute cinchona-trees all over the world where there was a chance of successful cultivation. Government had no share in its introduction to Ceylon—where the plantations are only inferior to those of Bengal—to Jamaica, where the sales of bark exceed 5,000*l.* a year, to St. Helena, Trinidad, Mauritius, Cape of Good Hope, Queensland, and settlements beyond counting on a small scale. The actual output of the manufacture in "febrifuge" up to 1880 was 87,704 lbs., which, taking quinine at an average value of 8*s.* 4½*d.* per oz., would represent 587,616*l.*—so much saved to the Empire, besides the profit of sales.

Another instance is that of Liberian coffee. Some twenty years ago the coffee plantations of the East Indies were threatened with ruin by a fungoid pest, Hemileia vastatrix; while those of the West Indies were suffering as severely from the white fly, Cemiosoma coffeellum. The authorities at Kew heard of a new species, native of the Upper and Lower Guinea, which there was reason to think would withstand the attacks of both. Accordingly, they urged their correspondents to forward seed, and in 1872 the novelty was established in the Royal Gardens. Liberian coffee, as it is called, has advantages beyond that of resisting the fungus and the fly. Inhabiting the low hills of West Africa, it will thrive in situations hot and moist where the Arabian variety is unable even to live. Plants have been distributed from Kew over a great portion of the earth's surface. They are now cultivated on a larger or smaller scale at Dominica, Martinique, Guadeloupe, Jamaica, St. Kitt's, and Trinidad; on the Nilghirris; in Queensland, Mauritius, the Seychelles, the Bahamas, Bangalore, Bermuda, Calcutta, Ceylon, Java, Madras, Montserrat, Natal, New Granada, Rio de Janeiro—but this list is long enough. Nowhere, however, has it become the general crop, though fulfilling every promise, and of late the indefatigable inquirers at Kew have looked into this mystery. Explanations will be found in the Bulletin of November last; since the subject has interest for so many, we may observe in brief that the treatment proper for the Arabian berry, after gathering, is not suited to the Liberian, radically different in its pulp. The last illustration we choose is ipecacuanha, which belongs to a different class. Cinchona itself is hardly a greater blessing to mankind, and the importance of securing a native supply has been constantly urged upon the Government of India. But few plants refuse so absolutely to exist under conditions which are not just what they like. In 1866 Sir Joseph Hooker forwarded a specimen to the Botanical Gardens at Calcutta, which died promptly. Three more were sent next year, to a like doom; but some thirty-three cuttings had been taken. The India Office now bestirred itself, and two fine plants were despatched from Kew at its instance in 1869. Six months later they were dead. Then the struggle began in earnest. Dr. Anderson, of the Botanical Gardens, Calcutta, sought ipecacuanha in every direction, whilst the staff at Kew busied itself in propagating and establishing all that could be found. When these reached India the stock there had dwindled to twelve. But new methods of propagation had been discovered by leaf and rhizome, the new arrivals were healthy, and in 1875 Dr. King triumphantly reported that he had more than 100,000 nice young plants. A year later roots were dried, the drug extracted, and positively administered, with the happiest results. Surely all must be well now, thought the anxious Government. By no means. In 1886 the strain received from Kew direct alone survived, less than five per cent.; worse still, the bushes grow so slowly that all hope of successful cultivation has been abandoned long ago. This result, however, was not thought very surprising at the Royal Gardens. Plants had been sent out to Singapore in 1875 with much more lively confidence, and there perseverance found its reward. Ipecacuanha is established in the Old World at last, and the authorities of Kew may be trusted to diffuse the cultivation.

"MUSIC HATH CHARMS —."

IN view of recent perturbations of the public mind, a humble contribution to the efforts that have been made to solve the problem of causing schoolboys to be happy and good can hardly be out of place. Of the harsh methods of coercion and compulsory games enough has been said, for and against; it is a more artful and conciliatory method of stimulating the youthful mind and keeping the idle boy out of mischief that shall here be recommended. Be it known, therefore, that there is a series of books, apparently of American devising, called the International Education Series, and that a certain volume in this series is entitled The Education of Man (New York: Appleton), and that the author of it was Friedrich Froebel, now with the saints. The sixth chapter of that work contains a section marked D, and the name of that section is "Memorizing of Short Poetical Representations of Nature and Life, Particularly for Purposes of Song." In that section a device is recommended which appears likely to solve the difficulty of compulsion by removing the necessity for it. Its general adoption could hardly fail to produce a race of schoolboys, all of whose leisure would be so cheerfully and profitably spent that no question of any kind could possibly arise about it.

The following are the main principles underlying the treatment. "Soon after the first dawn of the consciousness of self" there is "aroused in man the longing to understand life and language of the external world, particularly of nature." Man may then observe that "The seasons come and go as regularly as the times of day; Spring, with its tide of new growth and wealth of blossoms, fills man (even in boyhood) with gladness and new life; . . . [we are told nothing about the effects of Summer]. Autumn, with its falling brilliant and fragrant leaves, fills man (even as boy) with a sense of longing and hope. And rigid but clear and steady winter awakens courage and vigour." "All these things are presentiments of later life," and it is, therefore, of much importance that they, as well as "the relation between man and man," should be impressed on the youthful mind, "though rather more indirectly and by reflection than directly in argument and precept. The direct precept fetters, hinders, represses," while "The indirect suggestion—e.g. in the mirror of a song without moralizing applications—gives to the soul and will of the boy inner freedom." And this is how it is done.

Suppose a class of boys assembled for instruction:—

In proper order they await the beginning of the instruction, of the lesson, as they call it. The teacher had been called away in the afternoon; it is evening. He enters, and greets them repeatedly in song:

This song-greeting comes unexpectedly so near their inner life that it fills them with pleasure, joy, and merriment.

They accordingly answer variously, some in plain speech, while a few say, in a more singing tone, "Good evening."

These the teacher now addresses particularly, saying, "Sing the 'Good evening' to me." Softly one sings,

A second one, full of merriment,

A third,

The teacher

then continues recitatively, as it were:

"Is this true?" he asks. "Well, then, let us sing it all together."

Again he continues:

"Is this, also, true? Well, then, let us sing this together." Then one who feels and can express the truth of these words most fully, sings it alone.

Then "the instruction proceeds in antiphonic song," until at last, a lively boy, having sung the same thing again and again, asks: "May we not soon have a song about the sunshine?" This question expresses the boy's inner wish that the sun might shine again after the long-continued rain and fog and blustering wind. The teacher, responding to this feeling, sings to the boy:

Full of joy, all the boys repeat it together.

THE ARTS AND CRAFTS EXHIBITION.

THE second exhibition of the Arts and Crafts Society was opened in the New Gallery in Regent Street on Monday. The number of objects shown is large, and many of them are so minute as to be easily overlooked. Yet there is no mistaking the general aspect. Amateur work is everywhere present, and not always good amateur work. Of course, as has been often pointed out, it is to the amateur that we must look for originality and "new departures." Here, especially in bookbinding and in furniture, we have too much attempt to outstep the limits of the conventional, and to mistake mere eccentricity for originality. Coupled with failures of this kind we have, of course, many others which result from trying to do too much in a stubborn material or with deficient appliances. The dominant idea of the promoters of the exhibition has been to depreciate what may be called "shop-work," and to appreciate individuality. As a tendency this may not be altogether unwholesome; but there are many arts in which the repetition and similarity here discouraged are absolutely necessary; and it is satisfactory to observe among the preliminary essays in the Catalogue a short treatise by Mr. Lethaby on "Cast Iron." He lays down some excellent rules for its use, and shows very successfully that it is very capable of artistic treatment, while he praises such work as the well-known iron fire-backs, still to be met with in the southern counties of England, and the iron railings, like those of St. Paul's, which were cast in Sussex. To many people it will be new to hear that the little lions on the outer rail at the British Museum "are by the late Alfred Stevens, and are thoroughly iron beasts, so slightly modelled that they would be only blocked out for bronze." Mr. Lethaby is certainly right in saying that they "are proof of how sufficient feeling for design will dignify any material for any object." He does not equally admire the railings behind the lions, which are designed on a false principle, "the result being only a high order of commonplace grandeur." There is much else in this very interesting essay which, beside its neighbours in the Catalogue, sets Mr. Lethaby in the light of an advocatus diaboli. He has a word to say even "for poor cast-iron." Among the other essays there is one by Mr. Reginald Blomfield on book illustration, which will interest many readers. Mr. Blomfield inquires as to reasons for the failure and success of certain forms of page decoration and arrangement, contending that "the relative importance attached to the printed type or the drawing is the crucial point for the illustrator." We may well question if it ever comes up in the minds of modern publishers of illustrated books, though we doubt not a good deal of Miss Greenaway's success results from its observance. The artist, says Mr. Blomfield, "must regard the printed type, not as a necessary evil, but as a valuable material for the decoration of the page." An excellent example of the way not to do it is afforded by the exhibition in one of the galleries of the Golden Wedding address presented to Mr. Gladstone by some Separatists. Here, though everything is done by hand, and the illuminator was under no restrictions, the result is to contravene every one of Mr. Blomfield's canons of taste. There are better illuminated manuscripts here than this, especially some very faithful imitations of mediæval work by Mr. Reuter. But the best observers of Mr. Blomfield's rules are the designers of the books exhibited in the Upper Gallery by Messrs. Whittingham & Co., of the Chiswick Press. One volume, in particular, Epistles and Gospels, printed in red and black on hand-made paper, is as nearly perfect as possible. Here, we cannot but think, "shop" shows its immense superiority to amateur work. In another department of book decoration this is still more apparent, though the professional bookbinders seem to have exhibited very sparingly. The books exhibited in the North Gallery are of two distinct types. The De Coverly family show work which is most pleasing when most conventional, but it does not come up to the level of the modern school of bookbinders in neatness and finish. Design is not everything, a truism abundantly illustrated by the uncomfortable bindings which Mr. Sanderson exhibits. His covers are evidently not intended to protect, but only to ornament, a book; they are much too tight, so that some of the volumes will not close properly, and the backs, instead of being flat—which in itself is a disagreeable innovation—are concave. But the point to which we take most exception is the extreme economy of leather, the covers hardly reaching the edges of the leaves. One thing, however, must be said of Mr. Sanderson's bindings; the gold tooling is simply superb. In beauty of design and manipulative skill we have never seen anything like it. But, as we remarked above, design is not everything, and even the contemplation of this delicate tooling will not reconcile any one who loves a pretty book to the shortcomings we have pointed out. There is some pretty work by Messrs. G. F. Stoakley & Son; but whether they are professional bookbinders or amateurs we do not know. A volume in flexible blue morocco in their case is, perhaps, the most successful example in the room, the tooling being very little inferior to that of Mr. Sanderson; while in all other respects the binding is vastly superior. Miss Harris, Miss Shepherd, and other ladies exhibit embossed leather book-covers, some of which show great skill; but the designs in all are wanting in originality.

Poverty of design is more apparent in the cases containing modern point-lace than in any others. Some of the work is extremely fine and delicate, especially that which comes from convents in the South of Ireland; but the designers seem to have forgotten that lace is not panelling or architectural ornament. Some much less delicate work, in appliqué on fine net, is, from the superiority of the design, much more satisfactory, and would in actual wear produce a far better effect. This is particularly true of some lace exhibited by Miss Emily Anderson, of the Cork School of Art. The Poor Clares of Kenmare exhibit the finest point; but, owing to defects of taste, it is almost impossible, except for a very practised eye, to distinguish some of their work from good Nottingham. The stiffness of the pattern and the hard edge go far to spoil some examples of marvellously skilful handling.

The embroidery shown is of every degree of goodness and badness conceivable, and there is an enormous amount of it, chiefly in a style which may be briefly described. It is Mr. Burne-Jones tempered by Mr. Crane. The colouring is seldom quite harmonious, and, as a rule, the drawing of figure subjects is execrable. One piece only need be specially described as a very conspicuous exception to the general rule. Miss Anstruther Thomson has sent a large "wall decoration in appliqué stuffs," in high relief. It represents "A file of Moors led by a fanatic," every figure, of a score at least, being full of individual character, the drawing excellent and forcible, and the effect produced by a few bundles of dingy rags being marvellous. Yet it seems a pity that so much good drawing and composition should be wasted on what in London will prove a mere trap for soot.

Some of Mr. Morris's carpet and tapestry weaving is very good. He takes great pains with his dyed wools, and with the subdued harmonies which may be produced by using the most brilliant colours. A piece of Arras tapestry, with a design by Mr. Burne-Jones, is perhaps the most pleasing of the forty-six examples shown by Mr. Morris in the West Gallery. A special feature of the exhibition is a darkened room for stained glass; but it does not contain a single example worth mention, and the same must be said of the designs for windows in the North Gallery and elsewhere. Three exceptions are drawings by Mr. Holiday for the American market, and by Mr. Burne-Jones for a two-light window to be executed by Messrs. Morris & Co. Among miscellaneous objects we may mention Mr. Benson's brass and copper work, of which there are numerous examples; the jars and bowls of the Aller Vale Pottery Company, and those designed by Sir Edmund Elton and Messrs. Doulton. A great deal of heraldry might be expected, yet there is little, and that little scarcely worth notice. We may except a plaque in repoussé copper, designed by Mr. Inigo Thomas, and a mirror in a mahogany frame designed by Mr. Prioleau Warren, with prettily painted shields of arms in an Italian style. There are three pieces of very beautiful inlaid ivory and rosewood designed by Mr. Stephen Webb, and cut by Messrs. Smith, Fowler, and Thurtell. In a very different style is a marble chimney-piece by Messrs. Farmer and Brindley, designed by Mr. Lethaby, and very simple and original in treatment. In the South Gallery are two or three good examples of wrought iron, among which we should select for honourable mention one in which ivy is used very well by Messrs. White & Sons, and a grille for a window by Mr. H. Ross. Some caskets in leather, oak, metal-work, and embroidery are in the same room. In the Upper Gallery is a good design for a school copy-book, one of Mr. Vere Foster's series, by Mr. T. Erat Harrison, and some book-plates, by Mr. Houseman, of very unequal merit. In the entrance hall is a case containing some good table-glass by Messrs. Powell, and, beside a great deal of little beauty or value, a clock, decorated by Mr. Spencer Stanhope, which is one of the few things in the Exhibition calculated to make a weak-minded man of taste break the tenth commandment.

The aspect of the whole exhibition is not exhilarating. Art-working within narrow grooves, following blindly certain self-constituted leaders, incomplete too often, and unfinished, wanting on the one hand what may be called "execution," and on the other delicacy, such is the verdict we must pass on most of what we see here. We may take an altar-table in the North Gallery as typical of the whole Exhibition. It is neither Gothic nor Classical. The painting and gilding are inharmonious and tawdry. The carving and cabinet-maker's work are coarse. Yet there are many worse things in the exhibition, the lowest depths being reached, perhaps, by plaster decorations on a flat ground, of which there are many poor specimens. A better effect might be attained if the Committee saw their way to limiting the number of exhibits from one hand. We reckon up two-score mentions of one name in the Catalogue—the name of an artist not one of whose works calls for any special separate mention.

BRAZILIAN FINANCE.

AS the demand for gold for Brazil is disturbing the money markets of Europe and America, exceptional interest is felt just now in the finances of that Empire; and some account of them, therefore, as well as of the causes of the metallic demand, may not be unwelcome to our readers. Brazil has never recovered from the unfortunate Paraguayan war, and the effects of that struggle have been aggravated by a succession of bad harvests, a defective fiscal system, and errors of the Government, especially the lavish guarantees given by it to railways, coffee and sugar factories, and other industrial concerns. In consequence, the Budget ends every year in a large deficit, and borrowing has been almost incessant. According to an ex-Finance Minister quoted by Mr. Gough in a Report lately presented to Parliament, the average deficit for the past four years has amounted to nearly three millions sterling, or over 20 per cent. of the revenue, and the same authority estimates that the probable deficit this year will exceed 3 millions sterling. Under these circumstances rigorous retrenchment would seem to be called for. But the present Cabinet has adopted, on the contrary, a policy directed to the encouragement of immigration and the development of the resources of the Empire. The only direction in which it practises economy is in the conversion of the debt. According to Mr. Gough, the external debt at the end of last year slightly exceeded 28½ millions sterling, and the internal debt was slightly under 43½ millions sterling. The two together somewhat exceeded 72 millions sterling. Unfunded debt brings up the total of the liabilities to about 90 millions sterling, and, in addition, there are the large guarantees which may at any moment, to some extent at all events, become actual liabilities. It is quite proper, of course, to reduce the charge on the debt; but the whole saving that can be effected in this way will probably not amount to a quarter of a million sterling—a very insufficient relief, considering how large the annual deficit is. In their decision that retrenchment would be unwise, Ministers are probably largely influenced by the example of the Argentine Republic. That example, however, ought to be a warning rather than an encouragement in the course upon which Brazil is now entering. And it will appear evident from what is about to follow that, unless the greatest prudence is observed, Brazil will involve herself before long in very serious difficulties. Emancipation having been carried last year without any indemnity being granted to the slave-owners, it has been found necessary by the Government to afford relief in another form. Accordingly it has entered into contracts with the principal banks by which it binds itself to make advances to the banks. They in their turn agree to lend to the planters at specified rates of interest. No doubt the assistance is necessary, but it is another reason why the Government should be careful not to embark rashly in extravagant expenditure, and it offers a warning to British investors that the economic condition of Brazil is not now so quite assured that the Government is justified in the new course upon which it has entered. In order to give the required help to the planters the Government found itself compelled in August last to issue a loan in Rio de Janeiro amounting to about 11¼ millions sterling. Nominally it is an internal loan, but as the interest is payable in gold or in currency at the nominal par value in London, the principal Continental cities, and New York, as well as in Brazil itself, it is evident that the intention of the Government is to place the bonds abroad as soon as an opportunity offers. We believe that this has not yet been done, but it is understood that a very large proportion of the bonds have been pledged with bankers in London, and it is principally by this means that Brazil is now able to take so much gold from Europe that it has excited alarm in the money markets of the world.

Another measure resolved upon, and now being carried into execution, is the resumption of specie payments. It is universally admitted that an inconvertible paper currency is a disadvantage to a country, and that it is worth while to make some sacrifices to get rid of it. It must also be conceded that the present time is favourable to an attempt to resume specie payments. The Brazilian milreis, which is of the nominal value of 27*d.*, was at one time in 1885 worth no more than 17¼*d.* Now it is worth more than 28*d.* It is actually, that is to say, above its par value. From two-thirds to three-quarters of the exports of Brazil consist of coffee, and for some time before 1885 the coffee crops of Brazil were very bad, and the price was very low. The coffee crop of last year, however, was exceptionally good, and the price obtained has been high. Consequently the balance of trade is now so much in favour of Brazil that the milreis is above its par value. But, while all this is true, it may well be doubted whether Brazil is able to permanently maintain a gold standard, and, if able, whether the plan of resumption adopted is a wise one. The present currency consists mainly of Treasury notes, amounting to nearly nineteen millions sterling, and a small amount of bank-notes. The Government has decided to call in and cancel its own notes, and to substitute for them notes of joint-stock banks guaranteed either by the deposit of Government bonds with the Government, or by a paid-up gold capital. The law is modelled to a very large extent upon the National Bank Law of the United States, though in one or two important particulars it departs from its exemplar. The banks which deposit bonds as a guarantee for their circulation can issue notes only to the amount of their capital, and their aggregate issue must not exceed 200 millions of milreis, or 22½ millions sterling. But the banks with a capital paid in gold may issue notes to the amount of three times their capital; their aggregate issues, however, must not exceed 600 millions of milreis. The law does not seem to have commended itself to the Brazilians, for the number of native banks founded under it is not large, and even of those founded some are not issuing banks, but either land mortgage banks or ordinary loan and discount banks. A syndicate of great institutions in Paris, headed by the Banque de Paris et des Pays Bas and the Imperial Ottoman Bank, have entered into a contract with the Brazilian Government, in accordance with which they have founded a National Bank of Brazil, with a capital of ten millions sterling, and the right to issue thirty millions sterling in notes. Ten per cent. of the capital was to have been paid on the signature of the statutes, which has already been done; a further 10 per cent. within a month after the constitution of the bank, and the remainder at intervals of at least sixty days, and in instalments not exceeding 20 per cent. It is, however, expected that not more than half the capital, or five millions sterling, will be required to be paid up for some time to come. It will be seen that the establishment of this bank increases very largely the power of Brazil to take gold from Europe. Already the Empire had obtained the command of the London market by pledging bonds of the Internal Loan issued last August. Now the creation of this National Bank in Paris has increased its power by about 2½ millions sterling. It is stated in a circular issued by the Banque de Paris et des Pays Bas to the members of the Syndicate that half the shares of the bank were placed in Brazil; consequently only half, or five millions sterling, would remain to be subscribed in Europe. But, as it is understood that only half the capital will be called up for the present, it follows that the European subscriptions will for some time to come not exceed 2½ millions sterling. That, however, is a very large amount when added to the sums already standing to the credit of Brazil in the books of London bankers, and explains how it is that the Brazilian demand has alarmed all the European money markets.

Practically, the National Bank will take up the notes of the Brazilian Government, and substitute for them its own notes, and the Government, in compensation, will hand over to the bank an equivalent amount of bonds bearing $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. interest. But the Government notes amount to between 18 and 19 millions. Consequently the transaction will increase the interest-bearing debt of Brazil by 18 or 19 millions sterling. The Conversion loan brought out here last week adds to the capital of the debt about $2\frac{1}{2}$ millions sterling, and in August last there was an internal 4 per cent. loan issued amounting to about $11\frac{1}{4}$ millions sterling. Therefore already within the present year the debt of Brazil has been increased by about 32 millions sterling. We saw above that at the end of last year the total debt of the Empire was about 90 millions sterling. Consequently, at the present moment the debt of Brazil, either actually incurred or to be incurred in consequence of arrangements already entered into, amounts to about 122 millions sterling—a heavy debt certainly for a population of about thirteen millions of souls, a large proportion of whom are negroes and Indians. But this is not all. Until quite lately the provinces and municipalities of the Empire had not borrowed in Europe; but within the last few years they have begun to do so, and their reception by the European money markets has been so favourable that they are likely to go on borrowing rapidly in the future. Further, some banks founded in Brazil under the new law are to issue Cédulas like those issued by the National Mortgage Bank of the Argentine Republic and the Hypothecary Bank of the province of Buenos Ayres. The Cédulas are bonds advanced by the banks to the owners of houses and lands who mortgage to the banks those lands and houses. And, apparently, it is the intention of these Brazilian land mortgage banks to follow the example of the Argentine banks just mentioned and make a market for their Cédulas in Europe. We would strongly recommend British investors before buying these Cédulas to inquire carefully into the constitution of the banks issuing them, and the precautions taken to ensure that the mortgaged property is not merely of sufficient value, but that, if through any accident the borrowers should be unable to pay the interest and sinking fund stipulated, it would be possible to realize by selling the properties. This is, however, by the way. The main point to bear in mind is that the Brazilian Government is at present, through its desire to develop the resources of the Empire, adding with alarming rapidity to its debt, and that it is doing so at a time when the industrial organization of the country has just been revolutionized by the emancipation that has set free nearly a million of slaves in a very short time; that, further, the provinces and municipalities are likewise piling up debt in Europe, and that, lastly, dangerous facilities are being afforded to the owners of houses and lands to incur debt. If great prudence is exercised all may turn out well; but if not the consequences are likely to be very grave.

CASTE.

THE chief result accomplished by the revival of Caste is the evidence it affords that the adequate representation of the late Mr. T. W. Robertson's comedies required much more art than was generally supposed. At the Criterion Theatre, where this piece is now being acted, the company possesses the advantage of having before it all the traditional stage business of the play as it grew from the time when the author superintended the original production, all that experience has shown to be effective being retained and all that did not tell discarded. Certain well-trying scenes are therefore sure to impress; and yet there is a frequent lack of spirit. The story, in many respects a really admirable one, does not retain throughout the keen sympathies of the house as it used to do, though, when the interpreters are at their best, notably in the last act, the power of the author is felt as it was formerly; from which it can only be deduced that the fault is with the players, and not with the play. That the story has its weak points must, at the same time, be admitted. The behaviour of the Marquise in particular is distinguished by a vulgarity, an absence of taste and good feeling, which render her disagreeable as well as tedious; and the social contrasts are so very extreme that there is little aspect of probability in the plot. It is too obvious that in some of the incidents nothing is aimed at beyond stage effect; but, nevertheless, Caste has very sterling qualities, as is conclusively proved by the fact that, in spite of its familiarity, it moves to laughter and also to tears, as the spectator may perceive if he glances down the rows of stalls—and it is not unlikely that his own eyes may be dim as he does so. We now see that there was a delicacy about the original interpretation which is made very conspicuous by the spectacle of players with coarser methods attempting to follow in the paths of their predecessors. Take one example. D'Alroy loves Esther Eccles, and asks Hawtree to accompany him to her home. Hawtree understands that his friend is hard hit, but derides the idea of marriage with a girl of Esther's position. "Can't it be arranged?" Hawtree inquires, and the actor at the Criterion simply puts the question. The line now goes for nothing, but the "Can't it be—arranged?" was full of significance when Mr. Bancroft hesitatingly, with a look at the ground, and a slight pause as if to find the least offensive word, suggestively asked the question. These are trifles; but any one who remembers the representation at the Prince of Wales', and compares it with what is now to be seen at the Criterion, will understand how important such trifles are.

Some good work is, however, done in the course of the performance, which introduces Mr. David James and Mr. Charles Brookfield in the parts of Eccles and Gerridge—in both cases repetitions. Mr. James, if not as genuinely comic as Mr. George Honey used to be, is probably as good an Eccles as could be found. What weakness there is in his acting comes from an effort to be funny which is occasionally not to be hidden, whereas Mr. Honey's comicality seemed to come without being sought. The Criterion Eccles is a little too much given to grimace; but he is amusing, and it is perhaps only by the possibly odious but inevitable comparison with the original, who made a memorable mark in the character, that any shortcoming can be detected. Mr. Brookfield makes his Gerridge rather morose and stolid, endeavouring, and with success, to show something different from the sharp, energetic little plumber of Mr. John Hare, and from the loutish artisan of Mr. Arthur Cecil. Mr. Brookfield cleverly reproduces an easily recognizable type. The hearty way in which Gerridge keeps on munching his great wedge of bread when George D'Alroy has returned, and is talking to his wife and friend, strikes us as a capital idea. Sam is very glad—delighted—but then it is tea-time, and he cannot satisfy his robust appetite with sentiment. A little later in the scene an episode ends in a way which has always seemed to us unpleasing. Hawtree, with great good feeling, expresses a fear that he has occasionally made himself offensive to Sam, and conventional politeness not being in the honest workman's way, he replies, not "Don't mention it!" or "Not at all!" but, "Well, sir, you 'ave!" At the same time Sam is not really deficient in good feeling, and regrets his own intentional rudeness to the "long swell." There, with mutual apologies, we think, the scene should end; for it jars somewhat to find Gerridge immediately offering the circular he has drawn up to "the nobility, gentry, and inhabitants of the Borough Road," and soliciting patronage. It would, at any rate, be better at the Criterion if the Hawtree did not hurry the incident, so that Gerridge might seem to act on an afterthought when the first effect of the reconciliation has passed. But the Hawtree is ill done, his gesture of wiping his hand after the interchange of courtesy with Sam being one of those mistakes which do so much towards destroying sentiment.

An actor or actress can scarcely have a more trying task than that of assuming a character with which some more famous player is universally associated. Miss Lottie Venne has talent and vivacity; but Mrs. Bancroft made the part of Polly Eccles her own; still, since the comedy is well worth revival, and the best of all possible Pollys is not available, some one must do duty. Miss Venne's fault is over-emphasis; she is too farcical, and has a disposition to caricature Polly, whose picture the author has drawn with sufficient breadth. She is best, in fact she is very good, in the last act—the Jeanne la Folle incident. Miss Olga Brandon acquits herself very well as Esther. She displays earnestness and sincerity—most valuable attributes. Force she has yet to acquire; her dismissal of the Marquise from the room of the little house in Stangate lacked dignity; a quieter, more repressed tone would have heightened the incident. Mr. Leonard Boyne, handicapped by an Irish accent, passes muster as D'Alroy. Mrs. Charles Poole does not grapple successfully with the difficulties of the Marquise, and there is a want of distinction about Mr. Elwood's Hawtree. The revival, however, gives pleasure.

SOME TWO-YEAR-OLD RACING.

FOR more than twenty years the Middle Park Plate has been the chief factor in the final settlement of the claims of the two-year-olds of the season. This year, for the first time, its office in this respect, as well as its general interest, has been to some extent threatened by the institution of a more valuable race which was run a few days earlier. The Middle Park Plate has varied in value from 4,840*l.* to 2,105*l.* for the winner, with 200*l.* for the second and 100*l.* for the third in the race; but in the new Great Breeders' Produce Stakes, at Kempton Park, the owner of the winner received 6,000*l.*, and his nominator 300*l.*; the owner of the second 1,500*l.*, and his nominator 150*l.*; the owner of the third 1,000*l.*, and his nominator 100*l.*; and the owner of the fourth 500*l.* It was possible, therefore, that seven different people might each get a share of the stakes, which amounted to 9,550*l.* No one can fairly complain at competition in race meetings more than in other things; at the same time it is to be regretted that two such important two-year-old races as the Great Breeders' Produce Stakes and the Middle Park Plate should take place within six days of each other. On this occasion it so happened that the second of them suffered comparatively little in interest through its predecessor; but, if the same arrangement is to go on in future, it is almost certain that the two great races will more or less clash with each other. Everything promised well for the Great Breeders' Produce Stakes until the middle of last week, when it was announced that Semolina would not run, in consequence of the death of a relative of her owner. She had been unplaced to Riviera on the only occasion on which she had suffered defeat; but then she had run more than a stone below her best form, so if the pair had now met again she would unquestionably have found backers; her withdrawal, therefore, took away much of the interest of the Great Breeders' Produce Stakes. Mr. H. Milner's Riviera had a splendid record. She had won eleven races, including walks-over; and a good deal more than 11,000*l.* in stakes. Her first defeat had been in her first race, and in such cases excuses may fairly be made for failures; her second had been amply atoned for when she beat her conqueror (Heaume) a week later, so she well deserved her position as first favourite for the Produce Stakes. Considering that Signorina, who was not entered for the Produce Stakes, was unbeaten, there was something to be said for the chance of Mr. D. Baird's Martagon, who had run her to a head for the Whitsuntide Plate at about the same terms as those on which he was now to meet Riviera. His owner had given 2,800 guineas for him as a yearling; his breeding—by Bend Or out of Tiger Lily, which is almost the same combination of blood as that of Ormonde—was unexceptionable, and his appearance was much admired, in spite of the protests made by certain critics to the effect that he had not grown so much as he ought to have done during the summer. For the Chesterfield Stakes, the Duke of Hamilton's Loup had run Heaume to three-quarters of a length and beaten Riviera by a neck; but, as Riviera had afterwards beaten Heaume, Loup was not now expected to beat Riviera; nevertheless, he had his supporters and a good deal of money was invested on him. Riviera was a strong favourite at the post at evens; 5 to 2 was laid against Martagon, and 8 to 1 against Loup, while liberal odds, varying from 33 to 100 to 1, were laid, or perhaps we ought rather to say offered, against each of the remainder of the field.

The afternoon was very misty, and rain began to fall as the twenty-one starters arrived at the post, where they could not be seen from the Stand. There was a long and tedious delay before the flag fell. The most excited and troublesome of the party are said to have been Woodnymph and Riviera, and as the ground was very heavy, it is probable that the favourite took a great deal out of herself in the course of her vagaries. When, after about half an hour had been expended in breaks-away and false-starts, the field was at last despatched, Mr. W. De la Rue's Dearest jumped off in front, with Dame Margaret close to her. In consequence of the foginess of the atmosphere, accounts of the race must be accepted with reserve until the point at which the horses came into sight, about a quarter of a mile from the finish. Dearest was then leading, and Riviera was next to her. It was soon evident that the race lay between the two leading fillies, and there was already a long straggling tail of beaten horses. Riviera appeared to be running under difficulties; but, instead of stopping, she struggled on very gamely, and kept gaining slightly upon Dearest almost to the last. Dearest, however, maintained the lead, which she had obtained at the start, to the finish, and she won by half a length from Riviera—a victory which does not put her on a par with that filly, as she was receiving 7 lbs. from her. Golden Gate was third, a length and a half off, and Dame Margaret was fourth.

Dearest is a bay filly by Hampton out of Lady Tramp by Albert Victor, and her granddam was by Birdcatcher, out of a Melbourne mare. Criticisms on her appearance were, upon the whole, favourable, and her good shoulders, depth of girth, and lengthy quarters were much admired; the objections made were want of bone, lightness of loin, inequality in the forefeet, and a want of precision in her manner of standing on her forelegs. She cost 1,700 guineas at Doncaster last year, a price at which she has proved an admirable investment. In her first race, the Champion Breeders' Foal Stakes at Derby, she started at 25 to 1, and ran her stable-companion, Heresy, to three-quarters of a length at 8 lbs. She now started at 50 to 1, from which it may be inferred that her chance was not much fancied by those who must have known most about her; indeed, Ostrogoth, who belonged to the same owner, was backed at a much shorter price. At worst, a beating by only half a length when giving 7 lbs. represents Riviera as the best horse in the race, and great as must have been the disappointment caused by her defeat, and large as were the sums lost in bets by her numerous backers, the money she gained by running second brought up her winnings in stakes to within a few pounds of 12,000*l.* It is probable, however, that Dearest got an exceptionally good start, and that Riviera was somewhat exhausted by her fractiousness at the post; nor should it be forgotten that wet days are proverbial for the success of outsiders. On these grounds it seems possible that Riviera scarcely ran up to her true form on this occasion. Nevertheless, there is another side to the question. Not only before the Produce Stakes at Kempton, but also before her previous race, the Rous Memorial Stakes at Newmarket, Riviera had been exceedingly irritable, and her admirers may do well by making sure that she is not developing an evil temper before they "plunge" on her in the future. It is needless to say that the professional bookmakers are immense gainers by the victory of Dearest.

The race which preceded the Great Breeders' Produce Stakes at Kempton was worth 1,000*l.*; but the inferiority of the form hitherto shown by the twelve starters, in comparison with that of the field in the latter race, may be understood when we say that the first favourite for the Champion Nursery Handicap was Ben, who had been beaten a length and a half at Manchester by Ponza, to whom Loup, the third favourite for the Produce Stakes, had given 7 lbs., besides weight for sex, and a beating by two lengths, at Newcastle. He now ran very badly, and the race was won by Mr. Maple's Lightfoot, a bay filly which he had purchased at the sale of Lord Rosslyn's yearlings for 520 guineas. Curiously enough, the second in the race, Sir J. Duke's Swallowfield, who was only beaten by half a length, had been bought at the same sale for 130 guineas.

For the Middle Park Plate, Semolina and Signorina were to race together for the first time, and the meeting between these two flying fillies was anticipated with interest; by far the greater number of the racing prophets, however, plumped unreservedly for the unbeaten Signorina. If the absence of Riviera's name from the entries was to be regretted, the starting of Le Nord almost made up for it, as he had run Riviera to a head for the Champagne Stakes at Doncaster, so that his position in the race would enable racing prophets to "take a line," as they call it, between Riviera and any other horse that might run. Martagon's form for the Produce Stakes at Kempton had seemed too bad to be true, and he was now to have an opportunity of showing whether this was the case, as well as whether he had been unlucky when beaten by a head by Signorina at Manchester. The enormous Alloway, also, had once run Signorina pretty closely, and he again was to throw down the gauntlet a second time to that filly.

Odds of 6 to 4 were laid upon Signorina, 7 to 2 was laid against Le Nord, who found many backers at that price, and 7 to 1 was laid pretty freely against Semolina, in spite of her eleven victories (including walks-over) to one defeat, and her winnings of more than 8,000*l.* in stakes. Alloway was considered to have a 14 to 1 chance; a few lovers of a forlorn hope backed Martagon at 25 to 1 regardless of his form at Kempton; and 50 to 1 was offered in vain against Golden Gate, Wildfire, Panthino, and Villejust. The favourite was a little fractious at the post, but the flag soon went down, and the party of nine got off on very even terms. Panthino made the running as far as the Bushes, where he gave place to Signorina. Just at this point Semolina, who was in the front rank, began to tire, and admitting that with her diminutive size she could hardly be expected to make a fight with the best of the larger two-year-olds, now that they have had time to mature, it was inconsistent with her previous form to be outpaced a quarter of a mile from home. Signorina sailed in front down the hill into the Abingdon Bottom, with Golden Gate and Le Nord racing hard against each other behind her; and she came on, up the opposite slope, in an easy, swinging gallop, winning, without being in the slightest degree pressed by her jockey (G. Barrett), by three lengths. There was a sharp contest between Le Nord, ridden by F. Barrett, and Golden Gate, ridden by Mornington Cannon, the former gaining second place by a head only. Semolina was fourth, at a clear interval, and then came Martagon and Alloway.

Golden Gate's close race with Le Nord says much for the truth of the running for the Produce Stakes at Kempton. The net result of the Champagne Stakes at Doncaster, the Produce Stakes at Kempton, and the Middle Park Plate appears to be that, even if she had been hard pressed for the latter race, Signorina would be at least some pounds better than Riviera; and that, as she won with the greatest ease, she must be, at present, that filly's superior by many pounds, and unquestionably the best two-year-old that has run in public this season. Riviera, Le Nord, Dearest, and Golden Gate would seem, if we judge from the above running alone, to be very near each other, in the order given; for it must not be forgotten that Golden Gate was giving Dearest 5 lbs. more than weight for sex at Kempton, and something must be allowed for Dearest's advantage at the start. Mr. D. Baird's Golden Gate, who cost 950 guineas as a yearling, will be remembered as having been the winner of the Richmond Stakes at Goodwood. Of the five two-year-olds, including Signorina, only Riviera, Le Nord, and Golden Gate are entered for the Derby; but Surefoot and Heaume will probably add to the interest of that race. Chevalier E. Ginistrelli's Signorina has now won something more than 11,000*l.* in stakes, without meeting with a single defeat. She is a brown filly by St. Simon out of Star of Portici by Heir-at-Law out of Verbena by De Ruyter. After her victory in the Middle Park Plate the critics were almost unanimous in declaring her to be the finest filly that had appeared on the Turf for many years, and without a fault in her conformation.

MONEY MATTERS.

THE exaggerated scare in the money market last week has been followed this week by unfounded confidence. At the beginning of last week brokers borrowed from the Bank of England over 3 millions at 6 per cent., and in some cases as much as 6½ per cent. was paid on the security of Treasury bills, while the rate of discount in the open market was about 4½ per cent. On Thursday of this week the rate of interest in the open market had fallen to 3½ per cent., and the rate of discount to the same figure. The cause of this extraordinary change in the feeling of the market was the efforts made by the two greatest financial houses to obtain gold abroad. It was brought from New York, Paris, Amsterdam, and Brazil last week, and this week it is announced that a million sterling will be received from the Imperial Bank of Russia within a few days. Altogether, about 2 millions sterling will thus be brought. If the joint-stock and private banks had co-operated with the Bank of England, and the discount-houses and bill-brokers had acted with judgment, this would probably have sufficed. But unfortunately the fall in the rates of interest and discount have enabled gold to be withdrawn almost as rapidly as it has been received. During the week ended Wednesday night 836,000*l.* was sent into the Bank of England, but 610,000*l.* was withdrawn, so that the net gain was only 226,000*l.* Of this amount on the following day 143,000*l.* was lost. The chief demand is for Brazil, the causes of which are explained elsewhere. And, since the fall in rates here, the Brazilian demand seems to be increasing, for there is a handsome profit on the shipment of gold from London to Rio de Janeiro, since the paper currency stands at a considerable premium. The Argentine Republic is, however, preparing to withdraw large amounts. It has arranged with certain great houses in London and Paris for an advance of 8 millions sterling; and it is understood that it would have withdrawn a considerable amount this week were it not for the intervention of Messrs. Baring Brothers. There are also demands for South Africa, Egypt, Portugal, &c.; and the probability seems to be, therefore, that before very long the market will be seized with another fit of apprehension, and rates will rise as they did at the beginning of last week.

The easier condition of the money market has revived confidence upon the Stock Exchange, and there is a general recovery in prices. The French elections, it is argued, have assured peace, and the visit of the Czar to Berlin, as well as the welcome given to the British fleet at Kiel, has made a very good impression. But if peace is preserved it is contended prices must continue to rise. The great financial houses, the argument goes on, are all interested in keeping the money market easy, and may be trusted to do so. They are equally interested in supporting markets. We are to have before a year is out, it is said, the completion of the Russian Conversion. The conversion of the Egyptian Preference Debt, it is also assumed, is imminent. In Germany there is to be immediately an Italian loan. The Brazilian Conversion Loan in London is already followed by a small Conversion loan for the capital Rio. And there are other numerous Brazilian issues projected. The Argentine Government, too, has arranged for a loan of 8 millions sterling, and other Argentine issues are to follow. Then there are to be Peruvian issues and Chilean issues, and there are numerous South African and other Companies in preparation. If all this is to be accomplished, we are told speculators must be encouraged by affording them the accommodation they require on easy terms, and by insuring them favourable markets. It is possible, of course, that the great financial houses, by combining together, may succeed in their undertaking. But it is just possible, also, that events may prove too powerful for them. For example, money is in strong demand all over the world, and, therefore, if very much gold is taken from any one country, the money market of that country may be thrown into confusion and it may react upon other markets. Thus, it may be found impossible to obtain all the gold that is required to keep the money markets easy, and, indeed, we are inclined to think that, as the London money market has gone of late, the task set themselves by the great houses will prove no easy one. Then, again, political accidents of one kind or another may upset all calculations; and, lastly, it is to be borne in mind that speculation has now been rampant for many years, that it has carried prices to an unexampled height, and that it is scarcely possible to carry them much further.

The National Bank of Brazil is coming out at once in Paris. Its capital is 10 millions sterling; but only half is to be offered in Europe, and of that half only half is to be immediately called up. The shares are to be offered to the French public at a premium of 25 per cent. If any of our readers think of applying they will do well to inquire what justifies the premium of 25 per cent. before the Bank is actually established. No doubt the Brazilian Government will be a ready customer, but it is to be recollected that the Brazilian Budget ends every year in a huge deficit. No doubt, also, the chief propertied class—the planters—will be eager borrowers. But then it should be borne in mind that the planters are impoverished by the emancipation of their slaves without compensation. There may be a very large and profitable business to be done, but intending subscribers will do well to assure themselves that there is.

There are some doubts whether the new Argentine Loan of 8 millions is to be offered for public subscription this year. The time certainly seems very unfavourable. For two autumns in succession the London money market has been seriously disturbed by South American demands for gold. Last year it was the Argentine demand; this year, so far, it is the Brazilian. And if now the Argentine Republic has 8 millions set to its credit, it will be able to withdraw gold on the scale of last year. Besides, the Argentine Republic, the provinces, and the municipalities have been borrowing most recklessly in Europe for some years past. Within less than eight years the total of the Argentine issues in Europe has amounted to from 90 to 100 millions sterling, an enormous sum for a population of about 4 millions, not all of them of European descent. Over and above all this the finances of the Republic are in a very serious condition. Legal tender paper is worth less than half its nominal value, and though the Government has promised to stop further issues of paper, it does not appreciate. The land speculation has been carried beyond all bounds, and the country is going through a severe crisis. And, lastly, the Argentine Republic has not strictly observed its engagements with its creditors. It has not, for example, carried out the law which established free banking, and unquestionably its conversion of the Hard Dollar Loan was not according to its promises. It would be well, then, if the Republic were compelled to abstain from adding to its debt for some years to come.

Improved trade, leading to a largely increased consumption of iron and steel, is encouraging an active speculation in Glasgow, where this week there has been a sharp rise in the price of Scotch pig-iron warrants.

THE THEATRES.

A MORE hopeless enterprise than that essayed by Mr. George Cockle at the Opera Comique is not often put forward at a West-End theatre. Without possessing the qualities which are essential for a composer of opera, he has set to music a very bad libretto of The Lady of Lyons, has engaged an inferior and unattractive company to perform the work, and leased for the purpose a house at which serious opera was never before given. Mr. Cockle is gifted with a certain amount of musical facility and cultivation. Some of his numbers are moderately tuneful, and if his orchestration is devoid of any special merit or attractiveness, at any rate he shows some knowledge of the business he has undertaken. But there is no reason of any kind why The Castle of Como, as the work is called, should be in the least degree popular. We are inclined to sympathize with an ambitious person placed as Mr. Cockle is. He desires to do something, and can do it well enough to avoid harsh criticism, but not nearly well enough to win approval. The hand of the amateur is obvious. He has admittedly tinkered the libretto, but without any knowledge of stage effect. The device of making Claude and Pauline advance to the footlights during their interview in Deschappelles's garden, letting down a heavy bank of clouds behind them and drawing it up to reveal the illuminated castle of Como, proved conclusively that no one who had a voice in the production of the opera was blessed with any sense either of the dramatic or of the ludicrous. Pauline's companions—bridesmaids, or whatever they are—leave the room, making obeisance to her as if she were a Princess. She thinks that she is to be one; but surely the merchants' daughters of Lyons did not thus bow down to another merchant's daughter because she was betrothed to a nobleman? The blunders and absurdities of The Castle of Como are, however, far too numerous for comment, and no good end would be gained by dwelling on them.

The second mistake on which we have to remark is The Bungalow, now being given at Toole's Theatre. The farce is an adaptation of a French piece, La Garçonnière, which was played last year, without bringing much credit to any one concerned in it, at the Théâtre Déjazet. In the process of adaptation it has become absolutely motiveless. There is no sort of reason why an elderly gentleman should have made an appointment to meet a young woman who was formerly his model, and wants to blackmail him, in the deserted bungalow of his prospective son-in-law; nor does it appear why two friends should secretly bring each other's wives to the same place and at the same time. Of course if one searches about for the missing motives they may be found; but that is not the business of the spectator, who should have a comprehensible scheme put before him. The plot, such as it is, or would be if the adapter had not restrained himself—unless it be, indeed, that the Licenser restrained him—is tediously trite. We have so often seen these errant husbands and flirting wives rushing in and out through doors and windows to avoid imminent discovery, and it is inevitable that an innocent man should be suspected of various offences which he has never intended to commit. One ought not, it may be said, to look at a French farce of this sort seriously; but then it is so feeble and worn that it makes one serious; and it is well for adapters to know that we have had enough of it, not to say too much. Mr. Charles Wyndham had the tact to perceive which way opinion was drifting, and he abandoned this class of piece at the Criterion some years ago. A company by which very fair work might be done if the opportunity were provided has been engaged at Toole's Theatre, and the least known member of it does best. This is Mr. F. Kaye, who gave a really humorous representation of that familiar stage figure, the timid husband who lives in terror of his wife. The part was very neatly and well sustained by this comedian, by whom, if he has played in London before, our attention has not hitherto been attracted. Mr. Charles Glenney and Mr. Yorke Stephens are actors of a certain capacity who know their business, and rarely fall below a modest level of competence; and very much the same may be said of the two actresses here associated with them, Miss Grahame and Miss Vane Featherston. A Mr. Compton Coutts almost creates sympathy for himself by his feeble and totally misdirected effort to bestow character upon the part he undertakes, one of the husbands who visit the bungalow. Mr. Coutts awakened in us a feeling of profound melancholy. Miss Helen Forsyth and Miss Cicely Richards do what they can to brighten a play that is deficient in all good qualities.

Very pleasant is it to turn from two mistakes in theatrical enterprise to an undertaking which has proved itself very much the reverse of mistaken. Mr. Buchanan's A Man's Shadow (adapted from Roger la Honte), at the Haymarket, improves greatly on acquaintance. The inherent weaknesses of the French story are now, by closer playing, far better concealed than they were, and the whole effect of the play has been improved by many subtle exercises of Mr. Tree's tact and experience. He himself, as we prophesied, has developed his performance of Luversan, the spy, into a very striking and original study of character, and at the same time he has imparted many new and distinctive touches to the somewhat conventional character of the falsely-accused Laroque, which in the early presentations of the piece seemed a little colourless. Both by him and by Mr. Fernandez the trial scene is played to what may be fairly called perfection. Miss Norreys has gained sprightliness as Victoire, Miss Julia Neilson has found more strength as Madame de Noirville. For Mrs. Tree's graceful, yet forcible, performance of Madame Laroque throughout nothing but praise can be found; but the very highest praise must be given to the truth and tenderness of her acting in two scenes of a singularly moving character; that in which she falls fainting at the door through which her husband, whom she loves for all she believes him guilty, has been taken in custody, and the last scene of the piece, where the adapter's ingenuity has provided a succession of stirring episodes. In both scenes the impression produced by the acting is of a kind seldom experienced.

ROGUES ALL!

["Every honest man in Ire'land was opposed to the Union."—SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT.]

WHAT! "every honest man"? A crushing sentence
From those authoritative lips to fall.
Rogues, all the others?—rogues beyond repentance?
No H-re-rt to be found among them all?

Almost you have achieved the refutation,
Stern moralist, of Burke's oft-quoted words;
For, if you have not quite arraigned a nation,
You have indicted—well, a good two-thirds.

Rogues all, rogues all, whoe'er acclaimed the Union,
In any rank, of either race or creed,
And whether of the dominant communion
Or of the Church aspiring to be freed.

Rogues all who drafted or subscribed the addresses
Showered upon the Castle fast and thick;
Whole knavish towns with rascals for burgesses—
Cork, Waterford, Kilkenny, Limerick.

Rogues all those county members whom so clearly Ireland discerned and spurned as false to her
That their constituents punished them severely
By sending them to sit at Westminster.

Vile traitors to their country, all who classed it
Her higher fate an Empire's life to share;
Rogues all who voted for the scheme, and passed it,
A roguery the last great speech of Clare.

A sorry sight, a sight to disconcert you,
This mass corrupt of tricksters, sweetened not
By one faint foretaste of Gladstonian virtue,
By one redeeming H-re-rt in the lot.

How those pale shades in their Elysian limbo
Must cower to hear this lofty judge condemn;
This brazen-blustrious censor, arms a-kimbo,
Pronouncing thus upon their deeds and them!

Doubtless the damning charge which so doth flutter
That shadowy band of long-departed knaves,
These Unionists had heard opponents utter Full oft, ere they descended to their graves.

But never, never can the accusation
Have fallen so shattering of all defence,
Weighted with such a weight of reputation,
Strong with such strength of ripe experience.

Is virtue Separatism's nursing mother?
Is Unionism falsehood's hateful growth?
It must be so;—on such a point none other
Can speak like H-re-rt, for he's tried them both.

The enemy of the Union, once enlisted
For its defence, must know, we all allow,
Save by the light of conscience, unassisted,
Whether he was less honest then than now.

REVIEWS.

A CENTURY OF REVOLUTION.*

THE critic is not that member of the human race who least frequently prays to be saved from his friends, with or without the usual apparently arrogant, but assuredly not quite nonsensical, addition that he can protect himself from his enemies. Whether the critical temperament is or is not inimical to the productive—whether the difficulty which a man inclined by nature and trained by practice to be critical finds in "letting himself go," in dismissing the thought "What will the fellows on the other side have to say to this?" is really a great hindrance, or a hindrance at all, to work, is a question which we cannot argue out here. But it is certain that in no books is the critic so sensitive to uncritical faults as in books with the general purport of which he agrees. He knows what "the other fellows will say" well enough, and the knowledge which in the case of an enemy converts itself into a joyful "thou hast given a handle" is here a positive pain and grief. Of course there are critics who are not troubled by these fine fancies, who simply set the trumpet to their lips and blow for anybody who speaks on their own side, and either do not care (nor perhaps know) what will be said on the other side, or at least hope to overbray it. That is not the fashion in which we understand criticism, and we hereby register a declaration, which may or may not meet with credence, that we would very much rather tackle the most formidable book that ever appeared, the principles of which we do not agree with (let us say something of Hume's or of Voltaire's), than have to be umpire of the swashing blow of such a champion as the author of the book before us.

Not that there is not much good in Mr. Lilly. He is on the right side to begin with; and his swashing blows are by no means always, or even very often, delivered dans l'eau. His book, which attempts to meet in mid-way and fight fairly with the general principle that the French Revolution was in its results, if not in itself (but preferably in itself as well as in its results), a boon to mankind, is an attempt in a direction which is the right direction. On many detailed points his argument is sound and happy. He deals with Mr. John Morley, who is his chief antagonist, very well, exposing the curious contrasts in that very puzzling writer's work, emphasizing the oddly extreme views which, nobody quite knows how, have embodied themselves—both as to religion, as to sociology, and as to politics—in a man who, on some sides of his talent and most sides of his character, seems to be fitted for nothing so much as the office of an intelligent Conservative; and preserving throughout the good manners which are seldom more required than in a controversy with Mr. Morley, who never forgets his own manners, except in reference to the Deity, the Christian religion, and the House of Lords. When Mr. Lilly comes across such a promachos of the other side as M. Zola he is still better. We sit unbuttoned on the bench and applaud as we see him "get home" on the various points of M. Zola's uncomely person, with something like the delight, half critical and half ferocious, which might have been felt (but for the very unsportsmanlike close of that mill) by any spectator of the turn-up between the Amateur and the Baker. Every now and then Mr. Lilly goes straight to the point, as where he says—upsetting himself a little, though he does not know it—that "you do not explain a thing by tracing it back to its rudimentary forms." Most assuredly you do not; and the remark simply cleaves all modern "scientism" to the breastbone. The aperçus throughout the book to which we might give hardly less praise are numberless. Mr. Lilly, indeed, has nowhere put clearly (we do not know the modern political philosopher who has) the most fatal logical lapse of the revolutionary and Democratic dogma; its oblivion of the fact that, while proclaiming loudly the rights of the individual and the equality of man, it practically abrogates equality and rights in favour of what we have often called here "the absolutely irrational tyranny of the fifty-one over the forty-nine," though every person in the forty-nine has rights and equality just as much as every person of the fifty-one; but if he has missed this fatal blunder he has "spotted" many others. He has, as the Laureate says, "ruining overthrown" the notion that any liberty worth the name exists in France now. He has shown very well, indeed, that the revolutionary doctrine, whether as shown in a dead dog like the late M. Paul Bert, or in a live lion like Mr. Morley, represents nothing so much as a kind of anti-religious mania, as infâme as any superstition or religion which it attacks, and wholly destitute of the justification ex hypothesi which those religions and superstitions have had. And, let us add, he has taken with his book the trouble which used to be common, but which is now rare, of arranging it in such a fashion with elaborately reasoned contents, an unusually full index, and so forth, that any one may see the drift of his argument and the gist of his principal conclusions. This service, mechanical as it may seem, is not a small one, and for the want of it many books of the present day, some on the right side and some on the wrong, are likely to be and to remain long unread. Few modern men excel in arrangement; hardly any modern man at all takes trouble enough to give his reader a clue to whatsoever arrangement he has been good enough to take the trouble to devise for the purpose of putting his thoughts before those who wish to acquaint themselves with them.

And yet, as we have hinted, we find Mr. Lilly very irritating at times. Minor matters of expression are, perhaps, of little importance. But still, though Thérèse Levasseur was not a nice person in her later days (if she was at any time), what do you gain by calling her Rousseau's "filthy concubine"? It is surely as well to leave language of that kind, especially in reference to a person who was certainly at first more sinned against than sinning, to the other side. Then we have Diderot. Mr. Lilly never seems quite to know where to have his Diderot. At one time he is a "gluttonous and obscene blasphemer," a "libidinous materialist," an "indescribably filthy writer and no less filthy liver" (we know our Diderot pretty well, but the authority for this last exaggeration of his compliance with certain loose fashions of the time is not known to us), and so forth. But when Mr. Lilly comes to M. Zola, and the affiliation order which that dirty little talent serves on Diderot's great and often quite clean genius, he has to admit the "vastness" of the "genius"; he has to quote the affirmation of artistic truth, which cuts Naturalism at the root, and leaves it a rotting, lifeless weed—the demand for "quelque chose ultérieure à la nature"—he has to allow that "he could discourse on occasion admirably well." These things do not agree admirably well together. That Diderot wrote, and took money for writing, things which he had much better have left alone; that he followed the fashions of his day to deery, not merely conventions, but principles of which his sounder sense should have shown him, and did at times show him, the sacredness, is perfectly true, and is lamentable enough. That he was not a proper moral man (just as his contemporary Bet Flint, whom Dr. Johnson "loved," was certainly not a proper moral woman) is equally true. But we at least ask nothing better than the twenty volumes of Diderot wherewith to smash the revolutionaries in religion, art, literature, and politics out of their own prophet's mouth; and for this, as well as for his "vast genius," which Mr. Lilly admits, and for the admirable humour and humanity which perhaps he does not recognize, we say that the second, and not the first, Cantica of any new Divine Comedy describes the place of his lot.

* A Century of Revolution. By W. S. Lilly. London: Chapman & Hall. 1889.

But there is much worse than this in Mr. Lilly; for undoubtedly large parts of Diderot require a very strong stomach to digest them. Mr. Lilly, while directing his swashing blows at revolutionary Liberalism, revolutionary Democracy, revolutionary science, still protests himself a Liberal, a Democrat, a scientist even. He is desperately wroth with "Renaissance Absolutism," and the wicked Stuarts who followed it; he adores "the great event of 1688"; he thinks that "the German type of Democracy, in harmony with the facts of history and of science," is just the nicest thing you ever saw. "In this disciplined law-abiding and architectonic [ah! the blessedness of five syllables!] democracy of Germany [shall we look for it at Vaduz? Is it in Reuss-Greiz that they sell him, the architectonic democracy?] we may reasonably hope to see the great problem of the age receive its solution." "Democracy must be scientific; it must accept the facts of all the sciences." "Ach! mein lieber Mr. Lilly!" might a man say, "er kennt nicht," and so forth. Far be it from us to use bad language of the great Liberal party in the past. It has furnished, and is furnishing, much valuable resistance, and some valuable aggressive action, on the side of truth. Far be it from us, again, to say that the party which, under various names, has opposed the Liberal party has been always in the right. On the contrary, it has exercised much mistaken tyranny, has fought for many things not worth fighting for, has opposed many things which might have been very well admitted. But the sordid, immovable, inexorable fact remains that a man who opposes the revolutionary spirit, and "cracks up" the great event of 1688, who thunders against Democracy, and then says that there is a kind of democracy which is the solution of all troubles; who attacks the corner-stones of modern science, as we have seen, and urges the wholesale adoption of the building, leaves himself open to the most crushing retorts from his adversaries. You can only attack Democracy with any effect by showing (which it is easy enough to do) that Democracy means unreason, and can only become reasonable in proportion as it denies or ignores its own principles and ceases to be democratic. What are "all the facts of science" which Mr. Lilly wants "recognized"? The facts of science which, as he himself says, and as Hume said long before him, explain nothing? What has science, in any sense of the word usually understood, to do with politics at all? History has to do hugely with them, philosophy has to do, literature has to do, even art in a way has to do—but what has science? Nothing. And when we have the great event of 1688 cried up and the great event of 1789 cried down, it is impossible for a sane critic, even while allowing for the vast difference of manner in the two events, not to admit that the principle of the two was the same. Let us put it for Mr. Lilly in a very simple fashion. Two schools simultaneously "bar out" and succeed. The one elects masters, arranges its work and its play sensibly, abides by the rules in both, and gets on rather better than before. The other makes bonfires of the forms, invites bad characters into the dormitories, abolishes honest beef and mutton for various varieties of "sock," and so forth. A very great difference of result, no doubt. But what has the difference of result to do with the original propriety of the barring out? Will one any more than the other decide the question whether periodical barrings-out are the proper or improper basis of school-government?

NOVELS.*

IF the dialect novel is to be an established institution with us as it is in America, our novelists must be more assiduous

* The Tree of Knowledge. By G. M. Robins. 3 vols. London: Hurst & Blackett. 1889.

The Scotts of Bestminster. By J. Masterman. 3 vols. London: Richard Bentley & Son. 1889.

students than the author of The Tree of Knowledge. Mrs., or Miss, Robins, it is fair to add, obviously tires of her undertaking in this Devonshire story, and after the first volume surrenders at discretion. At the outset, however, moved by the example of Mr. Blackmore, Mr. Baring-Gould, and the author of Troy Town, or emulative of the varying success of Westward Ho! Adam and Eve, and The Dwale Bluth, the writer shows a certain alacrity of confidence. There are the rustic folk of Devon picturesquely presented in juxtaposition to the neighbouring gentry and fashionable visitors from London. The country people speak what purports to be Devonshire speech, but it is of the kind that is manufactured to order, as stage properties are, and will strike a native with the sense of shame that overwhelms the stranger. The scene opens in a fairy-like combe, lying deep in the tolerably bare, well-farmed, uninteresting uplands of the sea-coast. The place is not ill described. Many such luxuriant combes surprise the wanderer over the hills along the coast between Axe and Exe, or between Berry Head and Salcombe. From the geological indications this secluded Devonian Eden, where two murders are attempted, one of them successfully, in the course of a few weeks, is not a hundred miles from the mouth of the Axe or Beer Head. From the dialectical evidence the man of Devon would be justified in identifying the district with the city of Weissnichtwo, or where you please. The story, though well enough written, as the average goes, is preposterous in incident, weak in characterization, and mawkish in tone. The heroine is one of the most exasperating specimens of the ingénue conceivable. She is reared by three maiden aunts to the age of nineteen in a state of innocence, ignorance, and lack of raiment, which prepares the reader for the disillusion that falls upon the wealthy and mysterious Percivale after his marriage with her. This same Percivale, though a barren prig, does her knightly service. He suddenly appears on the coast in his yacht, The Swan, as her champion, when she is suspected by the shrewd, hard-headed country magistrate, Henry Fowler—not Henry the Fowler—of the murder of her half-brother, an odious little brat with large expectations. From the first the real murderer is palpable to every reader—he is the village idiot, and a very proper person for the deed—yet Henry Fowler, whose common sense is much vaunted, and who is a friend of the lovely Elaine, is determined, like another Justice Shallow, to make a case of it—a Constance Kent affair. 'Tis the foolishhest business imaginable. Percivale soon tracks the matter out, and is taken for better or worse by Elaine, or for pure gratitude or love of filthy lucre. As she is known by two names, so is he made to play two parts. He is now the knightly Percivale, now the mystical Lohengrin. She is Elaine when Percivale is called upon for the Arthurian part, and Elsa when he is required in the Wagnerian character. By this theatrical doubling the reader is made to feel all the agonies of a distressed call-boy fresh from school. The remaining persons in this Devonshire story pale their ineffectual fires in the company of the resplendent hero. They may be left out of the account. In the end Elaine-Elsa tells the secret of Percivale's mystery to an enemy; and, after a fatuous scene between the two, as dreary, yet not so long as the duet in Lohengrin, the Swan sets sail with her party from the Devonian valley of Avilion, "to be lost evermore in the main."

The dialect in The Tree of Knowledge needs not to be extensively sampled. The following may pass well for English rustic speech in novels, but it is as like Lowland Scots as Devonshire:—"Me mother said a was t'ask yer if yer was goin' to get your dinner aout, same as yesterday, or if yer'd get your dinner here to-day?" Again, p. 37, vol. i., we have, "Well, now, I dû say that it's nice to see you, Miss Ullin, and Jane tû! Come along in out of the heat—come into the rhûme. Is all the ladies well? How dû they like this weatherr, and how dû yew like it yourself, Miss Ullin, my dearr?" This last sample is referred to by the author as "the Devonshire dialect," and the "soft liquid French sound of the u" is noticed, contrasted with "the rough burr of the r." What is meant by the "burr" in Devonshire dialect we know not, "burr" having but one meaning in speech, and one that is familiar to every one who crosses the Tyne northwards. The confusion of pronouns, "yer," and so forth, and, in other sentences, "them" for "those," instead of "they," is entirely misleading. The old formula ought to have served the author in this particular:—"Wât vor this gallers they gûsen-chicks?" "Wât vor I gallers they gûsen-chicks! Wât vor they gûsen-chicks vader bite my leg vor than?" And better still had it been if the author had studied the vernacular as it is written in the book of The Astonishing History of Troy Town (Cassell & Co.) The admirable fidelity with which the Devonshire speech is reproduced, in spirit and suggested to the eye and ear, in this diverting chronicle has been some time recognized by natives and dwellers in the South Hams and adjacent parts. Of the precise locality indicated by the author there is still, we believe, some contention among judges. For aught we know, as Chaucer says of his shipman, "it is of Dartmouth" that "Q." writes. Caleb Trotter, for all his Wellerisms and Ramsbottomisms, is inimitable. That West Saxon speech, with its so-called Americanisms, which the Devonshire folk introduced into New England, where it does still mightily prevail, though corrupted, is immortalized in the mouth of Caleb Trotter. The racy humour, the idioms, the inflexions, are reproduced with unsurpassed truth and purity; while the author's skill in suggesting the pronunciation is as remarkable as it is rare. We take by hap a typical example, as a lesson for hardy experimenters like the author of The Tree of Knowledge:—

You've heard me spake, sir, o' Joe Bonaday, him as made poetry 'long wi' me wan time when lying becalmed off Ilfrycombe? Well, this Joe were a Barnstaple man, bred an' born. But he had a brother—Sam were hes name—as came an' settled out Carne way; "ould These-an'-Thicky," us used to call 'n. Sam was a crowder, you must know, an' used to play the fiddle over to Tregarrick fair; but he cudn' niver play more 'n two tunes. "Which 'll 'ee ha'," he used to say, "which 'll 'ee ha'—these or thicky?" That's why, though he was chrisn'd Sam, us used to call 'n These-an'-Thicky for short.

To cite more of Caleb's stories at this date is needless. Most people who have been stopping westward this season know all about the humours of Troy, whether it be this side of the Tamar or the other, and have laughed with the irrepressible Caleb "and that astounding Admiral, and the Twins and Tamsin." For the rest there is the new edition to hand, and we trust it may be "jest pull hot foot" to get it.

Mr. Masterman is, or ought to be, a very fortunate man. He deserves the admiration of all the ladies of the land who read novels, not merely that The Scotts of Bestminster is bright, wholesome, and amusing, but for the unparalleled and impeccable description it contains of the trials of a young mother and her first born. The story of poor Mrs. Scott, inexperienced, ill, travelling in India with her sick husband, charged with the care of a tender and wonderful infant, is told with admirable truth and a blended pathos and humour that is perfectly unaffected. The situation has never, to our knowledge, been so happily depicted, and if Mr. Masterman had done nothing more than refute the vulgar fallacy that only women know anything of the ways of babies, he is entitled to the sincerest commendation of his book. But there are other good things in store for the reader. The characters are, for the most part, firmly characterized. Life in India and English country life are faithfully presented, and with nothing of over-colour or eccentricity in the treatment. Mrs. Smith, though a little too suggestive of a lady in a Gilbert-and-Sullivan operetta, is an amusing sketch of a vulgar, good-hearted, consequential woman, not altogether unrecognizable as a type of Anglo-Indian society. The episode of a shipwreck on some not unfriendly isles in the Indian Ocean, though rather inordinately spun out, is cleverly imagined, and shows that an old and picturesque device of novelists is by no means exhausted of its interest. Altogether, The Scotts of Bestminster is full of capable work, and readable from cover to cover.

NEW ENGLAND.*

IF Mr. Fiske had cut out his first chapter he would greatly have improved his book. It does not seem to have struck him that there was anything ridiculous in beginning a short account of the foundation and early history of the New England colonies with a discussion as to the import of the dethronement of Romulus Augustulus in 476, or that his readers might resent being told how the subject of some of Professor Freeman's lectures at Oxford illustrates his opinion as to the necessity of studying the history of the "Dark Ages." He has prefaced his legitimate work with an introduction mainly on the "English idea" of representation, which has no very considerable bearing on the general contents of his book. Much of what he has written about political representation suffers from his ambiguous phraseology. The term "nation-making" is applied alike to the enslavement of foreign nations by Oriental monarchs, to the denationalizing decrees which extended the Roman citizenship to men of the nations subject to Rome, and to the adoption of Parliamentary representation by the English. Surely there was an English nation before the reign of Edward I. Nor is the author's history above reproach. His choice of Frederic II. as an example of a great monarch in full sympathy with his subjects is certainly peculiar. He misapprehends and overstates the constitutional importance of the Parliament summoned by Simon de Montfort in 1265, when, he says, there was "first asserted and applied at Westminster the fundamental principle of 'no taxation without representation.'" It was unwise to mention Wycliffe without having learnt that he was not a "professor," as the word is now used, at Oxford, and that he was not a "free-thinker," to talk about the punishment of death for heresy without having learnt that there was an unwritten Common Law in England, which did not derive its force from Acts of Parliament, or, lastly, to choose "fine tact" as the special characteristic which Elizabeth must have inherited from her mother. When he at last gets to his proper subject, we find much to praise and very little to blame. The assertion that the abolition of tithes has been adopted by the more civilized portions of the Protestant world is probably a mere bit of hasty writing. The narrative is well put together, and is far more brightly told than any of the numberless short accounts of the early days of New England that have yet reached us. While dwelling with laudable pride on the achievements of the settlers and the results of their work, he freely criticizes their motives and actions. That the Puritan migration was undertaken in the interests of religious liberty is, he justly says, "nonsense," and he pleads that it is consequently unjust to charge the colonists with inconsistency because they were grossly intolerant. They left England in order to establish a theocratic community, and their scheme did not admit of religious liberty. Nor were they likely, in the face of the dangers which surrounded them, to be tolerant of anything which tended to weaken or destroy unity of feeling. Dissent from the general religion almost necessarily implied political discontent, and they acted on the principle enunciated by Arnold, a leading citizen of Providence, with reference to Gorton's case, that "there is no State but in the first place will seek to preserve its own safety and peace." Mr. Fiske's statement of the merits and defects inherent in the theocratic idea, and especially apparent in Massachusetts, where it was most thoroughly followed out, is well considered, and his treatment of the whole question of the attitude of the New England colonists with reference to religious liberty is vigorous and interesting. He carries his narrative down to the grant of the Massachusetts charter of 1692, and appends a useful bibliographical note, in which we are glad to observe a warm acknowledgment of the impartiality and accuracy of Mr. Doyle's work, The English in America.

THE BLIND.*

THIS very industrious Commission, of which Lord Egerton of Tatton was the chairman, was appointed in January 1886. It visited almost all the institutions for the blind and the deaf and dumb, not only in the United Kingdom, but in Paris, Germany, Switzerland, and Italy. It also made a thorough inquiry into the principles on which such institutions are conducted in the United States. In the present article we propose to confine our observations to the blind, leaving the deaf and dumb for another occasion; and, as the well-to-do blind are few in number and are usually well cared for, and have the benefit of all the modern appliances which have been invented for the alleviation of their sad lot, it will hardly be necessary to say more about them than that it is from their class, as might be expected, that the most conspicuous instances of energy in the endeavour to overcome the effects of the terrible disqualification under which they suffer have come. The late Mr. Fawcett is a well-known example of that energy, and there are others whom it is unnecessary here to mention. One instance of an effort to overcome the disabilities of blindness which is related by the Commissioners we cannot forbear from quoting. At the college at Worcester, which is a college for the higher education of blind people, the pupils were playing at football with a basket-ball enclosing a bell, and walking on stilts with perfect fearlessness.

To the seeing (we dislike the word "sighted," which is the one most in use among people associated with the blind to indicate those who have sight) blindness is such an overwhelming calamity that it seems almost brutal to do anything with the blind but to enable them to lead comfortable lives at the expense of somebody else. By the statute 43 Eliz. c. 2, it was provided that the relatives of blind people, being of sufficient ability, should maintain them; but in the case of the poor it must often happen that the relatives are not of sufficient ability, and in that case the poor blind had no resource but the workhouse or begging, with or without "a musical instrument"—hence the familiar blind fiddler. By recent legislation the guardians of the poor have been empowered to provide for the maintenance and education of the blind, in schools and other institutions, and to subscribe to the support of such institutions.

That the blind could be taught many things which would make their lives brighter and happier, and make themselves more useful members of the community, has apparently, in England at least, been a discovery of the present century. In 1800 there were but four institutions for the blind in the United Kingdom. There are now sixty-one of various kinds, mostly schools and workshops. The idea that the blind should be provided for comfortably appears to have been acted upon in Saxony, and the result is well told by Herr Büttner, the director of the institution at Dresden, in a memorandum quoted in the Report. After stating the reasons why an asylum was established in which the blind might live, "free from care and the chicaneries of the world" (the ideal condition, be it observed), he goes on:—

This asylum was not a success, for the expenses were so great that only a few of the blind discharged from the institution could be provided for; the greater number fell back again into beggary. There was great discontent in the asylum. The men thought it beneath their dignity to rise, take their meals, and work by the clock. They only thought of the restriction to their liberty, and, having grown accustomed to the acts of benevolence done them, they demanded them as a right. The women, living without care and distraction, became shrewish, and embittered their own lives for mere trifles.

Experience in other cases shows that this may be taken as a fair account of the results of the comfortable system. We must harden our hearts, and for the sake of the blind themselves and of society, remove them from mendicancy, and teach them what they can be taught.

By the last Census the number of blind persons in England was 22,832, in Scotland 3,158, in Ireland 6,111, and in the Isle of Man and Channel Islands 195; total, 32,296. But the Commissioners think that these figures do not represent the real number, as persons who can see enough to walk about and can distinguish light and darkness are reluctant to include themselves

* The Beginnings of New England; or, the Puritan Theocracy in its Relations to Civil and Religious Liberty. By John Fiske. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

* Report of the Royal Commission on the Blind, the Deaf, and Dumb, &c., of the United Kingdom. 1889.

among the blind. Many causes of blindness are preventible, and it is satisfactory to find that there has been a sensible decrease in the number of blind persons within the last thirty years. More than one-fourth of the blind in the United Kingdom have lost their sight from purulent ophthalmia at birth, a malady which might be greatly diminished, if not almost altogether extinguished, by proper treatment. The Commission recommends that information on this subject should be circulated through the Post Office. In Germany the importance of proper treatment at this stage is recognized, and stringent laws exist providing for the calling in of a doctor in cases where the malady exists and forbidding, under penalties, treatment by anybody but a doctor.

It is obvious, of course, that the numerous so-called accidents from flying shuttles, from burns by fire or acids, and from flying stones or chips in workshops could be greatly diminished by care; and, if English people could abstain from blows, probably there would be fewer blind people by one-third. The blind may be divided into three classes—namely, those blind from birth, those who have become blind in after-life, and the aged blind; and these again may be subdivided into those who are totally blind and those who can see a little light. For educational purposes these latter are rightly classified as blind; but their condition is very different from that of the totally blind, as they are much less dependent.

It is evident to those who are much associated with the blind that those who have lost their sight from birth live in altogether a different world from the seeing—a world in which there is no identification even of their most intimate companions save by hearing or touch—a world in which a person's idea of the human countenance must be derived from feeling his or her own face, and in which there can be no idea of the human eye—a world of utter darkness, in which there is no colour and only such shapes as may be distinguished by touch; in which, in fact, all that is taken in through the eye is absent—a world the dweller in which is supremely helpless. Is it possible that such a world can be otherwise than a sad one? The blind show that it is a sad one by the expression of their faces, which in many cases is singularly distressing; to enter a room in which there are many blind people, and to observe that there is no recognition except by the sound of the voice or the footstep, is a sad experience. It is difficult for the seeing to imagine the lives such people lead; but it is certain that the self-concentration which is the effect of the loss of sight is bad for them; that they can do work, and that they can learn, and that learning and work are good for them. Reading is taught by touch. A book is a number of large sheets of paper which have been stamped in such a manner that small protuberances appear on the other side; these represent letters and words, according to their form. A clever boy can learn to read this raised or embossed type in about one year; but the average time for a child is about two years. When proficient they can read almost as quickly as the seeing. Their literature is necessarily limited; but the Bible, an English history, and other books, have been prepared in this raised type, and there is also a magazine on purpose for the blind. Writing is taught in the same way, the scholars stamping out the letters themselves. There is a most ingenious system of teaching arithmetic by means of a perforated metal plate, a description of which would make us exceed our limits; but by it children can do long Reduction and Rule-of-three sums with great readiness. Basket-making, mat-making, brush-making, and chair-caning are taught with success to men, and chair-caning and knitting to women and girls. But music is undoubtedly the most important subject of education for the blind. It is a mistake to suppose that blind people have a better ear for music than others. Their sense of hearing may possibly be keener from cultivation, but the reason they become musicians is, first, that music gives them one of the few pleasures which life affords, and, secondly, that to those with an ear it is not extremely difficult to learn. In Paris music has been more effectually taught than anywhere in England, and a good percentage of the blind are there doing well by its means. In England some few are gaining a living by pianoforte-tuning, and even by playing the organ and other instruments, but comparatively few who learn music are able to make their living by it.

Of the blind trained in institutions it would appear that 42 per cent. do not after leaving continue to practise the industry taught them, while about 34 per cent. of the remainder do work, but do not earn more than 5s. a week. "This," say the Commissioners, "indicates a great deal of indifferent teaching or want of proper facilities for working and disposing of their work." In another part of their Report, however, the Commissioners admit, as might be expected, that the blind cannot compete on equal terms with the seeing. They make some kinds of rough baskets and some kinds of mats so nearly as well that the difference can hardly be perceived, but the blind suffer from other disabilities besides blindness. They very seldom have strong health. When physical weakness is added to blindness, it is difficult to see how they could compete with healthy seeing people.

There is a great desire among the blind to teach their blind brethren, and also a desire among the latter to be taught by the blind, and this is done to a great extent in England, and almost entirely at the Institution Nationale in Paris, but the supervision of seeing persons appears necessary. It is worthy of remark that one or two blind witnesses impressed on the Commissioners that, in the event of there being Government inspection of schools for the blind, the inspectors should be blind men, "because a seeing man would never be severe enough in demanding the full powers of the blind."

But it is time to come to the recommendations of the Commissioners. They recommend that the provisions of the Education Act should be extended to the blind, and that their attendance at a school or institution should be enforced from the age of 5 to the age of 16—that is to say, at a public elementary school from 5 to 12, and at a technical or industrial training school from 12 to 16—and that, where the number is too small to form a class, the educational authority should have power to send the child to an existing institution or to provide one in conjunction with other authorities. And that, to cover the expenses, a capitation grant of half the cost of instruction should be given. Under the London School Board the annual cost of educating a blind child is 9*l.* 10*s.* 5*d.*, and at Cardiff, Bradford, and Sunderland 7*l.* 3*s.* 1*d.* Educating a seeing child in the same school would cost, in round numbers, something under 2*l.* The difficulty of educating blind children in day schools is the trouble of getting them to and from the schools, as they have to be attended, and, therefore, schools in which blind children alone are taught would seem out of the question, unless they could be boarding schools. Probably the best plan, on the whole, if boarding schools cannot be provided, is the special class recommended by the Commissioners in elementary schools, with a grant per head to cover the extra cost; but we hardly see how compulsion could be worked. With regard to the adult blind, the Commissioners recommend the adoption of the system in use in Saxony of supervision and help after leaving the institution; for the details of this system the Report must be referred to.

The Commissioners say "the aged blind in workhouses at present pass a wretched existence," but it is exceedingly difficult to find any remedy for their condition. There are numerous charities for the blind, and the Commissioners recommend improved supervision of and intercommunication between such charities. Under them a good many blind people receive small pensions; if they were better managed, more would have the benefit of them. There is one recommendation of the Commissioners in which we heartily agree—namely, that the intermarriage of the blind should be strongly discouraged; how their intermarriage should come about at all seems odd, but we should very much like some more information as to the form the discouragement is to take.

ITALIAN LITERATURE.

THE Sardinian Tales (1) of Signor Giovanni Saragat are admirably illustrative of the manners and customs, patriarchal and picturesque, of the island of Sardinia. When they are descriptive it is with so excellent a sense of proportion that, although we see and breathe the air of a land not often trodden by the tourist, it is but as a background to the sturdy, ignorant, dignified figures of its people. There is a freshness and maestria in the writer's character-sketches which bring us nearer to them than any holiday exploration could do. For, although we might meet with an Ignazia, type of healthy feminine vigour, magnanimity, and common sense, with an Antonicu type of village youth and bravery, with an epicurean Tio Antioco and a pious but hot-tempered Tio Francesco-Angelo, with an innocent youth of military experience who has served his three years on the mainland, and even with his sister Mariadda, the fair little saint whose heart is torn between the rival claims of earthly and spiritual love, they would not open their hearts to us as they do in these pleasant pages. It is even doubtful whether they would admit us to their feasts, fights, serenades, and secret meetings, exclusion from which would mean the loss of much quaint and picturesque experience. Other sides of native character are revealed in the burglary of Coixedda, the parish priest disguised as the Devil, the vendetta of Prete Andrea, and the immunity accorded to him by the six jurymen who declared him innocent. All these things are told with an absence of declamatory emphasis, a tenderness, a humour, a suggestive and almost impersonal irony that mark one well acquainted with a people set apart from the common-places of civilization.

Sulla Montagna ("On the Heights") (2) is a strong and touching story of peasant life, as true as only the best art can be to nature, reproducing the very atmosphere of the Marches, redolent of its harvests, eloquent of the toils, the simple pleasures, the passions and the beliefs of its primitive people. The idyllic lovers are not more idealized than is the prerogative of all right-minded heroes and heroines; the most carping and least optimistic of critics will hardly cavil at the "illusion" of their steadfastness and innocence. The agony of Antonuccio's unmerited disgrace; how fair Menica and Agnese the witch bore witness for him; what Agnese said to the judge in open court "con rispetto parlando"; the confession of Lo Storto, a village Iago; how the choleric parish priest (whose sermons, beginning "umanissimi uditori," were wont to end with "voi altri canaglia") repented him of injustice, and how happy the lovers were made for ever afterwards, are things so excellently told by the Signora Pigorini-Beci that they are better read than discussed.

Signor F. de Roberto, in a prefatory letter to his publisher, in which he incidentally designates M. Zola as the "master of

(1) Di là dal mare. Da Giovanni Saragat. Milano: Brigola & Co.

(2) Sulla Montagna. Da Caterina Pigorini-Beci. Roma: Direzione della Nuova Antologia.

masters," apologizes for the idealism of Documenti umani (3). These idealistic (?) tales follow closely on the production of Sorte, a work so suggestive of the manner of the "master of masters" that Signor Treves declined to publish it, not only on account of its ethical and artistic poverty, but because he held such works "to be injurious to the good taste of the younger generation, and believed the writer's talent to be capable of better things." Signor de Roberto is much imbued with Gallicism. His dissertation on the right of every man to write how and what he pleases is a wordy parody of M. de Maupassant's famous preface. His Duchessa di Neli, in Studio di Donna, talks little, but thinks the more. She is elaborately gowned and barricaded by furniture, among which Signor de Roberto stumbles on the last novel of M. Paul Bourget. When, in a loutre and sky-blue tea-gown, she is discovered in a remote villa by the object of her choice after days of passionate longing, she asks him, "Cavaliere, do you like sweets?" As she hands him the bonbonnière he perceives that the skin of her forehead is slightly stained with hair-dye, banished are the silver threads he had admired amid her luxuriant locks when he last met her in a grey, tailor-made gown. More to her surprise than ours, he bids her a cold good-bye and flees to a neighbouring town. Another tribute to M. Bourget is the exoticism of his Princess Borischeff. Four languages are needful for the baring of the lady's unsophisticated soul. This we learn from a polyglot letter written, except for the mixture of tongues, after (a long way after) the manner of a Slav heroine of M. Cherbuliez's. In the blended Americanese and Volapük of her signature, Toute (sic) à vous, Catherine P. Borischeff, we find the first indication of Signor de Roberto's originality. Realism, he remarks, is the truth about things external, idealism the truth about things invisible. This definition will do as well as any other; but why should it induce the author of Documenti umani to mistake the Unreal for the Ideal?

The author of Rosa, scene della vita di villaggio (4) tells us that his book is not a novel, by which he allows us to infer that it is history. It is, at any rate, a veritable cyclopædia of village types, mostly well drawn. His artists and gentlefolk are less satisfactory. The book is too long and so laden with digressions on art, politics, literature, the adventures of Italian emigrants in America, and a thousand other things, that, when at last we come to the rounding off of this authentic history, we are not quite sure what it is all about.

Noemi (5) begins life with sentiments which would do honour to Mme. Bovary. In the cart which bears her from her rustic home to the nearest station she "wishes that the horse might never stop," she "longs to be borne along unceasingly 'twixt the blue of infinite space and the dewy green of the landscape." But when this too artless daughter of a village apothecary arrives at Milan, it is, to borrow a local idiom, "another pair of gloves." Noemi, no longer Mme. Bovary, but Denise (with many apologies to Flaubert and the younger Dumas), falls a ready prey to the fascinations of a curled and highly-scented Marchesino. The author is careful to warn us in a preface to this "simple story" that therein "we shall find no trace of that old-fashioned morality which awards to every one his or her due . . . for in this wicked world evil is done without either redress for the victim or punishment for the guilty." We are not quite so sure whether the victim in this case is Noemi, or whether it be Arnaldo, the worthy painter whom, after many vicissitudes, she marries, as we are that there is little trace of old-fashioned or of any other sort of morality in this novel. After over two hundred pages, in which the objectionable element is carefully eliminated, Mercedes is delivered of a homily on the possible redemption of too adventurous ladies. We fear that when she has realized that an Arnaldo who is willing to "waive the absurd prejudices which separate one class from another" is rara avis, she will have lost her last illusion.

Signor Salvatore Farina has added an epilogue to the sketch published simultaneously some two years ago in the Nuova Antologia and the Deutsche Rundschau (6). Between the prologue, which opens in a foundling hospital, and the epilogue, which ends in the gain and loss of all the two heroes had wished for, the greater part of their long lives has elapsed. Signor Farina leaves the intermediate novel to the imagination of his readers. He has not written it at all; but so potent is his concentration of thought and expression that, in the presages of the prologue and the few reminiscences of the epilogue, we may read it between the lines, just as in the Odyssey we are conscious of the beauty of Nausicaa, although Homer did not stoop to catalogue its details. The story of Desiderio Coppa and of Desiderio Diodato is told with the art of a consummate littérateur, with a purity of language admirably free from the Gallicism which mars so much good Italian writing, and with an ideal, inherent purity of conception as difficult to define as it is delightful to meet with.

Signora Maria Savi-Lopez has not inappropriately dedicated her "Legends of the Alps" (7) to the Queen of Italy, for the best told of her tales are those of the House of Savoy. If our historic sense has a leaning towards M. Henri Carrard's view that to Thomas and not to Peter of Savoy appertained the glory of the battle of Chillon, our artistic sense is not ill pleased when Count Pierre appears before his liege lord with one half of his handsome truculent person clothed in silken raiment and the other half in steel. "Beau cosin," quoth Charlemagne, "si je ne vous heusse voullu investir de Chablaix, de Vaudz et d'Ouste, mais que je les heusse voulu avoir pour moi, que heussiez vous fait par vôte foy?" "Monsigneur," replied Pierre, taking the words from the lips of Thomas and the kudos from his memory, "vous en diray-ge sur la foy et fidélité que je vous doi, je vous heusse tourné le costé armé et l'espée, et me fusse deffandu jusqu'à la mort, l'espée au poing." The gracefully dishevelled Alpine fairy of Signor Carlo Chessa's frontispiece promises better illustrations than are furnished by some sixty coarse woodcuts. The promise of the Signora Savi-Lopez's introduction shall speak for itself:—"When all the legends that still cling to the Alps have been garnered, I think," says the writer, "that we shall possess an admirable document of all the sweet, grand, or poetic imaginings woven by popular fantasy around the ancient myths and historic emprises of our fathers. And when to Alpine legends shall be added those equally poetic ones of the Scottish and Scandinavian mountains of the Sierras, the Carpathians, and other parts of Europe, and when these can be compared to others, a new, vast, and fecund field will be opened to the learned of every clime." All of which is undeniable. But had these pretty Alpine tales or fragments of tales come to us in simpler garb, interspersed with less pseudo-scientific hypothesis, the cause of science would not have suffered, and lovers of genuine folklore would have been better pleased. So much braying of trumpets is calculated to invite indiscreet questions as to the meaning of Jack Frost's and Karfunkel's chassée-croisée in the Alps and the presence of "Mary Morgan's" on the Continent. For the mermaids (sic), who under this English designation disport themselves on Baltic strands and in Italian pages, "que font-elles dans cette galère?"

We have received the first number of Signor A. de Gubernatis's Dizionario degli artisti Italiani viventi (8) (fascicolo A e B), an excellent guide to the Promised Land of the dilettante. The next number will appear in November and every following month until the work is completed.

NATURAL INHERITANCE.*

MOST people are accustomed to regard the studies with which Mr. Galton has principally associated his name as at best rather suitable to the dilettante, if not absolutely a little frivolous. It is flattering in a small way to be weighed and measured with scientific precision, to have one's "swiftness of stroke," keenness of vision, "strength of squeeze," and the like, tested, and the results solemnly recorded for anonymous incorporation into a book of high repute. Nor is it less pleasing to be sedulously asked about one's secret views of numbers from one to twenty and from twenty to a hundred, about the aptitudes and illnesses, the colour of the eyes and hair, and the good and bad temper of oneself and as many of one's relations as possible. These circumstances account for the fact that Mr. Galton's researches are to some extent considered to be popular, in more senses of that expressive adjective than one. It is, therefore, not to be wondered at if a good deal of disappointment has arisen from the circumstance that Mr. Galton's latest volume is very far from being popular. It is technical in a high degree, and may be colloquially described as a great deal too "stiff" to afford the least entertainment to the casual amateur of heredity. It contains no pictures, but a great many sums and long tables, the meaning of which can be apprehended only after a careful and thorough study of the text.

The present volume largely consists of matter which is not new, but has seen the light before in some of the many articles, essays, addresses, and so forth, which the author has published from time to time. Much of such matter is now set out in a more concise, and at the same time more comprehensive, manner than was possible by the original mode of publication; and indeed the object of the present work seems to be to furnish a text-book to serve as a general foundation for the study of inheritance at large, with especial reference to human beings. The first five chapters deal with the subject generally. In them Mr. Galton explains his terminology, most of which he has had to invent for himself, and indicates such general principles as he believes to be properly inducible from the facts affecting inheritance of all kinds. Chapter vi. deals with the "Records of Family Faculties," known to students of Mr. Galton's researches as the "R. F. F.," and with the famous "Anthropometric Laboratory" established at one of the more recent exhibitions at South Kensington. The four following chapters respectively contain specific records, the result of investigation by Mr. Galton and his friends, as to Stature, Eye Colour, the Artistic Faculty, and Disease. These are followed by a discussion of "latent elements"—that is to say, upon the probability of a given peculiarity in an ancestor reappearing in his comparatively remote descendants after an interval of non-appearance in persons through whom it must be presumed to have been transmitted—and the volume concludes with a summary of results, and eight appendices containing a

(3) Documenti umani. Da F. de Roberto. Milano: Treves.

(4) Rosa, scene della vita di villaggio. Milano: Fior di Spina.

(5) Noemi da Mercedes. Milano: Galli.

(6) I due desideri, Prologo ed Epilogo. Da Salvatore Farina. Milano: Brigola.

(7) Leggende delle Alpi. Da Maria Savi-Lopez. Torino: Ermanno Loescher.

(8) Dizionario degli artisti viventi. Da A. de Gubernatis. Firenze: L. ed A. S. Gonnelli.

* Natural Inheritance. By Francis Galton, F.R.S., Author of "Hereditary Genius" &c. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

large number of statements in tabular form, being the bases of most of the generalizations asserted in the text.

The most striking of the general characteristics of Mr. Galton's work is its want of precision. Again and again throughout his calculations we meet with an avowed "shot." For instance, in dealing with average human measures, Mr. Galton has found it practically necessary to "transmute" the measures of females into terms of measures for males. "For example:—the statures of women bear to those of men the proportion of about twelve to thirteen." Therefore, for purposes of calculating stature, a woman may be considered as a man with an inch added to his stature for every foot of hers. Mr. Galton uses the proportion of 100 to 108 for stature, and other proportions for female measures generally—e.g. for "strength of squeeze," and the like. As regards stature, which is capable of being ascertained with a good deal of accuracy, this method seems reasonable enough; but when widely used it opens a considerable door for error. It is, of course, a weakness in Mr. Galton's methods of research, rendered inevitable by circumstances, that, however careful his correspondents may be in their statements, they must rely a great deal upon hearsay, and even where they report such simple matters as whether eyes or hair are light or dark, from their personal observation, it is impossible to rely with much confidence upon their reports. Any one who will try the experiment of making an assertion which he supposes to be obviously true as to the colour of the hair or eyes of some person well known to each of several listeners will speedily discover how much room there is for difference of opinion—and very confident opinion, too—upon questions of this nature. When it comes to saying that such and such members of a large family are or were "good-tempered," and such others "bad-tempered," or to writing down opposite the names of a long string of relations the diseases of which they died and from which they suffered in life, the information is really so loose that no sensible man would act upon it for any practical purpose. These considerations make us look on Mr. Galton's generalizations about the probable influence upon descendants of ancestors, about the character of the imaginary person whom he rather fantastically styles the "Mid-Parent," and about the curves of frequency into which the actual or probable recurrence of physical peculiarities will naturally fall, as pleasing and ingenious, but by no means irrefragable. The criticism, of course, whatever it may be worth, affects only the question whether a man would act judiciously in selecting a wife in accordance with the teaching of Mr. Galton's statistics. It leaves entirely untouched the further question whether, assuming the former to be unhesitatingly answered in the affirmative, any considerable number of persons are likely to be so judicious as to behave accordingly.

It can hardly be necessary, for the benefit of any one who is acquainted with any of Mr. Galton's work, to add that his language and style are good, that the candour and ingenuity of his observations are alike admirable, and that his discourse abounds in peculiarly neat and original analogies and speculations. For the benefit of others, if any such there be, it may be worth while to mention one or two such passages. In the chapter on "Latent Elements," Mr. Galton devises a most ingenious simile from playing-cards. Suppose a hand of thirteen cards to be dealt from each of two packs, and another hand of thirteen from the twenty-six so obtained. Then any given card in either of the original packs may be dealt in the final pack, while it is certain that most of them will not be. "So," says Mr. Galton, "I conceive it to be with hereditary transmission. No given pair can possibly transmit the whole of their ancestral qualities; on the other hand, there is probably no description of ancestor whose qualities have not been in some cases transmitted to a descendant." This is so artful, and analogies are such a fruitful source of delusion, that it is almost necessary to observe that there is no ground for believing any "ancestral quality" to be nearly such a definite and enduring thing as a playing-card, but rather the contrary. No such criticism need be passed on the following poetical parallel:—

The population retains its peculiarities, although the elements of which it is composed are never stationary. In these respects a population may be compared to a cloud that seems to repose in calm upon a mountain plateau, while a gale of wind is blowing over it. The outline of the cloud remains unchanged, although its elements are in violent movement, and in a condition of perpetual destruction and renewal. The well-understood cause of such clouds is the deflection of a wind laden with invisible vapour, by means of the sloping flanks of the mountain, up to a level at which the atmosphere is much colder and rarer than below. Part of the invisible vapour with which the wind was charged becomes thereby condensed into the minute particles of water of which clouds are formed. After a while the process is reversed. The particles of cloud, having been carried by the wind across the plateau, are swept down the other side of it again to a lower level, and during their descent they return into invisible vapour. Both in the cloud and in the population there is, on the one hand, a continual supply and inrush of new individuals from the unseen; they remain a while as visible objects, and then disappear. The cloud and the population are composed of elements that resemble each other in the brevity of their existence, while the general features of the cloud and of the population are alike in that they abide.

A VOYAGE IN A NORFOLK WHERRY.*

FRIESLAND Meres and through the Netherlands is the somewhat clumsy title of a very entertaining little book. It was a happy thought of the writer, after exhausting the not very extensive waterways of Norfolk, to transfer his "wherry" to the "greater Broadland" of Friesland, and enjoy the satisfaction of showing the natives the way about their own waters. The land as well as the water is apparently free from tourists, and so little known that we can almost sympathize with Mr. Doughty's friends, who asked him when he came home:—

* Friesland Meres and through the Netherlands: the Voyage of a Family in a Norfolk Wherry. By Henry Montagu Doughty, Author of "Summer in Broadland." London: Sampson Low & Co. 1889.

"Do tell me, where is Friesland? Somewhere near Iceland, isn't it?"

"What language do they speak?"

"What did you find to eat?"

"What! did you go in a wherry? Didn't you get very wet when it rained? It must have been hard work rowing her," &c.

A wherry in Norfolk means a river barge, which, owing to the fineness of its lines and the arrangement of its sail, can lie closer to the wind than any craft with which we are acquainted; indeed, the progress of the Gipsy through Holland and Friesland seems to have been a continuous series of triumphs over the local "tjalks" and other craft. For sailing on fresh water nothing that floats can beat a Norfolk wherry; like house-boats on the Thames for size and comfort, yet safe and fast and handy under sail; they float in three feet of water, and can lead where nothing bigger than a boat can follow. Mr. Doughty is evidently an experienced sailor-man, and seems to have handled his craft capitally; but we must humbly suggest a doubt as to whether his masthead was the correct place to carry his ensign.

A great drawback to the complete enjoyment of his book is the map of Friesland, which is on so minute a scale that a microscope would be needed to trace the sinuous red thread which marks his route through the countless meres and canals with which the province is veined. He visited nearly all the towns, old walled towns most of them—Sneek, Leeuwarden, Dokkum, Bolsward, Workum, Sloten, and Lemmer—and only on two occasions seems to have met with any incivility. His subsequent voyage by the Ysel to the Rhine, and thence by Utrecht and Leiden back up the western part of Holland, is through better-known scenes, and gives one a charming impression of green landscapes, street canals, picturesque gables, carved oak panelling, and stained-glass windows. Museums are, as a rule, the dreariest of human resorts; but that at Leeuwarden, whose simple name is the "Friesch Genootschap van Geschied oudheid en Taalkende," must be described in the visitor's own words:—

We went to see the Museum, because, as dear old Hans Andersen has taught us, "You must do it for decency's sake, for you are sure to be asked when you come back, and then you're sure to be told that you have omitted to see what is best worth seeing." And, prejudice against museums apart, we enjoyed ourselves immensely, for we found delights we little bargained for.

Why do not our English museum-makers take a lesson from their Frisian cousins, and, instead of putting separate pieces of puzzle in separate glass cases, fit them together, and instruct us with a harmonious whole? In this museum we found two rooms which seemed to have been taken bodily from the everyday life of ancient Hindelopen, and very fascinating they are.

The rooms were spotlessly clean, and forcibly reminded us of a model dairy by their tiled walls and floor, and the soft light which came in from a small-paned window. Of course the tiles are Old Dutch, with biblical subjects. In the first room were sitting and standing three good people, two women and a man, in the quaintest of dresses. They were discussing the beverage which "cheers but not inebriates," but unluckily they were not alive, but only "stuffed people," as some one called the figures at the "Colonies," and could not invite us to partake.

One side of this room was filled with old oak armoires, two-storied, and with massive doors; beds, we shrewdly suspect they would be, did these "stuffed people" require such accommodation, and there were little painted ladders for climbing into them.

Hindelopen taste in colours was and is almost barbaric, and there were plenty of examples here, almost Indian-looking, with closely blended arabesque patterns, in the brightest colours imaginable. Little square "stoofjes," or foot-warming footstools, openwork with brass handles, a cradle, I think a tea-tray, and many things beside. There was no carpet in the rooms, only a small round mat under the tea-table; but the tiled floor did not need covering. The dresses I cannot describe; but one good dame had a beautiful silver châtelaine, and the mirror which hung against the wall was framed in tortoiseshell.

But no inventory, however complete, can give any idea of the charm of the place; those two ghostly rooms, and the three weird figures sitting for ever over their never-begun and never-finished tea.

There is an equally charming description of a palatial doll's-house at Utrecht: indeed, there are few towns in Holland or Friesland without some sight worth seeing; a gabled street closed by an ancient gate, a tree-bordered canal street, or a very narrow alley between leaning houses, and a glimpse of a broad river at the end of it, not to speak of churches and many-storied Renaissance town-halls and water-towers. The costumes of the women and their extraordinary gold head-dresses complete the picture, and the bright colours, set off by the brilliant atmosphere, made the voyagers feel that they had, indeed, reached a new country. The artists found that they had to use pure colour, instead of the grey half-tones to which they were accustomed under English skies:—

The clearness of the air and the brightness of the colouring was noticeable. The houses are of red brick, or else painted in audacious colours, looking ever fresh; windows are large, the glass more than merely clean—polished—with immaculate white blinds. Every bit of brass work is burnished; then the sky is pure azure, and the foliage a vivid green. Filthy black smoke never sullies these Dutch towns; peat is the common fuel, and makes but little smoke—polite simple-seeming people; such were our impressions.

For healthy enjoyment, including almost all the delights of yachting, with safety and comfort to the ladies of the party, combining with all this the pleasure of visiting a foreign country without the ceaseless worry produced by hotels, railways, and luggage, Mr. Doughty's mode of spending his summer holiday, seems unequalled. It seems strange that it has not been done before; but we feel sure that now he has shown the way it will be done again. Many Englishmen, of course, have visited Holland in boats of various kinds. Mr. Doughty heard at Edam of an "Engelsch schip" which had lain there, which his informant, a farmer's wife, told him contained "four men, one a black man, and one a very long man." They slept under an awning, and bought cheese of her; but it was reserved for him to discover the absolutely perfect vessel for the purpose. We feel quite a thrill of patriotic pride as we read of the way in which the familiar Norfolk wherry went away from all the boëyers, tjalks, praams, schuuts, aaks, schouws, and boks with which the lakes and rivers abounded; for in Holland, as in China, many are born, live all their days, and die on board their craft; generations succeed each other who have no homes on shore:—

Of course [says Mr. Doughty] their status varies, from well-to-do families in large new vessels, smart and clean as any yacht, to gipsy-looking folk in a neglected lighter; but smiles and salutes, never an ill word or look, met us from one and all, and the country over; and I never saw a waterman the worse for liquor.

We must not forget to mention the illustrations, done in pen-and-ink, and very cleverly and effectively done, by the ladies of the party. Slight and unpretending though many of them are, they form a notable contrast to Mr. C. Davies's blurred photographs of the same scenes in his somewhat disappointing book, On Dutch Waterways. For the benefit of those who have never beheld such a craft, the cover of the book displays, on a seascape ingeniously formed out of the Dutch flag, a stately wherry sailing in the wind's eye, while a local tjalk runs before it. We think it very possible that this simple account of the Gipsy's adventures may incline others who love sailing, sketching, and out-of-the-way travelling to be advised by old Thomas Fuller:—"If thou wilt see much in little, travel the Low Countries; Holland is all Europe in an Amsterdam print, for Minerva, Mars, and Mercury, learning war and traffic."

BOOKS ON THE OUTSIDES OF BOOKS.*

BIBLIOGRAPHY must, to some minds, be a very fascinating science. Just as we have heard an amateur architect remark that it must be pleasant to design houses for other people to live in, so it must be pleasant to write about books without having to read them. The worst of it is that the critic who notices bibliographical works cannot be expected, even by the most exorbitantly tyrannical editor, to read even one of them through "from cover to cover," or "from end to I." The object of a critical notice of such books as those before us is to instruct the patient and obedient reader as to which he may safely place on his shelves for occasional consultation, and which he may hesitate over or reject. To arrive at a right judgment requires long experience of such books and of the kind of disappointment chiefly encountered in consulting them; and it needs also, with an extreme anxiety for exactness, an oblivion for faults of style, or rather for absence of style, and for the constant repetition of the same particulars. A volume of Lowndes may serve, in the almost total absence of anything else, to instruct, if not to entertain, a very omnivorous reader; but the most interesting part of the first book on our list is the introduction, originally compiled by the late Mr. Winter Jones, and continued to the present year by Mr. Bullen. The book itself has been greatly improved in this edition by expanding the subject-index, which previously was of comparatively little use. It now gives the short title and press-mark of every book. The introduction opens with a contrast between the Museum of 1759 and that of 1859, when the first edition of this list was issued. Admission at first, and down to 1810, was by ticket only. Mr. Jones, when he became Principal Librarian, seems to have somewhat modified the views here expressed, and, as is well known, restricted admissions by every means in his power; here, however, he congratulates the public on the large number of readers, a daily average of 420 having been attained. Under different arrangements it has now risen to 620; and the number of books supplied to readers, which in 1859 was 652, has now risen to 2,448. The introduction of the electric light has enabled the authorities "to avoid the enforced closing of the Museum on the occasion of a London fog," and greatly to extend the number of hours during which the Reading Room can remain open. A great improvement was introduced with the electric light when the lowest of the galleries which surround the Reading Room was filled with a second selection of works of reference to the number of 18,000, chosen mainly as being the works most frequently in requisition; and these books can be obtained long after the corridors of the general library have been closed for the day. The body of the Catalogue before us is beyond criticism. To the superficial observer the selection appears highly arbitrary; but no doubt the authorities have good reasons for their choice, and have placed on these shelves the volumes most frequently wanted by the daily reader.

The Catalogue and index of additions to the collection of manuscripts fill a stout, closely-printed volume of more than eleven hundred pages. It comprises all acquisitions made between 1882 and 1887. "The department," we are told, "has, during the six years covered by this Catalogue, been largely benefited by donations from various sources." Special mention is made in the preface of Lord Chichester's munificent gift of the official and private papers of the Duke of Newcastle, who was for forty-nine years a Minister of State, having become Lord Chamberlain in 1717 and having given up the Privy Seal in 1766, two years before his death. Every one remembers Walpole's amusing account of him. This collection consists of 548 volumes, besides 3,483 charters of the united families of Holles and Pelham. The department has also been enriched with a considerable number of illuminated manuscripts, and with the six volumes of State papers and historical documents which belonged to the late Sir Alexander Malet, and were acquired by the Museum in 1883. A wonderfully complete index occupies more than half the volume.

Mr. Sharman has endeavoured very bravely to identify all the books named in two inventories of the library of Queen Mary of Scotland. He has succeeded very well in a great many cases. The Queen evidently not only brought from France a goodly parcel of the beautiful productions of the Parisian press of the early sixteenth century, but kept up the supply at a later period, and also bought a few books printed in England. The number of specimens of Galliot du Pré and of Antoine Verard must have been considerable. On the whole, though we notice some misprints, and though Mr. Sharman's style is not always very clear, this is a book which sets a good example. A considerable knowledge of old French and English literature is involved in such an essay as this; but for an amateur with ample leisure a task like that which Mr. Sharman has set himself must be very pleasant. In quoting Notes and Queries on p. 45, Mr. Sharman should have mentioned the series, and we observe that on p. 50 he uses the word "copy" for "edition." At p. 52 there is an amusing example of Miss Strickland's way of writing history. It relates to Queen Elizabeth's translation of Boethius. Mr. Sharman might have found a more exact account of the work. Bowyer, who kept the Tower records, wrote to the Queen in 1593, and sent her a computation that the work had occupied her in all for twenty-four hours, at the rate of two hours a day. Mr. Sharman's heraldry fails him at p. 132, where he speaks of Queen Mary as "quartering" the arms of Queen Elizabeth. On the whole, however, this is an interesting volume not to the bibliographer alone, but to any historical student, and throws some side light on an obscure period.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

M. JULIEN TIERSOT, some four years ago, received an Institute "crown" for an essay on a certain period of French popular song-writing, and has now amplified it into a volume which contains a very large amount of matter (1). It must be a question for opinion to decide whether it is desirable or not to keep the purely literary and the purely musical sides of such a subject apart. M. Tiersot has not kept them apart, and in handling them together has ventured into the very perilous region of the musical notation of the ancients, designating the "mode" of this folk-song as "hypodorian, concluding on the dominant," of that as "a mixture of the major and hypophrygian modes," and so forth. We think we are not rash in saying that such matters are too technical, if not too contentious, for it to be satisfactory to treat them otherwise than by themselves. The purely literary part of the matter, and the border-ground between the literary and the technically musical, offered an ample field, of which M. Tiersot has availed himself not ill. He has covered in his view a very wide space, extending from the early romances, of which "Fair Isabel" is a specimen, to this present nineteenth century; he has endeavoured to "rationalize" the songs into love-songs, songs of the maumariée or unhappy wife, war-songs, drinking-songs, historical and other ballads, and the like; and, finally, he has, as we have said, devoted very considerable pains to the airs as well as to the words. It would appear that he has acquainted himself with most of the literature of the subject, including the recent researches of "folklorists," and his book contains very copious references to other works where the inquirer may fill up his stock of information. If a fault is to be found with it anywhere, it must probably be that, while it offers much more information in detail than is necessary for an essay, we have still nothing like an exhaustive history of French folk-song. To give this in full with all the variants of the different songs, after the fashion of Professor Child's monumental collection of English ballads, would, of course, be impossible in any single volume of a less size than Webster's Dictionary. But we think that M. Tiersot might have given a rather smaller, but still representative, collection of extracts in his text, and have thus made room for a nearly, if not quite, exhaustive catalogue of songs (not, of course, given in full) in an appendix or a separate

(1) Histoire de la chanson populaire en France. Par Julien Tiersot. Paris: Plon.

* Books of Reference in the Reading Room of the British Museum. Third edition. Printed for the Trustees. 1889.

Catalogue of Additions to the Manuscripts in the British Museum. Printed for the Trustees. 1889.

The Library of Mary Queen of Scots. By Julian Sharman. London: Stock. 1889.

division of the book. There are, however, always difficulties in the enlargement of a prize essay into a book, and M. Tiersot's volume is more than interesting enough as it is to justify itself, and also the fuller notice which we hope to give it elsewhere.

It is less surprising that La nouvelle Héloïse (2) should make her appearance in M. Jouaust's extremely beautiful "Petite Bibliothèque Artistique"—the most satisfactory, on the whole, of the numerous collections of the kind which are now produced in France—than that she should have waited so long for a place in it. True, Julie is not the attraction that once she was—that she was, as has just been shown in the letters published by Mr. David Ritchie, even to a girl so little sentimental as Jane Welsh (soon to be Carlyle), sixty years ago. The magnificent lines (perhaps, on the whole, the finest and most genuine that he ever wrote) of Byron in Childe Harold remain, and will remain for ever, to show what that attraction was to two generations, not the foolishness that Europe has known; and more than one prose passage of Hazlitt, a person sufficiently different from Byron, might be cited to accompany them. Even to this day, out of fashion as the style is, deliberately as Rousseau went out of his way to choke his book with surplussage of sentimentality and to starve it with penury of incident, no one who has what its own day called an âme sensible can read the immortal "Oh! mourons, ma douce amie," or any one of a dozen other passages, without acknowledging that here at least the author attained to that greatest triumph of literature—the embodying of a particular phase of thought, of feeling, of experience in words more adequate, more vivid, more forcible than any other writer has given to it. But almost from the first there has been a strong party against poor Mme. de Wolmar. Even on the Continent, and still more in England, those who prize (and there is something to be said for them) reticence about the delights of passion have always looked on the book as an unmanly, if not a positively immoral, piece of gush. It has been urged—and, indeed, it is very hard to deny it—that Saint-Preux was not only not a gentleman by birth (which he could not help), but was also, like his very gifted, but sometimes very despicable, creator, the reverse of a gentleman now and then in his sentiments and behaviour. The opinion of the saner part of the civilized world—even of the saner among those who fervently admire parts of the book—has always been that, if the passages referring to Mylord Edouard Bomston and M. de Wolmar respectively could have been separately hung round the necks of those two personages, and the whole parcel have then been drowned in the profoundest corner of the Lake of Geneva, it had been a blessed riddance. Still with the more capable students of literature the book, even with this heavy load, will survive and float unmerged in the other lake of Oblivion for ever and ever—all the more that the old reproach of immorality brought against it has, since the advent of Naturalism, been exchanged for that of insipid dullness. It can hardly be necessary to say at any great length that M. Jouaust's presentation of the first instalment of it is immaculate in all respects of workmanship. The illustrations are charming, and only too few—the frontispiece of Jean-Jacques, in his famous Armenian dress, is more prepossessing than usual, and the two etchings by M. Hédouin, the famous Bosquet scene, and the last farewell, where Saint-Preux grovels on the stairs, are among the most successful book illustrations that we have seen for a long time. In the first-named plate the action of Claire playfully pushing Julie forward is charmingly given; and in the second, all suspicion of the ridiculous—a peril especially incident to the treatment of such a scene in miniature—is avoided. The text appears also to have been printed with the greatest care, and divers faults, which always creep into constantly reprinted matter, have been removed. If we have a fault to find, it is with the introduction. M. John Grand-Carteret has done most excellent and agreeable work as an iconographer, and knows his eighteenth century well; but we had not previously any reason to think highly of him as a literary critic, nor have we now. To class Scott with "gens qui n'ont pas d'âme," and a good deal more of the same kind, because he did not like a book which it is extremely probable he never read in the original, and his dislike for which is easily accountable for, is uncritical to the point of imbecility, and there is much else both of praise and blame, which is equally questionable. But the introductions play but a small part in these beautiful editions, and may almost be neglected.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

AN appropriate start is made with "The Temple Library" by Dr. Birkbeck Hill's Select Essays of Dr. Johnson, with etchings by Mr. Herbert Railton (Dent & Co.), two volumes clad in the prettiest Quakerish hue imaginable, the type and paper delightful to sight and touch, the selection and notes altogether such as good Johnsonians must expect of an editor of Dr. Hill's equipment. Perhaps it is a sign of the hopeless loss of influence sustained by the Johnsonian essay that these charming reprints are offered, no doubt wisely, to the few. The issue is limited, and there is a "large paper" form, also limited. And yet there was a time, after its publication was abandoned, when the Rambler circulated freely, and there is plenty of evidence to show it was piously preserved. Ramblers and Idlers may be even now picked up by the book-hunter, substantially bound in leather, although the original reception was, as Dr. Hill remarks, not encouraging. The fate of Johnson's essays is sad, indeed, though scarcely so melancholy as the neglect of Cowley, with which Dr. Hill compares it. There is a fashion in periodical literature, and the bulk of readers obey it and follow with fervour. It is not to be expected that a public given over to Tit-Bits should fall back on the ephemeral or light literature of the last century. Dr. Hill's selection is, it is needless to say, a good one. It includes a fair sample of Johnson's contributions to Hawkesworth's Adventurer, and, it is well to note, though the Rambler does much more abound, a capital gathering of Idlers. If, as bookseller Cave confessed, "Mr. Johnson is the Great Rambler," it may with truth be asserted that he is the greater Idler. Those persons whose regard for Johnsonian criticism is much the same as the attitude of Coleridge's servant towards the author of the Watchman—"La, sir! it's only Idlers" is the mark of the tribe—might do worse things than study the opinions of Mr. Minim.

An instructive and suggestive summary of the last ten years of English political history is put forth as "a handbook for Unionists," under the title Mr. Gladstone and English Politics (Woodford, Fawcett, & Co.), by Mr. George Brooks, whose record is not merely exhaustive and searching, but peculiarly interesting, because of the writer's recent conversion from the Gladstonian faith. If we had not too much evidence of the extremely limited reading of the average good Gladstonian, both in past history and recent, we should be hopeful of excellent results from the publication of Mr. Brooks's plain-spoken, forcible, and convincing book. The writer hailed Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule measure with joy; but he was previously a vigorous critic of Mr. Gladstone's older Irish policy of sops and tinkering. A visit to the United States during the last Presidential election cured him of all belief in Mr. Gladstone's newest panacea for Irish "disaffection," and it is obvious that such an experience must necessarily lead any earnest inquirer, free from partisan spirit, to the same conclusion arrived at by Mr. Brooks. In America, as the writer observes, the Home Rule movement has "its base, its centre, its life, and strength"; and there he found the professed enemies of his country banded together in support of it. Hence Mr. Brooks was impelled to reconsider his position, and the vindication of his changed convictions should be read by all who have any respect for or faith in Liberalism.

Your voyager who keeps a journal and prints it at request of friends is not always so frank and fearless a chronicler of small beer as is Mr. Marchamp Longway (J. C. P. W.), whose London to Melbourne (Remington & Co.) is made up of the ordinary impressions of a voyager on an Orient Line steamer from London to Australia. In addition to the unutterable excitements that ever attend a sea voyage, the author provides a pitiless account of a visit to Naples, Pompeii, and so forth, of which we can only remark that, having read it, we would not invite our worst enemy to incur the "yawn of such a venture."

From Messrs. Macmillan & Co. we have new editions of Kingsley's Play and Puritans, and other Essays; Mrs. Oliphant's Sheridan, "English Men of Letters" series; Miss Charlotte M. Yonge's Chantry House, and Kingsley's Westward Ho! a re-issue of the famous Devonshire romance at sixpence, printed in double columns of good clear type by Messrs. Clark of Edinburgh.

With due allowance for the lessened range available, Mr. Alfred H. Miles has succeeded quite as well with his collection of short tales, Fifty-two Stories for Girls (Hutchinson & Co.), as with the companion volume for boys, already noticed. The editorial aim and method are the same. The stories, from many sources, are classified under the various heads of Home and School, Heroism, Adventure, Domestic Life, Historical and Fairy Lore, and, with all this uncommon variety, there does not appear to be one of the fifty-two without merit.

We have also received the new volume of that well-established favourite The Quiver (Cassell & Co.), compact of wholesome reading and pretty illustrations; the Handbook for Jamaica for 1889-90 (Stanford), edited by Messrs. A. C. Sinclair and Laurence R. Fyfe, comprising statistical and other information, with a map of the island prepared from the Government survey; and The Republic of Uruguay, 1888-9 (Liverpool: Rockliff), an official description of "the country at the Paris Exhibition," with statistics and illustrations that offer striking evidence of its progress and prosperity.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we cannot return rejected Communications; and to this rule we can make no exception, even if stamps for return of MS. are sent. The Editor must also entirely decline to enter into correspondence with the writers of MSS. sent in and not acknowledged.

ADVERTISEMENTS intended for the SATURDAY REVIEW should be addressed to the MANAGER of the ADVERTISEMENT DEPARTMENT at the OFFICE, 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON. A printed Scale of Charges can be obtained on application.

(2) J.-J. Rousseau—La nouvelle Héloïse. Première partie. Edition Jouaust. Paris: Librairie des Bibliophiles.

SUN LIFE OFFICE.

EXTRACTS FROM THE SOCIETY'S PROSPECTUS.

Dealing with all the most IMPORTANT POINTS necessary to be considered by Life Insurers.

- (1.) The AGE. This Society was ESTABLISHED in the year 1810.
- (2.) The FUNDS of the Society are AMPLE and WELL INVESTED.
- (3.) The ULTIMATE COST of Assurance in the "SUN."

The Bonus declared in January 1888 proves that a WITH PROFIT Policy, under Table A, opened with the Sun Life Office can be had at considerably LESS THAN COST PRICE—that is, can be eventually obtained for less than the UNLOADED NET PREMIUM.

- (4.) The LIBERALITY of the "SUN'S" CONTRACT and PRACTICAL FACILITIES for DEALING with its Policies.
- (5.) ECONOMY of Management in the "SUN."

EXTRAVAGANT and INJUDICIOUS Expenditure can NEVER produce LARGE BONUS Results to Policy-Holders; hence it is of the FIRST IMPORTANCE that ECONOMICS should be understood and practised.

The Expense Ratio on RENEWAL Premiums, after making due allowance for the large amount of new business transacted, was during the last financial year less than FOUR PER CENTUM of the Premiums.

- (6.) The BASIS of Valuation in the "SUN."

The Valuation, June 24, 1887, was made by the CARLISLE Table of Mortality, on the Basis of which the Premiums charged have long been calculated; a low rate of Interest has been assumed, viz., 3 PER CENT., and the NET PREMIUMS have only been dealt with, thus leaving FUTURE PROFITS entirely UNANTICIPATED.

- (7.) The TEST of Stability.

The Sun Life Assurance Society on the 24th June, 1887, had—(a) Over TWELVE Years' Premium Income in Hand; (b) Over £36 Cash invested against every £100 assured.

- (8.) The DISTRIBUTION of PROFITS in the "SUN."

Bonuses have been regularly declared since 1843, amounting in the aggregate to £1,857,452, and at the last Division, which was exceptionally large, £192,706 was apportioned, and resulted in an average

CASH RETURN OF £36 IN EVERY £100 PAID IN PREMIUMS.

Apply for the Society's Prospectus, at the CHIEF OFFICE, Threadneedle Street, London, E.C.

JOHN G. PRIESTLEY } Joint
HARRIS C. L. SAUNDERS } Actuaries.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION for the ADVANCEMENT of ART and its APPLICATION to INDUSTRY.

CONGRESS AT EDINBURGH.

OBJECTS OF THE ASSOCIATION.

This ASSOCIATION has been formed for the purpose of holding an ANNUAL CONGRESS, in the Principal Manufacturing Towns of the Kingdom in rotation, to discuss problems of a practical nature connected with the welfare of the Arts, Fine and Applied. By invitation of the CORPORATION of the City of Edinburgh the SECOND CONGRESS will be held here during the WEEK COMMENCING October 27, 1889.

The SECOND ANNUAL CONGRESS of the NATIONAL ASSOCIATION for the ADVANCEMENT of ART and its APPLICATION to INDUSTRY will be held at EDINBURGH, from October 27 to November 2, 1889.

President.

The Most Noble the MARQUIS OF LORNE, K.T.

CONGRESS ARRANGEMENTS.

SUNDAY, October 27—
3 P.M. The Congress Sermon will be preached in St. Giles's Cathedral by the Rev. Professor FLINT, D.D., LL.D.

MONDAY, October 28—
8.30 P.M. Presidential Address by the MARQUIS OF LORNE, K.T., President of the Association.

TUESDAY, October 29—
10 A.M. Section of Painting: Presidential Address by BRITON RIVIÈRE, R.A., followed by Two Papers.
2.3 P.M. Section of Applied Art: Presidential Address by WILLIAM MORRIS, followed by Two Papers.

WEDNESDAY, October 30—
10 A.M. Combined Meeting of the Sections of Sculpture, Architecture, and the National and Municipal Encouragement of Art.
10 A.M. Meeting of the Section of Painting.
2.30 P.M. Section of Sculpture: Presidential Address by E. ONSLOW FORD, A.R.A., followed by Two Papers.

THURSDAY, October 31—
10 A.M. Combined Meeting of the Sections of Painting, Sculpture, and Applied Art.
10 A.M. Meeting of the Section of Architecture.
10 A.M. Meeting of the Section of Museums and National and Municipal Encouragement of Art.
2.30 P.M. Section of Architecture: Presidential Address by R. ROWAND ANDERSON, LL.D., and Two other Papers.

FRIDAY, November 1—
10 A.M. Combined Meeting of the Sections of Sculpture and Architecture.
10 A.M. Combined Meeting of the Sections of Applied Art and the National and Municipal Encouragement of Art.
2.30 P.M. Section of Museums and National and Municipal Encouragement of Art: Presidential Address.
4 P.M. General Meeting.

The Presidential Addresses of the Sections will be delivered in the Queen Street Hall, the Section Meetings and Combined Meetings will be held in the Rooms of the New National Portrait Gallery, Edinburgh.

The FREE EVENING MEETINGS for WORKING MEN in the Lecture Hall of the Museum of Science and Art.

SUBSCRIPTIONS AND MEMBERSHIP.

The Subscription for Members is One Guinea; for Associates, Half-a-Guinea. Associates will be entitled to attend all the Meetings of the Congress, but will not be invited to the Entertainments given by the Association, and will not receive the Volume of Transactions. Tickets may be obtained direct from the LONDON OFFICE—22 ALBEMARLE STREET, PICCADILLY.

EDINBURGH OFFICE—139 GEORGE STREET, EDINBURGH.

H. W. CORNILLON, S.S.C., Hon. Local General Secretary.

CRYSTAL PALACE SATURDAY CONCERT.

Saturday, at Three. First of Thirty-fourth Annual Series of SATURDAY CONCERTS. Vocalist: Mr. Edward Lloyd. Pianoforte: Mme. Roger-Mielos. The renowned Crystal Palace Orchestra. Conductor, Mr. AUGUST MANN. Seats, rs. 6d. and 1s.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE, Haymarket.—Managing Director, HENRY J. LESLIE. HER MAJESTY'S PROMENADE CONCERTS. At 8 o'clock. Orchestra and Band of Scots Guards of 100 Performers. Conductor, Signor BEVIGNANI. Concert 8 o'clock. Prices of admission, 1s. to £3 3s.—Business Manager, Mr. F. S. FLEMING.

DRURY LANE (The National Theatre).—AUGUSTUS HARRIS, Lessee and Manager.—This Evening at 8. THE ROYAL OAK. Misses Winifred Emery, Neilson, Grey, V. Atherton, and Fanny Brough; Messrs. Henry Neville, Arthur Daere, Lablache, Lorraine, Dobell, Lyons, Thomas, Stephens, and Harry Nicholls.

LYCEUM.—THE DEAD HEART.—Every Evening at Eight o'clock. THE DEAD HEART: Mr. Henry Irving, Mr. Bancroft, Mr. Arthur Stirling, Mr. Righton, Miss Kate Phillips, and Miss Ellen Terry. Box Office (Mr. J. Hurst) open daily 10 to 5. Seats also booked by letter or telegram. Carriages at 11.—LYCEUM.

LYRIC.—Sole Proprietor and Manager, HENRY J. LESLIE. This Evening, at 8.50. DORIS: Mesdames Marie Tempest, Alice Barnett, Harriet Coveney, Hettie Lund, and Hilda Glen; Messrs. Ben Davies, C. Hayden Coffin, S. King, W. T. Hemsley, Frank M. Wood, and Arthur Williams. Preceded at 7.40 by LOVE'S TRICKERY.

ARTS and CRAFTS EXHIBITION SOCIETY.—The NEW GALLERY, Regent Street.—SECOND EXHIBITION NOW OPEN, Ten to Six. Admission, 1s. WALTER CRANE, President. ERNEST RADFORD, Secretary.

EDUCATIONAL.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

UNIVERSITY OF SYDNEY.

- (1) CHALLIS CHAIR OF ANATOMY.
- (2) CHALLIS CHAIR OF LAW.
- (3) CHALLIS CHAIR OF HISTORY.
- (4) CHALLIS CHAIR OF LOGIC AND MENTAL PHILOSOPHY.

The Senate of the University of Sydney, having decided to establish the above Chairs in accordance with the Bequest of the late Mr. John Henry Challis, invite Applications from Gentlemen qualified to fill the same.

All particulars as to tenure of office, salary, &c., may be obtained from the Agent-General for New South Wales, 9 Victoria Street, S.W., to whom applications, stating Candidate's age, and accompanied by eight copies of testimonials, should be sent on or before October 19, 1889.

SAUL SAMUEL,

Agent-General for New South Wales,
9 Victoria Street, London, S.W.

September 16, 1889.

ST. CLARE COLLEGE, WALMER, KENT.

Head-Master.—The Rev. E. D'AUQUIER, M.A. Clare College, Camb. One of the Examiners to the Irish Board of Intermediate Education, late Head-Master of South-Eastern College, Ramsgate, with a staff of Assistant Masters (Graduates).

The College is situated in a delightful spot, close to the sea, and contains teaching and boarding accommodation, chapel, sanatorium, infirmary, playroom, laundry, gymnasium, tuckshop, workshop, &c., 14 acres of well-timbered and beautiful grounds, cycle path, cricket and football fields, tennis-courts, &c., sea-bathing and boating.

The school year is divided into three terms; each term consists of about thirteen weeks. Inclusive fees, Eighty Guineas per annum. Exhibitions and Scholarships, of £10, £15, and £21, are annually thrown open for competition.

For further information, apply to the HEAD-MASTER.

LIVERPOOL INSTITUTE.—HIGH and COMMERCIAL SCHOOLS.

The DIRECTORS desire to receive applications for the HEAD-MASTERSHIP of these Schools. The salary consists of a percentage of the pupils' fees, expected to amount to between £6.0 and £7.0 per annum. No residence is provided. Preference will be given to candidates who are between 30 and 40 years of age. The selected candidate will be required to devote the whole of his time to the duties of his office. Printed particulars may be obtained by applying by letter only to the undersigned, to whom candidates are requested to send in their applications, with copies (not originals) of their testimonials, headed "Head Mastership," on or before the 1st of October.

Mount Street, Liverpool, Oct. 1st, 1889.

CHARLES SHARP, Secretary.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 1,772, OCTOBER 12, 1889:

The French Second Ballots.
Diogenes Harcourt. The Elections of the Week.
Mr. Parnell and Ireland. School Strikes.
Crete. Ocean Oxen. The Strike Mania.
The Songs of the County Council. Lord Randolph Churchill.
Lord Derby on Evening Schools.
More Police Magistrates.
"The Luck of Conybeare."

Edessa to Aleppo.
Kew—II. "Music hath Charms —"
The Arts and Crafts Exhibition. Brazilian Finance.
"Caste." Some Two-year-old Racing.
Money Matters. The Theatres.
Rogues All!

A Century of Revolution.
Novels. New England. The Blind.
Italian Literature. Natural Inheritance.
A Voyage in a Norfolk Wherry.
Books on the Outdoors of Books. French Literature.
New Books and Reprints.

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE Misses S. and R. ALLEN-OLNEY (formerly Head-Mistresses respectively of Blackheath and South Hampstead High Schools), residing in the healthy suburb of Hampstead, receive a few YOUNG LADIES to board and educate. The arrangements are those of a refined home. Large playground and full-sized tennis-court. Preparation for University examinations and degrees. Reference kindly permitted to parents of present and former pupils. —41 Belsize Park Gardens, London, N.W.

THE Rev. W. ALMACK, M.A., BRUCE CASTLE, near TOTTENHAM, prepares PUPILS wanting special help for the Universities, Army, Legal or Medical Preliminaries, or the ordinary requirements of business life. Excellent house in Park of 20 acres, containing Cricket and Football grounds. References, the Head-Masters of Charterhouse, Cheltenham, and Marlborough.

MILITARY COMPETITIVE.
Colonels B. A. WILKINSON and W. J. SHAW,
FARNHAM, SURREY, and VICTORIA HOUSE, ALDERSHOT.

Results of 1888 and 1889 to date:

A. C. Goings.	E. T. James.	C. L. Graham.
C. H. Bennett.	T. S. Smith.	E. S. Smith.
F. L. Richardson.	S. F. Legge.	A. J. Ralph.
N. C. MacLachlan.	C. H. Corbett.	A. F. Owen Lewis.
J. S. Dallas.	H. B. Galloway.	J. P. Law.
H. G. Heneage.	R. H. Pitcairn.	J. A. McLean.
G. D. E. Fullerton.	D. A. N. Lomax.	H. G. W. Wayne.
C. W. Howard.	J. M. F. Hiddings.	G. C. B. Weld-Forester.

Separate Department for Woolwich and Sandhurst Candidates.
Classes for the March Military Competitive now forming.

BELL FARM, CLEWER HILL, WINDSOR.
BOYS prepared for ETON and other PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—Address Miss HIBBARD.

PRÉ SCILLA, LAUSANNE.—Miss WILLS, late Head-Mistress of the Norwich High School, has a very comfortable English HOME for Elder GIRLS. Garden and full-sized Tennis-court. Numbers limited. Subjects taken:—French, German, Italian, Music, Singing, and Painting.

RADFORD HOUSE, COVENTRY.
PREPARATORY SCHOOL for the SONS of GENTLEMEN. Established 1800. Boys received from Six to Twelve years of age, and prepared for College and Local Examinations, which have hitherto been successfully passed by the Pupils of this School. Eight acres of recreation ground.—Apply for particulars to Mrs. and Miss HOUGHTON.

SCHOOL PIANOS.—NEW MODELS, from 18 Guineas. All the latest improvements. These instruments are remarkable for their beautiful tone, perfect touch, and durability. PIANOS for HIRE, or on the THREE YEARS' SYSTEM.—W. J. ENNEVER & SON, Manufacturers, 57 Berners Street, London, W.

ILFRACOMBE.—ILFRACOMBE HOTEL. Thoroughly furnished, equipped, and decorated. 250 Rooms. Eight Lawn-Tennis Courts, Large Swimming Bath, Private Baths. Descriptive Tariff of Manager.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS'
UPRIGHT IRON GRAND PIANOFORTES.
Prices from 40 Guineas upwards.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Pianoforte Makers by Special Appointment to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales, 1889.—18, 20, and 22 Wigmore Street, W. Lists free.

A Y T O N & T H O M A S,
PATENT AGENTS.
Conduct every kind of British, Foreign, and Colonial Business connected with PATENTS, DESIGNS, AND TRADE MARKS.
Mr. H. M. THOMAS, Author of "The True Position of Patentees," being a practical engineer, PERSONALLY SUPERINTENDS the applications in respect of mechanical inventions.
Moderate Terms. No charge for preliminary advice.
Telegraphic Address, "Prolonged, London."
9 & 10 Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, W.C.

METROPOLITAN DRINKING FOUNTAIN and CATTLE TROUGH ASSOCIATION.

Supported entirely by Voluntary Contributions.

This is the only Society providing Free Supplies of Water for Man and Beast in the London and Suburbs.

Contributions are very earnestly solicited.

Bankers: Messrs. BARCLAY, BEVAN, TRITTON, RANSOM, BOUVIER & Co.

Victoria Street, S.W.

M. W. MILTON, Secretary.

LIFE ASSURANCES, &c.

GUARDIAN FIRE and LIFE OFFICE.

HEAD OFFICE—11 LOMBARD STREET, LONDON, E.C.

LAW COURTS BRANCH—21 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Established 1821. Subscribed Capital, £2,000,000.

Directors.

Chairman—JOHN B. MARTIN, Esq.

Deputy-Chairman—HENRY JOHN NORMAN, Esq.

Henry Bonham-Carter, Esq.

Wm. Hill Dawson, Esq.

Charles F. Devas, Esq.

Granville F. R. Farquhar, Esq.

Alban G. H. Gibbs, Esq.

James Goodson, Esq.

John J. Hamilton, Esq.

Thomson Hankey, Esq.

Richard M. Harvey, Esq.

John Hunter, Esq.

George Lake, Esq.

Rt. Hon. G. J. Shaw Lefevre, M.P.

Beaumont W. Lubbock, Esq.

David Powell, Esq.

Augustus Prevost, Esq.

John G. Talbot, Esq., M.P.

Henry Vigne, Esq.

Actuary and Secretary—T. G. C. BROWNE.

Manager of Fire Department—A. J. RELTON.

Share Capital at present paid up and invested £1,000,000

Total Funds upwards of £4,179,000

Total Annual Income over £850,000

N.B.—Fire Policies which expire at Michaelmas should be renewed at the Head Office, or with the Agents, on or before October 14.

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY.

Established 1836.

LONDON—1 MOORGATE STREET, E.C. ABERDEEN—1 UNION TERRACE.

INCOME and FUNDS (1888).

Fire Premiums £615,000

Life Premiums 203,000

Interest 149,000

Accumulated Funds £3,581,000

ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH LAW

LIFE ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION (Established 1839).

12 Waterloo Place, London. 120 Princes Street, Edinburgh.

Whole Life Bonuses never less than £1 10s. per cent. per annum.

Annuities. Loans. Liberal Conditions.

ARTHUR JACKSON, General Manager } 12 Waterloo Place,
FRANCIS E. COLENSO, F.I.A., Actuary } London.

CITY OFFICE—11 LUDGATE HILL, E.C.

JOHN MUNRO, City Secretary.

PHENIX FIRE OFFICE,

LOMBARD STREET and CHARING CROSS, LONDON.—Established 1782.

Moderate Rates. Absolute Security.

Liberal Loss Settlements. Prompt payment of Claims.

W. C. MACDONALD

F. B. MACDONALD

Joint Secretaries.

Losses paid over £17,000,000.

IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Established 1803.—1 OLD BROAD STREET, E.C.; and 22 PAUL MALL, S.W.

Subscribed Capital, £1,200,000. Paid-up, £300,000. Total Invested Funds, over £1,600,000.

E. COZENS SMITH, General Manager.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane.

THREE per CENT. INTEREST on DEPOSITS repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS when not drawn below £100. The Bank undertakes, free of charge, the Custody of Securities and Valuables; the Collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Shares, and Annuities. Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued. THE BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK.

ISSUE of £371,320.

(Authorized by the Sheffield Corporation Acts, 1883 and 1889.)

The CORPORATION of SHEFFIELD give NOTICE that they are prepared to receive applications for the above sum of SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK.

Minimum price of Issue £100 per cent.

Interest payable half-yearly, on March 1 and September 1, at the Sheffield and Hallamshire Bank, Sheffield, or by their London Agents, Messrs. GLYN, MILLS, CURRIE, & CO., 67 Lombard Street.

No sum less than £50 of Stock will be allotted, and any amount in excess of that sum must be a multiple of £10.

Under the Trust Investment Act, 1889, recently passed, this Stock is an available investment for every Trustee who is not expressly forbidden by the instrument creating his trust to invest in Corporation Stock.

Forms of Prospectus, &c., and all information required, will be supplied by

Borough Accountant's Office,

Bridge Street, Sheffield,

August 16, 1889.

W. FISHER TASKER, Registrar.

P. and O. MAIL STEAMERS FROM LONDON TO

BOMBAY, GIBRALTAR, MALTA, BRINDISI, every week.

EGYPT, ADEN, and MADRAS via BOMBAY every week.

CALCUTTA, MADRAS, COLOMBO, CHINA, STRAITS, every alternate week.

and JAPAN, AUSTRALIA, NEW ZEALAND and TASMANIA, ALEXANDRIA, and NAPLES every alternate week.

CHEAP RETURN TICKETS.

For particulars apply at the Company's Offices, 122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., and 25 Cockspur Street, London, S.W.

SUTTON'S BULBS

GENUINE ONLY DIRECT FROM

SUTTON & SONS,
READING.

For full particulars see

SUTTON'S BULB CATALOGUE

Beautifully Illustrated, 6d. post free.

Complete Priced List of Bulbs gratis and post-free.

DINNEFORD'S MAGNESIA.

This pure Solution is the best remedy for Acidity of the Stomach, Heartburn, Headache, Gout, and Indigestion.

DINNEFORD'S MAGNESIA.

The safest and most gentle Aperient for delicate constitutions, Ladies, Children, and Infants.

180 Bond Street, London; and all Chemists.

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL, Strand, W.C.—The

COUNCIL earnestly appeal for DONATIONS and ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS. £20,000 required for new Nursing Establishment, enlargement of Medical School, the Convalescent Home, and current expenses. Bankers: Messrs. Drummond.

ARTHUR E. READE, Secretary.

MEL ROSA, the CERTAIN SAFE CURE for COUGHS,

Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, Hooping Cough, Hoarseness, Incipient Consumption, &c. In Bottles, 1s., 1ld. and 2s. 9d.; post free, 1s. 4ld. and 3s. Prepared only by the Proprietor, HERBERT POTTER, Chemist, M.P.S., Sutton, Surrey.

NOTE.—Insist on being supplied with Potter's "Mel Rosa."

SCHWEITZER'S COCOATINA.

GUARANTEED PURE SOLUBLE COCOA.

This Old-established Article retains its position as "the finest Cocoa in the market." It is unequalled in purity and flavour, bears the strictest Chemical test, and keeps in all climates.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS AND ECONOMICAL.

VAN HOUTEN'S
COCOA.

PURE—SOLUBLE.
BEST & GOES FARTHEST.
EASILY DIGESTED.
MADE INSTANTLY.

"Once used, always used—its PURITY is beyond question."
Health.

"It is admirable—flavour perfect—and so PURE."
British Medical Journal.

C. J. VAN HOUTEN & ZOON,
WEESP, HOLLAND.

FRY'S

Lancet—"Pure, and very soluble."

Medical Times—"Eminently suitable for Invalids."

PURE CONCENTRATED

Sir C. A. CAMERON, President of the Royal
College of Surgeons, Ireland—"I have never tasted Cocoa that I like so well."

COCOA.

THE GREATEST of all PIANOFORTES.

THE STEINWAY PIANOFORTES, New York & London.
Steinway Hall, LOWER SEYMOUR STREET, Portman Square, London, W.

BOOKS, &c.

H. SOTHERAN & CO.

BOOKSELLERS, BOOKBINDERS, AND PUBLISHERS.

GENERAL AGENTS FOR PRIVATE BOOKBUYERS & PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS
IN AMERICA, INDIA, THE COLONIES, AND FOREIGN PARTS.

A MONTHLY CATALOGUE of SECOND-HAND BOOKS, published over forty years; Specimen No. gratis and post-free.

Telegraphic Address: BOOKMEN, LONDON. Established 1816.

136 STRAND, W.C. AND 36 PICCADILLY, W.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW sent by post at following rates
per annum, paid in advance:

Any part of the United Kingdom	£1	8	2
India and China	1	12	6
Other British Colonies, Europe, Egypt, and America	1	10	6

STEEL & JONES, 4 Spring Gardens, London, S.W.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW.—The following NUMBERS
of THE SATURDAY REVIEW are required, for which 1s. each will be given, viz.
1, 2, 15, 25, 56, 59, 73, 75, 99, 112, 130, 132, 138, 174, 452, and 1627 (clean copies)—at the Office
34 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the 1s.—HATCHARDS, 187 Piccadilly,
London. All the New and Standard Books. Bibles, Prayers, Church Services, &c.
Post Orders promptly executed. Libraries arranged and catalogued.

PARIS EXHIBITION.—The FRENCH DICTIONARY
for TOURISTS—BELLOWS' POCKET FRENCH DICTIONARY. 32mo.
with 4 Maps, roan tuck, 10s. 6d.; morocco, 12s. 6d.

"Complete."—Times. "Without a rival."—Spectator. "The most portable."
Also Scotsman.

TOUS les VERBES.—CONJUGATIONS of all the VERBS,
French and English, with Tables of Weights, Measures, and Equivalent
Values, from Bellows' Dictionary. Second Edition. 32mo. 6d.

LONDON: TRÜBNER & CO., LUDGATE HILL.

PARIS: ERNEST LEROUX, 28 RUE BONAPARTE.
AND ALL BOOKSELLERS.

NEW EDITION, price 1s.

HYDROPATHY and HEALTH. By J. ERVING RITCHIE
(Christopher Crayon).

London: W. KENT & CO., Paternoster Row.

Now ready, Fifty-seventh Edition, 2s.

THE CHILD'S GUIDE to KNOWLEDGE. By A LADY.
The Original Authorized Edition, brought down to the Present Time.
London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, & CO.

THE LORDS MARCHERS OF WALES, THEIR CASTLE AND TOWN.
Just published, New and Cheaper Edition (Second). Demy 8vo. cloth, 12s. 6d.

LUDLOW TOWN and NEIGHBOURHOOD: a Series of Sketches of its Scenery, Antiquities, Geology, &c., drawn and described in Pen and Ink. By OLIVER BAKER, Fellow of the Royal Society of Painter-Etchers (London); Member of the Royal Society of Artists (Birmingham). With 70 Illustrations in facsimile from Sketches by the Author. Also a Map of the District.

"Distinguished by delicate feeling and great executive skill."—Graphic.

"Well-executed illustrations and agreeable letterpress."—Notes and Queries.

"Altogether the volume is one of remarkable interest and great beauty."

"Mr. Baker's illustrations are in every way charming, and we feel we are working with a thorough artist."—Academy.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, & CO. Ludlow: G. WOOLLEY, 2 Bull Ring.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LIMITED,

30 to 34 NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.;

241 BROMPTON ROAD, SOUTH KENSINGTON, S.W.;

AND 2 KING STREET, CHEAPSIDE, E.C.

FOR THE CIRCULATION OF BOOKS.

SUBSCRIPTION from £1 1s. per annum.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists Gratis.

FOR THE SALE OF BOOKS.

Second-hand Copies of all the best Books of past Seasons,
at greatly Reduced Prices.

Lists with Prices Gratis.

FOR THE BINDING OF BOOKS.

On the Premises by the best Workmen.

List of Bound Books Gratis.

N.B.—All Lists and Prospectuses Gratis and
Postage Free to any Address.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY,

30 to 34 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

NEW WORK BY PROFESSOR PALGRAVE.

Just ready, a limited Edition in fcp. 4to. half-vellum, gilt top, choicely printed on hand-made paper, 21s.

THE TREASURY OF SACRED SONG.

SELECTED FROM THE ENGLISH LYRICAL POETRY
OF FOUR CENTURIES. WITH NOTES, EXPLANA-
TORY & BIOGRAPHICAL, BY FRANCIS T. PALGRAVE, PROFESSOR OF POETRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD.

N.B.—Only 485 Copies of this Edition, numbered 16 to 500, and signed by the Author, are printed for publication in England.

* * To offer Poetry for Poetry's sake has been the Editor's first aim in compiling this Selection, which is intended to be representative of the entire range of English Sacred Poetry. The brief biographies inserted will, it is hoped, satisfy the natural desire for some acquaintance with the main facts in the lives of those whose best and deepest thoughts are here presented.—From the PREFACE.

LONDON: HENRY FROWDE, CLARENDON PRESS WAREHOUSE,
AMEN CORNER, E.C.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW, No. CCCXXXVIII.

will be published on WEDNESDAY, October 16.

CONTENTS:

1. COURTHOPE'S LIFE OF POPE.
2. THE PRINCIPALITY OF MONACO.
3. WARD AND THE OXFORD MOVEMENT.
4. BATTLE ABBEY ROLL.
5. HEINRICH HEINE.
6. THE INHABITANTS OF EAST LONDON.
7. JOHN LOCKE.
8. GARDINER'S CIVIL WAR.
9. THE ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.
10. THE NATIONAL PARTY OF THE FUTURE.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street.

Now ready, Part III., Vol. LII., SEPTEMBER 1889. Price 5s.

ROYAL STATISTICAL SOCIETY'S JOURNAL.

CONTENTS:

REPORT OF THE COUNCIL TO THE FIFTY-FIFTH ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING.
ON VARIATIONS IN THE VOLUME AND VALUE OF EXPORTS AND IM-PORTS OF THE UNITED KINGDOM IN RECENT YEARS. By S. BOURNE-Esq.
SUGGESTIONS FOR THE CENSUS OF 1891. By Dr. G. B. LONGSTAFF, M.A., F.R.C.P.
MISCELLANEA: (1) Sir Edwin Chadwick on an Annual Census.—(2) The Value of Personal Property in France. By A. NEYMARCK.—(3) Notes on Economical and Statistical Works.—(4) Quarterly List of Additions to the Library.

London: E. STANFORD, 26 and 27 Cockspur Street, Charing Cross, S.W.

THE BUILDER of October 12 contains, amongst other illustrations, a beautiful reproduction of a Decorative Design by Henry Holiday—"Of such is the kingdom of Heaven," from the "Arts and Crafts" Exhibition. Also a critical article on the Exhibition; Sanitation—Past and Future, by Sir Edwin Chadwick, &c. &c.

4d.; by post, 4½d. Annual subscription, 19s.—Office, 46 Catherine Street, London, W.C.

STAMMERERS and STUTTERERS should read a book by a gentleman who cured himself after suffering nearly forty years.

Post free for 13 stamps, from

Mr. B. BEASLEY, Sherwood, Willesden Lane, Brondesbury, London;
and Brompton Park, Huntingdon.

A NOVEL COMMENDED by Mr. GLADSTONE and by Dr. GEORGE MACDONALD. FOR the RIGHT. Now ready, New Cheap Edition. 3s. 6d.

GEORGE MACDONALD:—"I have seldom, if ever, read a work of fiction which moved me with so much admiration."

London: JAMES CLARKE & Co., 13 and 14 Fleet Street, E.C.

HURST & BLACKETT'S NEW NOVELS.

A HARDY NORSEMAN. By EDNA LYALL,
Author of "Donovan," "We Two," &c. 3 vols.

MY LORD OTHELLO. By HENRY CRESSWELL,
Author of "A Modern Greek Heroine," "A Willy Widow," &c. 3 vols.

GEOFF. By GERTRUDE FORDE, Author of "In
the Old Palazzo," "Driven before the Storm," &c. 3 vols.

THE FREAKS of LADY FORTUNE. By
MAY CROMMELIN, Author of "Queenie," "Orange Lily," &c. 2 vols.

THE TREE of KNOWLEDGE. By G. M.
ROBINS, Author of "Keep my Secret," "A False Position," &c. 3 vols.

BOTH OF THIS PARISH. By ALGERNON
GISSING, Author of "Joy Cometh in the Morning," 2 vols.

LONDON: HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED,
13 GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET.

Just published, 1 vol. 8vo. cloth, 15s.

AN EPITOME OF THE SYNTHETIC PHILOSOPHY.

By F. HOWARD COLLINS.

With a Preface by HERBERT SPENCER.

"I have read portions taken at random here and there, and have found them very well done."—Mr. SPENCER in Preface.

Just published, Second Edition, 8vo. 600 pp. cloth, 10s. 6d.

LABOUR AND LIFE OF THE PEOPLE.

Volume I. EAST LONDON.

Edited by CHARLES BOOTH.

WITH A LARGE COLOURED MAP.

Contents: 1. The Classes—2. The Trades (Docks, Tailoring, Bootmaking, Furniture, Tobacco, Silk, Women's Work)—3. Special Subjects (Sweating, Influx of Population, Jewish Community).

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14 HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON AND 20 SOUTH FREDERICK STREET, EDINBURGH.

MR. HERBERT SPENCER'S WORKS.

THE DOCTRINE of EVOLUTION.

FIRST PRINCIPLES. Seventh Thousand, 16s.

PRINCIPLES OF BIOLOGY. Fourth Thousand, 2 vols. 34s.

PRINCIPLES OF PSYCHOLOGY. Fourth Thousand, 2 vols. 36s.

PRINCIPLES OF SOCIOLOGY. Vol. I. Third Edition, 21s.

CEREMONIAL INSTITUTIONS. Second Thousand, 7s.

POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS. Second Thousand, 12s.

ECCLESIASTICAL INSTITUTIONS. Second Thousand. 8vo. cloth, 5s.

THE DATA OF ETHICS. Fourth Thousand, 8s.

OTHER WORKS.

THE STUDY OF SOCIOLOGY. Library Edition (the Ninth). 8vo. 10s. 6d.

EDUCATION. Sixth Thousand, 6s.; also Cheap Edition, Twelfth Thousand, price 2s. 6d.

ESSAYS. 2 vols. Fourth Thousand, 16s.

ESSAYS (Third Series). Third Thousand, 8s.

THE MAN versus THE STATE. Second Thousand, cloth, 2s. 6d.; also Cheap Edition, Seventh Thousand, 1s.

THE FACTORS OF ORGANIC EVOLUTION. 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

NOW READY AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS.

Handsomely bound, cloth gilt, crown 8vo. 6s.

THE AUTHORISED TRANSLATION OF MADAME CARETTE'S GREAT
AND POPULAR WORK,

"Souvenirs intimes de la Cour des Tuileries."

MY MISTRESS, the EMPRESS EUGÉNIE;
Or, Court Life at the Tuileries.

LONDON: DEAN & SON, 150A FLEET STREET, E.C.

Now ready, 47s pp. fcp. 8vo. cloth, 6s.

THE COMPLETE LIFE of HOMER. By F. A. WHITE, B.A.

Containing all that can be known or conjectured of his Life, Works, Birthplace, Date, Parentage, and Ancestry, from his own Works and those of others.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, York Street, Covent Garden.

Now ready, New Edition, price 2s. 6d.

THE HISTORY of the PIANOFORTE. By EDGAR
BRINSMEAD.

LONDON: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, E.C.; and
JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, 18, 20, and 22 Wigmore Street, W.

GEORGE PHILIP & SON'S NEW BOOKS.

On Monday, October 14, of all Booksellers and Libraries.

JOHN DAVIS,

Arctic Explorer and Early India Navigator.

By CLEMENTS R. MARKHAM, C.B., F.R.S.

Three hundred pages crown 8vo. with 16 Original Illustrations and 12 Maps, price 3s. 6d. Forming the First Volume of "THE WORLD'S GREAT EXPLORERS AND EXPLORATIONS." Edited by J. SCOTT KELTIE, Librarian Royal Geographical Society; H. J. MACKINDER, M.A., Reader in Geography at the University of Oxford; and E. G. RAVENSTEIN, F.R.G.S.

To be followed on December 1 by

P A L E S T I N E.

By Major C. R. CONDER, R.E.

Leader of the Palestine Exploring Expeditions.

Uniform in size and price. Detailed Prospectus of the Series may be obtained on application.

THE BEST RECENT ACCOUNT OF AFRICAN TRAVEL.

By JOSEPH THOMSON, Author of "Through Masai Land."

504 pp. crown 8vo. handsomely bound in cloth, 9s.

TRAVELS IN THE ATLAS AND SOUTHERN MOROCCO.

A Narrative of Exploration.

TIMES.

Apart from the distinct value of Mr. Thomson's volume as a contribution to our knowledge of Morocco, it is most attractively written. . . . The book is got up with excellent finish and taste, and the 70 Illustrations and 2 Maps are themselves a valuable help to the story.

SPECTATOR.

Mr. Thomson, a wilful as well as a dauntless explorer, justified the risks he ran by success; and his narrative of adventure gives us an exciting peep at the mighty Atlas, a very good idea of Southern Morocco, a stirring picture of the city itself, and graphic sketches of the Moorish, Jewish, and Berber races with whom he came in contact.

GEORGE PHILIP & SON, 32 FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.;
AND LIVERPOOL.

The October Number commences a New Volume.

ATALANTA, 1889-90.

MONTHLY, PRICE SIXPENCE.

Edited by L. T. MEADE and JOHN C. STAPLES.

THE position which has now been definitely accorded to ATALANTA amongst the leading illustrated magazines of the day renders it unnecessary to call attention to its special features in detail, and it will, therefore, be sufficient to mention that the general programme for the year will include the following:

NEW SERIAL STORY by GEORGE MACDONALD, entitled
"A Rough Shaking."

A NEW SERIAL STORY by JEAN INGELOW, entitled "Very Young."

Serials will also appear during the year by Mrs. PARR and GRANT ALLEN.

Shorter Serials and Stories by Lady LINDSAY, W. E. NORRIS, L. B. WALFORD, F. ANSTEE, and others.

"Old-Fashioned Girls." Popular Stories from the Old Tales and Novels.
Edited by L. T. MEADE.

Biographical Sketches of Celebrated Lady Novelists, by L. B. WALFORD and SARAH TYTLER.

Also Poems, Ballads, and Miscellaneous Papers by Miss THACKERAY, ARABELLA BUCKLEY, CHRISTINA ROSSETTI, Professor C. LLOYD MORGAN, MAXWELL GRAY, Mrs. HAMILTON KING, CONSTANCE GORDON CUMMING, &c. &c.

"ATALANTA" SCHOLARSHIP & READING UNION.

FIRST PRIZE.

A SCHOLARSHIP of £20 per annum, tenable for two years.

SECOND PRIZE.

A SCHOLARSHIP of £10 per annum, tenable for two years.

A Prize of One Guinea, and a Second Prize of Half-a-Guinea, will be given each month for the best and second best Essays received.

Full particulars are given with the October number.

LONDON: HATCHARDS, 187 PICCADILLY, W.

TO TRAVELLERS IN INDIA.

WHITWORTH'S ANGLO-INDIAN DICTIONARY:

A Glossary of Colloquial and Official Terms;

Of the names of Divinities, Festivals, Religions, and Sects; of Races, Tribes, and Languages; of Castes and Occupations; of the different Eras and Systems of Chronology; of seasons, Crops, and Land Tenures, and generally of all Indian terms used in English, and of English words peculiarly used in India. Price 12s.

"Well designed, well printed, and handy."—Saturday Review.

LONDON: KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.

MISS BRADDON'S NEW NOVEL.

In 3 vols. At all Libraries.

THE DAY WILL COME. A Novel. By the Author of

"Lady Audley's Secret" &c.

LONDON: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO.

MESSRS. WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS' NEW PUBLICATIONS.

DEDICATED TO H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES.

HINDU-KOH: Wanderings and Wild Sport
on and beyond the Himalayas. By Major-General DONALD MACINTYRE, V.C., late Prince of Wales' Own Goorkhas; Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society. 8vo. With numerous illustrations, 21s. [Next week.]

SCENES from a SILENT WORLD; or, Prisons and their Inmates. By FRANCIS SCOU GAL. 1 vol. crown 8vo. [Next week.]

ART in SCOTLAND: its Origin and Progress.
By ROBERT BRYDALL, Master of the St. George's Art School of Glasgow. 1 vol. 8vo. [Very shortly.]

SORDELLO: an Outline Analysis of Mr. Browning's Poem. By JEANIE MORISON, Author of "The Purpose of the Ages," "Ane Book of Ballades," &c. 1 vol. crown 8vo. [Immediately.]

BARBARA ALLAN, the Provost's Daughter.
By ROBERT CLELAND, Author of "Inchbracken," "True to a Type," "A Rich Man's Relatives." 2 vols. crown 8vo. 17s. [Next week.]

THE SONG of the BELL; and other Translations from Schiller, Goethe, Uhland, and Others. By Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

"A total absence of any appearance of difficulty, a fluent ease of language, and a ceaseless flow of melody in verse are peculiar to all this writer's translations, and might be illustrated by many citations. . . . The volume will delight the reader of poetry for its own sake, and still more the reader who is able to collate the renderings with their originals, and admire the thousand instances of felicity in catching the right word for the foreign thought."—Scotsman.

"Apart altogether from the merits of the execution in each case, the versatility of the poet is something amazing. He has gone the round of European literature, ancient and modern, and given to his countrymen the choicest specimens of many schools. . . . To those who have read the earlier collections of the author, it must suffice to say that the workmanship is as exact and graceful as ever."—Standard.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

SMITH, ELDER, & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "VICE VERSÂ."

On October 15, in 3 vols. post 8vo.

THE PARIAH.

By F. ANSTEY,

Author of "Vice Versâ," "The Giant's Robe," "A Fallen Idol," &c.

NEW EDITION of the POETICAL WORKS
OF
ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.

To be completed in Six Monthly Volumes. Small crown 8vo. 5s. each.

This Edition will be uniform with the recently published Edition of Mr. Robert Browning's Works. It will contain several Portraits of Mrs. Browning at different periods of life, and a few Illustrations.

There will also be a Large-paper Edition of 125 Copies, printed on Hand-made Paper. This Edition will only be supplied through Booksellers.

Volume I. will be published on October 26.

POCKET EDITION OF MRS. GASKELL'S WORKS.

To be completed in Eight Monthly Volumes, bound in cloth, with cut or uncut edges, price 1s. 6d. per vol.

Vol. II., NORTH and SOUTH, will be ready on October 26.

NEW NATURAL HISTORY VOLUME.

On October 26, crown 8vo. 5s.

WOODLAND, MOOR, and STREAM; being the Notes of a Naturalist.

NEW ANONYMOUS NOVEL.

At all the Libraries, in 2 vols. post 8vo.

THE COUNTY: a Story of Social Life.

"Very lively reading, and never drags."—Manchester Examiner and Times.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

EDWARD STANFORD'S ANNOUNCEMENTS FOR OCTOBER.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED AND ENLARGED.

STANFORD'S LONDON ATLAS of UNIVERSAL GEOGRAPHY. 4to. Edition, containing 46 Coloured Maps, drawn and engraved in the best style, and showing the latest Changes in Political Geography, as well as the leading Physical Features of the various Countries of the World; also an Alphabetical Index to the Geography of the World. Half-morocco, cloth sides, gilt edges, 30s.

CHARTS of the CONSTELLATIONS, from the North Pole to between 35 and 40 Degrees of South Declination. By ARTHUR COTTAM, F.R.A.S. 36 Charts, each 30 by 22 inches, printed on drawing paper, and supplied in a Portfolio. With one exception (Hydra) each Constellation is shown complete on a single Chart and the Scale (one-third of an inch to a degree of a great circle) is much larger than that of any Modern Star Maps. (Detailed Prospectus, with Specimen Chart, free on application.)

LETTERS on INFANTRY. By Prince KRAFT ZU HOHENLOPE INGELFINGEN. Translated by Lieut.-Colonel N. L. WALFORD, R.A. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

LETTERS on CAVALRY. With 3 Folding Plates of Battles. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

The above will be uniform in size and style with the recently published "Letters on Artillery" from the same pen, and combined with that Work will form a very complete account of the operation of troops of the three arms in recent warfare.

THE NEW FAR WEST and the OLD FAR EAST; being an Account of Recent Travel and Observation along the Line of the Canadian Pacific and Manitoba and North-Western Railway, thence to Japan, China, Ceylon, &c. By W. HENRY BARNEBY, Author of "Life and Labour in the Far Far West." Demy 8vo. cloth, with 3 Maps and 8 Page Illustrations, 12s.

A TRIP THROUGH the EASTERN CAUCASUS; being an Account of a Recent Run from Tiflis through the Shin Pass, and back by a less frequented Route, and including a Visit to Derbend, and an Exploration of the Great Wall, with Sketches of the Peoples of Daghestan, their Customs and Language. By the Hon. JOHN ABERCROMBY. Demy 8vo. cloth, with Maps and Illustrations.

MATHEMATICAL EXAMINATION PAPERS, set for the Militia Further and Sandhurst Entrance Examinations, 1885-89. With Answers. By W. F. AUSTIN and J. V. ELSDEN, B.Sc. Demy 8vo. pp. 84, cloth, 2s. 6d.

LONDON: EDWARD STANFORD,
26 AND 27 COCKSPUR STREET, CHARING CROSS, S.W.

MESSRS. ISBISTERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

THE TRIPLE ALLIANCE and ITALY'S PLACE in IT, by "OUTIDANOS," appears in THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW for OCTOBER of which a Second Edition is now ready, price Half-a-Crown.

Just published.

THE LIFE of RICHARD STEELE. By G. A. AITKEN. 2 vols. demy 8vo. with numerous Portraits, 32s.

"That in these days of hasty research and hastier publication such a train of investigation should have been undertaken at all, is remarkable; that so prolonged and arduous an effort should have been selected as the diploma-work of a young and hitherto untired writer, is more remarkable still. Mr. Aitken's will probably be the last Life of Steele. To shrink from no investigation, however tedious, to take nothing at second-hand, to verify everything, to cross-examine everything, to leave no smallest stone unturned in the establishment of the most infinitesimal fact—these are conditions which presuppose a literary constitution of iron. And this recognition his labours undoubtedly deserve."

AUSTIN DOBSON in the Contemporary Review.

"We can honestly recommend Mr. Aitken's biography. He has done his work most exhaustively, and the result is the production of this really important addition to the libraries of all lovers of English literature. It was a long-needed book, and it comes in good time."—Daily Telegraph.

"It has been reserved for Mr. Aitken to write the standard Life of Steele, and we may well be satisfied with the immense mass of details which, with remarkable industry and much acumen he has here brought together. Practically, Steele's latest biographer has exhausted the subject of which he treats. It would, indeed, be difficult to overpraise the loving care bestowed by Mr. Aitken on his enterprise. The book is admirably got up."—Globe.

"In any question about Steele that may arise hereafter, the first inquiry will be, What does Mr. Aitken say?"—Scotsman.

"Readers will have themselves to blame if they do not find in Mr. Aitken's two portly octavo volumes material enough and to spare for estimating aright the position and influence of one of the most delightful of English essayists."

Glasgow Herald.

Just published.

MARY HOWITT: an Autobiography. Edited by her Daughter, MARGARET HOWITT. With Portraits and numerous Illustrations. 2 vols. medium 8vo. 32s.

CONTENTS:—Parentage and Descent—Early Days at Uttoxeter—Girlhood—My Husband's Narrative—First Years of Married Life—At Nottingham—At Esher—In Germany—At Clapton—In St. John's Wood—The Hermitage—In Switzerland and Italy—Rome and Tyrol—The Home in Meran—In the Eternal City.

"It is simply one of the most charming studies of still life that has appeared for a long time."—Standard.

WM. ISBISTER, LIMITED, 15 & 16 Tavistock Street,
Covent Garden, W.C.

WARD & DOWNEY'S NEW LIST.

BIOGRAPHICAL WORKS.

- REMINISCENCES of a CLERICAL and LITERARY LIFE. By the Author of "Three-Cornered Essays" &c. 2 vols. 21s. [This day.]
- 'TIXT OLD TIMES and NEW. By the BARON DE MALORTIE, late Prime Minister to the King of Hanover. [In the press.]
- A MEMOIR of the late CAPTAIN MAYNE REID. By his WIDOW. [In the press.]
- LOVES and MARRIAGES of EMINENT PERSONS. By T. F. THISTELTON DYER. 2 vols. [Just ready.]
- THE EMPRESS MARIA TERESA. Translated from the French of the Duc du Broglie by Mrs. CASHEL HOEY. [In the press.]
- BISMARCK at HOME. [In the press.]
- THE SECRET of the EMPEROR. Confidential Correspondence between the Duc de Grammont and General Count de Flehant, 1860-1863. Translated from the French by R. Ledos de Beaufort. 2 vols. [Shortly.]
- THE STORY of THOMAS CARLYLE. By A. S. ARNOLD. Price 6s.
- MEMOIRS of an ARABIAN PRINCESS. By the Princess EMILY OF ZANZIBAR. 6s.
- COSMOPOLITAN RECOLLECTIONS. By the Author of "Random Recollections of Courts and Society." 2 vols. 21s.

WORKS OF TRAVEL.

- AN ARTIST'S TOUR in AMERICA and the SANDWICH ISLANDS. By B. KROUPA. Illustrated by the Author. Royal 8vo. [In the press.]
- THE GOLDEN SOUTH: Home Life in Australia. [Just ready.]
- KALEIDOSCOPE: Shifting Scenes from East to West. By E. KATHARINE BATES. Demy 8vo. 12s.
- THE AUSTRALIAN in LONDON and the UNITED STATES. By J. F. HOGAN. 6s.
- THREE YEARS of a WANDERER'S LIFE. By J. F. KEANE. New Edition, 6s.
- SIX MONTHS in the HEJAZ: a Narrative of the Pilgrimage to Meccah and Medinah. By J. F. KAN. New Edition, 6s.

FINE ART BOOKS.

- PICTURESQUE LONDON. By PERCY FITZGERALD. With numerous Illustrations. [Shortly.]
- AS in a LOOKING-GLASS. By F. C. PHILIPS. Illustrated by G. du Maurier. Extra crown 4to. 31s. 6d.
- MEMORIES of the MONTH. By HUME NISBET. With Photogravure Frontispiece, 12 Whole-Page, and numerous smaller Illustrations by the Author. Fcp. 4to. [Just ready.]

BOOKS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.

- BRAVE MEN in ACTION. By the late STEPHEN J. MACKENNA and JOHN AUGUSTUS O'SHEA. New Edition. [In the press.]
- STORIES in ENGLISH LITERATURE. By HENRIETTA C. WRIGHT. [Shortly.]
- STORIES of the GREAT SCIENTISTS. By the same Author. With Portrait, 6s.
- LITTLE PEOPLE and their HOMES in MEADOWS, WOODS, and WATER. By STELLA HOOK. Illustrated by D. and H. Beard. Price 6s.
- TRAVELS in the INTERIOR. Edited by a LONDON PHYSICIAN. Illustrated by Harry Furniss. 6s.

STORIES OF ADVENTURE.

- A TALE of THREE NATIONS. By J. F. HODGETTS. [Shortly.]
- THE BEACHCOMBERS; or, Slave-Trading under the Union Jack. By GILBERT BISHOP. Illustrated, 6s. [Just ready.]
- THE WRECK of the "ARGO"; or, the Island Home. By F. G. FOWELL. [Just ready.]
- THE SPANISH GALLEON. By F. C. BADRICK. [Just ready.]
- EIGHT BELLS. By HUME NISBET. 6s.
- THE LAND of the HIBISCUS BLOSSOM. By the same Author. 6s.
- NIGEL FORTESCUE. By WILLIAM WESTALL. 5s.
- JOHN BROWN and LARRY LOHENGRIN. By the same Author. 5s.
- A PRINCE of the BLOOD. By JAMES PAYN.

NEW NOVELS.

- OF HIGH DESCENT. By G. M. FENN. 3 vols. [This day.]
- MIKE FLETCHER. By GEORGE MOORE. 6s. [Just ready.]
- ONE for the WORLD. By M. BETHAM-EDWARDS. 2 vols. [Just ready.]
- IN BLACK and WHITE. By PERCY HULBURD. 3 vols. [Shortly.]
- A TRUST BETRAYED. By JOHN TIPTON. 3 vols.
- ROY'S REPENTANCE. By ADELINE SARJEANT. 3 vols.
- THE STORY of a MARRIAGE. By L. BALDWIN. 3 vols.
- A YOUNG GIRL'S LIFE. By B. L. FARJEON. 3 vols.
- ROGER FERRON. By Mrs. MACQUOID. 2 vols.
- THE CRIME of KEZIAH KEENE. By Mrs. VERE CAMPBELL. Price 2s. 6d.
- A RUINED RACE. By H. SIGERSON. 6s.
- THE STORY of MARY HERRIES. By J. FRANCIS. 2s. 6d.
- FROM the GREEN BAG. By F. M. ALLEN. 2s. 6d.

WARD & DOWNEY, 12 YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

MESSRS. MACLEHOSE & SONS' NEW BOOKS.

This day, 2 vols. demy 8vo. 1,360 pp. 32s.

THE CRITICAL PHILOSOPHY of IMMANUEL KANT. By EDWARD CAIRD, LL.D., Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Glasgow, late Fellow and Tutor of Merton College, Oxford.

"The object of this book is to give a connected view of the Critical Philosophy, showing the relations of the three 'Critiques' to each other and to the other works of Kant which may be regarded as illustrations or developments of his main arguments. The first part, on the 'Critique of Pure Reason,' deals with the same subject as my former work, entitled 'The Philosophy of Kant,' but, except in a few passages, it is not a reproduction of it."—Extract from PREFACE.

This day, demy 8vo. 830 pp. with 500 Illustrations, 24s.

SPECIAL PHYSIOLOGY; including Nutrition, Innervation, and Reproduction. By JOHN GRAY M'KENDRICK, M.D., LL.D., F.R.S., Professor of the Institutes of Medicine in the University of Glasgow.

This forms the Second and Concluding volume of Professor M'KENDRICK'S TEXT-BOOK of PHYSIOLOGY.

Volume I. (demy 8vo. price 16s.), comprising GENERAL PHYSIOLOGY, including the Chemistry and Histology of the Tissues and the Physiology of Muscle, was recently issued.

This day, fcp. folio, 42s. net.

A CENTURY of ARTISTS. A Memorial of the Loan Collection of Painting and Sculpture at the Glasgow International Exhibition, 1888. With Historical and Biographical Notices of the Artists. By WILLIAM ERNEST HENLEY, Author of the Memorial Catalogue of the French and Dutch Loan Collection, Edinburgh, 1886.

This book is illustrated by 13 Full-page Plates and 90 Illustrations, very many of them in colour, from Drawings specially made for this volume.

The description, of each of the Pictures exhibited, is by Mr. ROBERT WALKER. The Etchings, after Pictures by Bosboom, Corot, Israels, Sir Daniel Macnez, Jacobus, Maris, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Rousseau, and Sir David Wilkie, are by Mr. William Hole, R.S.A., Mr. William Strang, Mr. F. Huth, and Mr. A. W. Henley.

Other Illustrations are by Mr. Hugh Cameron, R.S.A., Mr. William Hole, R.S.A., Mr. A. Roche, Mr. J. Crawford Hamilton, Mr. Hector Chalmers, and Mr. D. Gauld.

There is also a Large-paper Edition, limited to 215 Copies for sale, with the Full-page Plates printed on Japanese, price £5 5s. net. A large proportion of both Editions has already been subscribed for in advance.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITIONS.

AN INTRODUCTION to the PHILOSOPHY of RELIGION. By JOHN CAIRD, D.D., LL.D., Principal and Vice Chancellor of the University of Glasgow. Fourth Thousand, crown 8vo. 6s.

"A book rich in the results of speculative study, broad in its intellectual grasp, and happy in its original suggestiveness. To Dr. Caird we are indebted for a subtle and masterly presentation of Hegel's philosophy in its solution of the problem of religion."—Edinburgh Review.

THE LIFE of a SCOTTISH PROBATIONER.

Being the Memoir of Thomas Davidson, with his Poems and Letters. By JAMES BROWN, D.D., Paisley, Author of "The Life and Letters of the Rev. W. B. Robertson, D.D., of Irvine." Third and Cheaper Edition, crown 8vo. 5s.

"This Life of an unknown Scotch probationer is equal in interest to anything of the kind we have seen since Carlyle's 'Life of Sterling' was written."

Blackwood's Magazine.

MEDICAL NURSING. By J. WALLACE

ANDERSON, M.D. Third and Cheaper Edition, fcp. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

"An admirable guide. In many respects the best manual we at present possess on the subject."—Lancet.

"A valuable text-book. Throughout his instructions Dr. Anderson is always practical and clear."—Health.

POEMS BY THE AUTHOR OF "OLRIG GRANGE." NEW UNIFORM EDITION OF POEMS BY WALTER C. SMITH, M.A. Fcp. 8vo. cloth, gilt top, each 5s.

OLRIG GRANGE. Fourth Edition.

NORTH-COUNTRY FOLK.

KILDROSTAN.

HILDA. Fourth Edition.

"It is to 'Hilda,' however, that we must turn for the most tragic conception of actual life that has hitherto been fashioned into verse."—Scottish Review.

"These poems are really dramatic, genuinely pathetic, and will bear reading over and over again."—Westminster Review.

THE SOCIAL PHILOSOPHY and RELIGION of COMTE. By EDWARD CAIRD, M.A., LL.D., Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Glasgow. Crown 8vo. 5s.

THE PHILOSOPHY of KANT, as contained in Extracts from his own Writings. Selected and Translated by JOHN WATSON, LL.D., Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Queen's College, Kingston, Author of "Kant and his English Critics." Crown 8vo. price 7s. 6d.

"Cannot fail soon to recommend itself to all concerned."—Mind.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

KANT and his ENGLISH CRITICS: a Comparison of Critical and Empirical Philosophy. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

JANET HAMILTON'S POEMS, ESSAYS, and SKETCHES. New Edition. Crown 8vo. with Portrait, 6s.

TABLES of EUROPEAN HISTORY, LITERATURE and ART, from A.D. 200 to 1882. By JOHN NICHOL, M.A., Oxon. LL.D. Fourth Edition, greatly Enlarged. Royal 8vo. printed in five Colours, 7s. 6d.

GLASGOW: JAMES MACLEHOSE & SONS, PUBLISHERS TO THE UNIVERSITY. LONDON: MACMILLAN & CO.

ALBEMARLE STREET,
October 1889.

MR. MURRAY'S FORTHCOMING WORKS.

OUR VICEREGAL LIFE in INDIA: Selections from my Journal during the Years 1884-1888. By the MARCHIONESS OF DUFFERIN AND AVA. With Portrait. 2 vols. crown 8vo.

THE FOUNDATIONS of the CREED. Being a Discussion of the grounds upon which the Articles of the Apostles' Creed may be held by earnest and thoughtful minds in the Nineteenth Century. By HARVEY GOODWIN, D.D., Lord Bishop of Carlisle. 8vo.

A NATURALIST in NORTH CELEBES: Zoological and Anthropological Researches during some Months' Residence. By SYDNEY J. HICKSON, M.A. With Map and Illustrations. 8vo.

THE VIKING AGE: the Early History, Manners, and Customs of the Ancestors of the English-speaking Nations, illustrated from the Antiquities discovered in Mounds, Cairns, and Bogs, as well as from the Ancient Sagas and Eddas. By PAUL B. DU CHAILLU. With 1,360 Illustrations. 2 vols. medium 8vo.

LUX MUNDI: a Series of STUDIES in the Religion of the Incarnation. By various Writers. Edited by the Rev. CHARLES GORE, M.A., Principal of Pusey House, and Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford. 8vo.

CONTENTS:

- FAITH. Canon H. S. HOLLAND, M.A.
CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE OF GOD. Rev. AUBREY MOORE, M.A.
THE PROBLEM OF PAIN; ITS BEARING ON FAITH IN GOD. Rev. J. R. ILLINGWORTH, M.A.
PREPARATION IN HISTORY FOR CHRIST. Rev. E. S. TALBOT, D.D.
THE INCARNATION IN RELATION TO DEVELOPMENT. Rev. J. R. ILLINGWORTH, M.A.
THE INCARNATION AS THE BASIS OF DOGMA. Rev. R. C. MOBERLY, M.A.
THE ATONEMENT. Rev. and Hon. ARTHUR LYTTELTON, M.A.
THE HOLY SPIRIT AND INSPIRATION. Rev. C. GORE, M.A.
THE CHURCH. Rev. W. LOCK, M.A.
SACRAMENTS. Canon F. PAGET, D.D.
CHRISTIANITY AND POLITICS. Rev. W. J. R. CAMPION, M.A.
CHRISTIAN ETHICS. Rev. R. L. OTTLEY, M.A.

THE LIFE of ALEXANDER POPE. By W. J. COURTHOPE, M.A. Being the Completing Volume of the WORKS edited by CROKER, ELWIN, and COURTHOPE. With Copious Index to the Complete Work. With Portrait. 8vo. 10s. 6d. [Ready.]

AMONG CANNIBALS: an Account of Four Years' Travel in Australia, and of Camp Life among the little known Savage Tribes of Queensland. By CARL LUMHOLTZ, M.A., Member of the Scientific Academy of Christiania. With Maps and 120 Illustrations. Medium 8vo.

THE MINISTER of BAPTISM: a History of Church Opinion from the Time of the Apostles. Especially with Reference to Heretical and Lay Administration. By Rev. WARWICK ELWIN, M.A. 8vo.

THE ENGLISH POOR: a Sketch of their Social and Economic History; and an Attempt to Estimate the Influence of Private Property on Character and Habit. By THOMAS MACKAY, B.A. Crown 8vo.

NATURE and REVELATION: Occasional Thoughts of an Astronomer. By CHARLES PRITCHARD, D.D., Savilian Professor of Astronomy at Oxford. Crown 8vo.

AN ILLUSTRATED EDITION of the VOYAGE of "THE BEAGLE" ROUND the WORLD. By CHARLES DARWIN, F.R.S. With 10 Sketches of the Places Visited and Described, by R. J. PRITCHETT. Medium 8vo.

THE PHYSIOLOGY of INDUSTRY; being an Exposure of certain Fallacies in existing Theories of Political Economy. By F. MUMMERY and J. A. HOBSON. Crown 8vo.

VIRGIL in ENGLISH VERSE; Eclogues, and Æneid, Books I.—VI. By Lord Justice BOWEN. Second Edition, revised. 8vo. 12s. [Ready.]

MAHOMMED and MAHOMMEDISM. By B. BOSWORTH SMITH, M.A., Assistant Master in Harrow School, late Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford. Third Edition. Crown 8vo.

AN INTRODUCTION to the STUDY of the NEW TESTAMENT, and an Investigation into Modern Biblical Criticism. By GEORGE SALMON, D.D. Fourth Edition. Crown 8vo.

THE GREAT SILVER RIVER and the ARGENTINE STATES as a field for British Settlers. By Sir HORACE RUMBOLD, Bart. Second Edition, with Additions. Illustrations. Crown 8vo.

STEPHEN HISLOP: Pioneer Missionary and Naturalist in Central India, 1844-1863. By GEORGE SMITH, LL.D. Author of "The Life of William Carey" &c. Popular Edition. Illustrations. Post 8vo. 7s. 6d.

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

RUSSIA in CENTRAL ASIA in 1889, and the ANGLO-RUSSIAN QUESTION. By the Hon. GEORGE N. CURZON, M.P., Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford. With Illustrations, Maps, Appendices, and an Index. 1 vol. 8vo. 21s.

"This is a volume of great and varied interest.....Without being an extreme partisan, Mr. Curzon has enunciated clear views worthy of the consideration of English statesmen on the many questions that present themselves in connexion with the position of affairs in Central Asia.....The book will, of course, be read by every one desirous of keeping himself abreast of a topic which is repeatedly undergoing change and which attracts daily increasing attention."—Times.

The BLUE FAIRY BOOK. Edited by ANDREW LANG. With 8 Full-page Plates and 130 Illustrations in the Text by H. J. Ford and G. P. Jacob Hood. Crown 8vo. 6s. gilt edges.

NEW BOOK BY THE AUTHOR OF "SUPERNATURAL RELIGION."
A REPLY to DR. LIGHTFOOT'S ESSAYS. By the Author of "Supernatural Religion." 1 vol. 8vo. 6s.

SUPERNATURAL RELIGION: an Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. 3 vols. 8vo. 36s.

WATTS' DICTIONARY of CHEMISTRY. Revised and entirely Rewritten, by H. FORSTER MORLEY, M.A., D.Sc., and M. M. PATTISON MUIR, M.A., F.R.S.E., assisted by Eminent Contributors. (To be published in 4 vols.) 8vo. Vols. I. and II. Two GUINEAS each.

The THEORY of CREDIT. By HENRY DUNNING MACLEOD, M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge, and the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law; selected by the Royal Commissioners for the Digest of the Law to prepare the Digest of the Law of Bills, Notes, &c. Two vols. 8vo. Vol. I. 7s. 6d. [Vol. II. in the press.]

"Mr. Macleod does not exaggerate the importance or the novelty of an English book on the subject which he has undertaken. No man understands better than an English man of business the practical side of credit, and few men understand so little as Englishmen how to formulate their idea on the subject. This defect Mr. Macleod proposes to supply, and few Englishmen are better qualified than he to supply it."—Law Journal.

The ROTIFERA or "WHEEL-ANIMALCULES." By C. T. HUDSON, LL.D., and P. H. GOSSE, F.R.S. With 30 Coloured and 4 Uncoloured Plates. In 6 Parts. 4to. 10s. 6d. each; Supplement, 12s. 6d. Complete in 2 vols., with Supplement, 4to. £4 4s.

* * * The Plates in the Supplement contain figures of almost all the Foreign Species, as well as of the British Species, that have been discovered since the publication of Vols. I. & II.

HANDBOOK of COMMERCIAL GEOGRAPHY. By G. G. CHISHOLM, M.A., B.Sc. With 29 Maps. 8vo. 16s.

"Far in advance of other books recently published with similar titles.....The author has succeeded in imparting what Mr. Goschen calls 'an intellectual interest' to the study of geographical facts relating to commerce."—Educational Times.

OUTLINES of the LIFE of SHAKESPEARE. By J. O. HALLIWELL-PHILLIPS, F.R.S. Eighth Edition. With numerous Illustrations and Facsimiles. 2 vols. Royal 8vo. 21s.

B.C. 1887: A Ramble in British Columbia. By J. A. LEES and W. J. CLUTTERBUCK, Authors of "Three in Norway." With Map and 75 Illustrations from Sketches and Photographs by the Authors. New and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

NEW BOOK ON GRAHAM OF CLAVERHOUSE.

CLAVERS, the DESPOT'S CHAMPION: a Scots Biography. By A. SOUTHERN. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.
"This is the most judicial, the most careful, the most impartial and satisfying Life of Claverhouse that has yet appeared.....If impartiality and lucidity can do so, this work should make an end of the Claverhouse controversy."—Scottish Leader.

NEW NOVELS.

CLEOPATRA; being an Account of the Fall and Vengeance of Harmachis, the Royal Egyptian, as set forth by his own hand. By H. RIDER HAGGARD, Author of "King Solomon's Mines," "She," "Allan Quatermain," &c. With 29 Full-page Illustrations by M. Greiffenhagen and R. Caton Woodville, and numerous Initial Letters. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

"'Cleopatra' will prove for readers of 'She' to be like revisiting past scenes of delight; not that Mr. Rider Haggard is a vain repeater of old achievements, but because the romantic elements that pervade the wild and wondrous tale of Kôr are scarcely less potent and impressive in the new romance. We are disposed to set 'Cleopatra' above its predecessor, seeing that the theme is of far greater magnitude and complexity."—Saturday Review.

BY the WESTERN SEA: a Summer Idyl. By JAMES BAKER, Author of "John Westacott" &c. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

"A beautiful story, beautifully told.....The conversations are very good, and the descriptions of scenery are exquisitely lovely; and the plot, talk, and scenery all work together to justify the theme chosen by the author. It is not too much to say that one feels better for having read this story."—Guardian.

WILD DARRIE: a Story. By CHRISTIE MURRAY and HENRY HERMAN. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

"Will be heartily welcomed by every one who can appreciate good, wholesome fiction.....The heroine is finely drawn. There is nothing mawkish in the sentiment that surrounds her; on the contrary, there is a fine, healthy, manly tone in the book from first to last."—Scotsman.

SUCH IS LIFE: a Novel. By MAY KENDALL. Author of "From a Garret" and "Dreams to Sell"; Joint Author of "That Very Mab." 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

"'Such is Life' is a work of art.....It is better than a good novel—it is a book to be grateful for, on the moral even more than on the literary side."—Academy.

The TANGENA TREE: a True Story from Madagascar. By AGNES MARION. Fcp. 8vo. sewed, 1s.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON'S

LIST OF

FORTHCOMING WORKS IN OCTOBER AND NOVEMBER.

I.

THE CORRESPONDENCE of the PRINCESS LIEVEN and EARL GREY.

Translated and Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by GUY LE STRANGE. 2 vols. demy 8vo. with Portraits, 30s.

II.

A MEMOIR of EDWARD ASKEW SOTHERN ("Lord Dundreary"). By

T. EDGAR PEMBERTON. 1 vol. demy 8vo. with Portraits and Facsimiles, 16s.

III.

THE LIFE and LETTERS of MARY WOLLSTONECRAFT SHELLEY. By

Mrs. JULIAN MARSHALL. 2 vols. demy 8vo. with Portraits and Facsimiles, 30s.

IV.

A LIFE of ARABELLA STUART. By MARY ELIZABETH BRADLEY. 2 vols. crown

8vo. with Portraits and Facsimile.

V.

THE DOMINION of MAN OVER ANIMALS. By the late Rev. J. G. Wood, Author of "The Illustrated Natural History," "Homes Without Hands," &c. 1 vol. demy 8vo. with Frontispiece and 32 Illustrations.

VI.

FURTHER RECOLLECTIONS of MR. THOMAS ADOLPHUS TROLLOPE.

Forming a Third Volume of "WHAT I REMEMBER." Demy 8vo. with a Frontispiece, 15s.

VII.

THE ROOF of FRANCE. By M. B. BETHAM EDWARDS, Author of "Kitty."

1 vol. demy 8vo.

VIII.

IN AN ENCHANTED ISLAND: a Visit to Cyprus in 1889. By W. H. MALLOCK, Author of "Is Life Worth Living" &c. 1 vol. demy 8vo. with Frontispiece.

IX.

THE FIRST of the BOURBONS. By CATHERINE CHARLOTTE, Lady JACKSON, Author of "The Last of the Valois," "Old Paris," &c. 2 vols. large crown 8vo. with Portraits, 24s.

X.

A TOUR in a PHAETON THROUGH the EASTERN COUNTIES. By JAMES

JOHN HISSEY, Author of "An Old-fashioned Journey," "A Drive through England," &c. Demy 8vo. with Map and 16 Full-page Illustrations, engraved by Pearson from Sketches by the Author, 16s.

XI.

LETTERS and CORRESPONDENCE of MADAME DU NOYER during the REIGN OF LOUIS THE FOURTEENTH. Now First Translated from the original by FLORENCE LAYARD. 2 vols. demy 8vo. with Notes and Portraits.

XII.

FROM LONDON to BOKHARA in 1887. By Colonel LE MESSURIER, R.E. 1 vol.

demy 8vo. with Maps and Sketches.

XIII.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY of the TENTH EARL of DUNDONALD. New Edition, with Continuation, including Lord Dundonald's services in South America, and other additional matter. 1 vol. crown 8vo. with Portrait, Illustrations, and Charts.

XIV.

SARDINIA and the SARDES. By CHARLES EDWARDS, Author of "Letters from Crete." Demy 8vo.

XV.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY and REMINISCENCES of GUSTAV FREYTAG.

From the German. 1 vol. demy 8vo.

XVI.

LETTERS from HELL. With a Preface by GEORGE MACDONALD, LL.D. New and Cheaper Edition, 1 vol. crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

XVII.

NEW ADDITION TO "BENTLEY'S FAVOURITE NOVELS."

AN UGLY DUCKLING. By HENRY ERROLL. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

LONDON: RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET,
PUBLISHERS IN ORDINARY TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW
OF
POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,773, Vol. 68.

October 19, 1889.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

EAST AND WEST.

ALMOST before the visit of the Czar to Berlin was over its interest was eclipsed, at any rate in the eyes of the quidnuncs, by the speech of Signor CRISPI at the banquet given to him at Palermo. Even before the provision of this new subject the interest excited in the older one had been but languid. A laborious comparison of versions in order to ascertain whether or no the EMPEROR had spoken more and the Czar less cordially than was at first reported, an attempt to discriminate between the official and the popular welcome, some stories as to personal conversations between the Czar and Prince BISMARCK on the subject of Bulgaria—these were things which did not evince any very lively curiosity on the subject or testify to any great importance in it. Nor, in fact, was there much of either. The delay of the visit and the rather singular tactics adopted in regard to it by the press of a country where the press is specially under official control, of one kind or another, had given to the thing a wholly factitious attraction. It would certainly have been singular if the visit of the Emperor WILLIAM had not been returned; but its return was exceedingly unlikely (or, rather, it was wholly impossible for it) to alter the relations between Russia and Germany in any appreciable degree. That it is practically impossible for these relations to be actively friendly has been shown here over and over again. But it is possible that the visit may have allayed some personal soreness, and so have done good; while it is exceedingly unlikely that it can have done any harm. If any attempt was made to remove the strange and unworthy sentiments which occupy the Czar's mind in relation to Bulgaria, we fear it was foredoomed to failure; and no other question of high policy is likely to have been mooted.

The curiously empirical character of most handlings of foreign policy could hardly be better illustrated than by the fact that, while some critics have affected to regard the Italian PRIME MINISTER'S speech as directed, with as little disguise of aim as is consistent with usage, at the attack on Italian policy which Mr. GLADSTONE recently made or inspired, others have seen in it a "severe avoidance" of the subject. For ourselves, we incline decidedly to the former view. Signor CRISPI could hardly have held a regular disputation with a masked opponent in a foreign periodical, and he did not hold one; he could hardly have passed over remarks attributed, without contradiction, to a statesman whom Italians, wisely or unwisely, hold in peculiar estimation, and he did not pass them over. His speech, of course, dealt with many subjects, and we fear it must be added that no increase of good taste or good sense can be discovered in that part of it which had reference to the Church and the Papacy. Signor CRISPI is past praying for on that head, and it must, we suppose, be left to some younger politician to perceive and carry out the elementary principle of statesmanship that, when you have a great force in your own country of which it is practically impossible to get rid, common sense dictates alliance with it, and utilization of its energy, not defiance and exasperation. In other respects Signor CRISPI'S apology for the apparently heavy burdens which have been bound on Italy, and for the attitude in which that country finds herself towards France, was sound enough, and, indeed, followed pretty closely the lines which were indicated here, a fortnight ago, as those which an intelligent Italian would take. That the newly-established Great Power neither intends to be a spoilt child of Europe, nor desires to build a wall of brass round her so as to shut herself off from the rest of the Continent, nor wishes to sit defenceless under vine and olive till the spoiler comes once more, is the gist of the speech, and we need not endorse arguments which we have anticipated. The recent announcement of the new relations between Italy and Abyssinia, or, as it seems we must call it, Ethiopia, supplied Signor CRISPI with one of those touches of "bite" of which public speakers know the value. It is easy to see why this policy should be adopted. Although headlong colonization, as both France and Germany have recently found to their cost, is a profitless and thankless blunder, it is difficult for a nation to keep up and exercise either land or sea forces without some such possessions. Intelligent Americans, for instance, admit that the want of such things has not a little to do with the extreme difficulty which their country finds in maintaining an efficient navy. England, which has studiously welcomed the efforts of Italy in this direction, and which (for what reason it is unnecessary to discuss) has declined herself to enter into the country travelled by BRUCE and conquered by NAPIER, could make no reasonable objection to the Italian protectorate. It may, indeed, be observed that the claims of Italy's ally to the sovereignty of Ethiopia are by no means yet recognized by all the blameless Ethiopians; but Italy will probably be wise enough to remember her own proverb, and "go softly" in this district.

From the various centres of disturbance where the enemies of the Turkish Empire are trying to make mischief the news is chequered. It would appear that Greek lying, and English repetition of the lies, with agitation to match, have at last prevailed on the Cretan insurgents to take up arms again at their favourite old post of Sphakia. Six Turkish soldiers are said to have been surprised and butchered in their sleep—a transaction described gleefully by the organs of humanitarianism, who shriek when a Cretan is sent to prison, as the lessening of "the number of ruffians in Crete by six." These good men, therefore, may possibly succeed in renewing the bloodshed to which the firm and wise proceedings of SHAKIR had put a stop, and they may rub their hands in the thought that, if Turks are killed, it means only the extirpation of ruffians, while if their own protégés fall, the blood of the martyrs will be the seed of—they probably do not quite know what. In a similar spirit (for with the Turcophobe it is always "Heads I win; tails you lose") when it is reported that MOUSSA Bey has been convicted of misconduct in Armenia, and that in the investigation gross corruption and mismanagement have, to the SULTAN'S great displeasure, been found to exist in the official world, this is held to prove that the Turk is not fit to govern; while, when it is said that the result of the inquiry has been not to acquit MOUSSA and the officials, but to refer the matter to local tribunals, it proves the unfitness still more clearly. There are no blanks in the pleasant lottery of atrocity-mongering; there is no wood of which the Turcophobe cannot make arrows. It should be needless to add that the real meaning of the news, both from Crete and from Armenia, is that the Turkish authorities are doing their utmost to get the country in each case into an orderly condition, and that the agitators are doing their utmost to prevent them. In Servia the pranks of Queen NATALIE continue, as also the more dangerous pranks of the Regents themselves. Probably no more hare-brained act (unless a harsher name is to be given to it) has been recently committed by any European Government than the reported installation, at Servian expense and in Servian territory, of fifteen hundred Montenegrins on the Bulgarian frontier. If these valiant, but not too scrupulous, heroes do not "see their duty and go for it," with all the keen sight and prompt action of that other hero of Colonel HAY'S, why then the Servian Regents may either congratulate themselves very much or be very much disappointed. The absence of Prince FERDINAND from his Principality at the very moment of the Czar's German visit was sufficiently curious, and has excited even more than sufficient curiosity. As we have already hinted, it was not very likely to do any good. On the subject of Bulgaria the CZAR is quite toqué; and only time and tide can bring him, if he is ever to be brought, to his right mind. The escapade of Prince DOLGOROUKOFF, and its treatment by that very intelligent politician M. STAMBOULOFF, for whose "removal" Russophiles are openly praying, adds yet another anecdote to a most piquant chapter of anecdotic history. That anybody in the world, except a Russian, should in any part of the world, except Bulgaria, coolly propose to celebrate a public requiem for a foreign Prince, à propos of nothing at all, would, of course, be impossible except as an incident in a comic opera. But the dealings of Russians with the Principality have always been of the nature of comic opera, except when they have rather inclined to tragedy.

LORD HERSCHELL ON IRELAND.

LORD HERSCHELL does not often favour the world with an exposition of his political views. In his place in the Upper House, indeed, he has occasionally to make out as good a case as he can, from the lawyer's point of view, for a party which has sent legality to join political economy in a distant planet; and, considering the inherent difficulties of this task, and the fact that in performing it he has to wage a very unequal battle with legal authority on the opposite side of the House, he probably thinks that he does enough for his cause without volunteering his services in the Recess. The Liberals, however, of his old constituency have succeeded in luring him to the platform; and, as in political matters he is lawyer first—and, perhaps, if we may say so without offence to him, last also—his speech at Durham the other day was largely devoted to an attempt to show that the policy of the Government in Ireland was to be deplored and reprobated even by persons who approach it solely from the legal point of view. With this view, he began by laying down the propositions that "they had always prided themselves in England upon two things in connexion with our administration of the law—one, that, where inferences were to be drawn as to a man's conduct and his intentions, those inferences should be drawn by a jury of his countrymen; and the other, that the magistracy should be absolutely independent." To this the readiest reply would be, that of the "two things" on which we are said to pride ourselves, that which exists in England exists also in Ireland, and that which is wanting in Ireland is wanting also in England.

Indeed, Lord HERSCHELL himself appears subsequently to abandon his implied denial to Ireland of the second of the advantages; for, though he goes on to question the judicial competency of the Irish resident magistrates, he virtually drops the insinuation against their "independence" altogether. A vague half-muttered remark, so to speak, about the magistrates depending on the Executive for giving them a "comfortable" or "uncomfortable" district cannot be regarded as a serious attempt to establish the charge. It is creditable to his sense of justice and decency that he should not have stooped to a repetition of the slanders which the tagrag and bobtail of his party are continually flinging at the so-called "removables," and of which even Mr. GLADSTONE and Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT have not been ashamed to make themselves the mouthpieces in the House of Commons; but justice and decency are only saved in his case at the expense of argumentative coherence. Lord HERSCHELL, after having by implication declared that the Irish resident magistrates are not "independent"—an allegation which, if it means anything to the purpose, must mean that they decide cases which come before them, not according to truth and justice, but in subservience to the wishes or the supposed wishes of the Executive—should either have substantiated that grave charge or, if he did not intend to make it, have expressly amended the sentence which appeared to convey it. To go on to complain that the Irish magistrates are men "the greater part of whose functions are connected with police duties," men who have "had, for the most part, no legal training," "half-pay officers in the army," and Lord HERSCHELL "knows not what," is to wander widely indeed from the proposition to be proved. It was magisterial good faith which he had challenged, not magisterial competence—though, if he cared to argue that point, we should be quite at his service. He said, as we have seen, that Irish resident magistrates, beyond being half-pay officers, &c., were "he knew not what." Well, we know what else they are, and we will tell Lord HERSCHELL.

They are persons of whose legal attainments the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland for the time being had to satisfy himself at the time of their appointment, and something like three-fourths of them were appointed by Lord-Lieutenants belonging to the party and the Government to which Lord HERSCHELL himself belongs.

As to his other proposition—namely, that we pride ourselves in England on the fact that where inferences have to be drawn as to a man's conduct and intentions, these inferences are drawn by a jury of his countrymen—a more mysterious topic of national self-congratulation was surely never propounded. One might really suppose that these so solemnly described inferences were matters of such prodigious weight as to require at least twelve men to draw them. But the whole administration of justice, civil or criminal, consists almost entirely of drawing inferences as to men's conduct and intentions; and most of Lord HERSCHELL's predecessors on the Woolsack have spent the greater part of their professional lives in endeavouring to get inferences favourable to their client's conduct and intentions, or unfavourable to the conduct and intentions of an adverse litigant, drawn not by twelve men, but by one. If Lord HERSCHELL should reply that we are here speaking of civil, and not of criminal matters, the answer to that would be that every stipendiary magistrate throughout the country is continually engaged in drawing inferences of the precise kind which Lord HERSCHELL says that we pride ourselves on reserving for juries alone; and, further, that hundreds of men in England are at this moment undergoing short terms of imprisonment because magistrates, sitting singly, have drawn inferences sufficiently unfavourable to their conduct and intentions to justify the drawer in summarily convicting them. Further, their rights of appeal, as Lord HERSCHELL must well know, are neither more nor less extensive, neither more nor less valuable to the prisoners, neither better nor worse securities against a miscarriage of justice, in Ireland than they are in England. It is a truly melancholy sight to see an experienced and highly respectable English lawyer labouring thus at the futile but invidious task of showing that liberties and privileges which only Irish mendacity can represent to English ignorance as assailed by the Executive authority have been in some unaccountable and inexplicable manner compromised.

It is almost with a sense of relief that we see Lord HERSCHELL emerge from the region of legal criticism, in which it is difficult to avoid charging him with conscious sophistry, into that of political ethics, where every politician has a chartered right of obfuscating his intelligence by partisan controversy up to the point at which he becomes himself incapable of distinguishing sound reasoning from fallacy. "Some people talked," he said, "of the successes that had been achieved by the Government in Ireland." Well, yes, some people do talk of them; and not Englishmen, or even Unionists, alone. It is a sore but a very, unfortunately, pressing subject of conversation, we may be pretty sure, in the private councils of the agitators, for all the bold front which they contrive to put upon matters in public. Unionists, however, have no right, according to Lord HERSCHELL, to regard these successes with any satisfaction at all. "Order might be maintained and rent paid," he said; "but if the people are discontented with their lot, hated the Government under which they lived, and desired to thwart the administration of the law, sympathized with those that were against the law, felt not with the judge, but with the person who was sentenced and who was charged with crime—was it well with a country in which such a state of things existed?" To the extent to which that state of things exists—and it is, as usual, grossly exaggerated by one of those singular friends of Ireland who endeavour to establish her right to self-government by describing her people as destitute of the rudimentary virtues of civilization—to the extent, we say, to which such a state of things exists, it is undoubtedly "not well with the country" in which its existence is observable. In like manner "it is not well" with any individual who exhibits the symptoms of a dangerous disease; but the point to be proved by those who denounce his physicians is that it would be better with him if they reversed his treatment and dealt with his malady in a different way. It is, therefore, for Lord HERSCHELL to convince the country that, when a people "desire to thwart the administration of the law," in so far as it prescribes the fulfilment of contracts and the payment of debts, and when they "sympathize with those who are against the law," in so far as it forbids men to shoot their neighbours in the legs, or to mutilate their cattle, and when they "feel" so strongly, "not with the judge, but with the person who was sentenced and who was charged with crime," that they will violate the juror's oath rather than convict him of the crime and procure his sentence for it, the proper treatment of these symptoms of social disease is to permit that people to break their contracts, to repudiate their debts, to shoot their neighbours in the legs or mutilate their cattle, and to rescue criminals from justice by the violation of the juror's oath. It is for Lord HERSCHELL, we say, to advance a step beyond the proposition admitted on both sides, that it is not well with a community which desires to do these things, and establish the much more disputable proposition that it would be better with such a community if it were permitted to do them, instead of being prevented by whatever exertion or reinforcement of the existing powers of the law may be required for the purpose. This, we repeat, is what Lord HERSCHELL has got to prove; and, until he succeeds in doing so, his lamentations over the assumed state of affairs in Ireland—a state of affairs which, as regards the great bulk of the Irish people, is a mere figment of Irish agitators, adopted for controversial purposes by a Gladstonian lawyer—are mere and sheer irrelevancies.

"SWEAR'ST THOU, UNGRACIOUS BOY?"

THE "appalling revelations" of "ETONENSIS" continue to horrify pavid matrons. He is particularly concerned this week at startling intelligence from the old school which he adorned so long and loves so dearly. "ETONENSIS" has had a letter from his nephew, the father of a new boy. At Sandhurst of old, if we mistake not, they called a new boy "a something snooker." This terminology is not Etonian; yet we fancy the new boy may be regarded as rather a snooker if he does not keep his secret. He informs the parent, who informs "ETONENSIS" (who is, we repeat, his respected uncle), "that he likes Eton very much, except for the compulsory football four times a week." Well, if the only crumpled rose-leaf in the couch of Eton life be football four times a week, that boy must indeed be a sybarite who complains. What does the boy propose to do with the time in which at present he plays football? Indeed, what can he do with it? He will scarcely pretend that he wants to employ it in reading the Elizabethan dramatists. The nights of winter are long enough for his studies. Does he want to go on the river at that very time or to play fives? or would he prefer to loaf about and consume the ambrosia known as "sock"? To any one of the last generation, except "ETONENSIS" (who, indeed, belongs apparently to a generation older yet), this great-nephew of "ETONENSIS" seems uncommonly hard to please. We sincerely trust that most boys have more respect for our old friends TOM BROWN and HARRY EAST, who went into the Rugby game with a will from the first time of asking. As we said before, a boy must be made to take exercise, if not at football, then at runs (also most obnoxious to lazy boys) or in the gymnasium. A recent article in the Field exposed the defects in a bodily training of pure gymnastic. Open air is as necessary as exercise, and in football you get both, while a gymnasium only provides one of these advantages. We are not prepared to go as far as the Field about gymnastics; for the Germans are not a feeble folk, and, except for what they do with the sword, the gymnasium is their favourite field. Perhaps "ETONENSIS" would prefer compulsory duelling—for which, no doubt, a great deal is to be said. Is his objection to enforced exercise in general, or only to football? That seems the most economical of sports; it wastes less money, and it occupies less time than any other. The amount of dawdling in cricket has been not unjustly censured; you cannot dawdle at football if you play the game at all. Perhaps the great-nephew of "ETONENSIS" prefers golf. It is a game for his elders, it is tardior et remissior, as a medical authority of the sixteenth century says. But it is hardly uncharitable to believe that the great-nephew is a loafer, and "ETONENSIS" an elderly muff.

The great-nephew brings another charge against his new school, a charge which we are sorry to hear, but which has nothing more to do with football than with fives. The father, not the great-nephew, speaks thus:—"Strong language is among the modern developments at Eton. In my time it was thought 'bad form'; but E. says "that the boys swear most frightfully at football and when they are angry." Swearing, whether plain or fancy, is undeniably an execrable habit, but "ETONENSIS" talks about "this latest development of football's moral effects." Could anybody but "ETONENSIS" talk such nonsense? The boys swear, if swear they do, as our men did terribly in Flanders, because they are "angry." They may get "angry" at any occupation in the world. A man has been known to damn even an examination paper; and, in fishing, when a salmon breaks him; at golf, when he tops into a bunker; at cricket, when he is given out l.b.w. Nay, even in coaching an eight on the river, many a person has uttered a choleric word, if not a flat blasphemy. If the boys do swear frightfully, that is neither because they play football nor because football is compulsory. Perhaps there is some mistake. In Scotland the goals are, or were, called "Hales." A Scotch boy was informed by the Headmaster that his language (like that of the Master of Ballantrae after his service with the pirates) was couched "in terms not proper for a chairman." Happily the lad chanced to remember his exact expression, "DANIEL, you little beggar, go to hale." This had been misunderstood to an extent painful but obvious. Let us hope that the "frightful swearing" at Eton is also a misunderstanding. "ETONENSIS" thinks he has quite demolished "the deniers" of compulsory football. But quis negavit? As to his "not unfrequent deaths from football," let him produce statistics from Eton. His contention that football is the cause of profanity, or profanity the moral consequence of football, is too childish for argument. "ETONENSIS" is old enough to know better.

MORE ELECTION LESSONS.

THE manner in which the reverse in North Bucks, following upon those at Peterborough and in Morayshire and Nairn, has been received by Unionists in general is fairly satisfactory; but there is still need of rubbing in the lesson—not, of course, by attempting to explain away the defeat. The exultation of Separatists has, indeed, been chastened and moderate when compared with the wild horns blown to celebrate the return of one of the most Radical towns in the kingdom to its Radical allegiance, and the retention by a somewhat larger majority of two Scotch counties which for fifteen years have unswervingly followed Mr. GLADSTONE in all his swerves. Indeed, the failure of Captain VERNEY to recover more than about one-seventh of his 1885 majority, and the steady growth of the Conservative vote during the last three contests, were things which only the most feather-brained Gladstonian could overlook, or the most impudent pretend to ignore. But the seat is gone for the time, and once more, though the fact has been less emphasized, "two votes on a division" are lost to the Government. It may be hoped that, while these successive lessons can hardly fail to encourage and, in a way, to strengthen the Gladstonians of Brighton, they will at the same time brace the Tory party there to use every effort for Mr. GERALD LODER. The contest is rather a serious one. That Sir ROBERT PEEL, Mr. LODER's opponent, though no one wishes to say anything unkind about him, or has anything to say that is positively bad of him, possesses a record probably unequalled in the kingdom for political levity, for chances thrown away, for experience and position squandered, will do Mr. LODER little good. The party which counts Mr. CONYBEARE and Mr. KEAY among its representatives is not likely to attach much importance to anything of that kind, and Sir ROBERT has been described, in English well matched with wisdom, as a "splendid candidate." He has, indeed, certain personal gifts which may tell with such a constituency as that of Brighton, while his opponent must depend to some extent on the most troublesome and untrustworthy classes of electors—busy professional men, who can with difficulty be persuaded to spare the time to vote, and more or less well-to-do idlers, who, of course, can spare it still less. It is, however, quite certain that the seat can be held by intelligent management and hard work, and that these are what must be given to the holding of it.

North Bucks comes on the other side to reinforce Elgin and Nairn in showing how the hard work must be applied. It does not appear that such work was spared in either the Scotch or the English county constituency, yet, as has been seen, it was thrown away in both. And in both, far distant as one is from the other, and apparently different as are their characteristics, the same causes seem to have brought about the same result. Captain VERNEY had, indeed, some advantages which Mr. KEAY lacked; but Mr. HUBBARD was correspondingly superior to Mr. LOGAN. Captain VERNEY has shown little or no ability as a politician; but he has not made himself a laughing-stock, he has considerable political experience, and his name is justly popular in the county. Yet these advantages did not avail to seat him three years ago, and something else was required to recover for him a portion, and only a portion, of the great majority which he obtained a year earlier. This something else seems to have been found in exactly the same two causes which combined to carry the day for Mr. SEYMOUR KEAY—that is to say, the tendency of persons calling themselves Liberals to revert to the side which is nominally that of their old party, and the lavish use of appeals to the cupidity—at any rate, to the interests—of the agricultural labourers and their fellows of similar classes. It is not merely asserted by the apologists of the Unionist defeat in the North of Scotland, but admitted freely by those who exult in it, that the hopes which Mr. SEYMOUR KEAY held out to the Morayshire labourers and small tenant-farmers of agrarian legislation similar to that of Ireland, and to the fishermen of the throwing open of the valuable salmon and other fisheries along the Moray Firth, practically carried a candidate who might have whistled to the gulls in that same Firth to come and help him if he had confined himself to advocating Home Rule for Ireland or even for Scotland. There is no Spey and no Findhorn in Buckinghamshire to make miles on miles of coast, as well as the river mouths, a succession of salmon preserves, so valuable that fisheries let for hundreds a year have been known to be relet for thousands at the expiration of a lease. But there was the allotments question. Friends and foes agree that the trumpery and half-unintelligible business of the Twyford allotments—where somebody, not Mr. HUBBARD at all, seems to have made a fool of himself or themselves, and to have persuaded the labourers that the Act of 1887 was being somehow evaded—had more to do than anything else with Captain VERNEY'S return. This is, of course, as we have said before now, a very disagreeable business. These Buckinghamshire labourers, like the Oxfordshire farmer on whose threats in relation to tithe comments were made some time ago, have been taught by their political advisers to regard a vote as a commodity, traffickable—not, indeed, for a five- or a fifty-pound note, or (as happened, if we remember rightly, to one lucky elector of Totnes in the last heroic appearance of that famous old town as a Parliamentary borough) for an income of three hundred a year, but for an allotment of Lincoln College land, honestly to be paid for at first, of course, then to be “landcourted” some day, and perhaps to be finally enjoyed free. The Morayshire fishermen looked in the same way to a share of Lord MORAY'S or Mr. MONRO-FERGUSON'S or the Duke of RICHMOND'S fishings. Elsewhere voters are promised that they shall keep the parson's tithe in their pockets if they will vote for Gladstonian candidates. Mining royalties form another obvious variety of the new Gladstonian bribe indirect—if there can be said to be anything of indirectness left about the practice—and plenty of other things are going the same way. The only difference that our obtuse faculties can discern between the new bribery and the old is, that the latter was generally, if not always, done at the briber's own expense, while the former is effected much more satisfactorily at the expense of somebody else.

It is, however, only with the lowest class of voters that these tactics are ever effectual, and though they are formidable enough for a time, they threaten too many interests to be long successful except in a country like Ireland, where the circumstances are quite different. So-called “Liberal” voters in Bucks have told the world, quite unabashed—indeed with an apparently smug sense of virtue—that they were Unionists, that they are Unionists, but that they cannot any longer assist Tories, or keep out important Liberal measures (they usually forget to say what these are). It is tolerably certain—the comparison of the three sets of figures for 1885, 1886, and 1889, indeed, sets it beyond doubt—that it was folk of this sort who carried the seat for Captain VERNEY. Although the allotments blunder may have gained Captain VERNEY some votes, it can have caused no serious defection from Mr. HUBBARD'S side, as the steady growth of the Tory vote shows. The mischief must have lain in the purely unreasoning fanaticism which made a certain sufficient number of the majority of 1885 who abstained in 1886 either swallow Home Rule or (as the wise persons above referred to confess in their own case) simply put it aside in order to be no longer “with the Tories.” These are the persons (and what we say of them we should say equally of any Peterborough or Morayshire Tories who held back wishing not to be “with the Radicals”) who lose elections and who are the real trouble. Nor is it at all easy to see what is to be done with them. They must have a certain amount of interest in politics, yet they have by their own confession so little rational comprehension of them that they prefer names to measures, or at the best unimportant measures to important ones. Home Rule may be the panacea that Mr. GLADSTONE thinks it, the inevitable evil that Mr. MORLEY thought it (we hardly know what he thinks it now), the intolerable but perfectly evitable evil that it seems to us. But, whatever it is, it is infinitely the most important thing that has been before the British and Irish electorate during this century. And yet there are Buckinghamshire Liberals who almost in so many words declare that in their eyes it is of less importance than playing further childish tricks with the franchise, than enabling the London County Council to play the fool on a larger scale than at present, or even than changing the names of the occupants of certain rather ramshackle mansions looking upon the Horse Guards Parade!

LORD GALLOWAY'S CASE.

IT is not necessary to dilate on the satisfaction which every one must feel that a nobleman of good repute has been completely exonerated of a foul and sordid charge. Upon the evidence given, as far as appears from the reports in the English newspapers, no civilized tribunal could have hesitated for a moment to pronounce a verdict of acquittal. But there is a general aspect of the case which is too important to be passed over in silence, and the interest which the prosecution has aroused, solely because of the conspicuous position and character of the accused, may be useful in directing public attention to a danger from which no one is altogether free, and to which those who happen to be well born, rich, or eminent in almost any way, are peculiarly exposed.

The facts were simplicity itself. The Earl of GALLOWAY, having to wait a long time for a train at a country station, strolled along the road, and came to a place where some children were playing. One, a child of ten years old, was sitting on a rather high wall, and Lord GALLOWAY patted it in a friendly manner on the leg. It was broad daylight, and a number of people were about. One of these, a woman, observing Lord GALLOWAY'S action, came up and charged him with having indecently assaulted the child. At the trial the child seems to have stated that Lord GALLOWAY behaved in a manner amounting to indecent assault, and to have been more or less contradicted by other witnesses called for the Crown; but the story as here given is that told by Lord GALLOWAY, and that which the jury obviously believed. Every one who has any acquaintance with the ordinary course of criminal justice at assizes and sessions knows that in this country trumped-up charges of this kind are always frequent, and have been more frequent than ever since the unsavoury episodes which immediately preceded and accompanied the passing of the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1885. It is perfectly right that children should be protected by every possible means against the outrages and insults of depraved and brutal men. But it is a cruel thing that an honest man should be subjected to the ignominy and anxiety of a profoundly disgraceful charge, when it is obvious to any man of sense that that charge cannot possibly be supported. Everybody knows, except perhaps extremely ignorant women and unsexed men, that the bare statement of a little child, in whose presence such a charge has been recklessly made, is worth nothing at all. But there are many dirty-minded persons who are never so happy as when they find an opportunity of making this sort of charge, which they do to their own prurient gratification, and to the injury of the child they profess to be befriending only less than to that of the unhappy man whose character they wantonly assail.

Though all men are nowadays more or less exposed to this danger, no men are so much exposed to it as rich or distinguished men, and especially peers of the realm. It is undoubtedly the fact—and a very deplorable fact too—that the mere circumstance of distinction is unfavourable in such cases to the chance of acquittal. It is but a few years since a verdict of Guilty in a case of this character was returned at the Central Criminal Court upon evidence so manifestly insufficient to support a conviction that the distinguished judge who tried the case passed a merely nominal sentence, with the complete approbation of the public. The Sheriff-substitute at Dumfries is reported to have addressed the jury to the following effect:—"He had never in the whole course of his experience, which had been considerable, known a case in which such a charge was brought where the circumstances attending it were of so slight a nature. The law was no respecter of persons, and as part of the law at that particular time they should deal with the case as they would with that of any ordinary man. The Advocate-depute had told them that the Crown had so dealt with Lord GALLOWAY. He (the Sheriff) was not quite sure of that, for he had never seen a case of so slight a nature sent to be settled by a jury." In other words, a person holding a great public position gets harder measure than "any ordinary man." This is not justice, for he ought to get the same measure. Our Courts are happily as free as possible from any reproach on the score that the poor are in danger of not getting fair play. We ought to be on our guard against erring in the opposite direction.

THE OLD NEW WORLD.

THE Americans are often reproached with being indifferent to the antiquities of pre-Columbian America. Perhaps they have been too busy with their own antiquities, with the life of WASHINGTON, and histories of the Revolution and the War, to have time for more ancient and more speculative matter. But the recent discoveries of Mr. FRANK CUSHING with the Hemenway South-Western Archaeological Expedition are interesting, and are a proof that real American archaeology is beginning to have its serious students. Mr. CUSHING found nothing which can be called "sensational" in mysterious towns and temples like those of Cambodia or Yucatan. But what he unearthed did throw light, we think, on that difficult and interesting problem, the early stages of the native civilization which the Spaniards encountered and destroyed. A brief account of Mr. CUSHING's researches by an eye-witness, Mr. SYLVESTER BAXTER, the secretary of the Hemenway Expedition, is published, reprinted from the Boston Herald, in a separate pamphlet. Mr. CUSHING's own report will be still more satisfactory and complete.

It is in the valley of the Salado, in a desert overgrown with sage-brush, that Mr. CUSHING has found remains of a rude essay in civilization. Low mounds, sherds of pottery, stone implements, and the lines of ancient irrigation-canals, tell of a time when the desert was cultivated. Nothing but water is needed to make it a garden, and water the ancient inhabitants managed to introduce. Their pottery, if we may judge by a sketch printed in the pamphlet, is very like that of the modern Zuñis. It has many shapes, not inelegant, and is painted in dull reds and blacks on a yellowish surface. The colours and geometric designs might almost be taken at a first glance for archaic Greek work.

Indian corn, beans, and pumpkins were the staple of the vanished people. Their houses were three or four stories in height, surrounding a much taller central structure, and a great oval building of one story. Canals, bordered by trees, ran through their towns, and carried water to the fields. The towns were very much larger than the modern pueblos, which, perhaps, are their degenerate descendants, as, indeed, the patterns on the modern pottery prove. We have noticed a feature on the vases, deer drawn with the heart coloured red, and with a red line running to the tongue, which also occurs in the drawings of the Red Indians much further North and East. Their circulating medium, perhaps—their jewels, certainly—were rare shells from the distant Pacific or the Gulf of California. The shells were used as a base for inlaying. One curious jewel has been found, in the shape of a frog, a creature often imitated in the rude ancient gold-work of Central America. The shell is covered with a kind of lacquer, made from the gum deposited on the grease-wood "by a species of lac-insect." Little fragments of turquoise and red stone were embedded as a mosaic in the gum and then polished. Examples of this art are still treasured by the esoteric priesthoods and guilds of the Zuñis, as aggrey beads, of unknown provenance, are valued by the Ashantis. Mr. CUSHING has traced the development of the pottery and its patterns out of basket-work. The society was "co-operative," and the people had public ovens for cooking, perhaps had public syssitia, like the Spartans. The central buildings were temples, colleges of the priests, and citadels in time of war—developing, it may be, into the palaces of Aztec monarchy. The common people were cremated after death; the members of the hereditary priesthood, which governed the community, were buried in the temple or beneath the floors of their houses. The portable property of the dead, or enough of it to secure a fair start in the world of spirits, was buried. Major POWELL, of the Smithsonian Institute, calculates that a comparatively small town had 13,000 inhabitants. There are canals to the river of seventy miles in length, which implies great command of labour. The large reservoirs for surplus water are also a proof of the considerable population. Mr. BANDELIER believes that some of these cities were inhabited at the time of the Spanish conquest. Earthquakes have, apparently, been the reason why certain cities were deserted. Household articles were found in these places, indicating a sudden flight from the old home; a wall had fallen, and a skeleton was discovered beneath it; the remains of a girl, with objects consecrated to the Zuñi Chthonian gods, indicated a sacrifice to the powers which shake the earth. Mr. CUSHING's knowledge of modern Zuñi ritual enables him to elucidate these matters. Perhaps the cities indicate the kind of life where Aztec civilization arose and of which Zuñi "culture" is a survival. This appears to be Mr. CUSHING's view, and he gives the name Toltecan merely as a name without ethnological assumptions to the civilization of the Rio Salado valley. The knowledge of metallurgy was very faint, and it is certain that, if the culture of the Aztecs came from this origin, it had risen very far above those beginnings in the time of CORTES.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S EXPLANATION.

THE first shock of disappointment having passed away, it must be apparent to all men that the Unionist party is not so much overcome by the results of the recent elections as its enemies might wish. They, of course, are in a most excited state of jubilation; but their present happiness is measured by their own preceding griefs, and has no corresponding degrees in the sorrow of their opponents. Of all the many members of the Unionist party, not one, perhaps, is more distressed than Mr. CHAMBERLAIN by the bye-elections of the last fortnight. His political education naturally disposes him to watch such conflicts as these with concern, and to rate their significance at the highest. Before they were fought out he spoke of the contests at Peterborough, North Bucks, Nairn, and other places as "a miniature general election"; and this alone is enough to prove that he does not underestimate their importance. And yet Mr. CHAMBERLAIN never spoke with a more aggressive confidence and animation than in the Guildhall at Plymouth on Wednesday night.

To be sure, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN addressed himself almost exclusively to the past on that occasion. The reproach, the misrepresentation, the insult which Mr. GLADSTONE's partisans shower upon the "Dissentient Liberals" is as copious as ever, and its ingenuity is as unflagging as its hardihood. Whether it has as much effect as ever may be doubted. It may be questioned whether the mud-flingers are not allowed a gratuitous delight in the never-ending exclamations of protest against their monotonous attacks. But, since Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT and the rest propose to rule the country, and since truth and honesty are expected of all persons who aspire to Ministerial honours and Ministerial authority, the little historiette with which Mr. CHAMBERLAIN regaled his Plymouth audience on Wednesday evening may have its uses.

No one has been more active than Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT in persuading his fellow-countrymen that in seceding from Mr. GLADSTONE on the Home Rule question certain Ministers, including Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, were consciously treacherous to their great leader, false to the interests of their party, and untrue to their own convictions. He never mentions that it was his own misfortune, only four months before the rupture, to agree with Lord HARTINGTON and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN in opposing the Parnellite plan, and to have avowed his agreement with them publicly. In none of Sir WILLIAM'S harangues against political inconstancy does he remind us that at this time he made the following announcement:—"We are the only leaders and the only party which have the courage and the honesty to face Mr. PARNELL." He takes his examples of treachery from another source and a later date, insinuating that, whatever may have been the opinions of Mr. GLADSTONE'S colleagues before he took office on the last occasion, they all knew they were to join him in a Home Rule Cabinet. They were aware of it; in accepting office they assented to well-understood conditions—after overhauling and reconsidering their principles, we are to infer; and therefore, in breaking away from their revered leader almost immediately afterwards, the dissentients played traitor. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN certainly knew that this administration of Mr. GLADSTONE'S was pledged to a policy of Home Rule which would revolutionize the government of Ireland; and he was not opposed to that policy either. His motive in abandoning Mr. GLADSTONE was mere personal ill-will. This was Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT'S account of the matter at Salisbury the other day; and, coming from a man who could hardly be mistaken in his facts, it must have looked rather formidable to many innocent persons. Now Mr. CHAMBERLAIN explains, not without some natural heat and irritation. He says it is true that he joined Mr. GLADSTONE'S Government knowing that he was pledged to a policy of Home Rule. But this is also true: "Mr. GLADSTONE told me at the time that he had no plan and no definite scheme, and that all he wanted was a full and careful inquiry into the Irish demand." To put himself on a safe footing, however, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN did not accept Mr. GLADSTONE'S offer of a place in the Cabinet till he had warned him by letter that, in his (Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S) judgment, "it would not be possible to conciliate the integrity of the Empire, the supremacy of Parliament, and the rights of minorities with the establishment of a national legislative body sitting in Dublin." Above all, in this letter Mr. CHAMBERLAIN took note of the fact that "you have explained that in these things I shall retain unlimited liberty of judgment in regard to the rejection of any scheme that may ultimately be proposed." Thus it appears that if Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT can boast that he was true to his chief though false to his principles, the man whom he denounces for treachery was false to neither. And even so, the question remains whether he is a faithful friend who abets the calculating perfidy of another by the cheerful sacrifice of public faith and his own character for honesty.

After this, Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT'S account of the Round Table Conference will not be preferred to Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S by any one who was not present at that inharmonious board. The one would have us believe that at the Conference everybody was at first agreed in accepting Mr. GLADSTONE'S plans, substantially. For instance, a Parliament in Dublin, and an Executive dependent upon it, was agreed upon. The other declares that he made a note at the time which reads thus: "Not one word was said about a Parliament in Dublin and an Executive dependent on it." What was discussed was a proposal to establish some system of provincial authorities; a proposal which Mr. CHAMBERLAIN has not yet abandoned, apparently. However, we need not trouble ourselves about that for the moment, though it does seem to include a proviso that "the Imperial Parliament is to have concurrent jurisdiction and a concurrent right of making laws and levying taxes." (Concurrent jurisdiction?—concurrent right?) In fact, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN may be congratulated on having thoroughly carried out the purpose of this speech, which was to vindicate the honesty of the "Dissentient Liberals" against the attacks of one who has often sighed at his own too-precipitate dissidence from their dissent.

And now we may hope that there has been explanation and vindication enough on these points; unless, indeed, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN will find some means of informing the world more explicitly what he means when he says that if "the blackguard PRTT" employed corruption to establish the Union, another eminent statesman, who is no blackguard, "employed corruption to destroy it." "What does he say," exclaims Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, speaking of this other and purer one—"what does he say to the men who owe their titles and their social distinction to the fact that they voted against their convictions upon the second reading of the Home Rule Bill?" What does he say to the "blandishment, entreaty, threat, and even bribery" that were employed to get the Bill through? It does not matter much, perhaps, what he may say, if Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S unqualified accusation is warranted in fact; but the rest of us, who are as much concerned with whatever corruption may survive to these days as with the blackguardly procedure of statesmen deceased, hope to be assured that Mr. CHAMBERLAIN is scarcely accurate. This is new matter. It is "personal," but it demands public explanation. The old quarrel about the treachery and inconstancy of this and that kind of Radical at the time of the great disruption may as well cease. It has gone on long enough, and it belongs to days that are past and measures which (as Mr. CHAMBERLAIN himself maintains) are abandoned. They are abandoned, and no man knows what is to take their place in the Gladstonian programme. Till we are better informed on that point it would be wise to devote a little less attention to Home Rule plans withdrawn, and a little more to the "doctrines of public plunder" which are a newer and a graver danger, and as hateful to Liberal-Unionists, we understand, as to other sensible people. Doctrines of public plunder they are in Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S opinion; and we humbly submit that the union of the Unionists cannot be better employed (pending the production of Mr. GLADSTONE'S plans revised) than in fighting against them.

MANSFIELD COLLEGE.

TO people (there must be some such) who are weary of the perpetual cant of the present day, a brief letter from Mr. THOMAS CASE in the Times of Wednesday must have been a blessed relief and refreshment. As most persons who take an interest in University matters know, there has for some time past been in course of erection at Oxford a rather pretty building, in a site also rather pretty, though somewhat remote and almost Mesopotamic, which is called Mansfield College, and has been built by persons who are believed to be members of the sect which used to call itself Independent, and now calls itself Congregationalist. It was long supposed, and appears to be still supposed by some people, that this was to be a kind of Nonconformist Keble, if not a real "College," yet at least a real "Hall," in the Oxford sense, in which Nonconformist youth were to have those benefits of the University which they have long enjoyed without the drawbacks of associating with benighted prelatists. And it was pointed out long ago that, though this attempt at sectarianizing University education had its bad side, nobody need much object to it, as the general effect of Oxford was likely to do more good than the particular effect of Mansfield could do harm. As it turned out, however, Mansfield was something quite different, and Professor CASE, after a fashion which will certainly have caused the shade of his great predecessor, Dean MANSEL, to smile benediction on him, has politely but firmly pointed out that Mansfield College is "a Congregationalist seminary, built within the precincts of the borough of Oxford," and possessing "no connexion whatever with the University." Not only will its members not necessarily, or as its members at all, be members of the University, but it will have no undergraduates, will not aim even at the status of a hall, public or private, and, in short, might, but for the accident of position, and the fact that some of its students, like some of the students of the Reading-room of the British Museum, may be Oxford men, as well be at Cambridge or at Camelford. It is to be a kind of sectarian-unsectarian theological college in Oxford, or just outside of it, and that is all.

Although we can hardly pretend to much sympathy with an institution which aims at studying, as a system of open questions, a science which is mere floating cobweb unless certain of those questions are taken as not open, we certainly should not go out of our way to throw half-bricks at Mansfield. It may come to good ends yet, even short of the unkind suggestion that it may go bankrupt or prove a total failure, and that so Mr. CHAMPNEYS'S pretty building may fall into better hands. But Professor CASE'S quite polite reminder was certainly wanted as a corrective to the stuff talked at the opening ceremony. Of the Congregationalist speakers we say little, though the spectacle of Dr. FAIRBAIRN calmly lecturing a University, to which we are not aware that he even personally belongs (in one report the Rector of Exeter is made to say that Dr. FAIRBAIRN is "on the list" of that College; but "on the list" is not an Oxford phrase), on the blessings conferred on it by an additional institution which has nothing to do with it, is rather funny. But the persons who do belong to the University might have remembered the facts which the Waynflete Professor has brought to their notice. The Master of Balliol's approval will, of course, at once stamp Mansfield as orthodox, but how came he to talk about "the other colleges"? As a Bachelor of Divinity Mr. JOWETT speaks without appeal; as a Master of Arts and an ex-Vice-Chancellor he should have known better. The President of Corpus is a most amiable man, and once wrote a book on logic; but when Dr. FOWLER speaks "on behalf of the University of Oxford and the Church of England" he surely rather magnifies his office and his person. After this the Rev. Dr. RAY PALMER, an American gentleman, may be excused for talking about "the return of Nonconformity to Oxford after 227 years" ["precisely] of exile," and even for the still more absurd statement that Mansfield is an actual "widening of the basis" of a University with which, qua University, it has as much to do as if it were a non-affiliated college in Kamtschatka, and not so much as if it were an affiliated one. By all means let courtesies pass when gentlefolks meet; and we would have it most particularly understood that it is to the self-styled representatives of "the University of Oxford and the Church of England," not to Dr. FAIRBAIRN and his fellows, that these remarks are addressed. But what is the good of saying the thing which is not? If, when the Pusey House was founded, Anglicans had talked about widening the basis of the University, the enemy might have girded justly; though, short of actual connexion with the University, that institution has everything which Mansfield lacks. How much more absurd is it to talk about "wide bases" and "broad bosoms" (for the metaphors are delightfully mixed) in reference to a Nonconformist seminary possessing no connexion whatever with the University, but occupying, like the gaol and the workhouse, a site somewhere near the site of University buildings?

MR. LABOUCHERE AMONG THE SCOTCH.

OUR memory does not enable us to say, and it may be that a reference to the newspaper files of past years would not assist us to ascertain, whether Mr. LABOUCHERE ever addressed a Scotch political meeting before this week. Perhaps he may have done so in days before he became "the pillar of a party's hope," and when he was, to put the matter bluntly, not considered worth reporting. But we incline to the belief that his appearance at St. Andrew's Hall, Govan, was "his first appearance on any stage" in Scotland in the character of Radical stump-orator; and, if so, he has certainly made a spirited début. No one who came away from that meeting would require to write a letter to the speaker of the evening to protest against the colourless or ambiguous character of his political creed. It was as precise, compact, and well-defined a confession of faith as it could possibly be. In the condensed form in which even the Daily News is obliged to report it, it appears to us that it must have gained rather than lost in effectiveness; and that report, as it stands, would form an excellent manual of Radicalism for the use of students desiring to know how many institutions there are in England which a politician of spirit with sufficient backing might, and therefore should, destroy.

It is worth while to run through the list of Mr. LABOUCHERE's proposed reforms, if only for the sake of noting how admirably comprehensive it is. To begin with, of course he wants "One man, one vote," in order to ensure sending to Parliament "good, sound members." And when he has got that he wants the following changes:—(1) Returning officers' expenses to be paid from the rates; (2) payment of members, as the only way to get a truly democratic Assembly in a rich country like this; (3) repeal of the Septennial Act and reversion to Triennial Parliaments; (4) abolition of the House of Lords, as "a lot of hereditary old women" who would probably object to confiscating the property of Irish landlords; (5) separate Parliaments for the four countries; (6) Disestablishment for Scotland, if the Scotch wish it, or doubling of the existing Establishment, if the Scotch wish that, Mr. LABOUCHERE being "quite willing to vote with the majority"; (7) increase of the taxes on property; (8) increase of the death duties; (9) abolition of indirect taxation; (10) an entirely new agreement with HER MAJESTY's successor on the throne, so as to enable the country to maintain Royalty "at a much cheaper rate than now."

These being the things that Mr. LABOUCHERE wants, and that the Scotch people are invited to help him to, one is naturally curious as to his suggestions for attaining them. The first step, of course, is to get rid of the Parliament that does not see its way to satisfying Mr. LABOUCHERE in the matter and to elect another that does. But how to get this first step promptly taken? It is not easy with that detested Septennial Act in the way, and in his first speech to the Glasgow Junior Liberal Association Mr. LABOUCHERE was pensively silent on the subject. On the following evening, however, he had an idea, which he imparted to the Govanhill (Glasgow) Liberal Association, and which was almost the only one of his valuable remarks on that occasion to reach London. He "criticized," we are told, "the recent utterances of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Lord HARTINGTON, and Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL." He would do that. "Coercion in Ireland," he said, "would have to be abolished and Home Rule granted." That, too, he would be likely to say; nor the less so because he had said it the night before. It is to the means, the programme, the modus operandi, the Plan of Campaign, that one looks as to a possible novelty, and Mr. LABOUCHERE went on to state it. But ah! what a disappointment! "It was the duty," he said, "of members to render government difficult, if not impossible, by the present Ministry." One can fancy the faces of the Govanhill (Glasgow) Liberal Association when this startlingly original and buoyantly hopeful scheme of Parliamentary tactics was unfolded to them. Alas! (they must have said to themselves) it has been tried, this game of rendering government difficult, if not impossible, by the present Ministry. It has been tried by our dear and distinguished guest himself; nay, it has been tried by him twice and thrice already. He is always trying it, or boasting that he will, or rebuking other people who will not. If we are not deceived—so must have run the thoughts of the Govanhill (Glasgow) Liberal Association—we have heard this selfsame Mr. LABOUCHERE proclaim again and again, in Parliament and out of it, that he will render government difficult, if not impossible, by the present Ministry. Yet it has been noticed that before he has succeeded in making government impossible, or even particularly difficult, for the present Ministry, so many of his supporters have turned tail and left him, and so many more are beginning to doubt whether their constituencies really want the "government to be made difficult, if not impossible," that Mr. LABOUCHERE's plan of tactics ignominiously collapses. And the Govanhill (Glasgow) Liberal Association may look long without finding any reason to doubt that this experience will go on repeating itself until the period fixed by the accursed Septennial Act has expired.

SENSE AT LAST.

THE singular consciousness of virtue which most of those persons who meddled in the late Dock strike continue to show has, of course, nothing in it very surprising to a tolerably careful student of human nature. But there is, perhaps, some faint surprise—not much—still possible over the fact that other people should continue to regard the meddlers as public benefactors. They do so, however, unless (as no less an authority than the Daily News, which should know, broadly hints) the dinner of last Monday night at the City Liberal Club was only in appearance a compliment to Mr. BUXTON and Lord BRASSEY, and was really an attempt to show that "Liberals" are not so very much divided after all. It appears to have been a rather successful meeting, the comic element being provided by Mr. CONYBEARE, who seems to have been appealed to for a speech as a former member for Peterborough used to be for a song; while the present representative of that city, Mr. MORTON, exhibited his notion of manners by crowing over his victory in the face of a company which avowedly comprised some, if not many, Unionists. The guests of the evening were a little better mannered, but equally cock-a-hoop. Lord BRASSEY avowed that "his sympathies were with the dockers" (by the way, does not this throw rather a lurid light on Lord BRASSEY's acceptance of the position of arbitrator in what was practically part of the dockers' strike?), and delivered a lecture to dock shareholders on the unwise expenditure of capital. It is much better, no doubt, to invest capital comfortably and go about the world in Sunbeams on the strength of it; but then we cannot all do that. Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON "wigged" Mr. NORWOOD soundly, forgetting that indirectly he owed Mr. NORWOOD his dinner, talked about the "self-control" of lime-throwers and blackleg-bashers, and exhibited his own wisdom by asserting that he did not believe the trade of London would suffer. Which belief if Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON really entertains, he is probably in the proud position of being absolutely alone in his creed.

Against this fatuous optimism it is fair to set the excellent words which a kind of colleague of Mr. BUXTON's, the Bishop of LONDON, has addressed to a body calling itself the Anti-Sweating League. Dr. TEMPLE has all his life—certainly since his participation in Essays and Reviews—held the curious position of a man of ability who is constantly doing unwise things and then striving to repair them. His collaboration in the meddling which helped Mr. JOHN BURNS so much, and in return for which Mr. JOHN BURNS treated the meddlers so cavalierly, was but partial, and it may be pleaded that his hand was forced by the dexterous play of Cardinal MANNING, who had nothing to lose, and something to gain, by the demagogue game. The Bishop went not all the way with the meddlers; and now he has administered a sound rebuke to other meddlers of the same stamp. Even now his right reverend unwariness and unworldliness appear in the words "If a man employs another man, he must give him wages on which he can live." But the context shows that the Bishop's "must" applies only to the moral obligation, in which we all agree. Otherwise Dr. TEMPLE's position is sound enough and refreshing enough after the sickening rubbish talked by the "sympathizers." "I do not know," says the Bishop, taking up the Anti-sweaters' words, "what the 'legitimate fruits' of any man's labour are," and such language seems to him "misleading and misleading." "If a man cannot live on his wages, he had better be driven to transfer his labour to some other place [or, we suppose, some other trade] where he can get wages on which he can live." Even in regard to the employer's "must" the Bishop is careful to add that "there are businesses which would cease to exist if it were adopted, and the workers would get nothing." There is, of course, no extraordinary or heaven-sent wisdom in such utterances. They are simple common sense, the result of universal intelligent experience, such as but a very few years ago nobody would have thought of questioning, while every one would have assented to them as soon as proposed. To speak so now, however, requires a certain amount of courage, and for plucking up his courage, such as it is, the Bishop shall not lose his meed. If a few more people will pluck up theirs, the tyranny of "sympathy" and simpletonism may soon be overpast.

WALES AND CORNWALL.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT'S visit to Carnarvon may be regarded as the attempt of the Gladstonians to administer an antidote to the bane of Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL. For, besides what Sir WILLIAM had to say about Lord RANDOLPH by name—which was a good deal—a large portion of the rest of his speech was employed in combating, directly or indirectly, the appeals made by the member for Paddington to the good sense and patriotism of the Welsh people. He appears, for instance, to have been rendered specially uneasy by their late visitor's defence of the Established Church in Wales; and, after reviewing the question at considerable length from the Radical standpoint, he evidently came to the conclusion that there was only one way of cutting short the controversy. It was necessary for him to exercise the powers vested in him by his own authority, and to pass sentence on the offending ecclesiastical institution. He accordingly delivered himself of what Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN subsequently described, with touching enthusiasm, as the "magnificent passage" in which Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT pronounced the doom "of the alien and anti-national Church in Wales." Sentence was passed in these terms:—"I believe that I express the clear conviction of the Liberal party when I say in memorable words that the time has come when the Church in Wales must cease to exist." It seems evident from the above description of his utterance that Sir WILLIAM rather "fancies" the "magnificent passage" himself. He may be right in thinking that it will be remembered, for he is a good hand at uttering "memorable words." We can at least recall one phrase of his which the political world will not willingly let die, and which has reference to—but no. We should but mock its immortality by appearing to think that any one needed to be reminded of it. Let us leave

Sir WILLIAM'S memorable words, whether about churches or juices; and, indeed, on the former it would be obviously useless to dwell. If he has really "pronounced the doom" of the alien and anti-national Church in Wales, there is, as there was at the death of "FRED," no more to be said. It only remains for the friends of the doomed institution to assist it in winding up its affairs.

We may, perhaps, be considered partial judges; but it certainly seems to us that, of the two speakers and speeches, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S appeal to the Methodists of Cornwall in his address at Bodmin was of a more persuasive character than Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT'S roystering encouragement of Welsh Dissent. We can conceive the former, for instance, as at least giving pause and matter for reflection to an opponent; while it is pretty notorious, and the truth was certainly well illustrated at Carnarvon, that you must start from agreement with Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT to be able to endure him at all. The address of the Irish Methodist to the English Methodist Conference, whatever else can be said of it, is a document which no member of that denomination in either country—unless, indeed, he has hopelessly sophisticated his religion with politics—would think of treating with disrespect. That the Irish Methodists must know "much more about Irish affairs, their own affairs, about the probabilities of the change, and how it would affect them, than any Englishman is likely to know," is a proposition which commends itself to the commonest common sense and the force of which no Gladstonian sophistry has ever yet done anything to weaken. It is, as Mr. CHAMBERLAIN says, for the Methodists of Cornwall to consider it by the light of their own reason and their own religious instincts. The appeal has been addressed to them on grounds from which party politics have been carefully excluded, and they should weigh it themselves with equal freedom from partisan bias. Whether they will allow the political Dissenter—who, as they must know well, thinks much more of his political than his religious creed—to "caucus" them into subservience, or whether they will revolt, we cannot say; but the attempt to persuade them to take the former course was at least worth making, which is more than can be said for a good deal of Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT'S effort at Carnarvon.

HIC JACET MR. QUILTER.

IN the current number of the Universal Review Mr. HARRY QUILTER writes as follows:—"Mr. ANDREW LANG, who for the past two or three years has found a fertile source of amusement and income in writing continued and (unanswered) [sic] most offensive personalities about the present writer, gets up—of course anonymously—in the Saturday Review, and sneers down WILKIE COLLINS for the purpose of dragging in a gibe at my expense."

We notice this for one purpose only, and in as few words as possible. Comment has been once or twice made here before on the absolute falsehoods which certain journalists are fond of publishing nowadays. This is a good instance. Whether the article on Mr. WILKIE COLLINS was a sneer or not may be left to readers to decide. But it happens that not a line or word of it was written by, or with the slightest privity on the part of, the person to whom Mr. QUILTER—writing as one who knows, and knowing that he does not possess the knowledge—impudently attributes it.

ANTHROPOMETAMORPHOSIS.

MANY whimsical treatises, laden with curious learning, were published by English scholars in the seventeenth century; but few are so entertaining as John Bulwer's Anthropometamorphosis: Man Transform'd; or, the Artificial Changeling. The writer was among the first to devote serious attention to the education of the deaf and dumb; but his literary fame rests—and rests securely—on Anthropometamorphosis. The first edition appeared in 1650, 12mo.; but the second edition 1653, 4to., is more highly valued by collectors and more interesting, for it has a fine portrait of the author by Faithorne, and numerous cuts.

Bulwer's design was to present the reader with "an enditement framed against most of the Nations under the Sun; whereby they are arraigned at the tribunal of Nature, as guilty of High Treason in abasing, counterfeiting, defacing, and clipping her coin instampt with her image and superscription, on the Body of Man." In other words, he proposed to show how people, all over the world, disfigure themselves in obedience to the caprices of fashion. The subject offers ample scope for investigation, and he has handled it with masterly thoroughness. He proceeds from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot.

In the fourth chapter, which treats of "Eye-brow Rites, or the Eye-brows abused contrary to Nature," he informs us that the Peruvians make a practice of plucking the hair from their eye-brows and dedicating it to the sun. The Brazilians stripped not only their eyebrows but their eyelids. Some Ethiopian races were accustomed to turn the eyelids backwards towards the forehead, "so that their skin being all black, and in that blackness shewing the white of their eyes, it is a very dreadful and devilish sight to behold them." The Peruvians admire great rolling eyes, a taste that would hardly commend itself to a Chinaman. In Tartary women pare their noses between their eyes, so as to become saddle-nosed. Many tribes of savages wear rings or other ornaments in the nose; but the inhabitants of St. Kitts seem to have been singular in using their noses as pincushions. Ancient authors—Pliny, Solinus, and others—are quoted to prove the existence of "a Nation of Fanesions, who, being otherwise naked, have eares so large that they envelope their whole bodies with them." Strabo, indeed, had his doubts on the matter, but Pomponius Mela and other authorities stiffly maintained the truth of the relation. In parts of the West Indies were to be found people who had made their ears of enormous size by hanging to them heavy weights; and the same fashion prevailed in Guinea. It is strange to learn that in many places a wide mouth is regarded as a beauty in women. One can understand that the cannibals "of Port Famine, in the country of Africa," should pride themselves on having mouths that stretch from ear to ear, but it may well excite surprise that in any civilized community sparrow-mouthed women should attract admirers.

Our author comments severely on the "ridiculous activity" that some African tribes display in their endeavours to increase the thickness of their lips. "Verily," he remarks, "unless it were to sweep a manger, they can have no use of such lips." The Azanaghi, a people of Æthiopia, have the under-lip hanging down so low that they take the precaution to season it with salt, lest it should gather infection from the air. To-day it is not regarded as a heinous offence to shave the chin; indeed, a bearded bishop is a rara avis. But Bulwer insists that every man should allow his beard to grow, and declares that the practice of shaving the chin dates from the time when Alexander became effeminated by Persian luxury. It will be news to many readers to learn that the Tovopinambaultians and the Chiribicensians go beardless. In the neighbourhood of St. Vincent the sight of a bearded man throws the inhabitants into a state of wild alarm.

Red teeth are greatly prized in parts of India, and Sir Francis Drake once came upon an island (in eight degrees from Nova Albion) where black teeth were the rage, as they were in Java and many other parts. Some simple people in Pegu blacken their teeth from foolish pride; they have noticed that dogs' teeth are white, and so (to avoid odious comparisons) they choose black. The women of Caridian, the chief city of Cathay, gild their teeth—a far less objectionable practice. In Peru there are people who pull out all their teeth (as they pull the hair from their eyebrows) for a sacrifice to their idols. Some Tartar tribes, from no religious enthusiasm, but simply from choice of change, discard their natural teeth, and substitute others of gold or silver, steel or iron. Turks paint their finger-nails red; but in the kingdom of Goer yellow is the polite colour, and "the nobler any one is, so much the longer is his nails; so that he is the best gentleman whose nails appear like eagles' claws." At the river Thomeros are men who kill fish and cut wood with their finger-nails.

The custom of swathing infants in tight bands is strongly condemned by Bulwer. He also denounces the "foolish affection in young virgins, though grown big enough to be wiser, but that they are led blindfold by custome to a fashion pernicious beyond imagination, who, thinking a slender-waste a great beauty, strive all that they possibly can by streight-lacing themselves to attain unto a wand-like smalnesse of waste, never thinking themselves fine enough untill they can span their waste." More sensible are the Venetian dames, who never lace themselves, but use every effort to become round and full-bodied.

In China the ladies who have the smallest feet are accounted the greatest beauties; and for this reason their feet are bound up hard in infancy. Bulwer supposes that the custom arose from the jealousy of men, "that have brought it in to the end that they shall not be able to go but with pain, and that going slowly and with a bad grace, they should have no great desire to go out of their houses." Spanish women are noted for their small feet; but Bulwer could not discover whether they used any artifice to attain this elegance. A proverb says that a handsome woman should be English to the neck, French to the waist, and Dutch downwards; but Howell, who had lived long in Spain, would have her hands and feet Spanish. Bulwer was not of a sceptical turn of mind, but he cannot swallow the story about the Indians that had but one leg and are expert runners. There must be some mistake, he mildly suggests; these people had doubtless two legs, but "for the most part made use of but one leg." Turks are averse to using even one leg; they like to sit quiet themselves, and they dislike to see others moving about. It may be true that the chief use of feet is for progressive motion, to afford a man means of going in the direction where his business lies; but Nature "never intended to debar us from taking a turn or two for contemplation or healthful recreation."

The Chiribicensians anoint themselves from head to foot with a slimy ointment, and then cover their bodies with birds' feathers. In Spain magicians are similarly treated when they are to be led out to execution. Gaga Calando, King of Gagas, used to have his body smeared every day with man's fat, and was afterwards painted red and white; the cannibals called Pories were painted red and black; and at Sierra Leone both men and women "race and pink over all their bodies, thinking themselves thereby as fine as fivepence in a shower of rain."

NEWMARKET SECOND OCTOBER MEETING.

THE stormy weather in which the Newmarket Second October Meeting opened had the effect of making the attendance very small on the first day. Jennings, the trainer, won the first race of the meeting with Father Confessor, an outsider at 12 to 1 that had hitherto lost all his races throughout the season; a 10 to 1 outsider won a Selling Plate for Sir Frederick Johnstone; Sturton and Donna Dolores, both of whom started at the same liberal odds, won the Welter Handicap and the Visitors' Plate for Chevalier Ginistrelli and Mr. G. Cleveland, and Mr. D. Baird's Marcia won a Nursery Stakes with 16 to 1 laid against her. This only left two races to be won by the favourites, so backers had a terrible day of it. The Duke of Hamilton's Fear Disgrace won her first victory in the October Produce Stakes. Although she is admired for her abundance of quality, her forelegs are criticized as being straight and stilty. Right Away won the Clearwell Stakes rather easily by a length from Vermillon, who finished three-quarters of a length in front of St. Serf. The winner has made great improvement since July, in which month he was beaten by Loup when receiving 11 lbs.; whereas now Loup was unplaced to him, although giving him only 6 lbs. His pedigree is worth studying, as he is very in-bred; for his two grandsires and one of his granddams were grandchildren of both The Baron and Pocohontas, and, in addition to this, he has three strains of Touchstone blood within the fifth degree. His dam met with an accident within a day or so of his victory in the Clearwell Stakes, and had to be destroyed. He is a good-looking, level, and compact colt, with splendid hind action, and the stakes he has already won leave a handsome balance on the 1,150 guineas which he cost as a yearling. Vermillon and St. Serf are both big, overgrown, and somewhat backward colts. The former, a chestnut colt by Tristan, is one of the largest two-year-olds in training; but some critics considered his shoulders inferior to those of his half-brother, Le Nord, and others thought that, although he showed speed in his race, he did not run like a stayer. St. Serf, who was purchased as a yearling for 1,200*l.*, is a fine mover, with excellent shoulders; but he has been found fault with for being a trifle leggy.

On public form there could scarcely be a doubt that Donovan would beat Minthe for the Royal Stakes on the Tuesday, when only giving her 7 lbs. more than weight for sex; so the Ring were not exorbitant in asking for 14 to 1 on him, and it proved the hollowest victory imaginable. Lord Hartington's good-looking and short-legged two-year-old, Morion, won the Severals Plate, after a close race with Mr. J. B. Leigh's Westminster, and Mr. J. E. Savill's little Australian horse, Ringmaster, won his first race since May in the handicap which ended the day; but these were the only favourites which won races throughout the afternoon. A Maiden Plate fell to Lord Penrhyn's Ornatus, a Bend Or colt, running in public for the first time, that started at 10 to 1. Lord Hartington won a Nursery Plate, in a field of twenty-one, with Ronaldina, a 12 to 1 outsider, and a Selling Plate and a Welter Handicap, both of which brought out fields of sixteen, were won by Southill at 7 to 1 and Tartarus at 10 to 1. Altogether, coming as it did after the disastrous Monday and the ruinous Friday at Kempton, the day was most depressing for backers. About eighty horses ran in the course of it, although there were no stakes of great value; but, if there is any truth in a statement, which appeared in a contemporary on Saturday last, that there are 1,500 horses in training at Newmarket, the fields on the Heath might well be large.

The Middle Park Plate, which we dealt with last week, was not the only event of interest on the Wednesday; but, with the exception of the Kennett Plate, no other race was won by the favourite. "Mr. Brampton" won the Ditch Mile Nursery with his 1,500-guinea Oddfellow, a good-looking colt by Barcaldine out of the celebrated mare Geheimniss. Six days earlier he had been unplaced to Lightfoot at Kempton, and he now won in a field of fifteen, although giving weight—27 lbs. in one instance—to all his opponents. His jockey, Calder, mistook the T.Y.C. winning-post for the D.M. winning-post, an error which was not then made for the first time. Fortunately he discovered it in time to "win a second time" at the real goal. The Kennett Plate produced a splendid race, which Mr. H. Milner's Whistle Jacket won by a head from Lord Penrhyn's Noble Chieftain, who finished only a neck in front of Prince Solykoff's Mephisto. The winner was receiving 21 lbs. from both the second and the third in the race, so the inferiority of this expensive beast was very apparent.

One of the greatest of the many reverses which backers experienced during the week was on the Thursday, when they laid 4 to 1 on Ayrshire for the Champion Stakes. In descending the hill from the Bushes he fell lame; and, although he struggled valiantly on, he was beaten by three-quarters of a length by Prince Soltykoff's Gold, and by half a length by Mr. H. Milner's Antibes. Enthusiast showed how much he had deteriorated since winning the Two Thousand, by taking no part whatever in the finish. It was a grand race, and two others during the afternoon were likewise won by heads, the second and third horses being separated by a similar distance. In noticing the Cesarewitch it will be necessary to look back to the time immediately following the publication of the weights. One of the first horses backed was Baron de Hirsch's Vasistas, the winner of the Grand Prix de Paris, and at 8 st. 4 lbs. the most heavily-weighted three-year-old in the race. His present owner was understood to have given 6,000*l.* for him; but he had lost every race for which he had run since he came to England, and, although his action in his gallop was greatly admired, it cannot be said that he altogether pleased the English critics, who thought him leggy, narrow, mean-looking, and an awkward walker. When Lord Bradford's Davenport had run third for the St. Leger he was backed at 5 or 6 to 1 for the Cesarewitch, and he remained one of the firmest Cesarewitch favourites from Doncaster to the Second October Meeting that we can remember. He had exactly a stone less to carry than Vasistas; yet his numerous backers were paying a very high compliment to Donovan in making Davenport favourite for the Cesarewitch at so short a price; for Donovan beat Davenport by six lengths for the St. Leger, and, assuming that Davenport was ridden out on that occasion, he received about a 30 lbs. beating; therefore, if Davenport could win the Cesarewitch under 7 st. 4 lbs., Donovan could win it under 9 st. 6 lbs., or under 10 lbs. more than the weight ever carried to victory for that race by a three-year-old. This, said Davenport's backers, Donovan might well be able to do, as the Cesarewitch field would be the worst in the history of that stake. The day before the race Davenport was supplanted in favouritism for a few hours by Ingram, a powerful and handsome colt by Isonomy out of Pirate Green, a mare said to have been once sold for eighteen guineas, yet the dam of many winners. He had met with an accident as a foal and had not been regularly trained until he was three years old. At that age he ran twice unsuccessfully in the late autumn, and this season, after being unplaced for the City and Suburban, he had, somewhat inconsistently, won the Goodwood Stakes. He had been handicapped for the Cesarewitch as if he had been ridden out to the very last ounce to win at Goodwood, yet in the opinion of many able judges the exact opposite was the case, for they considered that he had won it with a good deal in hand—moreover, it was contended that, under any circumstances, a four-year-old who had won the Goodwood Stakes (a race which had so many characteristics in common with the Cesarewitch) ought not to have been put into the latter handicap at so low a weight as 6 st. 10 lbs. At one time, on the Wednesday, Ingram was first favourite at 6 to 1; then he fell to 12 to 1, and eventually he started at 7½ to 1. He was the property of the clever trainer, A. Taylor, and he had a large number of eager backers, in spite of his mysterious fluctuations in the betting market. The first favourite at the start, although by a mere fraction only, was Mr. W. J. Legh's Veracity, the winner of the Liverpool Cup and the Chesterfield Cup at Goodwood. Although he had won many important handicaps in the course of his life, he had never yet won over a course at all approaching the length of that of the Cesarewitch, and he was rather a small horse to carry 9 st. 1 lb. Mr. Noel Fenwick's Mercy had won only two races out of eleven this season, but at 5 st. 13 lbs. she was believed to have a 12 to 1 chance, as she had been placed seven times. Primrose Day, a four-year-old filly entered under the name of Goater, the trainer, was not on a very large scale, but deep-bodied, short-legged, high-withered, and angularhipped; she had never won a race—indeed, she had only run once before during the present season, and but four times in her life; yet at 6 st. 1 lb. she was almost "turned loose," as it is termed. Eight days before the race 66 to 1 was laid against her; two days later she had risen to half those odds, and she started at 11 to 1.

The twenty-two starters got off after one break away, and a horse called Assassin made the running at a strong pace through the long grass in Choke Jade; but soon after passing through the Gap and entering the Flat he began to tire, and at the Rowley Mile starting-post the lead was taken by Mercy. In the course of the next half-mile one after another of the field was beaten, and half a mile from the winning-post the only horses left in the race were three light weights—Mercy, Ingram, and Primrose Day. In descending the Bushes Hill Mercy and Ingram began to show signs of exhaustion, and Primrose Day, ridden by W. Wood, came to the front on approaching the Abingdon Bottom. Breasting the hill with wonderful freshness, she achieved one of the easiest victories ever seen in a Cesarewitch by three lengths. Ingram was second, and Mercy a bad third. Of the heavy weights, Mill Stream, with 8 st., and Sheen, with 8 st. 11 lbs., ran best, finishing fourth and fifth. Primrose Day is a dark bay filly, without white, excepting a star on the forehead, by Sir Bevy's, out of Bonny Spec (Carlton's dam), by Speculum out of Bonny May by Newminster, and after her victory she was at once made first favourite for the Cambridgeshire. This year's Cesarewitch was one of the least interesting and most unsatisfactory that we can remember; nor did the rumours, during the settling, of possible difficulties in respect to the ownership and nomination of the winner improve matters. The mess, however, may be said to have reached its climax on Wednesday, when Messrs. Weatherby received a telegram from A. Taylor, the owner of Ingram, objecting to the stakes being paid to W. Goater, on the ground that Primrose Day was not in reality his property. And this after most of the bets on the race had been paid!

Backers had a lucky escape over the Newmarket Oaks, for which they had laid odds very freely on Minthe, who was beaten by Pamela. After the race it was found that Lord Marcus Beresford had started them from the wrong post—an error for which he was fined 10*l.* The race was ordered to be run again on the Friday, when Pamela walked over, and, on the ground that the other competitors were never "under the starter's orders" at the legal starting-post, the Committee of Tattersall's decided that all bets on the race were void. The Great Challenge Stakes brought out Baron de Rothschild's two-year-old, Heaume, Lord Penrhyn's Noble Chieftain, and Lord Zetland's Caerlaverock. The two-year-old had 2 lbs. the worst of the weights, but he was first favourite, and won easily by four lengths—a very smart performance! The surprise of the race was that Caerlaverock should have beaten Noble Chieftain, and immediately afterwards he was backed for the Cambridgeshire at considerably shortened odds. There is no safer guide in racing than public form; but some allowance must be made for attendant circumstances, and when backers laid odds that Mr. E. W. Baird's Golden Gate would beat the Duke of Portland's plain, but improving, filly, Memoir, for the Prendergast Stakes, they did not sufficiently remember that he had had an exceedingly severe race with Le Nord for second place in the Middle Park Plate only two days beforehand, to say nothing of running a good third for the Produce Stakes at Kempton in a fast-run race through heavy ground that day week. Too much importance, therefore, ought not to be attached to the hollow defeat which he now received. Jennings, the trainer, won a race for the second time during the meeting with an outsider, when his Dulce Domum, who started at 10 to 1, won a handicap in a common canter by six lengths; but backers won on the last race of the meeting, the Newmarket Derby, in which Lord Durham's Testator exactly confirmed his form with Gold in the Newmarket St. Leger, which had been the last race of the previous meeting at Newmarket.

KEW.

III.

THE last point to be considered in a sympathetic survey of Kew is the Garden. In 1840, when the Crown surrendered its rights, it had an area of eleven acres, containing, says the Commissioners' Report, "many fine exotic trees and shrubs, a small collection of herbaceous plants, and numerous specimens of grasses." There were ten greenhouses, of one sort or another. Sir William Hooker promptly begged permission to annex the Orangery and the land adjacent; then a part of the Pleasure Grounds, no less than forty-six acres; and then the Royal Kitchen and Forcing Grounds. All these prayers being heard, by 1847 the Garden had reached its present dimensions, about seventy acres. Three years later the rest of the Pleasure Grounds was granted for the establishment of an Arboretum, making the total area little less than two hundred and fifty acres. The Arboretum is the richest in Europe, no doubt, but probably inferior to that of Harvard University, where special attention has been paid to this department. Some may find it a relief to hear that Kew is not supreme all round. The soil, indeed—sandy and shallow, resting on a stratum of gravel—is unsuited to many trees. In former times, also, when an Imperial collection had to be got together as quickly as possible, and as cheaply, specimens were not planted with the care which might have overcome the disadvantage. It became necessary to reconstruct the Arboretum twenty years ago on this account, and in very great measure to renew it—a distressing sacrifice of time. A singular example of the influence of fashion in gardening then came to light. The British public had been running after evergreens so hotly and so desperately that nurserymen had ceased to grow deciduous species. It seems incredible that the authorities of Kew should have asked in vain for young aspens, for instance, throughout England, Scotland, and Ireland for months. As for American oaks, maples, and so forth, they absolutely could not be found in the Kingdom. Very little remains now of the collection formed in 1850; but unscientific lovers of the beautiful may rejoice that it has not yet been found necessary to interfere with the old forest trees, planted, perhaps, by Lord Capel, with the advice of "Sylva" Evelyn. That must come in time, no doubt, but not before the foreigners have made such growth that the loss will be compensated. These latter are arranged by genus; all species of willow, for example, around the pretty lake, with the alders; pines here, cedars there, oaks, nuts, maples, tamarisks, camellias, ranunculus, almost, it may be said, every tree and shrub that can be persuaded to live in our climate, set forth in all its varieties, for convenience of study. And the unlearned find a charm of sylvan scenery that cannot be surpassed. People wander far in search of "views" not more beautiful—since that could not be—than the long dell called the Rhododendron Walk, or the noble vista closed by Sion House, two miles away across the river. The "Seven Sisters," perishing of old age unhappily, still show that dense and stately foliage which Raffaele loved for his backgrounds. There is, indeed, a small cohort of painters here in summer-time.

On the Garden proper, the beds, and the flowers, it is not necessary to dwell—they speak for themselves; but there is a detail here and there which not every one remarks. The Economic section has few visitors, and they are not tempted to carry exploration far. Its value, however, has received a curious illustration within the last fortnight. In a village of Northamptonshire several persons lately died under puzzling circumstances. Their drinking-water was obtained from a brook, and a gentleman of the neighbourhood convinced himself that therein, somehow, lay the mischief. Finding suspicious roots in the stream-bed, he forwarded some fragments of them to Kew, where they were analysed and compared with plants in this department, proving to be Aconitum Napellus. The condition of the tobacco plants is well worth notice in this month of October, when their leaves should be fit for harvest. Enthusiasts who hoped to find a remedy for "agricultural depression" in this culture received no encouragement from Kew. This year we have enjoyed, upon the whole, a moderate sort of season, and the state of the tobacco is pitiable. No list has been taken of the species represented at Kew since the days of William Aiton, junior, in 1810, but at the present time this laborious work is approaching its end. Some departments have been catalogued already. Of orchids there are about fourteen hundred species; ferns eleven hundred; stove plants twenty-five hundred; succulents a thousand; palms and cycads, five hundred; greenhouse plants, three thousand; herbaceous, four thousand; trees and shrubs, three thousand—in several cases, however, the figure is a guess as yet. Though it should prove to be doubled in an accurate survey, the total will bear but a small proportion to the sum of nature's wealth. If we take the flowering plants alone, as enumerated in Bentham and Hooker's Genera Plantarum, there are two hundred natural orders, ten thousand genera, and one hundred thousand species—and this leaves out of account the ferns, and all the lower orders of Cryptogamia. Our British Empire alone furnishes forty-six thousand species, as Mr. Baker computes, of which, however, not less than thirty-six thousand are tropical or half-hardy. Of the remainder, very nearly all the fifteen hundred belonging to Great Britain are arrant weeds; while a good many of the three thousand found in Europe are too common or too insignificant to be worth the space they would occupy, and the attention they would demand. It is absolutely needful to draw a line, even though we have seventy acres of garden. To display, for example, all the culinary and medicinal herbs in use would be absurd. Not a few of them are found in this section. If by some fatal chance the onion of commerce should be exterminated in our back gardens, Kew is prepared to replace it. Side by side therewith grow the Patience Dock and the Skunk Cabbage, the briony, the cuckoo pint, the Japanese yam, and the All-Good—to which hangs a long and significant tale, no doubt, if we knew it; antiquaries may recognize this mysterious boon under its ingenuous Latin name, "Bonus Henricus." In ferns the collection is exceedingly rich. It has had three special benefactors in this department—Messrs. Joad, Carbonell, and Cooper Forster—to the former of whom the public is indebted for the very charming Rock Garden, opened in 1881. Sir Joseph Hooker had long been praying for this boon; and he was backed by a general petition of visitors and scientific persons, addressed to the Board of Works. The bequest of Mr. George Curling Joad brought the matter to a crisis. This earnest and ingenious amateur left all his collection at the disposal of Kew, to take what the authorities desired. Mr. Cooper Forster was the Principal Surgeon at Guy's Hospital, an enthusiast upon the culture of filmy ferns. He grew them on the roof of his house, in Grosvenor Street, most successfully, and set an example to others of his estimable class by bequeathing them for the nation's enjoyment when his own interest ceased. The legacy of Mr. W. C. Carbonell is specially curious. This gentleman devoted himself to the careful cultivation of hardy ferns, particularly to the crossing of them, and to the development of "sports." His success was astonishing—indeed, bewildering. It is not yet twelve months since the "Carbonell Ferns" were re-established in their new home, and that large section of the public which interests itself in this order is not yet familiar with them. Experienced students who pass by may well suppose that a great part of the British species represent foreigners as rare as strange. The natural vagaries which this gentleman secured and the extraordinary combinations he effected by skilful crossing must really be seen to be believed. It gives some vague notion of the facts to learn that there are more than one thousand distinct varieties of British ferns alone.

The glass-houses at Kew would seem a small proportion to the area in a private establishment. But they are grand buildings mostly. The Winter Garden covers more than an acre and a half of ground. The Palm House is three hundred and sixty-two feet long, a hundred feet wide. The new Orchid House is a hundred and forty feet in length, adding the two wings together. These latter are not wholly satisfactory—an orchid house on the imperial scale never is, nor can be. Supplemented, however, by the low, neat range from which the public is excluded, nearly all these fourteen hundred species which form our national collection thrive admirably. British orchidists are proud of Kew—nowadays; for it was not so satisfactory in this department a few years since. The Order, indeed, must be irritating to those in charge of a great "show-garden." They built a fine house some time ago expressly for the genus Phalæ- nopsis, designed with all the skill, of course, that science and experience could furnish. It was admirable and beautiful—but Phalænopsis resolutely declined to live there; after science and experience had done all they know in the way of persuasion, the house was abandoned to other uses. So the lovely and most interesting group of Anæchtochili used to flourish here luxuriantly; but something has been changed—they alone know what—and they barely submit to exist. A new house is urgently required for the Nepenthes, a collection beyond all rivalry.—But for the public these are details. They may well think the Nepenthes comfortable in their quarters, seeing the dense array of "cups" which droop pendent from their leathery leaves—enough to supply a troop of monkeys with a morning draught.

One function of a national institution very seriously regarded at Kew is the training of young men to fill botanic situations in the colonies. While carefully and publicly disclaiming "the least desire to see Kew become a general dispenser of patronage," Mr. Thiselton Dyer finds it more and more urgent to keep a supply of trustworthy and capable gardeners whom he can recommend for colonial service. Something is demanded of such young men beyond the practical knowledge which suffices at home. They should be acquainted with the principles of scientific botany, at least, and those general conditions which rule the practice of horticulture under differing circumstances. For many years such instruction has been imparted by members of the staff, in the form of lectures, to all who chose to attend; not till of late did they receive any remuneration for this public service. The applicants mostly belong, as is natural, to the superior class of gardener. They must be at least twenty years old, and not beyond twenty-five, with not less than five years' record in a "good private garden" or nursery. None are admitted to the list of applicants unless they have had some experience of the management of plants under glass. The advantage of this system all round scarcely needs illustration. While serving the interest of the colonies, it widens the influence of Kew, since all these emigrants keep up more or less of a correspondence with the institution which was their Alma mater. In no long time we may hope to see an esprit de corps arising which cannot fail to work for good. The day is not remote possibly when colonial officials of this class may be organized into a service, with a system of promotion from one establishment to another. By the communications and reports exchanged, the authorities at Kew are able to form a good idea of the capacity which its alumni develop in their new homes, and thus, as vacancies occur, the best men might be selected to fill them. But this is a mere suggestion, which the colonies themselves must formulate. Meantime, Kew performs its Imperial work in supplying them with competent servants at their demand.

PASTELS AT THE GROSVENOR.

THE Grosvenor Gallery leads off the dance of the winter exhibitions with a creditable series of modern pastels. The show is, however, limited this year to the work of living hands, and, as a matter of fact, is largely the contribution of amateurs, or else of artists whose names have not yet made very much noise for themselves. It is plain that pastel is on the high road to becoming a very popular branch of art, and there are many reasons why this should be the case. No other medium gives so brilliant an effect with so little effort. No painting is so rapid and, within the limitations of skill and practice, so satisfactory. The artist has not to wait for his colours to dry; he has no anxiety that he may not be able to make a necessary correction; if he has learned, as every student must, to sketch in chalk or charcoal, he has no new process to master. If he has a good instinct for colour, he may surprise his friends by the ease with which he throws off a pastel which will really not be without merit.

Two French artists of distinction and members of the French Society of Pastel Painters contribute to the Grosvenor, and should in courtesy be considered first. The pastels of M. Emile Lévy, indeed, are almost fatal to what hangs around them, so solid are they, so masterly in touch and so fine in colour. His "Tête de Vieille Veuve" (17) is an astonishing performance. The keen eye of the old woman looks out from her wrinkled parchment face, to which her black cap and black ribands form a sombre frame. On the opposite wall hangs the same artist's "Étude d'Enfant" (68), a little naked child sitting up in bed. The arrangement of colour in this piece is simple, but extremely effective—the dull brick-red of the wall-paper above, the snow-white bedclothes below, and the delicate mass of flesh-colour in the centre. M. Lévy's third pastel is "Jeune Fille en Costume Japonais" (106), a little less original than the former, but not inferior to them in executive skill. M. Blanche, his eminent companion, challenges comparison with M. Emile Lévy in a portrait of "Sir Rivers Wilson" (105) and in a curious composition of "Little Simone and her Doll" (123), but we cannot think that he sustains it with success. Another foreigner, but this time one who has settled amongst us and has adopted our art life, is Mr. Hubert Vos. His "Abdallah" (115) hangs in the place of honour in the West Gallery. This represents a dark, plain woman, in a sort of gipsy costume of artistic chintzes, doing nothing particular but scowl at the passer-by. This is a large work, dashed off with a good deal of spirit, but trivial in sentiment and without beauty. Mr. Vos's portraits are striking, and, indeed, his head of "Mr. Spielmann" (176) is vivid and lifelike to an astonishing degree. We are puzzled to know how Mr. Vos uses the medium. From the appearance of the surface of his pastels we are inclined to fancy that he grinds the dry tint to a powder, and really paints with it in a thin liquid solution. This is hardly legitimate pastel, however, and seems to be the result of an erroneous theory. Pastel is not a form of water-colour painting, but a kind of dry parallel to oil-painting. M. Emile Wauters, of Brussels, exhibits a very spirited head of "Mr. Hubert Vos" (2).

We must now pass through the rooms, drawing attention to whatever has specially attracted our notice. The majority of the more creditable pastels are to be found in the West Gallery, and it looks as though other parts of the exhibition had been rather carelessly stocked with anything that might cover the nakedness of the walls. Mr. Ellis Roberts's "Mrs. J. G. Menzies" (10) is a good example of what seems to be the average condition of British pastel at this moment. This portrait is pretty in colour, and the drapery, in its diaphanous lightness, is delicately indicated; but the face is weakly modelled, and the foreshortening of the limbs leaves very much to be desired. If the face and arms of this figure be compared with the body of the child by M. Lévy which hangs opposite, it will be seen that they are desperately chalky, merely through a lack of that force of touch which the French master has acquired. Miss Florence Small has reached a higher point of executive skill. Her tall girl in white, reading a book, absurdly named "The Poet" (19), is exceedingly promising, and her "Little Quakeress" (33) still more so. Mr. Henry Tuke's misty sketch, called "Barking Nets" (21), is full of beauty. The best landscape at the Grosvenor, without question, seems to us to be Mr. Llewellyn's "The River Camel—Padstow" (35), largely treated in a deep, serene atmosphere, a strip of land between pearly sky and iridescent sea. Of full-length portraits none is much cleverer than Mr. St. George Hare's "Mr. Montfort" (37), in evening dress, smoking a cigarette. By the way, cigarettes and cigars abound in every exhibition of pastels. The focus of smouldering fire can be represented more truthfully in pastel than in any other way, and forms an effective point of bright colour. We do not care for Mr. Arthur Hacker's "Mauve and Gold" (40), a sort of ideal Sarah Bernhardt crudely clothed in glittering raiment.

Mr. Swan has, we are obliged to confess, annoyed us by sending a very rough sketch, just knocked in, called "Polar Bears" (57). It is very clever, and doubtless would, with a couple of days' more work, have become very effective. But to send in work in this condition is an impertinence to the public, and looks as though Mr. Swan were not unwilling to abuse his new and sudden popularity. We admire him exceedingly, like the rest of the world; but we do not admire even Mr. Swan enough to wish him to come in his shirt-sleeves to public places of social resort. Mr. Stott of Oldham is another artist of whom the art-world has been apt to talk with some exaggeration. Mr. Stott has been to the Alps, and he has brought home some pastels which the emotional are now discussing with bated breath. We have examined these little "impressions de voyage" with curiosity, but our breath has not been taken from us. Our heads are where they were, and so are our heels. In "Morning Alps" (73) we say without hesitation that Mr. Stott has attempted to give a certain Alpine effect, and has failed. In "Jungfrau" (113) he has failed again. But "The Little Bay" (117) is pretty; and the "Eiger" (120) is much more than pretty—it is a very remarkable study. The mystery of moonlight hangs over the mountain, and there is given a sense of vast height of rock and depth of atmosphere. Moreover, the snow on the peak is painted as we hardly ever remember to have seen snow painted—light and feathery, crystal cold, and radiant in the limpid moonlight. Mr. Stott has a very unlucky pastel of "Mme. Nevada as 'Lackmé'" (94), childish in drawing and hot and bad in colour. His is evidently an unbalanced, though a genuine, talent. Mr. J. McLure Hamilton's pastels are interesting and curious. The "Studio of E. Onslow Ford, A.R.A." (99) and a "Study of Children in White" (60) are excellent. Mr. Llewellyn's "Mrs. Raymond Radclyffe" (77) is ablaze with azure-blue and orange-pink ribands, underneath all which suffusion of colour the flesh-tints are obscured. Mr. Solomon Solomon's nude "Amazon" (83), lying on a tiger-skin, in violent foreshortening, is a clever tour de force. A very strong portrait in chalks—hardly a pastel—of "Mr. R. B. Martineau" (129), by Mr. Holman Hunt, rivets the spectator's attention at the doorway into the East Gallery. But before we leave the West Gallery we must spare a word of praise for the pastels of Mrs. Stanhope Forbes and of Mlle. Anna Bilinska.

In the remainder of the exhibition there is not much that need detain us. Very curious and rather ingenious is Mr. Charles Shannon's "The Sheep hear His Voice" (197), strong rays of light proceeding to every corner of the picture from a central lantern. Mr. Arthur Hacker's "Nerina" (223) deserves a glance. There are some pleasing landscapes by Mr. Peppercorn (whose atmosphere has become, like Niobe, "all tears"), Mr. Muhrmann, Miss Osborne, and Mr. Aumonier. In the vestibule are hung portraits by Mr. Rudolf Lehmann of himself (282), of "Miss Ellen Terry" (278), of "Alma" (279), of "Mrs. W. H. Wills" (284), and others, forming an elegant group of heads. Mr. Frank Emanuel's full-length of "Mr. Charles Emanuel" (300), in cap and gown, is remarkably good. In the fourth and fifth rooms mediocrity reigns almost unopposed. There is some creditable sculpture scattered over the galleries, although little of it is new. Mr. Woolner's pretty, sharp-nosed "Ophelia" (449) is an old friend, and so are Mr. MacLean's bronze statuettes of the arts (450-454). Mr. Roscoe Mullins's "Morn wak'd by the circling hours" (460) is an accomplished marble, but it is not seen for the first time. But we are not sure that we recognize the simply-composed and cleverly-modelled terra-cotta study (457) signed by the same sculptor.

OUR ROYAL SELVES.

IS it possible that "the prophetic soul of the great world dreaming of things to come," which, as the Hegelians would say, became conscious of itself in Shakspeare, had any obscure prevision of Sir William Harcourt (who, we are really sorry to see, is again angry with the Saturday Review)? There are passages in our great dramatist which may be interpreted in this sense. We do not refer to the character of Falstaff, though it has been thought to foreshadow in some essential features that of the later hero. Nor are we thinking of the knight who so ingeniously contrived to avoid forswearing himself on the merits of the pancakes. We have rather in view him who, being presumably fond, as Sir William Harcourt certainly is, of playing with edged tools, never cut his fingers, as Sir William frequently does, without exclaiming, as Sir William Harcourt possibly may, "There is some of the King's blood spilt." Every one recollects the generosity with which, when the announcement was made of the Marquess of Lorne's approaching marriage with a daughter of the Queen, Sir William Harcourt, in his own name, and in that of the other members of the Royal Family, cordially welcomed the son of Maccallum More among them. We have been in the habit of considering the kingly descent of Sir William Harcourt as a rare, if not a unique, distinction. All the world has, indeed, heard of the bricklayers and cobblers, the butchers, turnpike-keepers, and sextons in whom the undisputed blood of the Plantagenets flowed, and Sir Bernard Burke and Mr. Jesse have traced it there with something of the ingenuity which Hamlet showed in following Alexander's dust to a bunghole, and with a closer attention to historic evidence. Not long ago, it is said, a lineal descendant of the charcoal-burner who found the body of William Rufus in the New Forest was pursuing his hereditary vocation in the same place, and a little disturbance of chronology might have brought him face to face with the collateral descendant of the Red King, who, by some hereditary instinct, perhaps, has fixed his dwelling there. Sir William Harcourt cannot, indeed, have figured in the ghostly procession of those at whom the blood-boltered Banquo pointed and smiled at them for his, for they, we believe, actually mounted the throne, and there are still many lives between the Crown and Sir William.

There are, indeed, apparently more than is usually supposed. An ingenious German writer, Professor Dr. G. M. Asher, has contributed to the October number of the Deutsche Rundschau an article which bears the title "Die Gentry und deren Abstammung von Englischen Königen." The thesis which the writer sets himself to maintain is that the great body of the English gentry are descended from the English kings. We cannot say that in our view the proposition is conclusively established. The writer proceeds rather in the way of illustration than by statistical proof. One typical instance which he takes is that of the noble family of Bathurst, which springing, so far as authentic history extends, from a Director of the East India Company, allied itself, in the person of one of the earlier peers of that name, with a daughter of the house of Lennox, and so is affiliated, to use a term not inappropriate in this connexion, to Charles II. Charles II., indeed, is credited with many contraband contributions of the royal blood, and a part of Dr. Asher's essay is a prose rendering and amplification of a celebrated couplet in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel. Another example we approach with more awe and reverence. Dr. Asher prints a genealogical table, beginning with the name of Edward III. and ending with that of "Will. E. Gladstone"—the diapason closing full in the grand old man. From Edward III. and John of Gaunt and Catherine Roet—has German erudition discovered this to be the real name of Catherine Swinford, and was she, like John himself, of Flemish birth?—the list proceeds through the semi-legitimate Beauforts, and the noble houses of Athol, Sutherland, and Huntley, to the more familiar patronymics of Gladstone and Robertson. But Dr. Asher must be allowed the use of his own tongue in tracing the lineage of "the greatest of living Englishmen," if that be the proper phrase:—"Die Descendenz, aus welcher Gladstone entsprossen, bewegt sich, aus der einen Seite durch fünf, und der anderen durch vier Generationen, von Johann Beaufort herab, in der hohen Nobility, und geht dann durch Töchter—auf der einen Seite Jane Gordon, Tochter des Grafen Sutherland, auf der anderen Elizabeth Stewart, Tochter des Grafen Athole, die unbetitelte Männer heirathen—in die unbetitelte Gentry über." In the days of Darwin and Galton researches of this kind are something more than matters of idle, or rather industrious, curiosity. Dr. Asher appreciates their significance. It is well worth remarking, he says, that "men of so pronounced and truly kingly a consciousness of power [wahrhaft königlichem Autoritätsbewusstsein], as for instance, Gladstone, Parnell, Wolseley, Tennyson, and Sir Frederick Leighton, President of the Academy of Arts, though sons of not-to-the-nobility-belonging fathers, nevertheless have demonstrably sprung from kingly ancestors." Confining ourselves to Mr. Gladstone, and neglecting for the moment the kingly qualities of Mr. Parnell and "Sir Fred. Leighton, Präsident der Akademie der Künste," and the rest, we may remark that to be the descendant of Edward III. is much more than to be the descendant of Edward III. and his Norman and Saxon ancestors—it is to be the descendant of Edward III.'s mother and of Philip V. of France, and all the preceding Philips and others of that kingdom. Mr. Gladstone represents not merely Midlothian and the House of Plantagenet, he represents the House of Valois, too. Perhaps this fact accounts for the sympathy he has always shown for France, and may explain his interference in the recent French elections, though it was not on behalf of the royal house of which he is an offshoot. He is moved by a kind of genealogical nostalgia.

By taking into account the various Fitzes who have emanated from Charles II. and other sovereigns, and especially by reckoning in the contributions made to the nobility by the Duchess of Suffolk, Henry VII.'s daughter, amounting, as one of her descendants proudly proclaimed in 1855, to a fourth of its total number, and by further keeping in mind the manner in which in England royalty, in its younger branches, subsides into the nobility, and the nobility into the gentry, and the gentry into the nicht-gentry, Dr. Asher leaves a gratifying impression on the mind of the reader that there is scarcely any one in England, including the said reader himself, who may not have at least a drop or two of royal blood in his veins. As all Irish women in Ireland are chaste, and as all Irishmen out of Ireland are the sons of kings, and have been to Trinity College, so all Englishmen, let us proudly believe, are of the blood royal, more or less.

Apart from his genealogical speculations—most of them based on English authorities—Dr. Asher has some very sensible remarks on the part which the English gentry have played, and still play, in the public and social life of England. The idea of the true gentleman and the true lady—"die Ideale des vollkommenen Gentleman und der vollkommenen Lady"—shapes conduct, as he points out, in other ranks than their own, and has created a noble type of man- and womankind. Dr. Asher has really a very fair knowledge of English society. He understands what we may call the Odo-Russell paradox, which puzzles so many foreigners—how the nephew and brother of a duke remained a simple Mister until he mysteriously became a lord, under the inexplicable name of Ampthill. He records a fact in connexion with the British army which he can only bring home to the minds of his readers by bidding them suppose a son of Herr Kranzler, confectioner, in Berlin, having a high command in the Prussian army. The most serious blunders which we have observed in his essay are due to a too implicit belief in the Financial Almanack, and an apparent ignorance of the fact that the useful and honourable order of solicitors have something to do with success at the Bar, which he attributes solely to aristocratic influence. He describes, among novelists, Thackeray as the most useful guide to a knowledge of the gentry (der nützlichste Führer der Kenntniss der Gentry), the other authorities whom he mentions combining the rather strangely-assorted names of "Bulwer, Trollope, Mrs. Craik, Mrs. Gaskell, Ch. Kingsley." On the other hand, we are told, Dickens is in this respect absolutely untrustworthy (hingegen ist Dickens in dieser Hinsicht absolut zuverlässig). We fear we must admit it. Dickens never understood that Lord Frederick Verisopht could not be at the same time Lord Verisopht; and he died impenitent in the conviction that Lord Decimus Barnacle was a peer. We are rather surprised that Dr. Asher does not mention some American novelists and other American writers as sources of information with regard to the manners, dress, and conversation of the nobility and gentry. They live and breathe, they bathe and swim in an atmosphere and ocean of lords, and are the interpreters not only to their own countrymen, but to the humble Britisher, of "The home-life of your aristocracy, sir."

SPECULATION IN GERMANY.

FOR several years now there has been a rampant speculation in Germany. The country undoubtedly has made great economic progress of late. There has been a marked development of industrial enterprise and a very considerable accumulation of capital. This, of course, has engendered a speculative spirit, and the spirit has been exaggerated by the policy of the Prussian Government in converting its debt and buying up the railways of the kingdom. Investors, dissatisfied with the low rates of interest obtainable from the public funds and railroad securities, turned in search of better paying investments, and speculators eagerly rushed in to secure profit by buying before the investors had made up their minds, in the hope of selling again to them at higher prices. At first speculation directed itself towards foreign Government bonds, and more particularly towards Russian bonds. Russian credit was very low at the time, and the great capitalists of Berlin conceived a plan for getting control of Russian finance, and ultimately converting the debt, thereby hoping, not only to make large profits, but to acquire political influence. The plan appeared very wild at the time, and most people predicted a crash; but failure was averted by French competition. The leading bankers of Paris took up the design originally conceived in Berlin, and they have already succeeded in converting a large part of the Russian Debt. In so doing they raised the price of Russian bonds considerably, and the German capitalists, who had bought at much lower quotations, were able to sell a considerable proportion of their holdings on very profitable terms. Encouraged by this result, they have extended their operations to Austrian, Hungarian, Italian, Egyptian, Turkish, and South American bonds, and they have been eagerly followed by a crowd of speculators. The courage of speculators has grown with each success, and during the past year or two they have run up to an unprecedented height the prices of domestic industrial concerns. The coal and iron trades are very prosperous. The protective tariff ensures to them the monopoly of the home market, and the demand for iron and steel is very large for military purposes, for railway construction and equipment, and for canals. Of late, indeed, the demand has exceeded the supply, and the imports of iron and steel from this country, Belgium, France, and Spain have become very large. Prices in consequence have risen above all precedent, and with the rise in the prices of iron and coal there has come an extraordinary rise in mining shares. A Frankfort journal published a week or two ago a list of nineteen industrial Companies, with the prices of the shares, at the beginning of January and the beginning of October. In three cases the rise has been from 100 to 136 per cent., in five cases it has been from 50 to 66 per cent., and in the remaining eleven cases from 18 to 50 per cent. And this is but a sample of what is going on in all directions. Naturally a speculation such as this has created grave apprehension. And careful observers are warning the public that a crisis cannot be long deferred. It is not merely that the prices of old securities have been run up in this wild way. There has also during the past few years been an extraordinary number of new loans and Companies brought out. In the year 1888 the total issues of all kinds in Germany amounted in round figures to about 95 millions sterling. And in the first half of the current year the amount was 49 millions sterling. Of course, many of those issues have not been subscribed for by the public; but yet the fact that nearly 150 millions sterling have been asked for from the German public in the course of eighteen months illustrates how great has been the absorption of capital of late. Rapid as has been the economic progress of the country, it is scarcely credible that its savings are large enough to supply the new demand, to run up old prices at such an unheard-of rate, and to purchase at the same time so considerable a proportion of foreign bonds. It is not surprising, then, that the liquidation on the Berlin Bourse at the end of last month was an exceedingly difficult one, and that Bourse borrowers were charged from 6 to 15, and in some cases even 20 per cent., for the accommodation afforded them. And our readers, therefore, will be prepared to hear that there is much anxiety as to the approaching liquidation at the end of this month.

The speculation has lasted much longer than most people expected. It has been favoured, of course, by the preservation of peace, and by the improvement in trade all over the world. Yet it could not have been maintained but for the peculiar constitution of banks on the Continent, and particularly in Germany. In this country business is highly specialized. Our banks, for example, are institutions which receive deposits from the public, and employ them in discounting good bills and lending upon readily realizable securities. Except for their regular customers, the banks, as a rule, do not themselves take even good bills directly from those who draw them. That is done by the discount houses and the billbrokers. And from these the banks purchase the bills. Thus the banks have not only additional security but, what is much more important, the advantage of the special knowledge and special experience of men whose whole lives are engaged in this particular branch of trade. As a rule, again, our banks do not issue loans and Companies. That is the business of great private firms, with partners of vast wealth and long experience. Lastly, our banks do not buy and sell upon the Stock Exchange. Of course they will undertake to invest for their customers, but they do not themselves buy and sell. They employ brokers for that. In Germany, on the contrary, lending and discounting constitute only a small part of a bank's business. Almost universally the banks are loan and Company mongers. Sometimes they bring out new issues alone, but generally they form syndicates for the purpose. They also combine a large Stock-Exchange business. Nearly every bank of any standing has one or more agents in the local bourse. It will be seen that banking in Germany is as yet in a rudimentary state. But the point to which we would direct the attention of our readers is, that the banks there are much more interested in Stock-Exchange quotations than are our banks. Our banks are, of course, interested in doing a large business; but if they are properly managed their chief care is that the business shall be safe. A German bank which itself undertakes to bring out an issue, or is largely interested as a member of a syndicate, is tempted to look rather to the success of the operation than to the safety of any particular loan it may make to a customer. The temptation is evidently strong to tout for business, to induce customers to buy shares or bonds, and, in order to do so, to make loans often far in excess of their means of repayment. As long as everything goes smooth the system is more effective for Stock-Exchange purposes than ours. Our banks often nip speculation in the bud by calling in loans when they think speculators are going too rapidly. But the German bank which has risked a large part of its capital in some grand operation is hardly in a position to refuse accommodation to its customers. On the other hand, the crash is sure to be all the greater if a crisis comes. It is not merely individual speculators scattered all over the country who are in danger of ruin, but the banks themselves. Up to the present, however, audacity, skill, and combination have availed to avert the danger, have kept up the confidence of the general public, and have carried prices continually higher and higher.

The most immediate source of danger is the dearth and scarcity of money in Berlin. The home trade of Germany is very prosperous, prices, as stated above, are exceptionally high, and wages have been raised in all directions by strikes and threatened strikes. Therefore, there is this year an unusual expansion of the internal coin circulation. On the other hand, the foreign trade of Germany is less favourable than in recent years. There are very large imports, especially of coal and iron, while owing to the high prices exports have fallen off. Consequently, the balance of trade is just now against Germany, and, therefore, the stock of gold held by the Imperial Bank is decreasing. To protect that stock the Imperial Bank has raised its rates of interest and discount every time the Bank of England has made an advance, and yet the outflow has not been stopped. It is said that the liquidation on the Berlin Bourse at the end of last month would have been even more difficult than it was but for the pecuniary assistance rendered by certain French banks. The rates of interest and discount were much higher in Berlin than in Paris, and it was profitable, therefore, for French bankers to employ their surplus money in Berlin. Besides, no doubt, the French banks in question were anxious to prevent such a disturbance of the Berlin money market as might have caused a fall upon the Bourse. It is feared that the coming liquidation in Berlin will be even more difficult than the last. There are strong doubts entertained whether the Imperial Bank will be inclined to lend largely. The note circulation of the Bank is already considerably in excess of the amount which it can issue without paying a royalty to the Government. Its loans and discounts are exceptionally large, and the drain upon its stock of gold is causing some apprehension. Therefore it is feared that the Bank may not be willing to afford such accommodation to the market as will tide the Bourse over its difficulties. The other banks, no doubt, will do what they can; but it is not generally believed that their power is equal to their will. Of course the Seehandlung-Societät, which is a Government institution, may be in a position to afford much accommodation, and it is possible, too, that French banks may once more give the assistance which they afforded at the end of last month. The great banks of Paris are interested in all sorts of financial operations which require for their success an easy money market and rising stock markets. At the same time, the Paris money market is very well supplied, and therefore is in a position to give assistance to Berlin. A fall in Berlin must inevitably cause a fall in Paris, and therefore it is probable that the assistance will be rendered if the amount required is not very large. Foreign bankers cannot to any very large extent take the place of local bankers. They may supplement the efforts of the latter, but they cannot act as a substitute for them. It depends, therefore, upon the ability of the German banks themselves to continue the accommodation to their customers, which they have hitherto been giving, whether the coming liquidation will pass over smoothly or not. It seems clear, however, that the wild speculation which has lasted so long has been carried nearly as far as it can be taken. The prices of coal and iron are higher now than they have been since the extraordinary inflation of 1873-4, and the prices of mining shares have been similarly run up. Every reader will remember that the inflation of 1873 ended in a crash that was followed by a long period of depression, and it will be strange indeed if the present speculation has not a like ending.

THE LEEDS FESTIVAL.

I.

THE reputation which the great Yorkshire musical gathering at Leeds has acquired since its revival in 1874—a reputation which culminated in the Festival of 1886, at which three such remarkable works as Sir Arthur Sullivan's Golden Legend, Dr. Mackenzie's Story of Sayid, and Professor Stanford's Ballad of the Revenge were first produced—caused the performances which took place at Leeds last week to be looked forward to with more than usual interest. The policy of the Committee in commissioning works by native composers had been so successful in 1886, that in 1889 it was resolved to confine the novelties to be produced entirely to works by British musicians, the only foreign composer invited to contribute—Herr Brahms—having declined to accede to the Committee's request for a new work. The Festival was, therefore, essentially English in character, and afforded a very good opportunity of estimating the position taken up by English composers, and of judging both their strong and their weak points. As in 1886, Dr. Mackenzie and Professor Stanford were represented by new and important works. Dr. Hubert Parry, whose Judith (produced at Birmingham last year) placed him in the first rank of native composers, contributed a setting of Pope's "Ode to St. Cecilia," and other novelties were given by Mr. Corder and Dr. Creser, a local musician; while Sir Arthur Sullivan, in addition to superintending the whole Festival, was represented by the music written for the recent performances of Macbeth at the Lyceum. The Committee are to be congratulated for their courage in relying upon native talent for the main attraction of the Festival, and for not, as is too often done on these occasions, depending upon performances of familiar standard works in order to swell the receipts. It is all the more gratifying to learn that, from a pecuniary point of view, the Festival has been a success; if the artistic result has not been altogether so satisfactory, the reason must be sought in another direction.

Of the performance of Berlioz's Faust, with which the Festival began on the morning of the 8th inst., there is no occasion to speak in detail, as the work is now thoroughly familiar to amateurs, and all the soloists who took part in it have been often heard in London. The performance, moreover, was not, as far as the chorus went, up to the standard which previous Festivals had entitled the audience to expect. The weakness of tone of the sopranos and tenors, the uncertainty of intonation and general lack of attack were attributed to over-fatigue, the two previous days having been devoted to long and exhausting rehearsals. Unfortunately, matters did not mend in this respect throughout the week. It is understood that the chorus had been almost entirely drawn this year from Leeds itself, and that Huddersfield and Bradford, which on former occasions had contributed large contingents, were practically unrepresented. If this was the case, it may explain many of the deficiencies which were so noticeable. Such a policy of local favouritism should be abandoned immediately if the Leeds chorus is to maintain the reputation it won in past years. It is pleasanter to turn from the deficiencies of the chorus to the excellence of the orchestra, which—with the exception of the occasional weakness of the horns—throughout the week won golden opinions, and reflected great credit upon the conductor.

The second concert, on the Wednesday evening, witnessed the production of the first of the Festival novelties, Mr. Corder's cantata, The Sword of Argantyr. Mr. Corder is a musician of whom great things have been expected since the days when he won the Mendelssohn scholarship. His compositions have always possessed a certain amount of originality, and their uncompromising character, especially in his younger days, led musicians to hope that, when he had sown his musical wild oats, he might produce something which would be an honour to himself and his country. His opera of Nordisa, which was performed under Mr. Carl Rosa's auspices two years ago, somewhat astonished his admirers by its apparently wilfully commonplace character. This was set down in some quarters to cynicism, and it was hoped that The Sword of Argantyr would retrieve the reputation of the composer. Whether it has done this or not may be a matter of opinion; but the verdict pronounced at Leeds was certainly not altogether favourable. The work is in many respects a return to the composer's earlier manner; but at the same time it contains many of the very commonplace features which distinguished Nordisa. No one will deny that The Sword of Argantyr is the work of a man of considerable talent; the orchestral writing shows this throughout; but, on the other hand, hardly a page of the score does not contain combinations and passages which can only be characterized as wilfully ugly. The solo parts are for the most part absolutely ungrateful; where they are not this, they are—to use the mildest terms—trivial and commonplace. In a man of less talent than Mr. Corder much which is objectionable in The Sword of Argantyr might be let pass; but his talent, if wayward, is so undoubted that it would be only mistaken kindness not to point out how fatal to his reputation such vagaries are. Even if space would allow, it would serve no purpose to examine the work in detail. The libretto—which is apparently the work of the composer—is laid out with great skill, and (if the absurd affectations of archaism in the argument be excepted) is written with much literary ability and considerable poetic feeling. It deals with a Scandinavian legend, in places strongly recalling passages of the Nibelung myth as treated by Wagner in his Trilogy. Possibly it was this resemblance which prompted Mr. Corder to reproduce many of the least agreeable features of the Bayreuth master's style. The performance, considering the very great difficulties of the work, was entitled to much praise. The chorus sang much better than in the morning, and the orchestra, as usual, was excellent. The very exacting and ungrateful soprano music was sung by Mme. Valleria, who struggled bravely against the too-evident effects of severe indisposition. The tenor music was sung by Mr. Piercy, while Mr. Barrington Foote sang that allotted to the baritone. The excellent performance of the small but difficult part of the Spirit of Argantyr, by Mr. Arthur Ferguson, a young bass with a good voice and method, deserves special mention. The second part of the concert consisted of Act III. of Wagner's Tannhäuser, with Mr. Edward Lloyd as the hero, Mr. Barrington Foote as Wolfram, Mme. Valleria as Elizabeth, and Fräulein Fillunger as Venus. In spite of the inevitable loss incurred by performing an operatic work without scenery, costume, or action, the selection proved very interesting and a welcome relief to the first part of the concert. It is almost needless to say that the chief honours were gained by Mr. Lloyd, whose Tannhäuser was altogether masterly.

The programme of Thursday morning's concert, though it suffered from excessive length, was admirably selected, consisting as it did of three masterpieces in such different styles as J. S. Bach's Actus Tragicus, Schubert's Mass in E flat, and Handel's Acis and Galatea. In Bach's Cantata there was almost no fault to be found with the performance; the work was sung and played by soloists, chorus, and orchestra in a thoroughly admirable manner. The solos, though not very important, were done full justice to by Miss Hilda Wilson and Messrs. Iver McKay and Brereton. Schubert's Mass was probably a quasi-novelty to most of the audience. In London it was performed some years ago by the Sacred Harmonic Society, and every successive hearing reveals in it fresh beauties. Performed in a concert-room, it doubtless loses much of the effect which it would produce in a church, and the fact that it is written throughout in flat keys gives rise to a certain amount of tonal monotony. But, apart from this small defect, the work is so full of charm and beauty that it deserves to be heard again and again. The solos were sung by Miss MacIntyre, Miss Hilda Wilson, Messrs. Piercy, Iver McKay, and Brereton. The soprano and the two tenors especially distinguished themselves in the lovely "Et incarnatus." Schubert's orchestration is never his strong point, and on this occasion some slight changes were made in the score, such as the occasional introduction of the organ and the suppression of the trombones in certain passages. Though this is a proceeding which is bad as a precedent, the result must be, on the whole, pronounced satisfactory. The accompaniments throughout were played without a fault; it is a pity the same cannot be said of the choral singing. Though the work is by no means difficult, the intonation of the chorus was at times distressingly bad, and one or two serious blunders were made which were, unfortunately, only too apparent. It would also have been an advantage if the chorus had received some instruction in the accepted manner of singing Latin. The contrast between the pure pronunciation of the soloists and the broad West-Riding dialect of the chorus was occasionally ludicrous in the extreme. The morning's concert ended with Acis and Galatea, in which, as was to be expected, the chorists showed themselves fully at home. In spite of the work coming at the end of a long programme, the singing was better than had previously been heard at the Festival, the basses, in particular, distinguishing themselves by their magnificent tone. Miss MacIntyre sang charmingly the music allotted to Galatea; and Mr. Brereton, if somewhat inclined to force his voice beyond its resources, was excellent as Polyphemus. Mr. Piercy was Acis and Mr. McKay Damon. The performance—especially so far as concerned the soloists—would have been better for more rehearsal; but, considering the amount of work to be got through in a short time, it is perhaps not to be wondered at if such a familiar classic as Handel's "Serenata" should be less rehearsed than newer and stranger works. The evening of Thursday was principally devoted to the production of two more of the novelties specially written for the Festival—namely, Dr. Creser's cantata, The Sacrifice of Freia, and Dr. Mackenzie's so-called Pibroch for violin solo and orchestra. The former is a setting of a fragment of a larger work left unfinished by the late Dr. Franz Hueffer. Its plot—if plot can be said to possess—is almost identical with that of Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night, and treats of a sacrifice to the Scandinavian Goddess of Spring, who is invoked to protect her votaries from a Christian invasion. The work ends as the worshippers rush to attack their foes, who are heard singing the old hymn, "Pange lingua," in the distance. The subject cannot be said to be very interesting; but the work is short, and Dr. Creser has not expanded it unduly. In this he shows some experience and a sense of dramatic effect with which the libretto can hardly have inspired him. His scoring is clever, and throughout the work there are many passages which show that the composer has considerable ability. At present he is evidently in a stage of transition. He has studied his Wagner, and is clearly much impressed by the system of leading motives which that master carried to such an extreme. Dr. Creser's adoption of the device is sometimes distinctly able; but he will, nevertheless, do well in his next work to abandon it, and to trust more to his own inspiration. The result will certainly be more spontaneous, and therefore more pleasing. With Dr. Mackenzie's Pibroch the only fault to be found is its name. Why a composition for violin and orchestra should be called by a name which is exclusively applied to bagpipe music, it is difficult to understand, especially as true pibrochs generally consist of three or four variations on either a dirge or a march, winding up with a quick movement, while Dr. Mackenzie's work, on the other hand, is made up of three distinct movements, styled respectively Rhapsody, Caprice, and Dance. The second of these consists of an introduction and nine variations on the old Scotch tune, "Three Guid Fellows," while the first subject of the Dance is taken from that treasure-house of Scotch song, the Skene MS. The whole work created a most favourable impression on its first performance. Dr. Mackenzie is never so happy as when writing for the orchestra, especially when his subject is a Scotch one. His Pibroch will rank with the best work he has produced; merely considered as a show-piece for the solo instrument it has qualities which will secure it a wide popularity, but its merits are far higher than this. For beauty of themes, ingenuity of treatment, and masterly orchestration, there is no work of its class which has been produced for some time to which it is inferior. The solo-part was admirably played by Señor Sarasate, who shared with the composer the hearty and well-deserved applause with which the new work was greeted. The remainder of the programme does not call for much remark, though mention must be made of Miss MacIntyre's admirable singing of the pathetic scena "L'altra notte," from Boïto's Mefistofele. Throughout the whole Festival the young Scotch soprano increased in favour with the audience, and her really admirable singing of Boïto's air created quite a sensation. The programme also included a very graceful Pastoral Chorus, "The Rosy Dawn," the composition of Mr. C. H. Lloyd; Spohr's Symphony, "The Power of Sound"; the Trial Songs from Wagner's Meistersinger; two numbers from a Suite for Violin and Orchestra, by Raff; and Gounod's overture to Mireille.

NOTES FROM THE ZOO.—LEPIDOSIRENS.

THE Manatee is dead, and its tank in the Reptile House is now occupied by Lepidosirens, or African mud-fish (Lepidosiren annectens). Thus one very old-world form has given way to another immeasurably older; for these fish are representatives of the Dipnoi—a type reaching back to the time when the Devonian rocks were in course of formation. The Dipnoi, once extremely plentiful and widely distributed, are now represented by four species only—Lepidosiren paradoxa, a very rare American species, an inhabitant of the river Amazon and its tributaries, of which little is known; two species of Ceratodus or Barramunda, plentiful in the Burnett, Dawson, and Mary rivers in Queensland; and Lepidosiren annectens, the African species, specimens of which are now living in the Zoo. The last-named is by far the commonest and most widely distributed, being found throughout the whole of tropical Africa, in the Upper Nile, in the Central Lake region—in some parts of which, Baker tells us, it is eaten by the natives both fresh and dried—on the Zambesi, and in all the rivers of the West Coast. Little was known of these animals until the year 1837, in which year this species was described by Professor Owen under the name Protopterus; while in the same year Dr. Natterer published an account of the allied American species under the name Lepidosiren paradoxa; after which Professor Owen, considering that both species must be referred to the same genus, adopted Dr. Natterer's generic name, and called the African species Lepidosiren annectens, the name still in general use and adopted by the Zoological Society. Authorities, however, are not agreed, as Dr. Günther, as we find by reference to the collection of fishes in the British Museum, is of opinion that the African form should more correctly be described as Protopterus annectens, and that it is generically distinct from the American Lepidosiren.

From the point of view of ordinary visitors to the Zoo the change from the manatee, or "mermaid," as many of them preferred to call it, to the Lepidosiren, is eminently uninteresting, and many are the expressions of disappointment called forth by the sight of what is apparently considered to be some species of eel in the place of the expected "mermaid." Yet though so generally treated with contempt, and passed by with a mere glance, Lepidosiren is a creature of more than ordinary interest. In appearance it certainly bears some faint resemblance to an eel, or better still, to an eel-pout, in that its body is somewhat eel-shaped, but here the resemblance ends. One difference between the Lepidosiren and the eel must strike the least observant—namely, that the former has four limbs, occupying the places of the pectoral and ventral fins in other fishes, which, to quote Professor Owen, "are round, filiform, gradually attenuated to an undivided point, resembling tentacles or feelers rather than fins or legs," and are the simplest form of limb known. Though they have no other very noticeable outward peculiarities, the Lepidosirens are very remarkable creatures, approximating to the amphibia, and possessing in reality far more peculiarities than it is possible even to mention in an article of this description. A few, however, of the most important must be given. The respiratory organs consist not only of gills, but also of lungs, or rather lung-like sacs; the skeleton is very peculiar, being partly cartilaginous and partly bony, the bony part being green, as in the common gar-fish; the dentition is also very peculiar, the jaws being armed with two slender conical and slightly recurved teeth and with strong dental plates on both the upper and lower sides of the mouth; and, lastly, the nostrils, of which there are two pairs, are placed within the opening of the mouth, and these nostrils by their structure determine the class to which the Lepidosiren belongs; for, as Professor Owen says, "in the organ of smell we have at last a character which is absolute in reference to the distinction of fishes from reptiles. In every fish it is a short sac communicating only with the external surface; in every reptile it is a canal with both an external and an internal opening. According to this test, the Lepidosiren is a fish; by its nose it is known not to be a reptile; in other words, it may be said that the Lepidosiren is proved to be a fish not by its gills, not by its air bladders, not by its spinal intestine, not by its unossified skeleton, not by its generative apparatus, nor its extremities, nor its skin, nor its eyes, nor its ears, but simply by its nose; so that at the close of our analysis we arrive at this very unexpected result, that a reptile is not characterized by its lungs nor a fish by its gills, but that the only unexceptionable distinction is afforded by the organ of smell."

Though Lepidosirens are without doubt fishes, they spend a considerable part of their existence out of the water, as they inhabit shallow waters which periodically dry up. During the dry season they enclose themselves in balls of clay, which are lined with mucus, and have small holes at either end to admit the air. In these they remain torpid until the rains refill their pools, when they emerge and resume their existence in the water. The balls of hardened clay enclosing the fishes in a torpid condition are sometimes brought to this country, and specimens of them may be seen in the British Museum. These fishes are said never to leave the water voluntarily; but from time to time they rise to the surface to fill their lungs with a fresh supply of air, a habit which cannot escape the notice of any one watching those in the Reptile House. The Australian Ceratodus, on the contrary, is believed to go out among the reeds and rushes on the flats which are left uncovered by the tide. Lepidosirens attain a length of from three to six feet; they are carnivorous, feeding on frogs, fishes, and other aquatic animals. The specimens in the Zoo, however, are small, averaging about a foot in length, and are fed on small fishes.

MONEY MATTERS.

THE money market has continued easy throughout the week. Most of the gold hitherto received has been taken away again, so that the Bank of England's stock has not been materially increased; but another million is coming from St. Petersburg, and the prospect of its receipt is keeping down the rates of interest and discount. There are reports, indeed, that most of it will be sent away to South America, and there are fears that a demand for Germany may arise. But brokers and bankers comfort themselves with the reflection that the great financial houses have undertaken to keep the market easy, and that they will do so.

The fortnightly settlement upon the Stock Exchange at the beginning of the week was one of the heaviest for a considerable time past. It covered a period of nineteen days, the usual period being fourteen or fifteen. And during the account there was a large speculation in Home Railway stocks, in South African diamond, gold, and land shares, and in miscellaneous securities. Although the settlement officially ended on Wednesday night, it actually was not concluded on the following evening, and even yesterday many offices did not know how they really stood. The supply of money was plentiful, and Stock Exchange borrowers were not charged unreasonable rates. But within the Stock Exchange itself the rates charged to speculators for continuing their accounts in some departments were extraordinarily heavy. In the South African department, for instance, rates of continuation ranged from 20 to 40 per cent., and in some instances even higher. The time and labour involved in completing the settlement and the stiff rates checked business. There was also some disappointment felt with several of the railway traffic returns. But apparently the speculation in South African land shares, as well as in gold and diamond shares, disconcerted for the moment, is likely to recover and to continue merrily for some time yet, and in Paris preparations are being made for a general rise in prices. The Bank of France is very strong, money is cheap and plentiful, the Exhibition has proved profitable to Paris at all events, if not to all France, and generally there is a good deal of money to invest. Besides, the great French banks have entered into arrangements for bringing out new loans and new Companies for very large amounts, and they are intent upon preparing the market. If they succeed, they will, of course, relieve Berlin of some of its difficulties. Berlin will naturally co-operate; and, although the most dangerous speculation in Berlin is in domestic mining shares, yet, if the Berlin speculators are able to sell the international securities they hold at high prices, they will clearly be in a better position to get through the coming liquidation on the Bourse. In New York the rates of interest and discount have continued unusually high for this time of the year. According to past experience, money ought to be flowing back freely from the interior. But the supply seems to be exceedingly scanty in New York, and rates are very high. Still, the New York Stock Exchange has been very firm, and as soon as ease returns to the money market the general expectation is that the rise in prices will be carried much further.

The condition of the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé Railway Company is, no doubt, a great obstacle in the way of an advance. The Board of the Company a few years ago adopted a grand policy of extension, which was to do wonders, but, in fact, has ended in practically making the Company bankrupt. The shares a little while ago stood at 140; they are now under 30, and the Directors have to propose a reorganization of the debt, or, in plain language, a compromise with the creditors of the Company. The proposals put forward, however, are not very acceptable. The rate of interest on the existing loans is generally 5 or 6 per cent., and for the higher rate it is proposed to substitute a General Mortgage Bond bearing 4 per cent. interest. This would be reasonable enough were it not that the bondholders are asked to surrender all bonds bearing higher interest for a smaller amount of the 4 per cent. bonds, and as a compensation they are offered a certain proportion of 5 per cent. Income Bonds. The interest on these latter, however, is payable only if and when it is earned. The sum and substance of the scheme come to this; the shareholders have ruined their Company by an over-ambitious policy, and they now ask the bondholders to take upon themselves all the sacrifices. It does not seem probable that the bondholders will consent; and if they do not the Company may have to make default in its interest, and a receiver may have to be appointed.

According to a private telegram received in London at the beginning of the week, the Argentine Finance Minister has laid a Bill before Congress proposing to reduce the note circulation to 100 millions of dollars, and to create a gold reserve fund of 80 millions of dollars. Where the fund is to come from is not stated. The new loan, of course, will provide part of it, but it is not easy to see how the rest is to be obtained. And without a real reserve the Bill will effect little. Apparently the Argentine public do not put much trust in the Government proposals; for, although the premium on gold at first fell to 100 per cent., it rose in a day or two to 104 per cent. And, indeed, it is obvious that, if there is a rapid and violent contraction of the circulation, a crisis in the money market must be caused, prices must fall alarmingly, and there must almost inevitably be widespread ruin.

The speculation in the iron market has been carried forward very actively all through the week. Comparing Glasgow prices on Thursday of last week and of this week, there is a rise of about two shillings per ton. The lowest price touched at the beginning of the year was 40s. 10d., and the highest price this week has been 55s. 10d. This is a rise of 15s., or over 36 per cent. As a natural consequence there has also been a considerable advance in mining shares. On the Manchester Stock Exchange, particularly, there has been a very active speculation this week, and the advance compared with twelve months ago is very great.

The price of silver has touched this week the highest point of the year, the highest, indeed, since November of last year. The Government is engaged in calling in half-sovereigns coined previous to the present reign, and in their place it is paying out silver. It is said that it is paying the workpeople in the Admiralty dockyards and in the workshops generally to the full limit of 2*l.*, for which silver is legal tender. To do this the coinage has been considerably increased. There has also been a good demand for some of the colonies and for Japan. In consequence, the price of silver has been during the summer higher than the Indian banks have been willing to pay, and the result is that for purposes of remittance the Indian banks have been buying India Council bills and telegraphic transfers much more largely than is usual at this time of the year. Generally there is a great falling off in the demand for Council remittances during the summer. But since the 1st of April—that is, the beginning of the financial year—the India Council has sold bills and transfers realizing about two millions sterling more than during the first twenty-eight weeks of the last financial year, and the price obtained has, nevertheless, been about the average of the corresponding period of last year. Last year, although the sales were so much smaller than they have been this year, the price tended downwards from the very beginning to the very end. This year the increased sales have not depressed the price. From all this it would appear that the supply of silver at present prices is very much smaller than is generally supposed. Apparently the number of silver mines that can produce at the present price is not very great, and any material increase in the consumption will, therefore, necessitate such an advance in prices as would enable other mines to resume working.

THE EXQUISITE REASON.

[“That addle-pated newspaper, the Saturday Review, has the sense to see —.”—SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT at Carnarvon.]

(A bewildered Gladstonian speaketh.)

“OH! good Sir William, tell to me
—My wits are quite checkmated—
Why when your foes ‘have sense to see’
You call them ‘addle-pated’?”

(The good Sir William answereth wrathfully.)

“Degenerate Gladstonian!
You talk but fiddle-faddle;—
Can there be sense in any man
Except his brains be addle?”

“Is Home Rule sense, sir? Speak, I beg”—

“Why, yes, Sir William, truly”—

“And in all the world was e’er an egg
Addled more through-and-throughly?”

REVIEWS.

THE CARISBROOKE LIBRARY.*

THE third, fourth, and fifth numbers of the “Carisbrooke Library” all present, in handsome, convenient, and cheap form, work which deserves to be a great deal better known by the readers of cheap books in England than it is. We have before now had occasion to comment on certain defects of Mr. Morley's editorship, which do not become less evident as he emerges from professorship into the greater freedom and less responsibility of his present state. These defects are by no means trivial; indeed, we have never known any person who loved literature so much and yet seemed to possess so few of the qualities of that “liberal education” as Mr. Morley does. Except industry and a generous determination to make others share his love, we can find but little to praise in him. He does not write well; his faculty of arrangement is defective; his judgment in all questions, literary and other, is anything but strong. And yet, by sheer dint of the two merits we have mentioned—a great, if not a reasonable, love of what is good, and a steadfast will to make others sharers in the good things he sees—few people have done or are doing sounder work than he does.

* The Carisbrooke Library. Edited by Henry Morley. The Earlier Works of Daniel Defoe. Early Prose Romances. English Prose Writings of John Milton. London: Routledge.

The Defoe volume is a particularly useful one, though the defects of arrangement, if not of judgment, to which we have referred are specially noticeable in its curious fragments of biography, which are scattered about in different places of the book, as if Mr. Morley had not been able to keep pace with his printers, and had stuck in a chapter of "life" here and a batch of "works" there to keep them going. Defoe is to the possessor of a library for use, not show, one of the most heartbreaking of authors. There is no collection of his work which is complete; the various collectors of it have, with a fiendish ingenuity, taken trouble not to supplement each other, and they have omitted, supplied, and duplicated in such a way that the unhappy reader must possess many things three or four times over in order to have as much as is to be had. And the present volume, though not entirely a complement, is a very useful addition to the cheapest and most accessible of all the reprints, that in Bohn's Library. It contains The Essay on Projects, The True-Born Englishman, The Shortest Way with the Dissenters, The Hymn to the Pillory, the very interesting and curious Consolidator, and, of course, Mrs. Veal. All these are extremely well worth reading, and if Mr. Morley, still not disdaining to keep an eye on "Bohn," gives another volume (there is room for two) equally well selected, it will be at last possible by the expenditure of some five-and-twenty or thirty shillings to get together a fairly representative collection of a very remarkable English writer. At present, with an immensely unnecessary expenditure of shelf-room for reduplications, it cannot be done under from five to ten pounds, excluding the biographical information, which is very fairly summarized as to fact in these chapters. Of course Mr. Morley harps on the old "irony" of The Shortest Way. To people who do not understand irony it is probably in vain to point out that there is none here. But Defoe, though he had little irony, had the most astonishing faculty of assimilating other people's moods that ever man had, and he wrote The Shortest Way exactly as a highflying Tory would have written it. Any one who can understand irony may be asked to read Swift's Argument Against Abolishing Christianity, to imagine how Swift would have written The Shortest Way, and then by comparison to discern at once why The Shortest Way is not ironical. Mr. Morley's own work on Swift is sufficient guarantee that he could never himself perform this exercise if it were his neckverse at Hairibee.

The second volume of the batch is of a different, but a not less welcome, nature. The "Early Prose Romances" which Mr. Morley has selected consist of certain of the Hundred Merry Tales, eleven to begin with, and a second batch as a kind of make-weight at the end. The History of Reynard the Fox, Robert the Devil, Virgilius, the History of Hamlet, that of Friar Bacon, Guy of Warwick, and Friar Rush come between—a goodly company. We are more particularly glad to see this volume, because a pestilent growth has sprung up of "Stories from So-and-so," "So-and-so Modernized," and the like, which threatens to bereave the youth of the present and near future of half the benefit of this delightful folk-literature. For your modernizing men and women are generally a very detestable crew. It is not long since we came across an apparently well-intentioned book of the kind which interlarded and commented its narratives with cheap wit of the penny-a-lining 'Arry type in such a manner that we really thank Providence for not having put the throat of that 'Arry within reach of our snickersnee at the moment. Things are not always as bad as this. But we really do not know whether the desperately archaic modernizer for whom the old English of the tales is not old enough, and who goes to Wardour Street for older, or the piously mystical modernizer who adapts them to a system of moralizing which is half Story without an End and half Agathos, or the historical and local-colour moralizer who pins his faith to Mr. Freeman or somebody else, or the march-of-intellect modernizer (but, thank Heaven, he is getting rare now), or any other of the numerous types of the fiend, is the most horrible and damnable. Professor Morley, of course, lets his texts (which are mostly fifteenth or sixteenth century) alone, for which let him have endless thank. His brief introduction of some twenty or thirty pages may be skipped without great loss and read without great irritation, though in his account of Reynard, for instance, he is far too prone to take theories for gospel and hypothesis for fact. Indeed, Mr. Morley's pretty copious references to literatures other than English are considerably lacking in exactitude. He says, for instance, that the most famous of Virgilian centos (a matter which, by the way, has nothing on earth to do with his text) is "a nuptial cento in which the pure Virgil [of course he writes the absurd form Vergil, which is neither Latin nor English] is made to speak immodestly"; if he had known the original, he would surely have entered the limitation that only part of the poem is at all immodest. But no matter for this and other trifling things. The text is the thing, and Mr. Morley has given us the text very desirably, so that all may read and see what much better men our fathers that were before us were than ourselves, and what much better books they read. To compare Reynard or Virgilius with the popular novels that Mr. Gladstone reviews is enough to make one cry.

The pricking of our thumbs told us that Mr. Morley's selections from Milton's prose would be more debatable, and they certainly are. Even here, however, things might have been worse. For one thing that Mr. Morley has written—the sentence no less just than chivalrous, "there is no reason whatever why we should think ill of Mary Powell"—we could forgive him more than there is to forgive. His selection of the works might, perhaps, have been improved; he gives both the Reformation of Church Discipline and the Reason of Church Government, when one would have sufficed; he gives the Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce (being apparently blind to the ludicrous want of sense of the ludicrous which it displays), and he gives the Tenure of Kings and Magistrates, the Treatise of Civil Power, and the Ready and Easy Way to Establish a Free Commonwealth. The Areopagitica and the Letter to Hartlib come in as a matter of course. But he refuses to give any of Milton's strictly controversial works—that is to say, his answers to others, or attacks upon them. Certainly there is much in these controversial works which every admirer of Milton would wish away; but there are also in them many of his finest and most of his most characteristic passages; and we do not know, little as we like the "gross scurrility" which shocked even the late rector of Lincoln, that it is not better than the pedantic and unpractical doctrinairism of much of the work that Mr. Morley gives. Milton, though not a pretty or elegant, was a vigorous enough, fighter; he was anything but a good preacher. Yet Mr. Morley must needs emphasize his tendency to preach by adopting such headings as "God and Man," "Man and Wife," "Man and Child," "Man and Man," as if Milton—than whom we should have supposed even those who at times agree with him would have admitted that no more unpractical adviser ever existed—were a Socrates or a Solomon. In his introduction Mr. Morley tells us that "the common idea of Milton's austerity is a vulgar error." It is very easy to apply this or any other term to an opinion with which you do not agree; but we confess that for ourselves we should have liked a little proof. Mr. Morley produces none, except the fact that Voss described Milton to Heinsius as "mitis comes multisque aliis virtutibus præditus" (as if such phrases in a Latin letter of the time meant any more than "obedient humble servant" means now), and an affectionate speech of one of his daughters many years after her father's death. To set against this we have the overwhelming weight of tradition, the positive testimony of Ellwood—certainly not an unfavourable witness—and, what is far better, the evidence of Milton's own works and the ways of thought revealed in them. We do not refer to the savage scurrility of the controversial writings, for much of this was as merely conventional as the mitis comes itself, and, besides, it is matter of common knowledge that a man may be a very Drawcansir with the pen in his hand who in private life is as mild as a sheep and much more tractable. But every line that Milton wrote (even when he was holding out a prospect of wine and music) shows the very opposite of the "good fellow," the precise, formal, anxiously self-regarding, self-esteeming man who, with a little less genius, would have run the risk of being nothing but a mere ascetic or an acrid prig. Here, again, no doubt, the text's the thing. We cannot help being sorry that Mr. Morley did not give some other things, notably the charming and fantastic History of England. After all, however, the important thing was to give a sufficient number of whole examples of Milton's extraordinarily vigorous and, in kind, almost unmatched style. The Areopagitica, good as it is, has been run to death, and, besides, is not by any means an exhaustive collection of Milton's literary manners. The extracts, longer or shorter, which have been often attempted, have the disadvantage which is common to all extracts, but to which no writer is so much exposed as Milton—the disadvantage, to wit, that they show him either "prettified" or mutilated, or both. No one endures either process much worse than he, though the longer we live the more out of conceit with extracts in general do we grow. It is the great merit of this "Carisbrooke Library" that its volumes are sufficient, in the case of almost all authors, to give either entire single works of considerable length, or a collection of entire single works of a varied and representative character without mutilation and without oneness. And therefore, however frequently we may disagree with Mr. Morley's opinions and desiderate in him merits which he does not possess, we hope that he will be able to push the series to a real bookcase-full of volumes, if not to such a bookcase-full (it was to be ten feet square, if we remember rightly) as that which the late Mr. Pattison declared would hold all really important literature.

NOVELS.*

HAD The Master of Ballantrae appeared anonymously, the naming of the author could have caused none of Mr.

* The Master of Ballantrae. By Robert Louis Stevenson. London: Cassell & Co. 1889.

Marooned. By W. Clark Russell. 3 vols. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

Darell Blake. By Lady Colin Campbell. London: Trischler & Co. 1889.

The Pennycomequicks. By S. Baring Gould. 3 vols. London: Blackett & Hallam. 1889.

Stevenson's readers the least pretext for hesitation. No other living novelist could have written this remarkable and in some ways masterly romance. The style alone were conclusive evidence. The distinction, for this very reason, is notable. The Master of Ballantrae is essentially a story of incident and adventure, and these are of the most romantic, yet also of the most plausible, complexion. Stories of adventure are not commonly distinguished, in the present day, by any sort of style whatever; style and artistic method are, in fact, the last literary qualities one thinks of associating with them. With Mr. Stevenson style is the first consideration. In one of his ingenuous essays he informs a curious public how, in the tenderest years of his literary apprenticeship, he was deliberate and assiduous in seeking after style. The evolutionary process is perhaps not readily made out—there are passages in The Master of Ballantrae that vividly recall Mr. Stevenson's earliest essays in literature—yet there can be, with regard to the attainment, but one opinion. It may not be so divinely unobtrusive as some have judged that a writer's style should be, and is, in fact, a little self-conscious at times, arresting one at intervals when the charm is in full working with a curious effect of personal intervention. But neither in Treasure Island nor in Kidnapped do we feel the charm of style more potent and subtle and well sustained than in the narrative of Mr. Ephraim MacKellar and the pleasant interludes of the Chevalier Burke, wherein is preserved the strange history of the fraternal feud that long troubled and well-nigh wrecked the fortunes of the Duries of Durrisdeer and Ballantrae. The piquancy of contrast is finely illustrated in the narrative of startling and unprecedented events by the "homespun" MacKellar, the steward of the family, and by the characters of the two brothers—the gallant, daring, and graceful Master of Ballantrae, and his homely long-suffering brother, who for the honour of the family endures incredible persecution at the hands of the Master. Mr. Stevenson's skill and insight are strikingly exhibited in the conception and development of these characters. Nor is the humorous self-revelation of MacKellar's less complex but very interesting nature less masterly in its way than the more searching and subtle analysis of the Master's character. On the one hand, we have recitals of stirring adventures on sea or land, as moving as any in Treasure Island, in which pirates, adventurers, Indians, smugglers, and other picturesque ruffians adorn the ever-shifting scene; and with these brave and ever-welcome things we have studies of the mind of man and the human heart, the motive springs of action, the passions of ambition, hate, and revenge, presented with wonderful power, influence, and fascination. The Master of Ballantrae is, with all the repellent features of the portraiture, an imposing and truly romantic figure. The character may well engage the polemical ardour of a people addicted to the free discussion of the nature of free will. His hatred of his brother and his diabolical plottings against him sometimes find a frank and brutal way of speech and action, though more often the meditated evil is cunningly disguised by courtly speech and a mock-submissive air. Extremely artistic is the skill with which Mr. Stevenson enlists the reader's sympathies with the hero at the outset. The Master has but to die to inherit popularity, and when the false report of his death is spread abroad we are made to feel how natural and honourable is the regret expressed by all but Mr. Ephraim MacKellar for the loss of a bad man. Circumstances are against him at the first, perhaps; but his evil-doing and persistency in it are obviously of his own free choice. By the toss of a coin with his brother it falls to him to represent the family as a Jacobite in the rising of the '45. He becomes a fugitive, attainted by the Government, and consorts with all kinds of villanous company. Something of chivalry, and not mere recklessness, may have inspired him to stake so much on the toss of a coin; but after the fight at Culloden, when he is given up for dead, neither chivalry nor any other virtue, save courage, brightens his dark and tortuous career. He reappears on the scene to find his brother in possession of his place, married to the lady he was himself engaged to, and his old father, his brother's wife, and the whole countryside full of regretful and romantic adoration of his gallantry. In such circumstances does he open his campaign against his brother, pursuing him with vindictive and spiteful provocation, blackening his character by secret and injurious arts, and by not less ingenious sophistries and blandishments establishing himself in the goodwill of his father and sister-in-law. And it is after a long succession of insults and injuries, culminating in a duel with his brother, in which he is worsted and left for dead, after a foul attempt at fratricide, that the Master calmly acknowledged to the excellent MacKellar that his malignant course was deliberately chosen. "Ah! MacKellar," said he, "do you think I have never a regret?" "I do not think you could be so bad a man," said I, "if you had not all the machinery to be a good one." "No, not all," says he, "not all. You are there in error. The malady of not wanting, my evangelist." There is much in this confession, no doubt, though "the malady of not wanting" is, in truth, far too simple a key to the intricate machinations of the Master. As is the case with his brother, who develops after the duel a hatred only less intense, and is reasonably suspected of insanity by the devoted MacKellar, the actions of the Master are not always such as accord with perfect sanity. There is a touch of extravagance in the episode of the Master, fallen from his high estate to be a clouter of clothes in a mean shanty in New York, while his wealthy brother gloats daily over his position, seeking vainly to provoke some furious outburst. In the striking and dramatic climax of the story Mr. Stevenson still more decidedly forsakes the patient and logical evolutionary process, the method and skill of which remind us of Balzac, and carries us off into his own kingdom of the grimly fantastic. The final scene, however, is extremely effective, and nothing Mr. Stevenson has produced is more finely imagined or more graphically realized than the last narrative of the Master's forlorn hope and the quest after buried treasure in the American wilds.

Mr. Clark Russell has written stories of the sea more interesting and more exciting than Marooned, which will strike the landsman at least as curiously circumscribed in development and a yarn inordinately spun out. The story is all about the voyage of a young man and a young lady on board an unpleasant sailing vessel with a brutal skipper and mutinous crew bound from London to Rio. The young man has gallantly undertaken to convoy the young lady to her affianced swain, at his importunate and rather singular request, and the confiding youth of Rio lives to reap the almost inevitable consequence of his faith in friendship, but survives, in spite of it, to his own unmerited consolation. The lady is beautiful as a houri, and her courage is more than enough for the horrors of a mutiny and the marooning of herself and the hero on a West Indian islet. Companions in adversity, thrown together on a tight little island of their own, there is little for them to do but to make love; and this they do in a timid and fugitive way, as if the ghosts of the buccaneers who once haunted their underground dwelling might arise and interrupt them. They do not so much as fear that the figure of the unhappy lover at Rio might visit their dreams. It is all very innocent and natural in the circumstances, which, though intended to be dreadfully trying, appear to the susceptible reader to be really very enviable. The account of the voyage is, however, of such tedious monotony that we are ready to welcome anything or excuse anything, and never have we so keenly felt the truth of Dr. Johnson's implied preference of a gaol to a long sea voyage. Mr. Russell revels in the sea and in things marine, and no one should be disposed to quarrel with him on this score; but he does not, in Marooned at least, provide sufficient variety of entertainment to stay the stomach of landsmen. We are quite sorry when the skipper makes a strange disappearance. He is an intelligible and interesting personality. The sailors also are capitally painted, and of navigation and the mysteries of rigging and the like we have more than enough. The mutiny is a good ordinary mutiny; the marooning is not less ordinary, and the adventures on the island are of the most unexciting kind, after a spell of Mr. Stevenson and Mr. Rider Haggard. And, finally, all our romantic hopes are dashed when we learn that the defrauded lover at Rio has, on hearing of the loss of the ship, which the mutineers have scuttled, taken to himself another lady, and is not ill content with himself when the pretty perfidy of his old love and older friend is made known to him.

Darell Blake is, what it claims to be, "a Study," a fact of peculiar significance when we consider how prevalent is the abuse of the term by the professors of a so-called scientific method in fiction. It deals with "things as they are," to quote the Godwinian phrase, not in the philosopher's way of a presentment of life predetermined by theory, but as they are in "the world of all of us," and the study has at once the depth and the sparkle of vitality, in its lighter as in its darker passages. It has been well said that the studies of great artists do often more consciously proclaim individuality and mastery than their finished work. Thus the sketch has precedence over the projected work in another sense than the literal. It is charged with a higher interest to students because of the potentiality it suggests. The character of Lady Colin Campbell's hero is intensely interesting. It reveals uncommon acuteness and freshness of observation, and that reserve of power which the possession and artistic control of power can alone suggest. Lady Colin Campbell is certainly gifted in the art, so like intuition it may well be intuition, that impels the unfaltering hand to stay at the right moment in the process of characterization, to give the required accent of light or nuance of shade with the simple and delicate touch that is most effective. Darell Blake is vigorously drawn and harmoniously developed. There is no disaccord between what he is at the outset and what he becomes, though the first state of the man compared with the last is as the garden state of innocence contrasted with the seventh circle of Dante's Hell. By nature he is, though ambitious, compacted of simple and healthy aspirations; fate and circumstance re-fashion him and develop the man he becomes. But to us the evolutionary process presents no flaw. There is none of that common and profitless working in circles, around and around the central conception, till the writer's aim is blurred, the effect nullified, and nothing is left to the reader but the burden of over-labour and the superfluity of iterated effort. When Darell Blake, the Radical editor of a reputable provincial paper, finds himself appointed to an important Liberal metropolitan daily journal, he is like a man from another planet in the society to which his promotion gives him the entrée. That society—society represented and interpreted by the "Society" papers—is depicted with exceeding cleverness. There are types drawn from life that, singularly enough, do, nevertheless, live—the man about town, the flâneur, the cynic, the gandin—a very amusing sketch—the fashionable parson, the lady who would lead, and the lady whose ambition is to preside at her own salon. With the confidence that is one of the most valuable fruits of his political faith, Darell plunges into the new and invigorating life. He is young, ardent, cocksure, ingenuous, inexperienced, and supercharged with sincerity—the most unfashionable and perilous of mental habits. He is, moreover, the happy and contented husband of the daughter of the proprietor of the provincial paper he had edited, and she is “prosaic, timid, sluggish,” with an unbounded gift of unselfishness, and an ineradicable provincialism of temperament. She is and remains an unassimilated item in their new life, and hankers after the flesh-pots, literally the heavy dinners, and solemn gatherings of Middleborough. But Darell develops apace, under the guidance and patronage of Lady Alma Vereker, the beautiful and baleful star of the heaven of his ambition. This woman, not less ambitious than Blake, though cold as ice, hard as steel, without ideal or principle, flatters, lionizes, and fools the young editor till he loses his head and avows his love. Love, and indeed all sentiment, save “the cause of the people,” had lain dormant in him. The crisis is not reached, however, before the conspicuous companionship of the two arouses the jealousy of the wife and causes a scene of remonstrance and irritation which is painted with admirable delicacy and truth. The infatuated Darell trembles, nevertheless, when he thinks of his hopeless servitude, and the “divided kingdom” of his mind is impressingly suggested in more than one powerful scene. A mere chance brings his idol to the ground, and when he knows that she has been trifling with him and his disillusion is complete, the passion of the man is stirred to the depths and his revenge is remorseless and of primitive savagery. Through some over-heard gossip Lady Alma fears that she, the wife of a judge, is compromising her name with “a vulgar Radical journalist,” as her friend Sir Hugh puts it, and she is bent on being rid of him. What are his love and devotion to her social security? She dismisses him in a letter. He pursues her with violence, pours out the pent-up forces of his scorn and fury upon her in the presence of her friends, flings a compromising letter of hers in their midst, and behaves as if all his Irish blood were in his head. It is all unavailing. The wretched man turns in thought to his wife, and a telegram arrives informing him of her dangerous illness. He reaches her only to find her dead, and to read her touching farewell. His health gives way, and there is nothing for the ruined and miserable Blake but a sea voyage to the colonies. It is the saddest curtain-fall imaginable. We would, for “the pity of it,” have had another ending, and yet we would not, while we commend the artistic spirit that has ordained otherwise.

Mr. Baring Gould's humour has before now shown a tendency towards the grotesque. His characters in fiction are often “characters” in the local or more limited significance of the word, and of such we have some excellent specimens in The Pennycomequicks, one of the lighter and more genial of the author's novels, and one we can recommend to overworked or extra-bilious persons with the virtuous confidence that comes of experience. The story does not belong to the genus of Mehalah and John Herring. It is not romantic, it does not deal with the wild or wonderful, nor is it built up of overlooked fragments of old superstition and folklore, which, indeed, make but an allusive show in its pages. Despite the title, which may move the inhabitants of Plymouth and its parts to false hopes, The Pennycomequicks has nothing to do with the Western county. It is a Yorkshire story, and Mr. Baring Gould has found the “fresh woods” he has sought to be productive in diverting ways. The family circle of the Pennycomequicks and their acquaintances provide the novel-reader with excellent entertainment. The story, too, is told with the author's accustomed skill, and with all his persuasiveness in vraisemblance, if only we except the rather extravagant episode of Earle Schofield, alias Colonel Beaple Yeo. Yet we should be loth to part with this sportive and delightful sketch of an adventurer. His schemes for raising the wind are exhilarating by reason of their impudence and ingenuity. Especially pleasing is his device for obtaining customers for a Swiss hotel and commissions for himself by preying on the fears of health-seekers and tourists with stories of his marvellous watch, which registers with fatal precision on its sinister metal the insidious taint of fever and sewer-gas common to all rival establishments. For the rest, the old mill-owner and his stiff-necked, self-satisfied nephew, Philip Pennycomequick, Mrs. Sidebottom, the shrewd, worldly-minded, heartless sister of old Pennycomequick, and Salome, the charming heroine, are cleverly characterized and the story of their fortunes is interesting to the end.

THE REAL HOMER.*

MR. WHITE has very kindly done for Homer what somebody else has done for Shelley and Byron. He has given us The Real Homer, including a criticism of his works, “whether surviving, lost, or only contemplated,” like the treatise Sur l'incommodité des commodés. He is justly surprised that, in the 2,842 years since the death of the poet, nobody has ever done this before. His materials are in part “Herodotus's unadulterated biography” of the author of the Iliad, and in part the autobiographical details which Homer, like Shakspeare, scatters in his books. When once we know that the Odyssey, though a fairy-tale, is practically full of autobiography, a task like Mr. White's becomes comparatively easy. There may be students who will find in Mr. White a satirist. He is laughing at such works as the account of Shakspeare in the Encyclopædia Britannica, they will say; he is having his quiet fling at Professor Dowden, and at the gushing biographer in general. It may be so, or Mr. White may be in earnest. His scholarship is rather wide than elegant. He refers airily to “The Egyptian inscriptions,” which are documents of considerable extent, where a rather more precise quotation might be thought desirable. He does not bother himself with archaeology nor epigraphy, with Dr. Schliemann and Mr. Flinders Petrie. His proof of the antiquity of writing partly consists of “abusing the plaintiff's attorney,” the learned Wolf. He thinks “Haysman's” edition of the Odyssey the best in England; and in Germany likes that of Nitzsch. No Ameis for Mr. White. Like the women in the Adoniazusæ, he “knows all things—how Zeus married Hera.” Being a friend of tradition and a foe of hypercritical scepticism, he is intimately acquainted with the private affairs of Tyro (an ancestress of Homer's), of Io, and of Epaphus. We, too, are friends of tradition, and about Homer almost conservative enough for Mr. White. But to believe in eponymous heroes as real persons is straining the faith a little.

Mr. White has to admit that Homer, like many other famous persons, was illegitimate. Quite in the modern biographical manner he speculates about Homer's father. “The poet appears to have retained a loving feeling towards a father I cannot find that he ever saw.” If Mr. White cannot find it, nobody can. Mr. White refrains from cursing the father, as he had intended to do. If Homer does not mind, it is no affair of Mr. White's. “His part in the life of Homer is as slight as that of the hero's father in Tom Jones. We know next to nothing about him. . . . Whether unprincipled or merely unfortunate, how has his sin found him out!” Certainly nobody else has found him out.

Kleanax, the father of Homer's mama, was “meanly cruel and heartless in the extreme.” He packed her off to Smyrna, a city just then founded; and we do not wonder at the conduct of Kleanax. “Homer never makes the most distant allusion to it or him, which alone in one so kindly is sufficient condemnation.” Homer was born beside the Meles, on a festive occasion, but Mr. White does not believe that his mother called him Melesigenes. That would have been as bad as labelling him “Riverside base-born beggar's brat,” the last thing that a mother would do. He was not named Homer because he said Homou = “and me too,” though, as a matter of fact, we have known “me too” applied as a friendly nickname to a pertinacious and self-assertive infant. Homer was a name in the poet's maternal family, probably from his great-great-grandfather, born 1104, at Cyme, and respected in the parish. His mother was a serving-girl, a Smyrnanian grisette; and hard work it was to pay for the boy's education. Homer has described his early youth in the verses about the orphaned Astyanax. Here we can hardly doubt that Mr. White is parodying the biographers of Molière, so skilled at deriving the poet's early history from his comedies. Note especially the passages in which Molière is said to satirize his stepmother. One Mæon was kind to the boy (Homer, not Molière), when, as Mr. White finely says, “the child” (Professor Dowden would have said “the babe”) “had just touched the cup of dawning prosperity with his lips it was dashed from them by the grim King of Terrors.” From a passage on p. 14 we infer that St. Luke was an authority on Homer; but perhaps Mr. White has failed to express himself quite clearly. Homer's mother was employed by Kretheis, a schoolmaster, to work up the wool in which his pupils paid their fees. Mr. White adds:—“Speaking as a pedagogue, I do not quite wish that I had lived in those days. I prefer cash payment myself.” Young Homer was “a bright-eyed glorious boy,” as might be expected, “intelligent, and of very good parts.” He hated the Amazons of the period, though on the mausoleum frieze they look very nice girls. He became a schoolmaster himself, and, we think, was the solitary exception to what Sir Walter Scott says about schoolmasters. Mentès used to step into the school and chat with Homer, Mentès being a cultivated skipper who “read fluently, wrote boustrophedon, and could strum an air or so on the fiddle.” With Mentès Homer went yachting as far as Ithaca. Here he “fancied that he saw the ghost of Ulysses,” for which manifestation we are referred to “Philostratus's Heroica.” Here his eyes began to give him trouble, but it was at Colophon that he became blind. He probably visited Egypt; but Mr. White agrees with Mr. Gladstone that he “never travelled in Egypt in the modern sense of the word.” He merely saw the country as first mate to the vessel of Mentès. He probably just looked in on “the Seirens, worthless women, that our poet made acquaintance with on landing, but scorned to be beguiled by; still he visited them for information sake, but took the precaution of bringing no money with him for them to rob him of.” Whether all this is quite worthy either of Homer or of the Sirens we doubt, and we are not certain that, in Homer's time, the Greeks had any coinage. Mr. White thinks he need not say much more about Homer's voyages. “I presume every reader of this work has either Pope's, or Cowper's, or Chapman's, or Worsley's translation of the Odyssey, and with that and the map he can beguile a pleasant hour in filling up the above sketch.” It really needs no filling up, being, if anything, too full already.

Homer did not make a good thing, in a commercial sense, of his seafaring. “Mentès had it all; Mentès was the publisher

* The Complete Life of Homer. By F. White, B.A. London: Bell & Sons. 1889.

with his fine place in Surrey; Homer the poor Grub Street author." Homer should have joined the Society of Authors; it appears that he was put off "with a certain small lump of pay." At Colophon Homer became an usher again, was blind, and did his Margites. "Wilkie Collins tells us that he wrote his marvellous book, The Moonstone, under precisely similar circumstances of severe mental and physical suffering." Homer now went back to Smyrna, and set to at his best known work, "The Kuklos." From the various readings in his epigrams, Mr. White discerns that Homer undoubtedly wrote his poems down, "else all these variations would surely not have been preserved even during his lifetime, much less for 300 years after." At Cyme Homer offered to the Town Council "an unlimited supply of the finest poetry the world has ever seen, or will see, in return for board, costing, say, sevenpence a day—namely, bread a penny, potatoes a halfpenny, tea a halfpenny, milk a halfpenny, sugar a farthing, fish or eggs a penny, meat threepence; pens, ink, paper and gum, a farthing; lodgings, washing, and a suit of clothes every other year." It will be plain that Mr. White has all a schoolmaster's humour. But the Cymeans refused this advantageous proposal. Hark to "the mournful song of the heart-transfixed wild swan of the Meles:—

Nor will I any longer stay
In thy holy streets, O Cyme,
But to some other city go,
Since thus you do deny me."

The "Curse of Chryses" was also suggested by this circumstance.

We shall not distress the reader with the sickness, old age, and death of Homer. Mr. White finds only one flash of humour in all his works—which, perhaps, is not surprising in Mr. White. The flash illuminates the riddle about the fleas. In the life of Homer Mr. White, like Mark Twain, discerns "not one Homer, but two, and we have to stagger about like drunken men as we strive delicately to ravel the mingled threads of two distinct human lives." The dog Argus belonged to the Real Homer. Mr. White, who knows everything, knows that the Odyssey is the source of Mr. Stevenson's Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll. "As Minerva translates the hero of the wreck from hero to beggar, he becomes alternately Jekyll and Hyde, Ulysses and Homer." So common is the vice of plagiarism in this age that, though Mr. White expresses no indignation, we may expect to see Mr. Stevenson held up to the contempt of people who never read anything but the New Journalism.

Homer's sources are interesting. The Iliad and Odyssey he got, more or less, from two works by Phantasia, an Egyptian lady, "based doubtless on the statements of Menelaus and Helen and other travellers of various times," and preserved at Memphis. Ptolemy is Mr. White's authority. Believing that Homer could write, Mr. White cries, "Would he have gone on composing, stupid, ostrich-like, without remembering?" Do ostriches compose without remembering? Besides, Seth invented writing, and Homer lived after his time. We fear Mr. White proves too much. "Homer, in a sense, proves the invention of writing," he cries; and here, perhaps, he is nearer the truth than some more sceptical critics.

Mr. White's book is no common specimen of Homeric study; but we can scarcely say that we never saw anything like it. The modern diaspontes, the modern theorists of Germany and of England, have often written things quite as absurd on the other side of the question. Indeed, it is probable that there is more nonsense and less common sense in the Homeric controversy than even in any other discussion that has perplexed the brains and wasted the time of the learned. Mr. White has, consciously or unconsciously, burlesqued the whole affair, and hardly to exaggeration.

AITKEN'S STEELE.*

THE star of Richard Steele has suffered a kind of occultation. He is no longer regarded by Court ladies and Lombard Street bankers as "the greatest scholar and best casuist of any man in England." Nor is it now claimed for him, as it was further claimed by John Gay—in what was probably an unconscious imitation of a fine passage in the preface to Blackmore's Prince Arthur—that he "had rescued Learning out of the hands of pedants and fools, and discovered the true method of making it amiable and lovely to all mankind." His fame has been gradually obscured by that of Addison. Something of this is, in a measure, due to Steele himself. That frank, self-effacing admiration for his friend of which Fielding makes fun in the Journey from this World to the Next, those loyal acknowledgments of the aid which he had received from his accomplished colleague, have been taken, as such utterances and admissions generally are taken, to mean not only exactly what they imply, but a great deal more. When upon these followed the publication by Tickell of Addison's contributions to the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian, coupled with a studiously insinuated depreciation of Steele's part in those performances, the general impression of Steele's subordinate attitude was revived and intensified. Addison, it was plain, had been the real presiding spirit. Addison it was who (were there not Steele's express declarations to that effect?) had raised the undertaking to a far greater thing than had ever been dreamed in the philosophy of its first fortunate but blundering projector. This conclusion lost nothing of its force under the word-picking ingenuity (the phrase is Johnson's) of that "old maid in breeches," Bishop Hurd. Into note after note of his edition of Addison he pours the verbal vinegar of his contempt for Steele. If Tickell happens to say that Steele assisted in any paper, Hurd follows suit by adding, "One sees this by the pertness of the manner in which many parts of it are composed." Or he sneers at the one-sided character of the combination. "When two such writers as Mr. A. and Sir R. Steele join in composing one of these papers, the misalliance is not only great, but the contrast ridiculous." The petty malice of these deliverances and the dryasdust pedantry of others stilled the impulses of lesser voices, and Steele faded more and more into the undistinguishable background. Now and then a frank impressionist, like Leigh Hunt, openly avowed his preference for Steele's Nature over Addison's Art, or bolder spirits like Hazlitt went further still, and not only preferred it, but gave it higher praise. Then came Lord Macaulay's famous essay upon Addison, by which, as it seemed, Steele's struggling reputation was once more contemptuously tossed back into the limbo of forgetfulness. His wit and humour, it was said, were of no high order; what ordinary readers took for comic genius was only gay animal spirits; his writings, in point of fact, were just "a pleasant small drink," tolerable only upon the condition that it was "not kept too long, or carried too far." As for the Tatler, it was Addison who made it; as for the Spectator, why Addison was the Spectator. Such an onslaught, from such a quarter, was a real disaster; and although, ten years later, Mr. John Forster made a chivalrous and sympathetic appeal on Steele's behalf, his defence, tardily put forth, was not powerful enough to turn the tide, and Macaulay, moreover, had addressed his thousands where Forster but addressed his tens. Notwithstanding Mr. Thackeray's lecture—perhaps even by reason of it—matters were so little mended that, in 1863, when M. Taine wrote his brilliant Histoire de la Littérature Anglaise, he mentions Steele only to quote what Steele says of Addison. Style, which preserves so much, must, no doubt, always keep Addison at the higher level; but of late years there have been indications that popular opinion is gradually lifting Steele upwards as a writer, and that, if he can never be placed upon a line with his old assistant and chief contributor, he may justly be credited with several estimable qualities to which that assistant could make no pretence.

Meanwhile, Steele's life has at last been written in a way which, if those illustrious shades still hold converse in the region where Fielding last encountered them, must certainly put Mr. Joseph Addison in need of further consolation. Comparatively speaking, his biography by Miss Aikin was a perfunctory piece of work, neither conclusive nor extensive. Macaulay calls it (in his letters) shallow and inaccurate, and it is known that it would have been worse in this latter respect if he himself had not corrected some of its more glaring blunders while it was yet at press. Mr. Aitken's performance, on the contrary, is certainly not perfunctory. His volumes are of the largest and most imposing library size, and, as regards the matter in hand, must be practically exhaustive. In their treatment of the subject they are certainly not shallow, if shallow means superficial, and he has evidently been at considerable pains to make them as trustworthy as possible. Indeed, what strikes the reader most forcibly is the extraordinary labour which they must have involved. Every chapter, every page even, is sown with the traces of painstaking investigation; the foot-notes bristle with references to out-of-the-way authorities, and the final bibliography would do credit to trained bibliographers, like Mr. H. R. Tedder or Mr. Anderson of the British Museum. What is more remarkable is, that at this lapse of time he has been able to make genuine discoveries. We knew nothing of Steele's father and mother, Mr. Aitken has found precise particulars respecting them; we were ignorant of the name of his first wife, Mr. Aitken has ascertained it, as well as the names of her "cousins to the fortieth remove." He has disinterred and reproduced a most attractive portrait of the "Ruler" who so vexed Sir Richard's ardent soul by her "coynesses and particularities," and he has established, beyond a possibility of doubt, the date and place of that hitherto half-mythical duel in which the "Christian Hero" ran his antagonist through the body. He has thrown a flood of light upon those mixed dramatic essays in which the versatile Captain of Lucas's (not "Fusiliers," it seems) endeavoured to conciliate Comedy and Collier; and he has, in general, pieced the imperfections of Steele's story by a crowd of minor details respecting his hopes, projects, trials, difficulties, and pecuniary embarrassments. These last, like a certain ailment of Mr. Pecksniff, must, it is feared, be described as "chronic." Never, we suppose, in the annals of literature have so many actions, suits, writs, pleadings, and processes been accumulated upon the unhappy head of one individual. And yet somehow they do not produce upon us the effect of, let us say, the debts of Sheridan, or even of Leigh Hunt. One feels, and Mr. Aitken's researches tend to show, that they were partly due to Steele's fluctuating income, partly to his inconsiderate generosity. And, in any case, he made special sacrifices to discharge them before his death, a fact which should be set down to the credit side of his account.

In some collateral branches of his investigations Fortune has not favoured Mr. Aitken. He has not been able, for example, to find out the date and place of Steele's marriage to Miss Scurlock—although, by the way, he has discovered that Mr. Gazetteer had a predecessor in his addresses to the imperious beauty who absorbed so much of the time which should have been devoted to the chronicle of the siege of Lille. Mr. Henry Owen, of Glassalt, in Carmarthen—the suitor in question—belongs to a race of fortune-hunters which is not yet extinct, and by the Libel and Answer which Mr. Aitken has printed in connexion with his proceedings against the future Mrs. Steele for breach of promise, he seems to have been an unusually contemptible specimen. Another point upon which Steele specialists will probably look for light is the secret history of the termination of the Tatler, a difficulty of which, in all probability, the most reasonable solution is that there is no secret history to relate. Again, they will seek unsuccessfully for some dispersion of the oft-repeated tradition about Addison's execution to recover his loan to Steele. Mr. Aitken's explorations in the records of the law courts have, it is true, disclosed no trace of Addison's action. But the evidence (and in this case one is constrained to agree with Lord Macaulay) is unusually strong, and the story is probably true. On the whole, it is more discreditable to Addison than to Steele; but this is a matter which may be left to Addison's apologists. A fourth point is rather the expression of a personal disappointment on our part than a failure to discover on Mr. Aitken's. Dennis taunted Steele with his bloodless military service, and we confess to have hoped that some trace of something beyond garrison duty at Landguard Fort might have been forthcoming. It is depressing to think that Marlborough was fighting Blenheim, and Peterborough besieging Barcelona, while Captain Steele was merely drilling recruits at home, or frittering away his pay in seeking for the philosopher's stone. What would not have been the gain to us if, with his generous admiration of military gallantry, he had been able to knock off a Tatler of memories on the surprise of Monjuich, or the reckless bravery of the Maison du Roi at Ramillies! The author of Valentine and Unnion, and the editor of the epistle of Sergeant Hall of the Foot Guards, should surely have made a graphic picture of those "well-foughten fields."

* The Life of Richard Steele. By George A. Aitken. 2 vols. London: Isbister. 1889.

We have already observed that there are signs of a revived interest in Steele's work. That the current view of his character will be greatly altered by Mr. Aitken's Life can scarcely be affirmed. His mission, and we speak it in no spirit of depreciation, lies more in the rectification of minor details, and the revelation of accessory facts, than in any material modification of the essential lines of the portrait. Nevertheless, he has discovered so much, and brought together in one place such a store of interesting information, that, in due course, we may fairly look for the disappearance of many of the venerable fables which are now in circulation respecting his hero. "In due course," we say, because it is notorious to all concerned in labours of this kind (and probably no one knows it better than Mr. Aitken himself), that nothing is so difficult to extirpate as a popular misconception, especially if it be a picturesque one. He must still, for some time to come, resign himself to reading, in magazine articles, that Steele ceased to write plays because the Lying Lover was "damned for its piety"; that the loss of the Gazette entailed an alteration in the plan of the Tatler; that the "Christian Hero" was educated under his "ever-honoured Tutor," Dr. Ellis of the Charterhouse; that he was born in 1675, and that the date of his duel is unknown. Smart newspaper paragraphists will continue to talk of his "dicing himself into a spunging-house," or "drinking himself into a fever," and they will gravely explain how he was dubbed "Little Dicky" by Addison. Then, by-and-bye, the exacter particulars will filter into handbooks, and dictionaries, and brief memoirs, where they will probably be quoted without acknowledgment, or quoted in such a way as to suggest that they are really as ancient as the Biographia Britannica :—

Such is, alas! the luckless fate
Of those who most investigate!

To the more enlightened, however, it will remain unquestioned that, in a plain and unaffected style, Mr. Aitken has written a biography of Richard Steele which is unsurpassed for its exhaustive collection of material and for its patient pertinacity of inquiry.

A GENTLEMAN USHER, V.C.*

THIS is a story of the relations between a gallant and distinguished officer of Her Majesty's land forces and a singularly accomplished little girl of the lower-upper-middle class. There does not seem to be any purpose in it. It is just a beautiful story. It therefore gives the author high rank amongst those whose calling it is to supply the intelligent public with pleasing fiction to the profit of both. It is domestic and scholastic, pathetic and picturesque, interesting and unaffected. In the neighbouring country of France it would, in all probability, be crowned by the Academy.

Colonel Russell was an officer of great fame and gallantry, and a V.C. Having been gloriously wounded in savage warfare, he came home to his residence at Fleetmouth on long leave. Being rich, virtuous, and energetic, he busied himself in local affairs. There was an Institute at Fleetmouth where young men and maidens received miscellaneous instruction. When Colonel Russell arrived it was languishing; so he helped to reorganize it, and himself took charge of the young ladies' Latin class, as he happened to be a capable scholar. His age was forty.

Lily Eversley was ten. Her father had come to Fleetmouth to be editor of the weekly paper, and her mother was dead. Lily was delicate and clever. She had been overworked at school before the family came to Fleetmouth, and therefore she was not to work too hard, but only to attend six weekly classes at the Institute "besides music and drawing." It cannot be discovered that she was at this time proficient in many branches of learning, except that she knew Latin, French, Literature, History, Science, and Mathematics, and was expert in drawing (especially caricatures), and in music, being a correct and effective singer, a really good violin-player, and capable of playing the piano and composing simple, but original and taking, melodies (her favourite musician was Beethoven, and the "Eroica Symphony" and "Violin Concerto" were the sort of pieces she preferred); and that she knew all about animals, had a reasonably complete command of the American language, and was one of the most intrepid and indefatigable flirts in fiction. Still, she was certainly clever. She had a brother called Wilfred, who went to school at the boys' college. He was twelve, and rather less brilliant than his sister; but then boys develop more slowly than girls. As a specimen of the way they talked when they were alone together, we extract the following from a conversation they had when they were deciding which six of the Institute classes, besides music and drawing, Lily should ask her papa to send her to :—

"I'm glad I'm to be in Colonel Russell's class—if he doesn't mind my frocks being pretty short still—and I'm sure I shall do what he says, so that he won't feel like wanting me to be shot. I'll have History. And, Wilfie, can't we do the very common ones at home? I want to know how to find the places where they fought the battles and did the other great things."

"Yes, we'll look for them in the second-best Atlas. Next comes Natural Science. Lily, I love that. We've such a jolly class at school for Physics, and we are going to make a thermometer."

"Oh, Wilfred! How lovely! A real one?"

When Lily joined Colonel Russell's Latin class, where the other girls were from fifteen to eighteen years old, she immediately went to the top of it and stayed there. The other girls were mostly idle, because, though they wanted to flirt with the Colonel, they did not want to learn Latin. Lily not only wanted to learn Latin and to flirt with the Colonel, but saw with the eye of genius that the Colonel was an appalling prig, and that furious devotion to Latin was the best way to ensnare his affections. She did not, however, disdain such humble devices as bewitching her pedagogue with artlessness, which she made more piquant by addressing him in American :—"I went," she said, "to the High School at Camford before we came here. I went there all the time after I hadn't a mamma." The military heart is ever susceptible, and the Colonel naturally fell hopelessly in love the first day Lily came to him. But he manifested his passion oddly. He observed that Lily's bright example of industry was infecting her idle class-mates. (Even "the cloak-room conversations, when class was over, grew at the same time longer and more creditable; the cloak-room coteries more loyal and sincere, . . . while talk was higher in tone, gossip declared vulgar and unanimously tabooed, lest a pair of big, astonished eyes should offer their innocent rebuke.") So he determined that she should go on and make the best use of the advantages which God had given to her. To this end he punished her with ever-increasing severity for every mistake she made—for being mortal she did occasionally make mistakes—by making her write impositions, for which purpose he generally kept her in when all the rest (who had done much worse) were allowed to go. By this means he got more of her society, and her hold over him increased. Also he ordered her to sit up at night, rise early in the morning, and stay at home on half-holiday afternoons, to learn her lessons better, and as he commanded so she did, for she reciprocated his affection, and lived only to please him. Her health, therefore, failed; she became more and more nervous, and had to write longer and longer impositions. But she never complained, because the Colonel had once said that she must not be cowardly.

At the end of the Institute "Session" there was to be a prize-giving and a concert, so it was naturally ordained that Lily should sing a solo. She was always shy about singing, and by this time she was so ill from overwork that she said she could not sing. Her papa said she must, and, according to a custom he had, locked her up in her own room, and said she should not come out except to attend her classes until she consented to sing. But Lily was a truthful child and persisted in saying she could not. So her papa asked the Colonel to try what he could do. The Colonel rode over to Lily's papa's house, and found her looking very ill asleep on a sofa. He woke her up and said she ought to sing. She said she could not. He reasoned with her and said she ought to give pleasure to others. She remained obdurate. He then commanded her to say she would sing. With a breaking heart she refused. In the Colonel's opinion disobedience must be overcome at any cost. He "lifted his riding-whip from a chair beside him and made an imperative motion to the child. 'Come here, Lily, and give me your hand.' * * * * (The asterisks are our own). 'The Colonel did his best to subdue his little pupil' and failed; not even when her Colonel horse-whipped her would she say she would sing when she knew she couldn't. In despair, having 'employed in vain the arguments both of persuasion and force," the Colonel withdrew; but in the evening he came back prepared, if necessary, to "repeat his arguments of the morning with an emphasis which should of necessity compel attention." Then it occurred to him to ask her to promise to sing in order to please him, and she answered "I didn't know you cared. I can do it for you."

* Colonel Russell's Baby. By Ellinor Davenport Adams. London: Smith & Innes. 1889.

The prize-day arrived. Lily had hardly ventured to hope for a prize, but she was almost as successful as Prince Gigli, obtaining those for Latin, French, Euclid, Literature, and Music, besides a gold watch and chain, and a great many kisses, thrown in by her kindly teachers because she had been such a good little girl. Then she sang the solo for love of Colonel Russell, and at the end of it fell into his arms, smitten with paralysis of the lower extremities. This consequence of overwork, horsewhipping, and mental agitation was soon complicated with brain-fever. The Colonel was much distressed and nursed his little victim assiduously. In the course of a week or two a little war arose, and a campaign became necessary in Rajpur, the scene of some of the Colonel's finest exploits. The nation, the army, and the Commander-in-chief all agreed that Colonel Russell was the man for the emergency, and he was ordered to go out and take command. Lily had a horror of his going into battle, and he knew his going would kill her. So he went to see her for the last time, and in two minutes she made him promise not to go away from her—"never any more." He kept his promise, and sent in his papers. The country rang with comments on his conduct. The "enterprising editor" of "a Society paper of high standing" sent Ellis, a famous war correspondent with a "powerful face seamed and scarred," to find out the explanation. Ellis was a bosom friend of the Colonel's, so the Colonel told him all about Lily, and Ellis went straight off and wrote out the whole story. "The enterprising Society editor held his head high that week. His journal sold by thousands; and all the town was talking of the article signed by a well-known name, and speedily copied everywhere." It is not stated whether the article mentioned that the Colonel had flogged Lily; but the public, the Duke of Cambridge, and the Queen very much approved of what he'd done, and he stayed at home, and Lily soon recovered the use of her legs.

A GUIDE TO THE FRENCH EXHIBITION.*

THE French Exhibition of 1889 has done much for France and for the universe. It has proclaimed once more to a world growing somewhat sceptical, but now happily reassured, that the Republic has been a triumphant success; that Paris is now, as it always has been, the focus of civilization; and that France is still the most liberal, the most orderly, the most pacific, and the most enlightened country in Europe. It has welcomed to a participation in its glories many thousands of more or less uncultured foreigners, and sent them one and all away with minds "profoundly impressed" and pockets substantially lightened; it has helped to tide the French Government over the treacherous shoals of a general election; and it has served as a gigantic advertisement to many hundreds of enterprising tradesmen. The French Exhibition has done all this; but it has done even more; it has given us a most entertaining guide-book. Universal exhibitions, excellent in every other respect, are never very amusing, and guides to universal exhibitions are, for the most part, the dullest of dull reading; but the little work of which we are writing is a bright exception to the rule; for, while it is full of the most varied and recondite information (as every exhibition guide-book should be), it sparkles with fun from beginning to end. The author modestly conceals his name, and we can hazard no conjecture as to his identity, save that the happy audacity with which he treats each subject in turn, his intimate knowledge of the manners and customs of foreign nations, and his accurate acquaintance with the intricacies of the English language are all eminently Parisian. His work, as critics say, "will well repay careful perusal." Every page contains a gem, and we propose to extract a few of them for the benefit of our readers.

Our author begins his preface by asking the natural question "Who was giving the idea of the Exhibition?" and he answers it as follows:—

The first idea of an Exhibition of the Centenary belongs, in reality not to anybody. It was in the air since several years, when divers newspapers, in 1883, bethought them to consecrate several articles to it, and so it became a serious matter.

The period of incubation (brooding) lasted since 1883 till the month of March 1884; when they considered the question they preoccupied them but about a national Exhibition. Afterwards the ambition increased.

This tribute paid to the influence of the press, we are informed, under the head of "General Informations," that the Exhibition can be entered by "39 wickets," and then that "Constables are affected in a permanent manner at the service of every wicket." We pass in safety these emotional guardians, who recall somehow a flavour of Pilgrim's Progress, and our guide proceeds to descant upon the beauties of "the Exhibition seen in a straight line"; these are his words:—

Placed under the circuit portic of the Trocadero, in the Centre even, in the axis of the pont d'Iena and the tower Eiffel, let us embrace at one glance the splendid panorama.

* Universal Exhibition, Paris 1889, Practical Guide. Paris: Bertels & Florent.

In the first of the perspective, in front of the above mentioned portic, are erected the gilded statues of the parts of the world which are hooking the sunrises; at our feet we see the green declivities of the plat-bands, the sheets of the bassins, and we hear the bubbling of the Cascades. At the bottom of the garden the pont d'Iena, covered with velum and adorned with elegant kiosques and beyond the Tower Eiffel, whose summit is lost in the clouds.

We are first conducted, it is needless to say, to the "Tower Eiffel," which is thus apostrophized:—

And nevertheless how many people have prophesied that the tower would never been constructed. How many critics have fallen upon this audacious project! It was erected, however, and one perceives it from all Paris; it astonishes and lets in extasy the strangers who come to contemplate it.

We climb to the top, and a marvellous spectacle awaits us:—

At your feet the houses are very plainly, because you see the four sides which are holed by the windows, symmetric like points of dice, so well that Paris has an appearance of a vast party of bibi played by a giant on a green carpet.

We descend, and admire the Fountain under the Tower; the description given of it is delicious but lengthy. Our guide then takes us for "The first walk," prefacing the excursion with the following considerate observation:—

Thus we begin, at present as we have let him see these two wonders which fly at the eyes, the Tower and the fountain, to return on his steps to retake with order this walk of recognition which will permit him, thanks to our watchfulness, to see all in a short time.

A few remarks are offered on the various "pavillions" as we pass them; the pavilion of "Suez and Panama" is dismissed with contemptuous brevity:—"Horrid little building in cement, of a hebrew style, which is of little signification" (we hope our Virgil holds no "Panamas"), and at last we come to "The Palace of the children," which is thus eloquently described:—

The aspect of the Palace of children is very characteristic. On each side of the pavilion are erected two high piles covered with pointed roofs and surmounted with turnpikes which turn at the wish of the wind. A beautiful harlequin dominates the Entrance of the Centre, and at the front of the two others, on the front roof, a polichinel at the appearance of a good child is sitting. And everywhere dancing-jacks, horses, puppets, toys of colossal dimensions, an entire decoration for children the whole of the most curious sight.

... Enter there with your little family and you will certainly not annoy you. There is united all what concerns the childhood, raiments, furnitures, toys, works for children, hygiene and even therapeutic. Your babies will find there a kermess with a shooting for macarons, turnpikes, divers games, waffles and milk.

Whether our little family will annoy us or not when they have undergone this varied experience we are not informed.

We visit in order the industries of the world, and our Guide is ever at our elbow with an appropriate remark. For instance:—

CLASS 36.—Garments for both sexes.—It is here the sanctuary of the dresses, there are some therein which would render mad the less prideful women.

Then artificial flowers, which one would gather so much they are well done, flowers and feathers, &c.

At last the raiments for men, livrees, uniforms, hatter-works of all kinds, since the melon until the silk hat, which is a true museum, since the Yokohama of 15 cent. until the Panama of 1,500 francs.

Have we in the first sentence some obscure allusion to the divided skirt? We are led gently onward to the region of science, and those of us who fear her frowns may draw comfort from the following assurance:—

The anthropology and ethnography are presented under a more curious than scientific aspect, in order not to frighten the visitor little in acquaintance with these questions. Rocks, trunks of trees, figures and scarecrow, arms and prehistorical objects show to our eyes the history of man, which the modern science commences hardly to unveil.

We listen to the strains of musical instruments, and we commend our Guide's description of the concert to all true votaries of Wagner:—

Unfortunately all this harmony is lost in the enormous noise produced by so many melodious machines or not. The brass instruments burst, the organs roar, the pianos mourn, and the violines mew, without counting the orchestrions, which commence to acclimate them in France, which is not a recommendation, and of which some ones are monuments.

We leave the glitter and clatter of Europe behind us, our eyes and ears are refreshed by the subdued lights, the hushed murmurs of the languid East, or as our Guide, describing "A Street in Cairo," more felicitously puts it, "When one comes out of the Palace of the divers Industries, a little giddy pate and aching of a blustering decoration, the eyes rest them there instantly." We see an endless variety of remarkable things too numerous to be mentioned, and our Guide discourses upon them in a series of remarkable passages, all worthy of quotation, but too long to be quoted. He leads us at last to the "Fairy Palace"; and we feel that with his description of it both he and we shall make a glorious ending; it is as follows:—

Still an attraction for the children and, we dare add, for the grown up persons! Nothing more astonishing than this fairy Palace (enchanted garden) as it is called. All what the childish imaginations are dreaming, worked by the tales of the good grand-mothers and the lectures of the tales of Perrault, is assembled there, like by the virtue of a good fairy, a friend of the little ones.

It is avenue Rapp that is situated the Palace of these divinities with their light feet, which charmed our first youth, to all as much as we are. It occupies a vast emplacement, in front of the avenue, and certainly, for a strange front, that is one. At the entrance, the ogres, in the exercise of their functions, then the saloons of the donkey's hide. Cendrillon, the Belle in the dorming wood, the cavern of Ali-Baba, twelve under ground rooms where are dwelling the forty thieves,—lighted by the electrical light. Then still the mill of the booted cat, where one sells cakes, the turning tree of the witches, the farm of the little Poucet, the house of the Ogre, the cottage of the Petit Chaperon Rouge (little Red-Riding Hood) and the tower of the Barbe-Bleue (blue beard) whereby the Russian mountains and a little theatre where are played the tales of Perrault.

Finally the blue Elephant, which measures not less than twenty metres of height, and is built all in sheet-iron.

All this fantastic evocation was made after the inspirations of M. Ch. Bonnet, and under the direction of M. Morin Goustiaux, architect. This creation makes them certainly an honour to both.

We need only add that this remarkable book is nicely got up, with a picture of the "Tower Eiffel" on the cover; that it contains two maps and a copious index, that it is to be bought for two-and-sixpence, and that it is dirt cheap at the price.

EROTIDIA.*

EROTIDIA, by Mr. C. Sayle, is a dainty little volume with white linen cover, rough paper with uncut edges, and plenty of margin round the nicely printed little poems which it contains. It is quite a book for the drawing-room table, but as a book to read it does not seem very "nutritious," as Mme. Mohl was wont to say. The title is interpreted by Liddell and Scott to mean "a Feast of Love," and, indeed, the word "Love" occurs in several of the lyrics at the beginning of the book; but Mr. Sayle's treatment of the subject is academic rather than amorous, and he seems merely to use it as a peg whereon to hang his "serenades," "versets," "hand-shakes," and so forth. He has never, apparently, read Modern Painters, or he would remember how one of Charles Kingsley's best-known poems is therein gibbeted. "The sea is not cruel, nor does it crawl," says Mr. Ruskin; in spite of which (perhaps arbitrary) dictum we find here a disjointed poem with the refrain, "The cruel and sinful and sighing sea." Mr. Sayle succeeds better in his sonnets, that to Milton being really good; yet, while we are looking for something equally good, we fall in with "A Thames Idyll," which we forbear to characterize. The writer is not without cleverness and power of expression; he is not lacking in audacity, as his poem on "The Ceasing of the Oracles" proves; but he should not puzzle his readers with such words as "dispassion," "Unhonour," and "recreance," nor should he write "Hesperidæ" when he means "Hesperides." We trust that he will consider our criticism of his somewhat crude productions as kindly meant, and not intended to discourage him in the practice of writing English verse, which we think is "a useful and humanizing exercise," as Dr. Arnold of Rugby used to call it. But he must learn to "prune away green passages" unshrinkingly; he must bear in mind that the art of "using words like jewels" is one of the most complex and difficult in the world; and he will be fortunate if, before publishing his next volume, he can prevail upon some friend of mature judgment to act as "Warrington" to his "Pendennis," and aid him in separating the wheat from the chaff.

THE ATTIC THEATRE.†

IT has been recently remarked that in the younger generation of Oxford men there are several who have done much to remove from their University the reproach of classical sterility. To the small band of scholars not content with absorbing the knowledge acquired by others Mr. A. E. Haigh is a noteworthy recruit. His account of the Attic Theatre combines a German thoroughness in research with a lucidity of exposition which is certainly not German. For the last fifty years, he tells us, the subject which he has selected has been left untouched by English scholars; but it has recently acquired fresh interest and importance owing to the discovery of many theatrical inscriptions and to excavations which have been made on the sites of several ancient Greek theatres. Mr. Haigh has come forward to summarize and criticize the work of scholars abroad and to bring English knowledge up to date. But it must not be supposed that he has merely compiled and arranged the results of other men's labours. He has himself made several important and original contributions to our knowledge of the Attic Theatre; and on more than one point of archaeological interest he has ventured to dissent from the conclusions reached by other authorities. Indeed, it is hardly in want of confidence that Mr. Haigh can be called deficient. If he has established a slight preponderance of the probabilities that is quite enough for him; and if he has occasion to refer to it afterwards he treats it as an ascertained conclusion. We could give several instances of this tendency from the early chapters in the book; though in every one of them we admit that Mr. Haigh could set up a far stronger case for his own view than we could bring against it. But it must not be forgotten by immature students using his book that they must make a certain allowance for Mr. Haigh's somewhat sanguine use of such argumentative terms as "conclusive evidence." Beyond this defect (which is an amiable one, especially when it proceeds from a University where it is the fashion to talk as if there was a great deal to be said on both sides of every question, and nothing much for either side) we have but one more complaint to bring forward. He has a habit of repeating himself almost in identical language—a fault which is the more surprising because his book has been so neatly arranged and divided that any reader who knows what he wants need have no difficulty in finding it. It would be unfair not to compliment Mr. Haigh on the living and modern interest which he has thrown into a subject which might have been made dull and profitless to anybody but a determined archæologist. This account of the Attic Theatre is written with so much vivacity and sympathy that it would repay the perusal to anybody who wished to obtain a comprehensive and historical view of the gradual development of the actor's art.

We are inclined to think that Mr. Haigh, with many other enthusiastic scholars, overrates "the moral influence" of the Greek drama. It is extravagant to say that the regular but infrequent performances of the new plays at Athens formed "an equivalent for the books, magazines, and newspapers of modern civilization." It is extravagant, again, to insist, so strongly as Mr. Haigh insists, upon the religious character of the representations. It is quite true that distraints for debt were forbidden during the festivals, that prisoners enjoyed a holiday from gaol, and that assaults and outrages committed at such a time were punished with especial severity. It is true, of course, that the drama was in origin a religious celebration. But it is going too far to say, with Mr. Haigh, that "every spectator who sat watching a tragedy or a comedy was not merely providing for his own amusement, but was also joining in an act of worship." To say this is either to use the words "religion" and "worship" in a forced and unnatural meaning or to forget the real character of the Athenian audience and the Athenian plays. Here we may remark that Mr. Haigh has abundantly made out his case as regards the long-disputed admission of boys and women. Some scholars, arguing from their innate or acquired ideas of abstract decorum, have held that boys and women were altogether excluded from the theatre; others, making a half-and-half concession to clear evidence, have declared that the imaginary restriction applied only to the comedies. The latter position is absolutely untenable when it is remembered how the comedies were interwoven in representation with the tragedies. The idea of "ladies being requested to leave the theatre" when the comedy began is one that would be somewhat less applicable to ancient Athens than to modern Paris. Indeed it is quite clear, as Mr. Haigh says, from several passages in Plato, that anybody who could get a seat was permitted to see the acting. It will be enough to cite the passage in which Plato speaks of tragedy as a kind of rhetoric addressed to boys, women, and men, slaves and free citizens, without distinction. So much for the tragedies. As to the comedies, it is again sufficient to recall the famous passage in which Aristophanes takes great credit to himself for having dispensed with a certain highly indecorous theatrical property, chiefly used "in order to make the boys laugh." Besides this, there is the positive assertion put by Lucian into the mouth of Solon, that the Athenians educated their sons by taking them to tragedies and comedies and showing them examples of vice and virtue, so as to teach them what to imitate and what to avoid. It must be admitted that the liberty granted to the women on the occasion of these public performances was a violation of that (sometimes exaggerated) seclusion in which they were supposed to pass their domestic lives. But the explanation lies in that "religious" character which the plays never quite lost. Here we may quote Mr. Haigh's words:—"Where the worship of the Gods was concerned, the practice of keeping women in strict seclusion was allowed to drop into abeyance. Women and even girls were present at the phallic processions in honour of Dionysus. Their appearance on such occasions was regarded as a mere matter of course. It need not, therefore, surprise us that women and boys should have been present in the theatre at the performances of the Old Comedy."

Not the least interesting part of Mr. Haigh's book is the selection of theatrical inscriptions in his appendices, taken from Köhler in the Corpus Inscriptionum Atticarum. These public records show what an important part was played in the national life by the drama and those who took part in it. The fulness of the details is both curious and instructive. Here is one relating to the tragic contests at the City Dionysia in the year 340 B.C.:

Ἐπὶ Νικομάχου· σατυρικῶν
Τιμοκλῆς Λυκούργου·
Παλαιᾶ. Νεοπτόλεμος
Ὁρέστη Εὐριπίδου·
[Π]οη[ταί]· Ἀστυδάμας
Παρθενοπαίω· ὑπεκρίνετο Θετ[ταλός].
[Λυκά]ονι, ὑπεκρίνετο Νεοπτόλεμος.
... οκλῆς δειν(τερος) Φρίξω,
[ὑπεκρίνετο] Θετταλός.
[Οἰδ]ι[ποδι], ὑπεκρίνετο Νεοπτό(λεμος)
[Εὐάρ]ετος τρι(τος)
[Ἀλκμ]έ[ονι], ὑπεκρίνετο Θεττα[λός].
... η, ὑπεκρίνετο Νεοπτό[λεμος].
[ὑποκρίτης] Θετταλός ἐνίκα.

Not the least significant point in this and other inscriptions is the importance assigned to the actor, and Mr. Haigh has devoted special pains to describing the gradual rise of the profession. Even in early times it seems to have been honourable; but the conventional limits within which the art was for so long a time restrained did not prevent the Greek actor from making himself so important a factor in the tragic contest that a poet who had an inferior actor allotted to him was considered to labour under an extremely heavy disadvantage, even if the other plays were in literary merit far inferior to his own. To remedy this unfairness Mr. Haigh reminds us that a new system was introduced by which the talents of the actors were divided with perfect equality among the poets. "Each tragedy was performed by a separate actor. All the actors appeared in turn in service of each of the poets. Thus, in 341, Astydamas exhibited three tragedies. His Achilles was acted by Thettalus, his Athamas by Neoptolemus, his Antigone by Athenodorus. The three tragedies of each of his competitors were performed by the same three actors." By this device it was hoped that the three competing poets would all enjoy a fair field and no favour—except such favour as they might obtain from the partiality of the judges or of the audience, whose outspoken applause or condemnation no doubt went a long way to decide the official verdict.

* Erotidia. By Charles Sayle. Rugby: George E. Over. 1889.

† The Attic Theatre: a Description of the Stage and Theatre of the Athenians, and of the Dramatic Performances at Athens. By A. E. Haigh, M.A., late Fellow of Hertford College, and Classical Lecturer at Corpus Christi and Wadham Colleges, Oxford. With Facsimiles and Illustrations. Oxford: at the Clarendon Press. 1889.

The value of Mr. Haigh's book is considerably increased by the numerous and excellent illustrations and plans which he has introduced—notably the ground-plan of the theatre of Dionysus at Athens and another of the theatre at Epidaurus. It is on the structural and mechanical arrangements of the ancient theatres that Mr. Haigh has spent the greatest and most fruitful part of his labours. The reason why we have devoted so little of our space to this part of his work is that, without the diagrams and illustrations, it would be hard to write about it in an intelligible manner. On many matters Mr. Haigh admits that he stands under great obligations to Dr. Dörpfeld; but he is not afraid to differ with him—as, e.g. on the date to be assigned to the construction of the auditorium of the theatre at Athens. It is agreed that the existing remains are those of the original building, and that there has been no later reconstruction of the auditorium, as in the case of the orchestra and stage buildings. Following the tradition of Suidas, that a collapse of the wooden benches in 499 led to the construction of a stone theatre, Mr. Haigh assigns the present auditorium to the early part of the fifth century. Perhaps the matter might have been settled by reference to a certain slab with an inscription upon it, but unluckily the date on the inscription is not a matter of certainty. That is just like inscriptions; you feel sure that they could tell you just what you wish to know, but unluckily you cannot make out what it is that they are telling you. Putting the inscription aside, and admitting that the construction of this vast auditorium may have been a work prolonged through a number of years, Mr. Haigh still entertains a "totally different opinion" from Dr. Dörpfeld, who assigns the auditorium to the latter part of the fourth century. Up to this time Dr. Dörpfeld holds that the seats of the spectators were merely wooden benches. But Mr. Haigh points out that both at Epidaurus and at the Peiræus stone theatres had been erected by the middle of the fourth century, and he does not like to believe (apart from the positive tradition of Suidas) that Athens would have been behind her own seaport, not to mention Epidaurus, in providing herself with a permanent theatre. Again, if the Athenian structure had in reality been subsequent to the one at Epidaurus, it is hard to believe, Mr. Haigh thinks, that it would have been so inferior in symmetry of design. We cannot say that we attribute much force to this last (somewhat rhetorical) argument, especially as it is partially discounted by the following sentence in which it is mentioned that the shape of the building was due to its being adapted to the natural conformation of the ground. Nevertheless we are inclined, on the whole, to follow Mr. Haigh's conclusion that the auditorium was substantially the work of the fourth century; later additions may have been made by Lycurgus, and the completion of details may have been carried out by him, but that is the furthest that we can go with Dr. Dörpfeld's view. We have entered at some length into this matter, partly because it is in itself interesting, but chiefly in order to give a sample of the solid and thorough, and yet attractive, manner in which Mr. Haigh has conducted his researches. He may be congratulated on having thrown much new light on a portion of classical archaeology sufficiently important in itself, but more especially important from the literary point of view, because without knowing something about the Greek theatre and the Greek stage it is not easy to have a proper understanding of the Greek plays.

THE SWISS CONFEDERATION AND CONSTITUTION.*

THE institutions of Switzerland are at length beginning to receive from English-speaking people the attention which they have long deserved, which they did receive to a fair extent in the eighteenth century, and which in the present century has been strangely intermitted. A land so centrally situated in Europe, so compact and yet so complex, presenting such a variety of laws and constitutions, both successive and simultaneous, and provided with so complete a chain of authentic history, might well be regarded by an enthusiastic publicist as a political microcosm appointed by the special bounty of Providence to promote the studies of his tribe. It is much that Switzerland alone in the European system preserves the unbroken record of a Republican form of government. Alone, for of such competitors as Andorre and San Marino one must be allowed to say de minimis non curat historia. It is more that in Switzerland we have the one pure and adequate example of a living Federal State which Europe can set against the United States, the Dominion of Canada, and the various imitations of the United States in Spanish-American Republics. Perhaps the modern development of mountaineering, and the general Alpine nature-worship of which it is partly a symptom and partly a concomitant cause, are in some measure answerable for having thrust political Switzerland into the background in the estimation of ordinary travellers.

Two of the books before us, however, show that among mountaineers there are some who are aware that the balance is in need of redressing, and are anxious to bear their own part in redressing it. Mr. Coolidge and Mr. Cunningham are both active members of the Alpine Club, and have contributed in different ways to Alpine literature. Mr. Coolidge is one of the small number who have been able to combine with the pleasures of mountaineering a varied and extensive study of Alpine topography. Not long ago we noticed his historical bibliography of Swiss guide-books; his article in the Encyclopædia Britannica gives a concise and convenient summary of the general history of Switzerland, and two articles lately contributed by him to the Law Quarterly Review deal in a more technical manner with some fundamental points of her modern constitution. Mr. Cunningham's senior and colleague, Sir Francis Adams, unhappily did not long survive the publication of their joint work on the Swiss Confederation. For many years he worthily represented this country at Bern, and he will be specially remembered by diplomatists and men of letters for his part in the International Copyright Convention. After a century and three-quarters he was the first to emulate the example of his predecessor in office, Abraham Stanyan, whose account of Switzerland, anonymously published in 1714, is pronounced by Mr. Coolidge to be "perhaps the best ever written by an Englishman on Swiss political matters." Sir Francis Adams could not be called a mountaineer according to the somewhat exacting modern definition; but he was a true lover of the Alps, and is believed to have set as high a value on the honorary membership of the Alpine Club, which he enjoyed for some years before his death, as on his well-earned official distinctions. This we may be allowed to mention, although the book of which he was joint author is in no way an Alpine or mountaineering book. The Swiss Confederation deals with Switzerland as a State; useful political information is not commonly reputed or expected to be amusing; but this is a thoroughly readable book. For this quality it is doubtless much beholden, not only to Sir Francis Adams's diplomatic experience at Bern, but to his knowledge of mankind at large and the genial disposition which will be remembered by all who knew him. The best living authorities in and about Switzerland appear to have been consulted for their respective departments; and, while the majority of readers will find enough to satisfy them on such matters, for example, as the military system or the scholastic institutions of the Confederation, more determined students may, with no less profit, use the work as a starting-point for further research. We do not know how much attention our War Office has paid to Switzerland; but it is certain that the Swiss keep fully abreast of the times in all details of equipment (they had a repeating rifle years before other people had begun to think about it), and at the same time manage to combine efficiency with economy in an even more remarkable degree than the Germans.

One exception or reservation must be made from the utility of The Swiss Confederation as a political work of reference. The publicist intent on the comparative examination of constitutions will come away from it disappointed, if not empty. Certainly facts are given, but they are not given in the way that is convenient for technical students, and a chapter purporting to compare the Constitutions of Switzerland and the United States is, to speak plainly, too meagre to be of any serious use. The gap thus left open seems to be precisely filled by the more severe and elaborate essay which Professor Moses, of the University of California, has still more lately brought out. Dr. Moses has apparently studied the Swiss Constitution only in books and documents, but he has studied his documents thoroughly. Nor does he strictly confine himself to his text; now and then he seeks further illustration in the Federal Constitutions of Canada, Mexico, and some of the South American States, and he has not forgotten the German Empire. In one chapter, entitled "The Distribution of Power," he enters on the more general consideration of the tendencies of political evolution in federal and democratic States. His remarks, though they perhaps do not contain anything positively new, are in our opinion judicious and deserving of attention. He holds that there is a drift of things, resulting from the constant conditions of human nature and society, which the legal machinery of constitutions may retard, but can only retard.

Our national history [he says] shows that in the United States there has been a marked drift of power towards the central Government, and in the central Government itself a drift of power towards the lower House. In short, every representative Government in which the representatives of the people have the right to initiate laws, however the political power of the nation may have been distributed at first, tends to move in a certain course whose end or culmination is the nearest practicable connexion between the voters of the dominant party and the actual business of government.

* History of the Swiss Confederation. By W. A. B. Coolidge. Reprinted from the Encyclopædia Britannica.

The Swiss Confederation. By [the late] Sir Francis Ottiwell Adams and C. D. Cunningham. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

The Federal Government of Switzerland. By Bernard Moses. Oakland, Cal.: Pacific Press Publishing Co. 1889.

The English Cabinet system has brought us very near this end; for the Cabinet is, in fact, a governing committee of the representatives of the dominant party, predominance being measured in terms of the parliamentary voting power resulting from the composition of the House of Commons. When the business of government becomes, as before very long it must, evidently more than such a committee can carry on, some new form of reinforcement or delegation of political power will have to be devised. Some political speculators have sought this in a reform of the House of Lords; some, perhaps more hopefully, in the putting forth of some new shoot from the ancient but still living trunk of the Privy Council; others have suggested that the Swiss Referendum (which so far has been in practice rather a conservative institution than otherwise) may have something to teach us. Dr. Moses thinks that the United States will have the same problem to face, though it may be later.

We should add, to our Californian author's credit, that the puzzles of legal and political sovereignty, in which writers of great reputation have been brought to confusion ere now, have no terrors for him. He takes the point quite straightforwardly and correctly:—"Since the Swiss Constitution is the fundamental law of the State, its makers are recognized as the legal sovereign in Switzerland." To find the sovereign, therefore, we have to ascertain from the Constitution itself who those makers are; or, to use terms more familiar to English and American readers, where the power of constitutional amendment resides. Those who are or who have been compelled to use Austin's lectures, either as learners or as teachers, may well wish that he had been as clear-headed as Professor Moses when he attempted to make the Constitution of the United States fit into his theory.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

A POSTHUMOUS book by the late M. Charles Blanc on the Renaissance (in its artistic sense) in Italy (1) is not a book to be finally despatched by a brief notice; and we shall hope to return to it. Its genesis, and the reasons for the considerable delay in its appearance, are detailed in a modest preface by M. Maurice Faucon, the editor, a pupil of the author's, and a well-known archæological writer. M. Blanc, it seems, expressed a wish that M. Faucon should act as his literary executor in regard to the partly unfinished book, and ill health has prevented M. Faucon from discharging the duty earlier. The book would appear to be, at least partly, based on M. Blanc's lectures at the Collège de France in his latest years. It takes the mixed form of what may be called a history-biography-catalogue—that is to say, the author surveys the whole period, from Nicholas of Pisa and Giotto down to Mantegna, with a certain amount of anecdotic detail, and with frequent elaborate description of the works chiefly commented upon. The criticism of this criticism from the special and technical side must be here postponed. We may now safely commend the literary skill once more observable in M. Blanc's disposition and handling of his material. Few art critics have surpassed the sometime Directeur des Beaux Arts in these respects—indeed, his literary faculty has often been considered superior to his brother's by good judges. The natural consequence is that his books are pleasant to read merely as books, and quite independently of any technical interest in their subject. This characteristic is very marked here—not the less marked, perhaps, because of the immense expenditure of ink on the same subject, or subjects closely connected with it, which the last half-century has seen.

M. Masséras's essay on Washington (2) (for it is rather an essay than a history) was avowedly written with a view to the late elections in France; but, unlike most books with a similar history, it is quite worth reading when its immediate purpose is out of date. The author, a journalist of both French and American experience, has treated his subject with much knowledge, and, on the whole, in a very sober spirit. He, indeed, undervalues, and was almost forced by his purpose to undervalue, the element of sheer good luck in American history; though, of course, he does not ignore it. His "look on this picture and on that," as addressed to French readers, is intended to urge on these latter the importance of driving a nail where it will go, of not being in a hurry, of preferring a modus vivendi to an elaborate theoretical settlement of a question, of believing, in short, and acting up to the belief, that "une génération doit se borner à vivre son temps en laissant à celles qui lui succéderont le soin d'écarter ou surmonter à leur tour les obstacles de leur route." And he very broadly and very truly hints that this is exactly what France has not been doing for the last century. In illustration he reviews the action of Washington himself before, during, and after the rebellion of the colonies, continuing his survey over the constitutional, and especially the financial, history of America till the present time. A great deal of what he says is perfectly true, though the praise falls more justly to England than to America.

(1) Histoire de la renaissance artistique en Italie. Par Charles Blanc. 2 tomes. Paris: Firmin-Didot.

(2) Washington et son œuvre. Par E. Masséras. Paris: Plon.

But still, as we have said, he seems to undervalue the element of luck—of the enormous mechanical advantages which the United States have enjoyed. The sculler who runs aground, and, without any apparent splashing or getting out to push behind, gets off again repeatedly, may seem to be a wiser and more dexterous pilot than he who exhausts his efforts in vain, or only forces the boat off with damaged keel. But, if the first has a perpetually rising tide underneath him, and the other is rowing in dead water, judgment must be altered a little. The resolve of American financiers to pay off the war debt, for instance, was worthy of all praise; but would they have been able to maintain it against a stationary or sinking revenue?

This is a book rather unequal, and by no means faultless, but decidedly amusing, and of a kind rare in France—the roman honnête which is not a mere children's book. M. de la Brète (3) has, we think, studied English and American models, and he has not always followed them wisely in making his independent and unsophisticated heroine, Reine de Laval, occasionally trench upon pertness, if not upon actual vulgarity. But in the revolt against candeur adorable before marriage and stealthy infidelity afterwards, some exaggeration was always inevitable. Both Reine and her more staid and stately cousin, Blanche de Pavol, otherwise "Junon," are very agreeable girls, such as it were well for the French nation if it would more commonly take for heroines. M. de la Brète has been equally uncompromising and unconventional in taking for hero a young man, good-looking indeed, but with a fat round face, an enormous appetite, a great sense of healthy fun, and apparently a decided preference for the daughters as opposed to the wives of his friends. The curé is less novel, but very pleasing, and the "uncle," M. de Pavol, who has a theory that man is a helpless victim conducted to the altar, and is half fond of, half-scandalized at his niece's pranks, is good likewise, as indeed are most of the minor characters, though an aunt who fortunately dies early has a touch of American exaggeration in her unpleasantness. The whole book, however, can be recommended. The genuine, breezy, almost riotous fun of it (Reine, a young lady of sixteen, announces, with perfect innocence, that she intends to get married directly, and describes young men in mixed society and to their faces as being charmants and gentils) contrasts in the most agreeable way with the dull filth, the arid pessimism, the Ouidesque fine writing, the mere vulgarity, or, worst of all, the maundering agnostic sentimentality of the average French fiction of the present day.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

ONE of the pleasantest exercises is offered to the armchair leader of locomotive fancy in the historical and archæological reminiscences collected by the Rev. A. G. L'Estrange, under the title Royal Winchester: Wanderings in and about the Ancient Capital of England, with illustrations by Mr. C. G. Harper (Blackett & Hallam). The book overbrims with curious and interesting information, delightfully presented, and with such sympathetic art, that assimilation will be found an easy and unconscious process with the most inveterate home-stayer. Some topographical acquaintance with the city of Winchester, its cathedral, school, and the many antiquities of the neighbourhood, is really the one qualification, and slight it is, necessary to the reader's enjoyment of the perambulation and the company of his agreeable and well-equipped guide. Mr. L'Estrange discourses of the past and present of Winchester in a manner equally persuasive and interesting. All Dryasdust instincts, with the tiresome and contentious disquisitions they breed, are as remote from his method as any other form of many-headed pedantry, and his itinerary is altogether what the ideal British Association holiday should be. It is a recreative excursion, the pleasure and profit of which is duly apportioned and fitly combined. On such subjects as the history of the cathedral, the castle, and the school Mr. L'Estrange has gathered from many sources and supplied much illustrative comment of an antiquarian nature. Further afield, beyond the city bounds, the author's wanderings embrace St. Catherine's Hill, St. Cross, with its noble church, the quaint village of Twyford, Wyke, Sparsholt, and other villages, the county proving scarcely less productive of antiquities and stories of times long past than the venerable city itself. Altogether, with Mr. Harper's excellent drawings, the book is one of the most attractive of its class.

Two volumes of Wordsworth are before us—Selections from Wordsworth, edited by Professor Knight and other members of the Wordsworth Society (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.), and Selections from Wordsworth, by A. J. George, M.A. (Boston, U.S.A.: Heath & Co.) There are good features, such as the chronological arrangement, common to both books, though Professor Knight's selection may justly claim precedence, on the ground of its somewhat fuller representation of the poet's work. The notes are brief and sufficient, and the selection shows at all points extreme care and excellent judgment. The book certainly merits the approbation of all Wordsworthians, and should, if any selection may, ensure the attainment of the compiler's aim, which is to popularize the poet among "the masses" and increase the number of the "fit audience" that reads him gladly. Mr. Grove's volume comprises an excellent selection and a more liberal annotation, such as American readers who have not Professor Knight's edition of the poet at hand may be grateful for.

(3) Mon oncle et mon curé. Par Jean de la Brète. Paris: Plon.

Mr. Joseph Hudson Yong's Lyrics (New York: Funk & Wagnalls) may be said to do no more than respond to the moderate expectations aroused by the present standard of the American minor bard. There are sonnets and songs, the verse of which flows smoothly enough, though it were hard to designate the purport or to shape the impressions they yield. A bolder spirit is Mr. Thomas James Macartney, who offers A Bid for the Laureateship (Simpkin & Co.), a volume of ballads dedicated to warlike themes and others, most of which are modestly commended by the author in an introduction, wherein we are informed that the poet does not in good faith put in a claim to succeed Lord Tennyson, but is convinced, all the same, that he is satisfied with his work and has produced "true and high-class poetry." Few there be, we fancy, who will accept Mr. Macartney's estimate of himself and labours. His ballads are of the ordinary "recitation" order, and may be effective with platform elocutionists. That they will find readers of the other sort we are exceedingly doubtful.

Mr. Cameron Macdowall, reversing an old and familiar process, has made of a drama, written some years since in what he candidly owns to be "blank, very blank verse," a romance in prose entitled A Queen among Queens (Swan Sonnenschein & Co.). Of the two productions, if our recollection of The First Empire of the East serves us, we must prefer the present. "The great and wise Zenobia" is decidedly a more imposing figure in the story than in the play, and Longinus has more of the sublime. Only Mr. Macdowall really should not be so diffident concerning the introduction of his poetry into his romances, and it is always a gratuitous error to bid the reader to skip it. The reader generally does nothing less without the suggestion. Let Mr. Macdowall follow the example of the unabashed Mrs. Radcliffe, whose heroines made poetry when and where they had a mind to it. We should be better pleased with Longinus and Glaucus if they did the like, without any disillusionizing modesty or any affectation for the delusive privacy of a foot-note.

Two pretty stories for small children we have from Messrs. Wells Gardner, Darton, & Co.—Bert, by Janie Brockman, told with excellent fidelity to nature by a little girl, the victim of the hero's love of mischief, and Evie, by E. G. Wilcox, a more placid narrative, yet wholesome and cheerful.

We have previously commended Mr. J. R. Tutin's way of selection, and have nothing further to say of his excellent selection of Early Poems by Wordsworth, recently added to "Routledge's Pocket Library." It is as satisfactory as the Keats that preceded it, and to better that were a task for the most fastidious lover of poetry.

The "reciter," by the way, appears to flourish in our midst, to judge from the literary provision set forth in The Overton Reciter and The Browning Reciter (Hutchins & Co.), two volumes of the "Platform Series," edited by Mr. Alfred H. Miles. The latter of these is a fairly good miscellaneous collection in prose and verse, including "Hervé Riel," and a few other poems by Mr. Browning. The character sketches of Mr. Robert Overton may do very well to vary the reciter's programme, but we should not willingly incur the responsibility of recommending a night with the Overton Reciter. These "character sketches" are written in a dreadful kind of dialect, for the most part, and, though not without humour of a sort, are apt to pall if persisted in. Tempered with The Browning Reciter, however, the prospect improves.

A Masque of Honour, or A Saratoga Romance—both titles hold good—by Caroline Washburn Rockwood (New York: Funk & Wagnalls), introduces for the *n*th time that prodigy of American civilization, the Boston Girl. She is not the girl of our dreams, nor, we imagine, of anybody's fancy, and long before we have done with her the dead weight of an extremely tedious novel has reduced us to indifference.

The new volume of "The Ancient and Modern Library of Theological Literature" comprises Cur Deus Homo? with a selection of the letters of St. Anselm, and a brief biographical introduction by "R. C." (Griffith, Farran, Okeden, & Welsh).

We have received new editions of A Handbook of Descriptive and Practical Astronomy, by George F. Chambers, F.R.A.S., with considerable additions, the first of three volumes (Oxford: at the Clarendon Press); Tom Brown's School Days, with illustrations by Arthur Hughes and Sydney Prior Hall (Macmillan & Co.); George Sand, by Bertha Thomas, "Eminent Women Series" (Allen & Co.), and The Confessions of a Young Man, by George Moore (Swan Sonnenschein & Co.).

We have also received the Key to Todhunter's Integral Calculus, by H. St. J. Hunter, M.A. (Macmillan & Co.); Arithmetical Reviews, by J. L. Patterson, D.Sc. (Boston, U.S.A.: Ginn & Co.); the Catalogue of Hindustani Printed Books in the Library of the British Museum, with title and subject indices, by Mr. J. F. Blumhardt (Longmans & Co.); and Caspar's Directory of the American Book, News, and Stationery Trade (Milwaukee, Wis.: C. N. Caspar), a bulky reference book, with a biographical notice of the late Mr. Frederick Leyboldt, "the martyr of American bibliography," a mighty index-maker and a benefactor to American bookmen.

For CONTENTS see page 446*

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we cannot return rejected Communications; and to this rule we can make no exception, even if stamps for return of MS. are sent. The Editor must also entirely decline to enter into correspondence with the writers of MSS. sent in and not acknowledged.

ADVERTISEMENTS intended for the SATURDAY REVIEW should be addressed to the MANAGER of the ADVERTISEMENT DEPARTMENT at the OFFICE, 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON. A printed Scale of Charges can be obtained on application.

The SATURDAY REVIEW may be had in Paris every Saturday from Veuve J. BOYVEAU, 22 Rue de la Banque (near the Bourse); also at Le KIOSQUE DUPERRON, Boulevard des Capucines, and Le KIOSQUE MICHEL, Boulevard des Capucines, by whom also Subscriptions will be received.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW may likewise be obtained in Paris every Saturday of MESSRS. GALIGNANI, 224 Rue de Rivoli.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW Bill of Contents will be forwarded every Friday Evening by post, prepaid, to any Newsagent in Town or Country on application to the Publisher.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE, Haymarket. — Managing Director, HENRY J. LESLIE. HER MAJESTY'S PROMENADE CONCERTS. At 8 o'clock. Orchestra and Band of Scots Guards of 100 Performers. Conductor, Signor BEVIGNANI. Concert 8 o'clock. Prices of admission, 1s. to £3 3s.—Business Manager, Mr. F. S. FLEMING.

DRURY LANE (The National Theatre). — AUGUSTUS HARRIS, Sole Lessee and Manager. — Every Evening at 8, THE ROYAL OAK. Misses Winifred Emery, Neilson, Grey, Atherton, and Fanny Brough; Messrs. Henry Neville, Arthur Dacre, Lablache, Lorraine, Dobell, Lyons, Thomas, Stephens, and Harry Nicholls, &c. At 7.20, THE OPERA CLOAK.

LYCEUM. — THE DEAD HEART. — Every Evening at Eight o'clock. THE DEAD HEART: Mr. Henry Irving, Mr. Bancroft, Mr. Arthur Stirling, Mr. Righton, Miss Kate Phillips, and Miss Ellen Terry. Box Office (Mr. J. Hurst) open daily 10 to 5. Seats also booked by letter or telegram. Carriages at 11. — LYCEUM.

LYRIC. — Sole Proprietor and Manager, HENRY J. LESLIE. This Evening, at 8.50, DORIS: Mesdames Marie Tempest, Alice Barnett, Harriet Coveney, Hettie Lund, and Hilda Glen; Messrs. Ben Davies, C. Hayden Coffin, S. King, W. T. Hemsley, Frank M. Wood, and Arthur Williams. Preceded at 7.40 by LOVE'S TRICKERY.

ROYAL AQUARIUM. — SAMSON, the Strongest Man living, in the theatre at 5.15 and 9.40. LOCKHART'S ELEPHANTS, the Cannibals from Tierra del Fuego, the Figaros, O'Brian and Reddin, Bella and Bijou, Damer's Donkeys and Goats, the Rossbach Troupe, the Poluskis, Mlle. LEIPIC in her great aerial act, the WHITE KANGAROO, Ellie Stuart; Beckwith's Swimming Performance, about 5 and 9.30.

CRYSTAL PALACE SATURDAY CONCERT. — Saturday, October 26th, at Three. Vocalist: Mme. Elvira Gambogi; Pianoforte, Señor Albeniz (his first appearance at the Crystal Palace). The Crystal Palace Orchestra. Conductor, Mr. AUGUST MANNS. Programme will include: — Overture, "Coriolan" (Beethoven); Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra (Schumann); Symphony in B flat (Op. 60); Dr. Bernhard Scholz (first time in England); Solos for Pianoforte (Albeniz) — (a) Sevillana, (b) Cotillon Valse, (c) Improptu. Concert Overture, "The Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" (Mendelssohn).

GROSVENOR GALLERY, New Bond Street, W. THE SECOND PASTEL EXHIBITION IS NOW OPEN. Admission, 1s. — Ten to Six.

ARTS and CRAFTS EXHIBITION SOCIETY. — The NEW GALLERY, Regent Street. — SECOND EXHIBITION NOW OPEN, Ten to Six. Admission, 1s. WALTER CRANE, President. ERNEST RADFORD, Secretary.

THE GROSVENOR GALLERIES, 135 NEW BOND STREET, W.

These well-known Galleries can accommodate Fifteen Hundred Persons, and may be engaged for PRIVATE "AT HOMES," SOIRÉES, CONVERSAZIONI, BANQUETS, &c. &c.

The PASTEL EXHIBITION opened on the 15th inst.

THE ELECTRIC LIGHT THROUGHOUT.

Applications should be made to the GENERAL MANAGER.

THE FLYING J PEN.

The DELIGHT of all WRITERS. A Fountain Pen without complications. A Superior J Pen which will write over 100 words with one dip of ink.

6d. and 1s. per Box. Sample box, 1s. 1d. by post.

MACNIVEN & CAMERON, WAVERLEY WORKS, BLAIR STREET, EDINBURGH. (Established 1770.)

PARIS EXHIBITION.

FACILE PRINCEPS!

IN COMPETITION

WITH

ALL THE WORLD!

PEARS.

ONLY

GOLD MEDAL

AND

DIPLOMA OF HONOUR

FOR TOILET SOAP,

AND THIS IS THE HIGHEST POSSIBLE HONOUR.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW
OF
POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.
Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 1,773, OCTOBER 19, 1889:

East and West.
Lord Herschell on Ireland.
"Swear'st Thou, Ungracious Boy?"
More Election Lessons. Lord Galloway's Case.
The Old New World. Mr. Chamberlain's Explanation.
Mansfield College. Mr. Labouchere among the Scotch.
Sense at Last. Wales and Cornwall.
Hic jacet Mr. Quilter.
Anthropometamorphosis.
Newmarket Second October Meeting.
Kew—III. Pastels at the Grosvenor. Our Royal Selves.
Speculation in Germany. The Leeds Festival—I.
Notes from the Zoo—Lepidosirens.
Money Matters. The Exquisite Reason.
The Carisbrooke Library.
Novels. The Real Homer. Aitken's Steele.
A Gentleman Usher, V.C.
A Guide to the French Exhibition. Erotidia.
The Attic Theatre. The Swiss Confederation and Constitution.
French Literature. New Books and Reprints.

London: Published at 33 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

EDUCATIONAL.

ST. CLARE COLLEGE, WALMER, KENT
Head-Master—The Rev. E. D'AUQUIER, M.A. Clare College, Camb.
One of the Examiners to the Irish Board of Intermediate Education, late Head-Master of South-Eastern College, Ramsgate, with a staff of Assistant Masters (Graduates).
The College is situated in a delightful spot, close to the sea, and contains teaching and boarding accommodation, chapel, sanatorium, infirmary, playroom, laundry, gymnasium, canteen, workshop, &c., 14 acres of well-timbered and beautiful grounds, cycle path, cricket and football fields, tennis-courts, &c., sea-bathing and boating.
The school year is divided into three terms; each term consists of about thirteen weeks.
Inclusive fees, Eighty Guineas per annum. Exhibitions and Scholarships, of £10, £15, and £21, are annually thrown open for competition.
For further information, apply to the HEAD-MASTER.

LIVERPOOL INSTITUTE.—HIGH and COMMERCIAL SCHOOLS.
The DIRECTORS desire to receive applications for the HEAD-MASTERSHIP of these Schools. The salary consists of a percentage of the pupils' fees, expected to amount to between £600 and £700 per annum. No residence is provided. Preference will be given to candidates who are between 30 and 40 years of age. The selected candidate will be required to devote the whole of his time to the duties of his office. Printed particulars may be obtained by applying by letter only to the undersigned, to whom candidates are requested to send in their applications, with copies (not originals) of their testimonials, headed "Head Mastership," on or before the 31st of October.
Mount Street, Liverpool, Oct. 1st, 1889. CHARLES SHARP, Secretary.

THE Misses S. and R. ALLEN-OLNEY (formerly Head-Mistresses respectively of Blackheath and South Hampstead High Schools), residing in the healthy suburb of Hampstead, receive a few YOUNG LADIES to board and educate. The arrangements are those of a refined home. Large playground and full-sized tennis-court. Preparation for University examinations and degrees. Reference kindly permitted to parents of present and former pupils. —41 Belsize Park Gardens, London, N.W.

THE Rev. W. ALMACK, M.A., BRUCE CASTLE, near TOTTENHAM, prepares PUPILS wanting special help for the Universities, Army, Legal or Medical Preliminaries, or the ordinary requirements of business life. Excellent house in Park of 20 acres, containing Cricket and Football grounds. References, the Head-Masters of Charterhouse, Cheltenham, and Marlborough.

MILITARY COMPETITIVE.
Colonels B. A. WILKINSON and W. J. SHAW,
FARNHAM, SURREY, and VICTORIA HOUSE, ALDERSHOT.
Results of 1888 and 1889 to date:

A. C. Going.	E. T. James.	C. L. Graham.
C. H. Bennett.	T. S. Smith.	E. S. Smith.
F. J. Richardson.	S. F. Legge.	A. J. Ralph.
N. C. MacLachlan.	C. H. Corbett.	A. F. Owen Lewis.
J. S. Dallas.	H. B. Galloway.	J. P. Law.
H. G. Heneage.	R. H. Pitcairn.	J. A. McLean.
G. D. E. Fullerton.	D. A. N. Lomax.	H. G. W. Wayne.
C. W. Howard.	J. M. F. Hiddingh.	G. C. B. Weld-Forester.

Separate Department for Woolwich and Sandhurst Candidates.
Classes for the March Military Competitive now forming.

BELL FARM, CLEWER HILL, WINDSOR.
BOYS prepared for ETON and other PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—Address Miss HIBBARD.

PRÉ SCILLA, LAUSANNE.—Miss WILLS, late Head-Mistress of the Norwich High School, has a very comfortable English HOME for Elder GIRLS. Garden and full-sized Tennis-court. Numbers limited. Subjects taken:—French, German, Italian, Music, Singing, and Painting.

RADFORD HOUSE, COVENTRY.
PREPARATORY SCHOOL for the SONS of GENTLEMEN. Established 1800. Boys prepared from Six to Twelve years of age, and prepared for College and Local Examinations, which have hitherto been successfully passed by the Pupils of this School. Eight acres of recreation ground.—Apply for particulars to Mrs. and Miss HOUGHTON.

SCHOOL PIANOS.—NEW MODELS, from 18 Guineas.
All the latest Improvements. These instruments are remarkable for their beautiful tone, perfect touch, and durability. PIANOS for HIRE, or on the THREE YEARS' SYSTEM.—W. J. ENNEVER & SON, Manufacturers, 57 Berners Street, London, W.

ILFRACOMBE.—ILFRACOMBE HOTEL. Thoroughly furnished, equipped, and decorated. 250 Rooms. Eight Lawn-Tennis Courts, Large Swimming Bath, Private Baths. Descriptive Tariff of Manager.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS' UPRIGHT IRON GRAND PIANOFORTES.
Prices from 40 Guineas upwards.
JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Pianoforte Makers by Special Appointment to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales, 1889.—18, 20, and 22 Wigmore Street, W. Lists free.

SCHWEITZER'S
COCOATINA.

GUARANTEED PURE SOLUBLE COCOA.

This Old-established Article retains its position as "the finest Cocoa in the market." It is unequalled in purity and flavour, bears the strictest Chemical test, and keeps in all Climates.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS AND ECONOMICAL.

PURE—SOLUBLE.
BEST & GOES FARTHEST.
EASILY DIGESTED.
MADE INSTANTLY.
"Once used, always used—its PURITY is beyond question."
Health.
"It is admirable—flavour perfect—and so PURE."
British Medical Journal.
C. J. VAN HOUTEN & ZOON,
WEESP, HOLLAND.

FRY'S
PURE CONCENTRATED
COCOA.
Lancet—"Pure, and very soluble."
Medical Times—"Eminently suitable for Invalids."
Sir C. A. CAMERON, President of the Royal College of Surgeons, Ireland—"I have never tasted Cocoa that I like so well."

GOOD MORNING!
Have you used
PEARS' SOAP?

CARDINAL AND HARFORD,
The oldest established Importers of
ORIENTAL CARPETS.

THE LEVANT WAREHOUSE,
108 & 109 HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.
Catalogues post free.

ROYAL ALFRED AGED MERCHANT SEAMEN'S INSTITUTION. Opened in 1867.
THE HOME, BELVEDERE, KENT.
Pensioners at all Ports of the United Kingdom.
Annual Disbursements, £6,000. Annual Subscriptions, £1,800.
Number of Inmates, 100. Out-Pensioners, 200.
Patron—Rear-Admiral H.R.H. THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH, K.G.
Chairman—Admiral Sir F. LEOPOLD MCCLINTOCK, F.R.S.
Deputy-Chairman—Captain DAVID MAINLAND, F.R.G.S.
The object of this Charity is to give a Home or a Pension to the Merchant Sailor when Old, Destitute, and Friendless.
800 Old Sailors, out of 1,700 Applicants, have enjoyed the benefits of this Charity; but from want of funds the Committee are unable to admit hundreds of necessitous and worthy Candidates, who for Forty years have been at Sea as Seaman, Mate, or Master.
Subscriptions and Donations are urgently needed to reduce this heavy list and to relieve many from destitution.
Bankers—Messrs. WILLIAMS, DEACON, & CO.
Office: 58 Fenchurch Street, London, E.C. W. E. DENNY, Secretary.

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL, Strand, W.C.—The COUNCIL earnestly appeal for DONATIONS and ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS. £20,000 required for new Nursing Establishment, enlargement of Medical School, the Convalescent Home, and current expenses. Bankers: Messrs. Drummond.
ARTHUR E. READE, Secretary.

MEL ROSA, the CERTAIN SAFE CURE for COUGHS, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, Hooping Cough, Hoarseness, Incipient Consumption, &c. In Bottles, 1s. 1d. and 2s. 9d.; post free, 1s. 4d. and 3s. Prepared only by the Proprietor, HERBERT POTTER, Chemist, M.P.S., Sutton, Surrey.
NOTE.—Insist on being supplied with Potter's "Mel Rosa."

LIFE ASSURANCES, &c.

LONDON ASSURANCE CORPORATION.

Established by Royal Charter, A.D. 1720.

7 ROYAL EXCHANGE AND 43A PALL MALL, S.W.

Marine, Fire, and Life Assurances have been granted by the Corporation for more than a century and a half.
Funds in hand exceed £3,500,000.

NATIONAL PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

FOR MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE.

Financial Year ends November 20.

All persons now insuring will receive an additional Share of Profit at the Next Division in 1892.

48 GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON.

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY.

Established 1836.

LONDON—1 MOORGATE STREET, E.C. ABERDEEN—1 UNION TERRACE.

INCOME AND FUNDS (1888).

Fire Premiums £615,000

Life Premiums 203,000

Interest 149,000

Accumulated Funds £3,581,000

ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH LAW LIFE ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION (Established 1839).

12 Waterloo Place, London. 120 Princes Street, Edinburgh.

Whole Life Bonuses never less than £1 10s. per cent. per annum.

Annuities. Loans. Liberal Conditions.

ARTHUR JACKSON, General Manager } 12 Waterloo Place,
FRANCIS E. COLENSO, F.I.A., Actuary } London.

CITY OFFICE—11 LUDGATE HILL, E.C.

JOHN MUNRO, City Secretary.

PHENIX FIRE OFFICE,

LOMBARD STREET and CHARING CROSS, LONDON.—Established 1782.

Moderate Rates. Absolute Security.

Liberal Loss Settlements. Prompt payment of Claims.

W. C. MACDONALD } Joint Secretaries.
F. B. MACDONALD }

Losses paid over £17,000,000.

IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Established 1803.—1 OLD BROAD STREET, E.C.; and 22 PALL MALL, S.W.

Subscribed Capital, £1,200,000. Paid-up, £300,000. Total Invested Funds, over £1,600,000.

E. COZENS SMITH, General Manager.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane.

THREE PER CENT. INTEREST on DEPOSITS repayable on demand. TWO PER CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS when not drawn below £100. The Bank undertakes, free of charge, the Custody of Securities and Valuables; the Collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Shares, and Annuities. Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued. THE BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK.

ISSUE of £371,320.

(Authorized by the Sheffield Corporation Acts, 1883 and 1889.)

The CORPORATION of SHEFFIELD give NOTICE that they are prepared to receive applications for the above sum of SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK. Minimum price of Issue £100 per cent.

Interest payable half-yearly, on March 1 and September 1, at the Sheffield and Hallamshire Bank, Sheffield, or by their London Agents, Messrs. GLYN, MILLS, CURRIE, & CO., 67 Lombard Street.

No sum less than £50 of Stock will be allotted, and any amount in excess of that sum must be a multiple of £10.

Under the Trust Investment Act, 1889, recently passed, this Stock is an available investment for every Trustee who is not expressly forbidden by the instrument creating his trust to invest in Corporation Stock.

Forms of Prospectus, &c., and all information required, will be supplied by

Borough Accountant's Office,
Bridge Street, Sheffield,
August 16, 1889.

W. FISHER TASKER, Registrar.

FOR THE DECORATION OF THE HOME
visit THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY'S Gallery,
74 New Oxford Street, W.C. A noble display of Copies of THE GREAT MASTERS, framed
and unframed.

The Chef-d'œuvres of THE NATIONAL
COLLECTIONS of London, Paris, Rome, Dresden,
St. Petersburg, Madrid, &c. &c.

Catalogue of 186 pages, Sixpence, post-free.
A descriptive Pamphlet free by post on application to

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY.

BENGER'S FOOD

FOR INFANTS,
CHILDREN AND INVALIDS.

GOLD MEDAL, HEALTH EXHIBITION.

EXTRACT FROM PRIVATE LETTER.—"The infant was very delicate; our medical adviser ordered your Food. The result in a short time was wonderful; the little fellow grew strong and fat, and is now in a thriving condition—in fact, 'the flower of the flock.'"

BENGER'S FOOD is Sold in Tins, at 1s. 6d., 2s. 6d., 5s., and 10s., by Chemists, &c., everywhere.

THE TRADE SUPPLIED BY ALL WHOLESALE HOUSES.

ROWLANDS' MACASSAR OIL.

Prevents and arrests baldness and produces luxuriant and glossy hair.
Also prepared in a GOLDEN COLOUR. Bottles, 3s. 6d., 7s., and 10s. 6d.

ROWLANDS' ODONTO.

A non-gritty Tooth Powder. Whitens the Teeth and prevents decay.

Ask Chemists for Rowlands' Articles.

SUTTON'S SUTTON & SONS, BULBS READING.

GENUINE ONLY DIRECT FROM

For full particulars see

SUTTON'S BULB CATALOGUE

Beautifully Illustrated, 6d. post free.

Complete Priced List of Bulbs gratis and post-free.

THE GREATEST of all PIANOFORTES.

THE STEINWAY PIANOFORTES, New York & London.
Steinway Hall, LOWER SEYMOUR STREET, Portman Square, London, W.

BOOKS, &c.

Ready next week.

No. 488 (OCTOBER 22) of

SOTHERAN'S PRICE CURRENT of LITERATURE,

Containing Collections of Works on

INDIAN and ASIATIC SUBJECTS, and in FRENCH LITERATURE, and a large number of the BEST EDITIONS of STANDARD ENGLISH WORKS, Historical, Philosophical, and Miscellaneous, from recently purchased Private Libraries.

A copy gratis and post free on application.

136 STRAND, W.C., AND 36 PICCADILLY, W., LONDON.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW sent by post at following rates

per annum, paid in advance:

Any part of the United Kingdom £1 8 2

India and China 1 12 6

Other British Colonies, Europe, Egypt, and America 1 10 6

STEEL & JONES, 4 Spring Gardens, London, S.W.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the 1s.—HATCHARDS, 187 Piccadilly,
London. All the New and Standard Books, Bibles, Prayers, Church Services, &c.
Post Orders promptly executed. Libraries arranged and catalogued.

STAMMERERS and STUTTERERS should read a book by a gentleman who cured himself after suffering nearly forty years.

Post free for 13 stamps, from

Mr. B. BEASLEY, Sherwood, Willesden Lane, Brondesbury, London; and Brampton Park, Huntingdon.

A NOVEL COMMENDED by Mr. GLADSTONE and by Dr. GEORGE MACDONALD.
FOR the RIGHT. Now ready, New Cheap Edition. 3s. 6d.
GEORGE MACDONALD:—"I have seldom, if ever, read a work of fiction which moved me with so much admiration."
London: JAMES CLARKE & CO., 13 and 14 Fleet Street, E.C.

MISS BRADDON'S NEW NOVEL.

In 3 vols. At all Libraries.

THE DAY WILL COME. A Novel. By the Author of
"Lady Audley's Secret" &c.
London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO.

Now ready, 47s pp. fep. 8vo. cloth, 6s.

THE COMPLETE LIFE of HOMER. By F. A. WHITE, B.A.
Containing all that can be known or conjectured of his Life, Works, Birthplace, Date,
Parentage, and Ancestry, from his own Works and those of others.
London: GEORGE BELL & SONS, York Street, Covent Garden.

Now ready, New Edition, price 2s. 6d.

THE HISTORY of the PIANOFORTE. By EDGAR
BRINSMEAD.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, E.C.; and
JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, 18, 20, and 22 Wigmore Street, W.

MR. JOHN BIRCH'S WORKS.

COUNTRY ARCHITECTURE, 42s. PICTURESQUE
LODGES, 12s. 6d. EXAMPLES of LABOURERS' COTTAGES, 3s. 6d. CONCRETE BUILDINGS for LANDED ESTATES, 2s.
WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, Edinburgh and London.

POPULAR EDITION OF L. B. WALFORD'S NOVELS.

Now ready, cloth extra, 2s. 6d. each, with Frontispiece engraved in Paris by Laslett J. Pott.

COUSINS. By L. B. WALFORD, Author of "Nan," "A Mere Child," &c.

THE BABY'S GRANDMOTHER.

MR. SMITH: a Part of His Life.

The Author's other Novels will be published at intervals.

London: SPENCER BLACKETT & HALLAM, 35 St. Bride Street.

NEW EDITION, price 1s.

HYDROPATHY and HEALTH. By J. EWING RITCHIE
(Christopher Crayon).

London: W. KENT & CO., Paternoster Row.

NINTH VOLUME OF

THE SLING and the STONE. By the Rev. CHARLES
VOYSEY. Price 7s. 6d.

CONTENTS:—On the Fatherhood of God—Sermon on the Mount—What is Christianity? and Discourses on Agnosticism.

London: WILLIAMS & NORGATE.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

NOTICE TO THE TRADE.

WINTER'S CHRISTMAS ANNUAL (Fifth Year).

BUTTONS.

By JOHN STRANGE WINTER, Author of "Bootles' Baby" &c.

Paper cover, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d.

The first large Edition of the above having been exhausted on the day of publication, a Second Edition is now ready. Orders will be executed in the rotation received.

NOVELS AT ALL CIRCULATING LIBRARIES.

MRS. BOB. By JOHN STRANGE WINTER, Author of "Bootles' Baby," "Army Society," "Beautiful Jim," &c. 2 vols. [Immediately.

MOUNT EDEN. By FLORENCE MARRYAT, Author of "My Sister the Actress," "Facing the Footlights," &c. 3 vols.

MATRON or MAID? By Mrs. EDWARD KENNARD, Author of "A Crack County," "A Real Good Thing," &c. 3 vols.

SHEBA. By "RITA," Author of "Dame Durden," "Miss Kate," "A Vagabond Lover," &c. 3 vols.

LADY CLAUD. By Mrs. ALEXANDER FRASER, Author of "Daughters of Belgravia," "The Last Drawing-Room," &c. Second Edition. 2 vols.

OFF WITH the OLD LOVE. By N. F. B. 2 vols.

THAT OTHER WOMAN. By ANNIE THOMAS (Mrs. Pender Cudlip), Author of "Her Success," "Allerton Towers," &c. 3 vols.

CLARE STRONG. By G. BERESFORD FITZGERALD, Author of "Lillian" &c. 2 vols.

MISS KATE; or, Confessions of a Caretaker. By "RITA," Author of "Dame Durden," "A Vagabond Lover," &c. 1 vol. 6s. [At all Booksellers'.

THE SECRET of FONTAINE-LA-CROIX. By MARGARET FIELD. 1 vol. 6s. [At all Booksellers'.

Will be published immediately, the NOVEMBER NUMBER of BELGRAVIA. A Monthly Magazine. 1s. Containing Contributions by Fergus Hume, "Basil" (Richard Ashe King), Denzil Vane, Carmen Sylva (Queen of Roumania), and other well-known Authors.

Also the NOVEMBER NUMBER of LONDON SOCIETY. A Monthly Magazine. 1s. Containing Contributions by Iza Duffus Hardy—"Rita"—The Hon. Mrs. H. W. Chetwynd—The Author of "Miss Molly"—Arthur T. Pask—The Author of "Who is Sylvia?"—Mrs. Humphry, and other Popular Authors; also an Article on the late Wilkie Collins, by H. Chartres.

F. V. WHITE & CO., 31 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND.

WARD, LOCK, & CO.'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

COMPLETE CATALOGUE post free on application.

The TIMES says:—"HAYDN'S DICTIONARY of DATES is the MOST UNIVERSAL BOOK of REFERENCE in a moderate compass that we know of in the English language."

NINETEENTH EDITION, Now Ready, containing 1068 PAGES, 10,000 ARTICLES, and 120,000 DATES and FACTS. REVISED, CORRECTED, and enlarged with NEW and IMPORTANT MATTER BROUGHT DOWN to the PRESENT DATE.

Medium 8vo. cloth, 18s.; half-calf, 24s.; full or tree calf, 31s. 6d.

HAYDN'S DICTIONARY of DATES and UNIVERSAL INFORMATION. A complete record of all Nations and Times. Containing the History of the World to the Autumn of 1889. By BENJAMIN VINCENT, Hon. Librarian of the Royal Institution of Great Britain.

"The new edition is as exhaustive as it is up to date.....Fully maintains its value as a standard work of reference."—Standard.

IMPORTANT TO EVERY LADY.

NEW EDITION (RECOMPOSED, REVISED, ENLARGED, and GREATLY IMPROVED) of the BEST COOKERY BOOK IN THE WORLD.

480th Thousand. Strongly bound, half-roan, 7s. 6d.

MRS. BEETON'S BOOK of HOUSEHOLD MANAGEMENT.

Comprising every kind of Practical Information on Domestic Economy and Cookery, including 350 Additional Pages of NEW RECIPES and NEW ENGRAVINGS. Containing 1700 PAGES, THOUSANDS of RECIPES and INSTRUCTIONS, HUNDREDS of ENGRAVINGS, and NEW COLOURED PLATES.

"No cookery book that has ever been published can be compared to Mrs. Beeton's 'Household Management.'"—Cambridge Chronicle.

The most COMPLETE and USEFUL BOOK PRODUCED for AMATEURS in CARPENTRY and the CONSTRUCTIVE ARTS.

Issue in Sixpenny Monthly Parts (Part I. ready October 25)

Of a NEW, ENLARGED, and REVISED EDITION of

EVERY MAN HIS OWN MECHANIC: a COMPLETE

GUIDE to ALL OPERATIONS in BUILDING, MAKING, and MENDING that can be done by Amateurs in the House, Garden, Farm, &c. With HUNDREDS of ILLUSTRATIONS of TOOLS, PROCESSES, BUILDINGS, &c. With an APPENDIX of ABOUT 100 PAGES of NEW TEXT and ILLUSTRATIONS. A VALUABLE SUPPLEMENT, EXHIBITING at a glance the Numbers, Size, and Prices of upwards of TWO HUNDRED SCREWS, is PRESENTED GRATIS with Part I.

ENTIRELY NEW WORK by the AUTHOR of "THE WORLD'S INHABITANTS." In Monthly Parts, each 6d. To be completed in 14 Parts. Part I. ready October 25.

THE WORLD'S RELIGIONS: describing the DOCTRINES, RISE, PRACTICES, PRIESTHOODS, and MORAL TEACHINGS of ALL the PRINCIPAL RELIGIONS of the present day and of past times. By G. T. BETTANY, M.A. (Camb.). B.Sc. London, Author of "The World's Inhabitants," and Editor of "The Minerva Library of Famous Books."

COPIOUSLY ILLUSTRATED with FULL-PAGE and OTHER ENGRAVINGS, depicting the most interesting scenes and objects in connection with the various religions.

With Part I. WILL BE PRESENTED to EVERY PURCHASER a VALUABLE SUPPLEMENT, giving a Pictorial View of the PRINCIPAL RELIGIOUS BUILDINGS, TEMPLES, &c., of the World.—Specimen Copy, post-free, for 7d.

LONDON: WARD, LOCK, & CO., SALISBURY SQUARE, E.C.

Just published, 10s. sewn.

STATUTES of PRACTICAL UTILITY passed in the Session of 1889 (ending in August), arranged in Alphabetical Order. With Notes. In Continuation of Chitty's Statutes. By J. M. LELY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Extracts from Preface.

"The Editor's object in these Annual Parts is, in addition to supplying references to the principal book, to point out the chief alterations effected, to deal with obvious difficulties of construction, and to supply such references to cases and text-books as may lighten the preliminary labour of the practitioner consulting the Acts."

CHITTY'S COLLECTION of STATUTES of PRACTICAL UTILITY. Arranged in Alphabetical and Chronological Order, with Notes thereon. The Fourth Edition. By J. M. LELY, Barrister-at-Law. 1880. In 7 vols., and 1 Part to 1886, royal, reduced to £7 10s. nett.

ANNUAL CONTINUATIONS TO ABOVE.

1887 10s. 6d.

1888 15s.

SWEET & MAXWELL, LIMITED, 3 CHANCERY LANE, LONDON;
STEVENS & SONS, LIMITED, 119 & 120 CHANCERY LANE, LONDON.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW.—The following NUMBERS

of THE SATURDAY REVIEW are required, for which 1s. each will be given, viz., 1, 2, 15, 25, 56, 59, 73, 75, 99, 112, 130, 132, 138, 174, 452, and 1637 (clean copies)—at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

NOW READY, AT ALL LIBRARIES.

A NEW NOVEL,

ENTITLED

A MATCH PAIR.

By AMES SAVILE.

In 2 vols.

LONDON: KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.

OCTOBER 15. Price 2s. 6d.

THE UNIVERSAL REVIEW

CONTENTS:

1. THE GREAT DOCK STRIKE. H. CHAMPION.
2. THE WAGES OF SIN. LUCAS MALET.
3. IN MEMORIAM AMICI. HARRY QUILTER.
4. ON TRANSLATING HOMER. Dr. GARNETT.
5. JUMP TO GLORY JANE. GEORGE MEREDITH.
6. TRIUMPH OF THE CROSS. LADY DILKE.
7. DARWINISM AND NEO-DARWINISM. C. C. COE.
8. SEA BORN VINE. WILLIAM SHARP.
9. WIT AND HUMOUR. Dr. HACK TUKE.

Full-page Illustrations by A. Sacheverel-Coke, H. Arthur Kennedy, Sir John Gilbert, R.A., &c.

SWAN SONNENSCHN & CO., PATERNOSTER ROW.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW, No. CCCXXXVIII.

is published THIS DAY.

CONTENTS:

1. COURTHOPE'S LIFE OF POPE.
2. THE PRINCIPALITY OF MONACO.
3. WARD AND THE OXFORD MOVEMENT.
4. BATTLE ABBEY ROLL.
5. HEINRICH HEINE.
6. THE INHABITANTS OF EAST LONDON.
7. JOHN LOCKE.
8. GARDINER'S CIVIL WAR.
9. THE ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.
10. THE NATIONAL PARTY OF THE FUTURE.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street.

PALESTINE EXPLORATION FUND.

Now ready, price 2s. 6d.

QUARTERLY STATEMENT for OCTOBER 1889.

CONTENTS:

- REPORT OF THE ANNUAL MEETING.
HERR SCHICK ON RECENT DISCOVERIES IN JERUSALEM AND THE MOUNT OF OLIVES.
REV. J. E. HANAUER ON A CURIOUS CAVE AT SARIS AND AN INSCRIPTION AT BEIT EL KHULIL.
HERR SCHUMACHER ON RECENT DISCOVERIES IN GALILEE.
MR. JAMES GLAISHER'S METEOROLOGICAL REPORT.
MAJOR CONDOR ON NORMAN PALESTINE.
MRS. FINN ON OLD WALL OF JERUSALEM.
REV. W. F. BIRCH ON NEHEMIAH'S WALL, &c.
ALEXANDER P. WATT, 2 Paternoster Square, E.C.

JOURNAL of MENTAL SCIENCE, OCTOBER 1889.

Edited by D. HACK TUKE, M.D., and GEORGE H. SAVAGE, M.D. Price 3s. 6d.

CONTENTS:

- PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS, delivered at the Annual Meeting of the Medico-Psychological Association, July 25, 1889. By H. HAYES NEWINGTON, M.R.C.P.Ed.
ON THE PROVISION FOR THE INSANE POOR IN THE FUTURE. By D. HACK TUKE, F.R.C.P.
REMARKS ON THE URINE AND TEMPERATURE IN GENERAL PARALYSIS OF THE INSANE. By JOHN TURNER, M.B.
ON THE STUDY OF CONDITIONS OF DEVELOPMENT AND BRAIN-POWER IN CHILDREN. By FRANCIS WARNER, M.D.
A STUDY OF STUPOR. By JAMES R. WHITWELL, M.B.
DRS. ROBERTSON AND YELLOWLEES ON NON-RESTRAINT.
THE NEW LUNACY ACT. ABSTRACT OF THE NEW LUNACY ACT.

London: J. & A. CHURCHILL, New Burlington Street, W.

Just published, crown 8vo. 5s.

THE FRIEND OF MAN, AND HIS FRIENDS,

The Poets.

By FRANCES POWER COBBE.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, 4 YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

NOW READY AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS'.

Handsomely bound, cloth gilt, crown 8vo. 6s.

THE AUTHORISED TRANSLATION OF MADAME CARETTE'S GREAT AND POPULAR WORK.

"Souvenirs intimes de la Cour des Tuileries."

MY MISTRESS, the EMPRESS EUGÉNIE;

Or, Court Life at the Tuileries.

LONDON: DEAN & SON, 150A FLEET STREET, E.C.

TO TRAVELLERS IN INDIA.

WHITWORTH'S ANGLO-INDIAN DICTIONARY:

A Glossary of Colloquial and Official Terms;

Of the names of Divinities, Festivals, Religions, and Sects; of Races, Tribes, and Languages; Of Castes and Occupations; of the different Eras and Systems of Chronology; of seasons, Crops, and Land Tenures, and generally of all Indian terms used in English, and of English words peculiarly used in India. Price 12s.

"Well designed, well printed, and handy."—Saturday Review.

LONDON: KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.

PROPOSED CHANNEL BRIDGE.—For View and Description

see THE BUILDER of October 19. Also a Sketch in the Cloisters, Gloucester, and other Illustrations; with Articles on various interesting subjects. 4d.; by post, 4jd. Annual subscription, 19s.—Office, 46 Catherine Street, London, W.C.

DAVID DOUGLAS'S LIST.

Nearly ready, Vol. III. royal 8vo. 42s.

THE CASTELLATED and DOMESTIC

ARCHITECTURE of SCOTLAND, from the Twelfth to the Eighteenth Century. By DAVID MACGIBBON and THOMAS ROSS, Architects.

* * * This Third Volume will be uniform in size and style with the previous volumes, and will be followed by the Fourth as soon as it can be prepared. When this has been published the authors confidently believe that they will have given particulars regarding the present and past condition of every edifice in Scotland of any importance falling within the range of their subject.

1 vol. demy 8vo. 21s.

THE ARCHITECTURE of PROVENÇE and the RIVIERA. By DAVID MACGIBBON. Illustrated with nearly 300 Sketches by the Author, showing the various styles of Architecture in the South of France.

Nearly ready, Fourth Edition, 1 vol. demy 8vo. 21s.

MODERN HORSEMANSHIP. Three Schools of Riding: an Original Method of Teaching the Art, by means of Pictures from the Life. By EDWARD L. ANDERSON.

* * * Re-written and re-arranged, and Illustrated by 40 Instantaneous Photographs, most of which have been taken specially for this edition.

Just published, 1 vol. demy 8vo. 15s.

VETERINARY MEDICINES: their Actions and Uses. By FINDLAY DUN. Seventh Edition, Enlarged and entirely Re-written.

In preparation, 1 vol. demy 8vo.

BUDDHISM and CHRISTIANITY: a Parallel and a Contrast. Being the Croall Lectures for 1889-1890. By ARCHIBALD SCOTT, D.D., Minister of St. George's, Edinburgh.

Nearly ready, 1 vol. extra fcp. 8vo.

PASSAGES from the LETTERS of the Rev.

JOHN KER, D.D., 1866-1885, Author of "Thoughts for Heart and Life."

Now ready, extra fcp. 8vo. 5s.

CHRONICLES of GLENBUCKIE. By HENRY

JOHNSTON, Author of "The Dawsons of Glenara," "Martha Spreull," &c.

"A delightful, humorous, and evidently faithful picture of Scottish life in a rural Ayrshire parish."—Scotsman.

"Challenges comparison with Galt's 'Annals of the Parish.'"—Saturday Review.

"Out of sight the best story dealing with Scotch country life during the period which is embraced between the Reform Bill of 1832 and the formation of the Free Church, that has ever appeared."—Academy.

"There are no weak sketches in this gallery of originals, which lovers of Lowland Scotland will do well to study."—Athenæum.

"One of the best, simplest, and most veracious books dealing with the lights and shadows of Scotch country life that have been published for many years."

Spectator.

Second Edition, 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

CIRCUIT JOURNEYS. By the late LORD

COCKBURN, one of the Judges of the Court of Session.

"One of the best books of reminiscences that have appeared."—Morning Post.

FOUR NEW NOVELS.

Nearly ready, 3 vols. post 8vo.

THE ART of LOVE; or, New Lessons in Old Lore. By Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart., M.P., Author of "Sir Lucian Elphin."

2 vols. demy 8vo. 24s.

PASSAGES in the LIFE of SIR LUCIAN

ELPHIN, of CASTLE WEARY. Edited by his SISTER.

Nearly ready, Copyright Edition, 2 vols. extra fcp. 8vo.

A HAZARD of NEW FORTUNES. By

WILLIAM D. HOWELLS.

Nearly ready, Copyright Edition, post 8vo.

WOULD YOU KILL HIM? By GEORGE

PARSONS LATHROP, Author of "An Echo of Passion."

EDINBURGH: DAVID DOUGLAS.

LONDON: HAMILTON, ADAMS, & CO.; SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, & CO.

NEW NOVELS AT ALL LIBRARIES.

PAUL'S SISTER. By F. M. PEARD, Author

of "The Country Cousin" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

HER OWN COUNSEL. By the Author of

"An Old Man's Favour" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

DIANA. By GEORGIANA M. CRAIK (Mrs. MAY),

Author of "Godfrey Helstone" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

AN IRISH COUSIN. By GEILLES HERRING

and MARTIN ROSS. 2 vols. crown 8vo.

THE SCOTTS of BESTMINSTER. By

J. MASTERMAN, Author of "A Fatal Error" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.

SMITH, ELDER, & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "VICE VERSÂ."

Ready this day, at all the Libraries, 3 vols. post 8vo.

THE PARIAH.

By F. ANSTEY,

Author of "Vice Versâ," "The Giant's Robe," "A Fallen Idol," &c.

NEW EDITION of the POETICAL WORKS

OF

ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.

To be completed in Six Monthly Volumes. Small crown 8vo. 5s. each.

This Edition will be uniform with the recently published Edition of Mr. Robert Browning's Works. It will contain several Portraits of Mrs. Browning at different periods of life, and a few Illustrations.

There will also be a Large-paper Edition of 125 Copies, printed on Hand-made Paper. This Edition will only be supplied through Booksellers.

Volume I. will be published on October 26.

POCKET EDITION OF MRS. GASKELL'S WORKS.

To be completed in Eight Monthly Volumes, bound in cloth, with cut or uncut edges, price 1s. 6d. per vol.

Vol. II., NORTH and SOUTH, will be ready on October 26.

NEW NATURAL HISTORY VOLUME.

On October 26, crown 8vo. 5s.

WOODLAND, MOOR, and STREAM; being the Notes of a Naturalist.

NEW ANONYMOUS NOVEL.

At all the Libraries, in 2 vols. post 8vo.

THE COUNTY: a Story of Social Life.

"One of the most brightly written and clever novels of the year."—Vanity Fair.

"On the whole very entertaining."—Athenæum. "Far above the average."—World.

"Very lively reading, and never drags."—Manchester Examiner and Times.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

Will be published on October 24.

A NEW VOLUME OF THE LOTOS SERIES.

Pott 8vo. uniformly bound in two styles: (1) cloth, gilt back and edges; (2) half-parchment, cloth sides, gilt top, uncut, each 3s. 6d.

Large Paper Edition, numbered, price 12s. 6d. to Subscribers.

With Illustrations and a Portrait of the Author.

THE LIGHT OF ASIA;

Or, the Great Renunciation.

Being the Life and Teaching of Gautama, Prince of India and Founder of Buddhism.

TOLD IN VERSE BY AN INDIAN BUDDHIST.

By Sir EDWIN ARNOLD, M.A., K.C.I.E., C.S.I.

* * * A Prospectus of the previous Volumes of the Lotos Series post free on application.

LONDON: TRÜBNER & CO., LUDGATE HILL.

HURST & BLACKETT'S
NEW NOVELS.

A HARDY NORSEMAN. By EDNA LYALL, Author of "Donovan," "We Two," &c. 3 vols.

MY LORD OTHELLO. By HENRY CRESSWELL, Author of "A Modern Greek Heroine," "A Willy Widow," &c. 3 vols.

GEOFF. By GERTRUDE FORDE, Author of "In the Old Palazzo," "Driven before the Storm," &c. 3 vols.

THE FREAKS of LADY FORTUNE. By MAY CROMMELIN, Author of "Queenie," "Orange Lily," &c. 2 vols.

THE TREE of KNOWLEDGE. By G. M. ROBINS, Author of "Keep my Secret," "A False Position," &c. 3 vols.

BOTH OF THIS PARISH. By ALGERNON GISSING, Author of "Joy Cometh in the Morning." 2 vols.

LONDON: HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED,
13 GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET.

SEELEY & CO. LIMITED.

Shortly.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY. By the Rev. W. J. LOFTIE, Author of "A History of London," "Memorials of the Savoy," "Windsor Castle," &c. With 12 Plates and many Minor Illustrations. Imperial 4to. cloth, 21s.
Large-paper Copies (100 only), £4 4s.
The Plates may now be seen at 48 Essex Street, Strand.

Shortly.

THE GREY RIVER: Impressions of London. By a Painter and Two Novelists: MORTIMER MENPES, JUSTIN MCCARTHY, and Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED. Mr. Menpes contributes twelve Etchings, each one of which is printed by himself. The work will be issued in imperial 4to. and bound in cloth after a design by Mr. Menpes. Each copy will be numbered, and subscribers' names will be entered in the order in which they are received.

Two hundred Copies only will be printed for sale, and 30 for presentation, and the Plates will then be destroyed. The price of each copy will be Five Guineas.

The Etchings may now be seen at the Publishers', 48 Essex Street, Strand.

Shortly.

THE EARLIER ENGLISH WATER-COLOUR PAINTERS. By COSMO MONKHOUSE. With 13 Plates after Turner, Girtin, Bonington, Cotman, De Wint, Sandby, Hearne, Barret, Prout, Cozens, Copley Fielding, Cattermole, and David Cox. Super-royal 8vo. cloth, 21s.

Large-Paper Copies (100 only), price 42s.

Just published.

FANNY BURNEY and HER FRIENDS. Select Passages from her Diary and other Writings. Edited by L. B. SEELEY, late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, Author of "Horace Walpole and his World." With 9 Copper-Plates after Reynolds, Gainsborough, Copley, and West. Cloth, 7s. 6d.
Large Paper Copies (150 only), price 21s.

NEW and CHEAPER EDITION of
OXFORD: Brief Historical and Descriptive Notes. By ANDREW LANG. With many Illustrations, cloth, 6s.

NEW and CHEAPER EDITION of
CAMBRIDGE: Brief Historical and Descriptive Notes. By J. W. CLARKE. With many Illustrations, cloth, 6s.

Shortly.

THE OCEAN of AIR: a Popular Scientific Account of the Atmosphere. By A. GIBERNE, Author of "Sun, Moon, and Stars." With a Preface by Professor PRITCHARD. With 16 Illustrations, cloth, 5s.

Shortly.

THE HAMMER: a Story of the Maccabees. By the Rev. A. J. CHURCH and RICHMOND SEELEY. With Illustrations, cloth, 5s.

In a few days.

LION-HEARTED: the Story of Bishop Hannington, told for Boys and Girls. By the Rev. E. C. DAWSON, M.A. With Illustrations, cloth, 2s. 6d.

A CHEAP EDITION OF
GEORGE MAXWELL GORDON, the Pilgrim Missionary of the Punjab. By the Rev. A. LEWIS, M.A. With Portrait and Illustrations, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"There never was a truer hero of the purest Christian type. His biography is one that ought to be universally read; no one can read it without being the better, and feeling himself mentally the richer."—Scotsman.

Shortly.

UNDER SALISBURY SPIRE: a Tale of the Times of George Herbert. By EMMA MARSHALL. With Illustrations, cloth, 5s.

By the same AUTHOR.

IN COLSTON'S DAYS. 5s.	THE TOWER ON THE CLIFF. 1s.
UNDER THE MENDIPS. 5s.	THE TWO SWORDS. 1s.
IN THE EAST COUNTRY. 5s.	BRISTOL DIAMONDS. 1s.
IN FOUR REIGNS. 5s.	HER SEASON IN BATH. 1s.
&c.	&c.

LONDON: SEELEY & CO., LIMITED, ESSEX STREET, STRAND.

IMPORTANT NEW FINE-ART WORK.

Part I. ready October 24, price 2s. 6d.

THE PICTURESQUE MEDITERRANEAN.

ILLUSTRATED WITH

Magnificent Wood Engravings from Original Drawings.

The leading Artists of the day, including J. MACWHIRTER, A.R.A., JOHN FULLEYLOVE, R.I., WILLIAM SIMPSON, R.I., EDWARD T. COMPTON, CHARLES WYLLIE, W. H. J. BOOT, JOHN O'CONNOR, R.I., and others have visited the Mediterranean specially to prepare drawings for this work, and have obtained a large number of beautiful sketches, which are being reproduced on wood by the principal English and Continental Wood Engravers, and the Publishers have no hesitation in saying that the Illustrations will be found to represent the very highest development which the Art of Wood Engraving has now reached.

The same care which is bestowed on the illustrations will be given to the literary portion. The writers engaged in the preparation of the text include the Rev. Prof. BONNEY, F.R.S., H. D. TRAILL, E. DICEY, GRANT ALLEN, FRANK BARRETT, Miss M. B. EDWARDS, and others, whose knowledge of the regions described, and whose fame in the world of letters, alike render them suitable for the task they have undertaken.

 An Exquisite Reproduction in Colours of an ORIGINAL PAINTING by BIRKET FOSTER, R.W.S., "The Rock of Gibraltar, from Algeciras," will be issued as a Frontispiece to Part I.

An EXHIBITION of THE ORIGINAL DRAWINGS prepared for "THE PICTURESQUE MEDITERRANEAN" will be opened at the Polytechnic Institute, 309 and 311 Regent Street, W., on WEDNESDAY NEXT, the 23rd inst. Admission free on presentation of address card.

CASELL & COMPANY, LIMITED, LUDGATE HILL, LONDON.

Ready October 24, price 1s.

THE MAGAZINE OF ART

For NOVEMBER, forming the First Part of a NEW VOLUME

CONTAINING:

- A BEAUTIFUL PHOTOGRAPHURE OF "THE LAST MUSTER," by Prof. HUBERT HERKOMER, A.R.A. Frontispiece.
- THE NATIONAL GALLERY OF SCOTLAND. By WALTER ARMSTRONG. With 5 Illustrations.
- THE ARTISTIC ASPECT OF LORD MAYORS' SHOWS. By JOSEPH GREGO. With 6 Illustrations.
- "ELIZABETH, COUNTESS GROSVENOR." By Sir THOMAS LAWRENCE, P.R.A. Engraved by R. Berthold.
- WILD WALES. By CHARLES STUART. With 5 Illustrations by the Author.
- ON ART PROFESSORSHIPS. By Professor W. M. CONWAY. With an Engraving by W. E. F. Britten.
- "A MAIDEN OF DREAMS." Poem by ARTHUR L. SALMON. With an Illustration by C. Ricketts.
- THE PHILOSOPHY OF LAUGHTER: A STUDY FOR THE ARTIST. By CHARLES WHIBLEY. With Drawings and Sketches by Fred Barnard.
- THE CHRONICLE OF ART: ART IN OCTOBER.

CASELL & COMPANY, LIMITED, LUDGATE HILL, LONDON.

GRIFFITH, FARRAN, & CO.'S NEW BOOKS

FINE ART GIFT BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

Large quarto, boards, price Five Shillings.

GRANNY'S STORY BOX. By the Author of "Our White Violet" &c. A New Edition, with 100 Illustrations in black and white, and 16 Full Pages in Colour by Mrs. Seymour Lucas.

Large quarto, boards, price Two Shillings and Sixpence.

HOLY GLADNESS. Twelve New and Original Sacred Songs for Children, by EDWARD OXENFORD, with Music by Sir JOHN STAINER, Mus. Doc. With 31 Illustrations in black and white, and 8 Coloured Pages by Henry Ryland.

Large quarto, boards, price Two Shillings and Sixpence.

SING ME A SONG. Twelve New and Original Songs for Children, by EDWARD OXENFORD, with Music by ALFRED SCOTT GATTY, F.S.A. With 31 Illustrations in black and white, and 8 Coloured Pages.

Small quarto, boards, price Three Shillings and Sixpence.

A RING of RHYMES. By E. L. SHUTE. Ninety-six pages, each illustrated in Colour. Ninety-six New Nursery Rhymes.

Small quarto, cloth boards, price Three Shillings and Sixpence.

SOME OTHER PEOPLE. By ALICE WEBER, Author of "When I'm a Man" &c. Illustrated.

Small quarto, cloth, price Three Shillings and Sixpence.

THE CHILD of the CARAVAN. By E. M. GREEN, Author of "Against the Tide" &c. Illustrated by Miss Edith Scannell.

BOOKS FOR BOYS.

BY GEORGE MANVILLE FENN.

THREE BOYS; or, the Chiefs of the Clan Mackhai. Illustrated by Stanley Berkeley. Large crown 8vo. cloth, price Five Shillings.

BY MAJOR-GENERAL A. W. DRAYSON, F.R.A.S.

THE DIAMOND HUNTERS of SOUTH AFRICA. Illustrated by A. W. Cooper. Large crown 8vo. cloth, price Five Shillings.

BY HENRY FRITH.

THE OPAL MOUNTAIN: a Tale of Adventure. Illustrated by H. Schonberg. Large crown 8vo. cloth, price Five Shillings.

BY J. PERCY GROVES.

WITH the GREEN JACKETS; or, the Life and Adventures of a Rifleman. Illustrated by Lieutenant-Colonel Marsman. Large crown 8vo. cloth, price Five Shillings.

EDITED BY E. DAVENPORT.

THE BOY'S OWN POETRY BOOK. This is the only Poetry Book for the exclusive use of Boys. Crown 8vo. 500 pp. cloth, price Three Shillings and Sixpence.

BY HENRY FRITH.

THE CAPTAINS of CADETS: a Story of Rule Britannia. Illustrated by Davidson Knowles. Crown 8vo. cloth, price Two Shillings and Sixpence.

BOOKS FOR GIRLS.

BY ANNE BEALE.

ROSE MERVYN: a Tale of the Rebecca Riots. Illustrated by A. Hitchcock. Large crown 8vo. 334 pp. cloth, price Five Shillings.

BY ALICE WEBER.

AULD LANG SYNE: a Nineteenth-Century Story. Illustrated by Miss Taylor. Large crown 8vo. pp. 334, cloth, price Five Shillings.

BY M. E. BURTON.

ANNABEL. Illustrated by W. S. Burton. Large crown 8vo. 352 pp. cloth, price Five Shillings.

BY MARY E. GELLIE. (M. E. B.)

RUBY'S CHOICE; or, the Brackenhurst Girls. Illustrated by Miss Paterson. Crown 8vo. 320 pp. cloth, price Three Shillings and Sixpence.

BY FRANCES ARMSTRONG.

HER OWN WAY. Illustrated by Annie G. Fenn. Crown 8vo. 288 pp. cloth, price Two Shillings and Sixpence.

BY MRS. MOLESWORTH.

THE OLD PINCUSHION; or, Aunt Clotilda's Guests. Profusely Illustrated by Laura M. Troubridge (Mrs. Hope). Small 4to. cloth, price Six Shillings."One of Mrs. Molesworth's pleasantest stories for children."—Saturday Review.GRIFFITH, FARRAN, OKEDEN, & WELSH, NEWBERY HOUSE, LONDON.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

RUSSIA in CENTRAL ASIA in 1889, and the ANGLO-RUSSIAN QUESTION. By the Hon. GEORGE N. CURZON, M.P., Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford. With Illustrations, Maps, Appendices, and an Index. 1 vol. 8vo. 21s."This is a volume of great and varied interest.....Without being an extreme partisan, Mr. Curzon has enunciated clear views worthy of the consideration of English statesmen on the many questions that present themselves in connexion with the position of affairs in Central Asia.....The book will, of course, be read by every one desirous of keeping himself abreast of a topic which is repeatedly undergoing change and which attracts daily increasing attention."—Times.The BLUE FAIRY BOOK. Edited by ANDREW LANG. With 8 Full-page Plates and 130 Illustrations in the Text by H. J. Ford and G. P. Jacob Hood. Crown 8vo. 6s. gilt edges.NEW BOOK BY THE AUTHOR OF "SUPERNATURAL RELIGION."
A REPLY to DR. LIGHTFOOT'S ESSAYS. By the Author of "Supernatural Religion." 1 vol. 8vo. 6s.SUPERNATURAL RELIGION: an Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. 3 vols. 8vo. 36s.WATTS' DICTIONARY of CHEMISTRY.

Revised and entirely Rewritten, by H. FORSTER MORLEY, M.A., D.Sc., and M. M. PATTISON MUIR, M.A., F.R.S.E., assisted by Eminent Contributors. (To be published in 4 vols.) 8vo. Vols. I. and II. Two GUINEAS each.

HANDBOOK of COMMERCIAL GEOGRAPHY.By G. G. CHISHOLM, M.A., B.Sc. With 29 Maps. 8vo. 16s.
"A most excellent work.....Complete, well arranged, a perfect storehouse of information, illustrated with a large number of maps, and very well printed and got up.....Mr. Chisholm's 'Handbook' is a decided success, and will probably remain for some time the standard English work on commercial or economic geography."—Manchester Guardian.OUTLINES of the LIFE of SHAKESPEARE.

By J. O. HALLIWELL-PHILLIPPS, F.R.S. Eighth Edition. With numerous Illustrations and Facsimiles. 2 vols. Royal 8vo. 21s.

B.C. 1887: A Ramble in British Columbia.

By J. A. LEES and W. J. CLUTTERBUCK, Authors of "Three in Norway." With Map and 75 Illustrations from Sketches and Photographs by the Authors. New and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

HISTORICAL REVIEW of the LEGISLATIVE SYSTEMS OPERATIVE in IRELAND, from the Invasion of Henry the Second to the Union (1172-1800). By the Right Hon. J. T. BALL, LL.D. D.C.L. New Edition, Revised throughout and Enlarged. 8vo. 6s.EAST COAST DAYS and MEMORIES. By the Author of "Recreations of a Country Parson." Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

NEW NOVELS.

WILD DARRIE: a Story. By CHRISTIE MURRAYand HENRY HERMAN. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.
"Will be heartily welcomed by every one who can appreciate good, wholesome fiction.....The heroine is finely drawn. There is nothing mawkish in the sentiment that surrounds her; on the contrary, there is a fine, healthy, manly tone in the book from first to last."—Scotsman.SUCH IS LIFE: a Novel. By MAY KENDALL.Author of "From a Garret" and "Dreams to Sell"; Joint Author of "That Very Mab." 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.
"Such is Life' is a work of art.....It is better than a good novel—it is a book to be grateful for, on the moral even more than on the literary side."—Academy.The TANGENA TREE: a True Story from Madagascar. By AGNES MARION. Fcp. 8vo. sewed, 1s.The ENGLISH HISTORICAL REVIEW.

Edited by the Rev. MANDELL CREIGHTON, M.A. LL.D.

No. 16, OCTOBER. Royal 8vo. price 5s.

1. Articles.

CONTENTS:

- THE EARLY HISTORY OF CHARTISM, 1836-1839. By E. C. K. GONNER.
THE POLISH INTERREGNUM, 1575. By R. NISBET BAIN.
THE RELIGIOUS WRITINGS OF SIR THOMAS MORE. By the Rev. W. H. HUTTON.
THE PATRICIATE OF PIPPIN. By EDWARD A. FREEMAN, D.C.L.
THE EARLY CONNEXION OF THE ISLE OF MAN WITH IRELAND. By A. W. MOORE.

2. Notes and Documents—

- Gesiths and Thegus: by A. G. Little—The Jesuits and Benedictines in England, 1602-1608: by T. G. Law—The Plunket Manuscript (continued): by Miss Mary Hickson—Jenkins's Ear: by Professor J. K. Laughton—A Letter of Lord Chesterfield on the Change of Ministry in 1746: Edited by John Robinson.

3. Reviews of Books—

4. List of Historical Books recently published—5. Contents of Periodical Publications.

The EDINBURGH REVIEW, No. 348.

CONTENTS:

1. OXFORD AND ITS PROFESSORS.
2. THE CONQUEST OF ALGERIA.
3. THE ORIGIN OF INTELLECT.
4. EAST AFRICA.
5. FARRAR'S LIVES OF THE FATHERS.
6. THE PRINCES OF THE HOUSE OF CONDÉ.
7. RECENT DISCOVERIES IN ROME.
8. THE INTERNAL ECONOMY OF RUSSIA.
9. MAITLAND OF LETHINGTON AND MARY STUART.
10. LOCAL GOVERNMENT, HOME RULE, AND NEW LIBERALISM.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO.

MESSRS. WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS' NEW PUBLICATIONS.

DEDICATED TO H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES.

On Thursday, October 24, will be published.

HINDU-KOH: Wanderings and Wild Sport
on and beyond the Himalayas. By Major-General DONALD MACINTYRE, V.C., late Prince of Wales' Own Goorkhas; Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society. 8vo. With numerous Illustrations, 21s.

On Thursday, October 24, will be published.

SCENES from a SILENT WORLD; or,
Prisons and their Inmates. By FRANCIS SCOU GAL. Crown 8vo. 6s.

Next week will be published.

DODO and I. A Novel. By Captain ANDREW HAGGARD. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

Shortly will be published.

A THOUSAND MILES on an ELEPHANT in the SHAN STATES. By HOLT S. HALLETT, M. Inst. C.E., F.R.G.S., M.R.A.S., Honorary Member Manchester and Tyneside Geographical Societies. 1 vol. 8vo. with Maps and numerous Illustrations.

Immediately will be published.

ART in SCOTLAND: its Origin and Progress.
By ROBERT BRYDALL, Master of the St. George's Art School of Glasgow. 1 vol. 8vo.

This day is published.

SORDELLO: an Outline Analysis of Mr.
Browning's Poem. By JEANIE MORISON, Author of "The Purpose of the Ages," "Ane Book of Ballads," &c. Crown 8vo. 3s.

Immediately will be published, Vol. III.

HISTORY of the CATHOLIC CHURCH of SCOTLAND. From the Introduction of Christianity to the Present Day. By ALPHONS BELLESHEIM, D.D., Canon of Aix-la-Chapelle. Translated, with Notes and Additions, by D. OSWALD HUNTER BLAIR, O.S.B., Monk of Fort Augustus. With a Map.

At all Libraries.

BARBARA ALLAN, the Provost's Daughter.
By ROBERT CLELAND, Author of "Inchbracken," "True to a Type," "A Rich Man's Relatives." 2 vols. crown 8vo. 17s.

Third Edition.

THOTH. A Romance. With New Preface and Appendix. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.

"'Thoth' is so good—and so short—that it might conceivably have been the Book of the Season.....The central and vivifying idea is, to us, absolutely novel."
Saturday Review.

"'Thoth' has imagination, delicacy, and finish."—Athenæum.
"A weird and mysterious romance manifesting unusual literary skill and displaying no small amount of imagination."—Academy.

Second Edition.

A DREAMER of DREAMS: a Modern
Romance. By the Author of "Thoth." Crown 8vo. 6s.

"Comes very near to being a tremendous feat of fancy."—Athenæum.
"Unmistakably delightful.....The wit and philosophy and poetry of the book are no less striking than the grace and charm of the author's style."
St. James's Gazette.

A VISIT TO

STANLEY'S REAR-GUARD at MAJOR
BARTELOT'S CAMP on the ARUHWIMI. With an Account of River-Life on the Congo. By J. R. WERNER, F.R.G.S., Engineer, late in the Service of the État Indépendant du Congo. With Maps, Portraits, and other Illustrations. 8vo. 16s.

"Mr. Werner's account is, in fact, excellent, full of graphic pictures and shrewd remarks on man and his surroundings, and revealing at every page a spirit of generous sympathy for the teeming populations."—Academy.

"Deeply interesting, however, is his description of the camp, his account of the treachery which surrounded the gallant commander, and his bold vindication of Major Bartelot's conduct in the impossibly difficult circumstances in which he was placed."—Morning Post.

"A trustworthy contribution to a knowledge of affairs on the Congo."—Times.

SCOTTISH SONG; its Wealth, Wisdom, and Social Significance. By JOHN STUART BLACKIE, Emeritus Professor of Greek in the University of Edinburgh, Author of "Lays and Legends of Ancient Greece" &c. Crown 8vo. With MUSIC. 7s. 6d.

"A charming book, as useful as it is charming, and one which every lover of letters will sincerely welcome."—Echo.

"A most original and suggestive work.....The very best book on the subject yet published."—North British Daily Mail.

"The work is thoroughly and altogether admirably done."—Manchester Examiner.

"A pleasant, wholesome book.....full of shrewd and just observations."—World.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

CHARLES KNIGHT'S POPULAR HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

The Publishers have the pleasure to announce that they have now become sole proprietors of this important Copyright and Standard History of England.

It is their intention to immediately issue

A NEW EDITION IN NINE VOLUMES.

Price £3 3s. cloth extra.

Its contents embrace the History from the Earliest Times to the Year 1848 by CHARLES KNIGHT, with a Continuation to the Year 1878 by PHILIP SMITH, M.A.

The whole fully illustrated with upwards of 1,000 Woodcuts and Steel Plates.

PROSPECTUS.

THE POPULAR HISTORY OF ENGLAND is universally acknowledged to be by far the most elaborate and able of all the Works of the late CHARLES KNIGHT. It differs from all other Standard Histories of England, which are made up of bulky continuations by different hands. It is compendious yet full. It is written on an uniform and original plan. It illustrates Society as well as government. It is, emphatically, a History of the People.

Combining great industry in collecting facts with a sound judgment in sifting, arranging, and using them; a rich imagination enabling him to present these facts with attractive picturesqueness; and a sage philosophy to deduce from them valuable political, social, and moral teachings, CHARLES KNIGHT was admitted to have possessed in harmonious proportions all the requisites of a perfect historian.

This History, therefore, is something more than a Series of Annals of Policy or War; describing among other matters—

1. The Development and Settlement of Constitutional Liberty.
2. The Discoveries of Science; the Refinements of Art and Literature; the Improvements of Social Institutions; Domestic Architecture, &c.
3. The Progress of Industry and Commerce from Age to Age or Year to Year.
4. English Domestic Life as distinct from the History of the English State.

In treating of these matters it is shown that advances therein have resulted from growth; are not of creation; and are in essential connexions as links of the same chain. The chapters in which these various aspects of Society are described follow the Chapters on the Political History of the State at suitable and distinctly marked points. The Work of Mr. CHARLES KNIGHT is animated throughout by a Liberal and English spirit, combined with great fairness of statement. The Continuation by Mr. PHILIP SMITH is written on the same principle and imbued with the same sentiments. A copious Index accompanies each separate History.

The Work is illustrated with upwards of One Thousand Engravings on Wood and a Series of Portraits engraved on Steel in the highest style of art. The Wood Engravings are real Illustrations of the Text, from rare and original sources. They represent Localities, Monumental Remains, Costumes, Works of Industry and Art, Popular Amusements, &c. The Portraits are of Sovereigns and persons remarkable in Civil, Military, Ecclesiastical, and Literary matters at all stages of English History.

AN ÉDITION DE LUXE OF GAY'S "FABLES."

Fcp. 4to. half-calf, gilt top, 10s. 6d.

THE FABLES of JOHN GAY. With Biographical and Critical Introduction, and Bibliographical Appendix. Edited by W. H. KEARLEY WRIGHT, F.R.Hist.Soc. Illustrated with 126 Drawings by William Harvey.

This Edition is limited to 250 Copies, 100 of which have been sold to America.

WARNE'S PRESENTATION SERIES—NEW VOLUME.

Demy 8vo. cloth gilt, bevelled boards, 7s. 6d. each.

THE OLD, OLD FAIRY TALES. Collected and Edited by Mrs. VALENTINE. With 16 New Coloured Plates by Alfred Johnson, and numerous Illustrations.

This is a collection of fairy tales other than those occurring in Grimm, Andersen, and "The Arabian Nights."

VICTORIA GIFT BOOK—NEW VOLUME.

Large crown 8vo. cloth gilt, 5s.

JACK TREVOR, R.N. By ARTHUR LEE KNIGHT, Author of "Ronald Halifax," "The Cruise of the Theseus," &c. With 8 Original Illustrations by W. S. Stacey.

NEW VOLUME IN THE "BOY'S ENTERPRISE LIBRARY."

Crown 8vo. cloth gilt, bevelled boards, 3s. 6d.

SCOUTS' HEAD; or, St. Nectan's Bell: a Tale of the Wild Welsh Coast. By the Rev. FREDERICK LANGBRIDGE, M.A., Author of "Nil Desperandum" &c. With Original Illustrations.

NEW VOLUME IN THE CAVENDISH LIBRARY.

Large crown 8vo. cloth, uncut, 3s. 6d.

WILLIAM HAZLITT, ESSAYIST and CRITIC.
Selections from his Writings, with a Memoir, Biographical and Critical. By ALEXANDER IRELAND, Author of "The Book-Lover's Enchiridion," "Memoir of Emerson," &c. With Steel Portrait.

"Every one who loves noble literature, every one who gladdens when a measure of justice, however tardily and imperfectly meted, is done to the memory of a gifted and neglected writer, every one who desires that a lofty standard should be upheld for critics of the day to follow so far as in them lies—all such would feel grateful to Mr. Alexander Ireland for his volume of selections from the Works of William Hazlitt."—Scots Observer.

Crown 8vo. cloth gilt, gilt top, 18s.

ABBEYS, CASTLES, and ANCIENT HALLS of ENGLAND AND WALES; their Legendary Lore and Popular History. By JOHN TIMBS and ALEXANDER GUNN. With 12 Page Photographic Views. 3 vols.

FREDERICK WARNE & CO., LONDON AND NEW YORK.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS.

NEW AND FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

THE COLLECTED PAPERS of HENRY BRADSHAW, including his Memoranda and Communications read before the Cambridge Antiquarian Society. With 13 Facsimiles. Edited by F. J. H. JENKINSON, M.A., Fellow of Trinity College. Demy 8vo. 16s.

THE LITERARY REMAINS of ALBRECHT DÜRER. By W. M. CONWAY. With Transcripts from the British Museum MSS., and Notes by LINA ECKENSTEIN. Royal 8vo. with Illustrations. [Nearly ready.]

DANTE.—DIVINA COMMEDIA. CONTRIBUCTIONS to the TEXTUAL CRITICISM of the DIVINA COMMEDIA, including the complete Collation throughout the "Inferno" of all the MSS. at Oxford and Cambridge. By the Rev. EDWARD MOORE, D.D., Principal of St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, and Barlow Lecturer on Dante in the University of London. Demy 8vo. 21s.

ELEMENTS of the LAW of TORTS: a Text-Book for Students. By MELVILLE M. BIGELOW, Ph.D., Lecturer in the Law School of the University of Boston, U.S.A. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION. By J. E. C. MUNRO, LL.M., Professor of Law and Political Economy at Victoria University, Manchester. Demy 8vo. 10s.

SOPHOCLES.—The PLAYS and FRAGMENTS. With Critical Notes, Commentary, and Translation in English Prose, by R. C. JEBB, Litt.D., LL.D., Regius Professor of Greek in the University of Cambridge.

Part I.—OEDIPUS TYRANNUS. New Edition. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d.

Part II.—OEDIPUS COLONEUS. Second Edition. Demy 8vo.

[Nearly ready.]

Part III.—ANTIGONE. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d.

Part IV.—PHILOCTETES. Demy 8vo.

[In the press.]

THE OLD TESTAMENT in GREEK, according to the SEPTUAGINT. Edited by H. B. SWETE, D.D., Honorary Fellow of Gonville and Caius College. Vol. I.—GENESIS—IV. KINGS. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. [Vol. II. in the press.]

THE BOOK of PSALMS in GREEK, according to the SEPTUAGINT. Edited by H. B. SWETE, D.D., Honorary Fellow of Gonville and Caius College. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

CATALOGUE of SCIENTIFIC PAPERS COMPILED by the ROYAL SOCIETY of LONDON. Vols. I. to VIII., containing the Catalogue of Papers for the Years 1800-1873, will in Future be Published at the Cambridge University Press Warehouse. Demy 4to. Vols. I.-VI., for the Years 1800-1863, royal 4to, cloth (Vol. I. in half-morocco) £4 net; half-morocco, £5 5s. net. Vols. VII.-VIII., for the Years 1864-1873, cloth, £1 11s. 6d. net; half-morocco, £2 5s. net; Single Volumes, cloth, 20s.; or half-morocco, 28s. net. A New Series for the Years 1874-1883 is now in the press.

THE CAMBRIDGE BIBLE FOR SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES.

General Editor: J. J. S. PEROWNE, D.D., Dean of Peterborough.

"It is difficult to commend too highly this excellent series."—Guardian.

Lists on application.

NEW VOLUMES.

THE EPISTLES to the EPHESIANS and PHILIPPIANS. By Rev. H. C. G. MOULE, M.A. 2s. 6d. each.

A HISTORY of the STUDY of MATHEMATICS at CAMBRIDGE. By W. W. ROUSE BALL, M.A., Fellow and Lecturer on Mathematics of Trinity College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo. 6s.

A TREATISE on ELEMENTARY DYNAMICS. By S. L. LONEY, M.A., Fellow of Sidney Sussex College. Cr. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

A TREATISE on PLANE TRIGONOMETRY. By E. W. HOBSON, M.A., Fellow and Lecturer of Christ College, Cambridge. Demy 8vo. [In the press.]

A TREATISE on ANALYTICAL STATICS. By E. J. ROUTH, Sc.D., F.R.S., Fellow of the University of London, Honorary Fellow of St. Peter's College, Cambridge. [In the press.]

PITT PRESS MATHEMATICAL SERIES.

EUCLID'S ELEMENTS of GEOMETRY. Books I. and II. With Notes and Exercises. Edited by H. M. TAYLOR, M.A., Fellow and formerly Tutor of Trinity College, Cambridge. 1s. 6d. [Nearly ready.]

NEW VOLUMES OF THE PITT PRESS SERIES.

PLATO.—EUTHYPHRO. With Introduction and Notes. By J. ADAM, M.A., Fellow and Classical Lecturer of Emmanuel College. [In the press.]

EURIPIDES.—IPHIGENEIA in AULIS. By C. E. S. HEADLAM, B.A., Fellow of Trinity Hall. [In the press.]

PLUTARCH.—LIFE of TIMOLEON. With Introduction, Notes, and Lexicon. By Rev. HUBERT A. HOLDEN, M.A., LL.D. 6s.

LIVY.—Book IV. With Introduction and Notes. By H. M. STEPHENSON, M.A. [In the press.]

VERGIL.—The COMPLETE WORKS. Edited, with Notes, by A. SIDGWICK, M.A. 2 vols. Vol. I. containing the Text. Vol. II., the Notes. [Nearly ready.]

MOLIÈRE—Les PRÉCIEUSES RIDICULES. With Introduction and Notes by E. G. W. BRAUNHOLTZ, M.A., Ph.D., University Lecturer in French. [In the press.]

BRITISH INDIA, a SHORT HISTORY of. (Uniform with Dr. Mill's "Elementary Commercial Geography.") By Rev. E. S. CARLOS, M.A., late Head-Master of Exeter Grammar School. With a Map. [Nearly ready.]

THE CAMBRIDGE GREEK TESTAMENT FOR SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES.

With a Revised Text, based on the most recent Critical Authorities, and English Notes, prepared under the direction of the General Editor, J. J. S. PEROWNE, D.D., Dean of Peterborough.

"Has achieved an excellence which puts it above criticism."—Expositor.

NEW VOLUME.

THE EPISTLE to the HEBREWS. By Archdeacon FARRAR. 3s. 6d.

THE SMALLER CAMBRIDGE BIBLE FOR SCHOOLS.

The Smaller Cambridge Bible for Schools will form an entirely new Series of Commentaries on some selected Books of the Bible. It is expected that they will be prepared for the most part by the Editors of the larger Series (The Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges). The volumes will be issued at a low price, and will be suitable to the requirements of preparatory and elementary schools. The first volumes of the Series will be ready for publication before the end of the present year.

Preparing.

THE FIRST and SECOND BOOKS of SAMUEL. By the Rev. Professor KIRKPATRICK, D.D.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING to ST. MATTHEW. By the Rev. A. CARR, M.A.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING to ST. MARK. By the Rev. G. F. MACLEAR, D.D.

RECENT VOLUMES OF THE PITT PRESS SERIES.

PLATONIS APOLOGIA SOCRATIS. With Introduction, Notes, and Appendices. By J. ADAM, M.A. 3s. 6d.

PLATONIS CRITO. With Introduction, Notes, and Appendix. By the same Editor. 2s. 6d.

THE ODYSSEY of HOMER. Books IX. & X. With Introduction, Notes, and Appendices. By G. M. EDWARDS, M.A. 2s. 6d. each.

HERODOTUS. Book VI. Edited, with Notes, Introduction, and Maps. By E. S. SHUCKBURGH, M.A. 3s. Books VIII. and IX. 3s. 6d. each.

THE HIPPOLYTUS of EURIPIDES. With Notes and Introduction. By W. S. HADLEY, M.A. 2s.

LIVY. Books XXI. & XXII. With Notes, Introduction, and Maps. By M. S. DIMSDALE, M.A. 2s. 6d. each.

HORACE.—EPISTLES. Book I. With Notes and Introduction. By E. S. SHUCKBURGH, M.A. 2s. 6d.

P. VERGILI MARONIS AENEIDOS. With Notes and Introduction. Libri I.—XII. By A. SIDGWICK, M.A. Each 1s. 6d.

P. VERGILI MARONIS GEORGICON. With Notes and Introduction. By the same Editor. Libri I., II., 2s.—Libri III., IV., 2s.

P. VERGILI MARONIS BUCOLICA. With Notes and Introduction. By the same Editor. 1s. 6d.

L'ÉCOLE des FEMMES.—MOLIÈRE. With Introduction and Notes. By GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M.A. 2s. 6d.

HAUFF.—DAS BILD des KAISERS. With Notes and Introduction. By KARL HERMANN BREUL, M.A., Ph.D. 3s.

Complete Catalogues on application.

London: C. J. CLAY & SONS, CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE, Ave Maria Lane.
GLASGOW: 263 Argyle Street.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW NOVELS.

BY BRET HARTE.
THE HERITAGE of DEDLOW MARSH ;
and other Tales. By BRET HARTE, Author of "Cressy." 2 vols. Globe 8vo. 12s.

BY F. MARION CRAWFORD.
SANT' ILARIO. By F. MARION CRAWFORD,
Author of "With the Immortals," "Greifenstein," "Paul Patoff," "Mr. Isaacs," "Dr. Claudius," "Marzio's Crucifix," &c. 3 vols. Crown 8vo. price 31s. 6d.

The Spectator says:—"Mr. Crawford is a first-rate story-teller, and 'Sant' Ilario' is likely to be quite as popular as any of his books. . . . It has a cleverness and power of its own; there is much varied interest in the story, and it is no doubt a faithful picture of a curious and interesting time in the most interesting city of the world—that old Rome which has passed away for ever."

BY W. CLARK RUSSELL.
MAROOINED. By W. CLARK RUSSELL,
Author of "The Wreck of the Grosvenor" &c. 3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.
The Academy says:—" 'Marooned' is a story full of incident and interest. It is written in good stirring English. The scenes at sea are as vivid and realistic as such scenes always are in Mr. Clark Russell's books."
The Observer says:—"It is a rattling tale of sea adventure."

BY CHARLOTTE M. YONGE.
A REPUTED CHANGELING ; or, Three
Seventh Years Two Centuries Ago. By CHARLOTTE M. YONGE. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 12s.
The Scotsman says:—"The working out of the dramatic incidents is as skilful as the portraiture of character. The story will charm the dullest reader, and its literary excellence will satisfy the most cultured and fastidious critic."

TWELVE ENGLISH STATESMEN.—New Volume.
WALPOLE. By JOHN MORLEY. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.
[Just ready.]

ENGLISH MEN OF ACTION.—New Volume.
STRAFFORD. By H. D. TRAILL. With Portrait.
Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. [Next week.]

A NEW BOOK BY MRS. HENRY FAWCETT.
SOME EMINENT WOMEN of OUR TIMES. Short Biographical Sketches. By Mrs. HENRY FAWCETT. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

NEW EDITION. WITH AN ESSAY ON THE POSITION AND PROSPECTS OF POETRY.
THE HUMAN TRAGEDY. By ALFRED AUSTIN, Author of "Savonarola," "Soliloquies in Song," "At the Gate of the Convent," "Prince Lucifer," "Love's Widowhood," and other Poems, &c. A New Edition, with a Prefatory Essay on the Position and Prospects of Poetry. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. [Ready October 25.]

NEW ILLUSTRATED BOOKS.

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY MR. JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.
WALTON and COTTON'S COMPLETE ANGLER. With an Introduction by JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL. Illustrated with 74 fine Woodcuts, 17 Plates, and some Etchings, 8vo. £2 12s. 6d. nett.
* Also a limited Edition, on Large Paper, the Proofs on Japanese Paper. £3 13s. 6d. nett.

NEW VOLUME OF MR. FARREN'S "CATHEDRAL CITIES."
CATHEDRAL CITIES.—PETERBOROUGH. With the Abbeys of Crowland and Thorney. 23 Plates Drawn and Etched by ROBERT FARREN. With an Introduction by EDMUND VENABLES, M.A., Precentor of Lincoln. Colombier 4to. handsomely bound in cloth, £2 2s. nett; Proofs, folio, half-Roxburgh, £5 5s. nett. The Edition is limited to 125 Small Paper and 45 Large.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.
CATHEDRAL CITIES.—ELY and NORWICH. Drawn and Etched by ROBERT FARREN. With an Introduction by Professor EDWARD A. FREEMAN, D.C.L. 100 Proofs folio on Japanese paper, half-bound, £6 6s.; 300 copies Colombier 4to. on Dutch paper, £3 3s.
"Mr. Freeman's competence for his own part of the matter needs no comment. Mr. Farren has executed his thirty-five plates with immense care and with great success,"
"We trust that, as the title of this book suggests, it is intended to illustrate the other English cathedrals in a similar manner."—Athenæum. Saturday Review.

A NEW BOOK BY THE AUTHOR OF "FO'C'S'LE YARNS."
THE MANX WITCH ; and other Poems.
By T. E. BROWN, Author of "Betsy Lee," "Fo'e's'le Yarns," &c. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

UNIFORM EDITION OF
THE WORKS OF THOMAS HUGHES.
Crown 8vo. with Illustrations, price 3s. 6d. each. In Monthly Volumes.
Volume I. October 1.
TOM BROWN'S SCHOOL DAYS. [Ready.] THE SCOURING OF THE WHITE HORSE, and TOM BROWN AT OXFORD. [Next week.] THE ASHEN FAGGOT. [Dec.]

UNIFORM EDITION OF
THE NOVELS OF F. MARION CRAWFORD.
Crown 8vo. price 3s. 6d. each. In Monthly Volumes. Volume I. October 1.
MR. ISAACS. [Ready.] A TALE OF A LONELY PARISH. [March.]
DR. CLAUDIUS. [Next week.]
A ROMAN SINGER. [Dec.] PAUL PATOFF. [April.]
ZOROASTER. [Jan.] WITH THE IMMORTALS. [May.]
MARZIO'S CRUCIFIX. [Feb.] GREIFENSTEIN. [June.]

A Sixpenny Edition of
CHARLES KINGSLEY'S NOVELS.
Medium 8vo. 6d. each. In Monthly Volumes. Volume I. October 1.
WESTWARD HO! [Ready.] ALTON LOCKE. [1890, Jan.]
HYPATIA. [Next week.] TWO YEARS AGO. [Feb.]
YEAST. [Dec.] HEReward THE WAKE. [Mar.]

Now ready, with nearly 500 Pictures.
THE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE, 1889.

A Volume of 900 pages, with nearly 500 Illustrations, price 8s.
The Volume contains a Complete Novel,
SANT' ILARIO. By F. MARION CRAWFORD.
And numerous short Stories, Poems, and Essays by well-known Writers, with Illustrations by Eminent Artists.
The Spectator says:—"The volume for the year ending this month of September shows no falling off either in the literary matter or the illustrations, which are the specialty of the periodical."
The Athenæum says:—"The 'English Illustrated Magazine,' 1888-9, is an excellent bargain."
The Scotsman says:—"The publication maintains the high excellence by which it has been marked from the first. . . . As for the illustrations, they are countless in number and wonderfully good in execution. A jaded reader may turn the pages over idly and not be bored, while a reader who 'means business' will find it under his hand. No better book could be suggested for a summer holiday or a winter retreat."
The Saturday Review says:—"The volume of the 'English Illustrated Magazine' is an attractive gift-book. . . . It is a bright and varied volume, which is by no means common to magazine literature."

THE SCIENTIFIC PAPERS of ASA GRAY
Selected by CHARLES SPRAGUE SARGENT. 2 vols. Demy 8vo. 21s.
Vol. I. Reviews of Works on Botany and Related Subjects, 1834-1887.
Vol. II. Essays: Biographical Sketches, 1841-1886.

ELEMENTS of the ART of WAR. Prepared for the Use of Cadets of the United States Military Academy. By JAMES MERCUR, Professor of Civil Engineering at the United States Academy, West Point, New York. Second Edition, Revised and Corrected. 8vo. 17s.

STEAM ENGINE DESIGN. For the Use of Mechanical Engineers, Students, and Draughtsmen. By Professor J. M. WITHAM. With 210 Illustrations. 8vo. 24s.

THERMODYNAMICS of the STEAM ENGINE and other HEAT-ENGINES. By CECIL H. PEABODY, Associate Professor of Steam Engineering, Massachusetts Institute of Technology. 8vo. 21s.

MACMILLAN'S ELEMENTARY CLASSICS.—NEW VOLUME.
VIRGIL.—ÆNEID VII. Edited, with Notes and Vocabulary, by the Rev. ARTHUR CALVERT, M.A. 18mo. 1s. 6d.

A New Volume of
THE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE
Began with the OCTOBER Number. Several new changes have been introduced, a Prospectus giving full details may be obtained from any Bookseller. The Magazine is now printed on thicker paper, a new and bolder type being used.

The St. James's Gazette says:—"Altogether the magazine in its new guise more than sustains its old reputation."
The Western Daily News says:—"The alterations are decided improvements."
The Graphic says:—"The changes made are certainly vast improvements, and must enhance the high reputation that the magazine enjoys among the sixpennies."

THE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE

For NOVEMBER. Profusely Illustrated, price 6d.; by post, 8d., contains:—
1. ST. HELENA'S VISION OF THE INVENTION OF THE CROSS. From the Picture by PAOLO VERONESE.
2. THE SEVEN SLEEPERS OF EPHEBUS. LEWIS MORRIS.
3. MARGARET OF SCOTLAND. Mrs. OLIPHANT. Illustrated by George Reid, R.S.A.
4. MY JOURNEY TO TEXAS. ARTHUR PATERSON.
5. THE DOCKER'S STORY. BENJAMIN TILLET.
6. CRACOW. ADAM GIELGUD. Illustrated by S. Witkiewicz.
7. HOW HAPPY COULD I BE WITH EITHER. JOHN GAY. Illustrated by Hugh Thomson.
8. BOMBAY. WALTER FREWEN LORD.
9. ST. MICHAEL'S. Prof. T. E. THORPE. Illustrated by Mrs. J. Branson.
10. THE RING OF AMASIS. A Romance. Chaps. III. and IV. The EARL OF LYTON.
11. NOVEMBER. A Decorated Page. HEYWOOD SUMNER.

MACMILLAN & CO., BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

Printed by SPOTTISWOODE & CO., at No. 5 New-street Square, in the Parish of St. Bride, in the City of London, and Published by WILLIAM FOYCE, at the Office, No. 38 Southampton Street, Strand, in the Parish of St. Paul, Covent Garden, in the County of Middlesex.—Saturday, October 19, 1889.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW
OF
POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,774, Vol. 68.

October 26, 1889.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

AN UN-MANIFEST MANIFESTO.

IT is always rather rash to speak for others, but impartial and careful observers may perhaps be permitted to discover not a little disappointment in the Gladstonian mind over the suddenly-arranged and much-discussed oration at Southport. For some days the paragraph-mongers and the writers of "notes" had been furiously busy over the goings and comings at Hawarden, and over the hasty resolve to deliver a great speech last Wednesday. It was more than whispered that, if not an elaborate revelation, at least significant hints of new departures in Gladstonian policy, would be given. Mr. GLADSTONE was to frame an anathema on the wicked Government and an indictment of its crimes which would not only seat Sir ROBERT PEEL triumphantly at Brighton, but sweep a Tory member into the vast inane "at" (as one of the finest and least hackneyed of Jacobite songs has it) "every whiff of his tartan plaidie." Some very sanguine or very credulous souls even whispered that that new Home Rule scheme for which Mr. GLADSTONE has been so politely, so unwearingly, and unsuccessfully asked would make its appearance. Alas for the vanity of human expectations! All the mysterious doings, as of a kind of Catilinarian conspiracy (which communicated to the frames of a certain class of newspaper reader a delicious horror as they read how Lord This had driven from Chester, and Mr. That had walked from somewhere else), all the precautions of stage caballing which had been observed, led up to a very ordinary platform speech, with rather more of the usual Gladstonian ambages, and rather less of the usual Gladstonian fire, without a hint of new programmes or new departures, without (is it necessary to say it?) what Mr. GLADSTONE might himself call the ghost of a scintilla of a suspicion of any new Home Rule "plan"—a speech in whose Gladstonian commentaries it is surely not fancy which makes us detect a disappointed turning to the sound and fury even of Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT himself.

Such disappointment is certainly warrantable enough. Mr. GLADSTONE may not be quite "the ruler of the world," as some enthusiastic Southporter called him; indeed, we had thought that that position was otherwise and already filled. But he is the most important person on one political side in England. And the most important person on one political side in England does not usually break the arranged order of political events to deliver a "first-class" speech (especially after heralding the sudden resolve with mysterious conciliabules and conferences) without some special purpose. The special purpose in the Southport speech can only be found by supposing that some system of passwords was arranged in the dead of night at Hawarden, and that apparently trivial platitudes about the control of the police, and the wickedness of the Turks, and the secret of cohesion among Irishmen, have, on some cryptographic or cryptolalic system, a quite different meaning. In that case we must leave it to the political Mr. DONNELLYS to piece together the scattered keywords, and elaborate the hidden significance. On the face of it the ruler of the world can hardly be said to have delivered a very intelligible allocution to his subjects. It is noticeable, no doubt, that even Mr. GLADSTONE, while availing himself of all his sleight of tongue to make censures of the conduct of the Turks thirteen years ago sound as if they were descriptions of the conduct of the Turks now, gives only the most cautious and gingerly sanction to the reports of Cretan outrages, and distinguishes (in a manner which would do him some credit if we could suppose that he wished to draw his audience's attention to the distinction instead of to make a political "pass") between Cretan "reports" and Armenian "evidence." When he came to criticism of the Government, he seemed to be surprisingly out of pocket. The Jubilee coinage is, it seems, ugly, and apparently it requires no argument to prove that, if Mr. GLADSTONE had been in power, it would have been beautiful. The Government has not passed all the measures indicated in the QUEEN'S Speech; and it is notorious that Mr. GLADSTONE'S Governments have invariably carried through everything proposed in that elastic and sanguine document. There was a Minister of Agriculture before Mr. CHAPLIN; it is true that Mr. GLADSTONE admits that he was not a Minister of Agriculture, but still, when he had nothing else to do (it was "almost nothing," again admits this wonderful controversialist), he sometimes agriculturally ministered. Such Bills as have been carried, and as are good Bills, were carried by the help of the Gladstonians; such Bills as the Gladstonians did not help to carry, were either not carried or were bad Bills. The Irish Union was associated with "shameful proceedings." Irish combination is "peaceful and "not criminal" combination. If the Southport meeting had been held under Irish circumstances, it would not have been held under English circumstances. "Municipal and Local Government can scarcely be said to exist in Ireland" (this is said when an inhabitant of Southport can hardly open his newspaper without finding some instance where municipal and local governors in Ireland have lavished silly insult on the Government of the country, or refused to do their proper work). And then, with a little of the weary old jangle about the statistics of offences in Ireland and the statistics of votes in England, Mr. GLADSTONE closed a speech in which, for a wonder (or rather for no wonder), even his most frantic partisans have not discovered the greatest speech he ever made, but have, on the contrary, been hard put to it to find any epithets of praise whatever, and still harder put to it to disguise their own disappointment.

We confess to a certain sympathy, or at least a certain condolence, with Mr. GLADSTONE. He has had what seems to his followers an extraordinary, and what is certainly a not inconsiderable, run of luck in the late elections, and it appears to have occurred, either to his own sanguine temperament or to some of his advisers, that it would be well to take it at the flood and make a great speech. He has taken it at the flood, and he has made a speech which, by the tacit confession of his own followers, is not exactly great—indeed, which contains scarcely more matter, and is put with scarcely more force, than the ordinary platform harangues which half a dozen of his followers can produce, and do, as a matter of fact, produce about once a fortnight. There is neither light nor leading in it for his friends, neither dazzlement nor discomfiture for his foes. The electors of Brighton primarily, and the people of England generally, are invited to vote for a Home Rule Bill which is still sealed up; for Disestablishment in Scotland and Wales, if Scotland and Wales wish for it (which puts the question no further than both were put before); for a foreign policy which is only indicated by the reminder that one half-European, half-Asiatic nation did shocking things thirteen years ago; for a home policy which contains little more inspiring than a few amendments to the Local Government and Allotments Acts; for an Irish policy which reduces its intelligible expression to the statements that the Union was very shameful, that boiling-water throwers are very peaceful, that it is disgraceful of policemen to go into a shop, not because they want anything, but to see if they will be refused (the action of inspectors of milk in this country must seem to Mr. GLADSTONE a base mixture of tyranny and fraud); that there is a great deal of sympathy between different classes (except landlords) in Ireland, and that England ought to afford Ireland a "sisterly embrace"—from which we can only suppose that when the Prodigal Son asked for the portion of goods that fell to him Mr. GLADSTONE would have described this as a "filial hug." All this they have had before a hundred times, even the cautious advance of Mr. GLADSTONE's approval of boycotting and the Plan of Campaign being so cautious as to be all but imperceptible. If they find the repetition, with less force and less sweetening of ornament, stimulating, they may be congratulated on their freedom from the usual course of the dram-drinker, political and other; but they can hardly be congratulated on anything else.

THE CENSORSHIP OF MUSIC-HALLS.

THE London County Council has earned for the first time warm approval by the manner in which it discharged last week the most important duty transferred to it from the Middlesex magistrates. So far as the Council as a body is concerned, the praise has been well earned and justly bestowed. The decisions at which the majority—the very considerable majority—of members arrived were in accordance with reason and common sense. As much cannot be said for the recommendations of the Licensing Committee, which had in several instances to be overruled. Lord ROSEBERY, whose consent to be again nominated as Chairman gave almost universal satisfaction, thought it necessary or politic to congratulate Mr. McDUGALL upon his energy and vigour as a self-constituted Inquisitor-General. It should be said in Mr. McDUGALL's favour that in the Council Chamber he conducted himself with decency, and avoided the deplorable example set by Mr. CHARRINGTON. The language repeatedly adopted by the latter Councillor, in reference to the morals of women who frequent music-halls, was not only indecorous, but unmanly and unchristian. Mr. NATHAN ROBINSON's emphatic protest against the cruel and hypocritical policy of hunting from pillar to post every woman suspected of vice is far more in accordance with the principles which Pharisees like Mr. CHARRINGTON profess, and do not follow. While, however, giving credit to Mr. McDUGALL for the comparative self-restraint which he observed, we would venture to point out the utter absurdity of the course which he pursued. Instead of travelling for health or recreation, this gentleman, says Lord ROSEBERY, nobly employed himself in going round from one music-hall to another, accompanied by a pencil and a note-book. It is impossible not to be struck by the similarity of this proceeding to that of another notorious busybody four or five years ago. Fortunately for Mr. McDUGALL and for the public, the County Council are not called upon to grant or withhold licences for the places visited by the inquisitor of 1885. Most people will agree with Lord ROSEBERY in thinking that the ordinary music-hall song, especially when read by Sir CHARLES RUSSELL, is not particularly amusing. But if anybody's morals are capable of being corrupted by it, they must, in the famous phrase of JUNIUS, have reached that maturity of corruption at which the worst examples cease to be contagious. The extreme silliness of these ditties is really distressing. Their impropriety is ridiculously exaggerated.

Whenever the Committee recommended that the structure of a music-hall was unsafe, the Council rightly supported the Committee, and refused the application. The question of ethics was obviously a very different one. Mr. McDUGALL's difficulties in the performance of his task may be imagined. The songs sung at these entertainments are not printed, so that the unhappy man must have been reduced to relying upon his note-book for the jokes and upon his memory for the style. Lord ROSEBERY reminded the Council that the duties cast upon them were quasi-judicial, and ought to be discharged in a judicial spirit. But it is a fundamental rule of judicial procedure, at least in this country, that a judge cannot be a witness in a cause tried before himself. The business of the Licensing Committee is to take evidence, not to make it. They did communicate with the police, through Mr. MONRO, and the police reported that there was no ground of complaint against any of the institutions for which renewed licences were sought. Of course the Committee were not bound, though they would perhaps have done well, to be satisfied with this negative result. They might fairly enough have given a hearing to any respectable person who could prove any gross violation of decorum. But, if the Council encourage or tolerate the efforts of any "representative" PAUL PRY who may have a fancy for what Scotch lawyers call "vicious intromission," they will bring themselves into general disrepute, and a clean sweep will be made of them two years hence. There are many worthy persons—we do not know whether Mr. McDUGALL is one of them—who regard all public amusements as unedifying, and theatres or music-halls as downright wicked. They are entitled to hold their opinions, and to abstain from going to the play. But the reign of the Puritan will require a greater man than Mr. McDUGALL to re-establish it in London. If Lord ROSEBERY, instead of patting this rather grotesque personage effusively on the back, had administered to him a mild snubbing, he would have increased his own reputation for sagacity at the cost of a little temporary unpopularity.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.

AT the meetings of the Fox Club, after the names of Fox, and GREY, and HOLLAND, "nephew of Fox and friend of GREY," have been honoured, a toast is drunk to "The memory of Lord JOHN RUSSELL." The inheritors of the true Whig traditions ignore the later peerage, and recognize only the title most durably associated with the fame of the last of the Whigs. Mr. SPENCER WALPOLE, in the biography which he has just published through Messrs. LONGMANS, has followed this example. He has given us the Life of "Lord JOHN RUSSELL." The usage of history has been very capricious in the matter of titles. As Lord MACAULAY pointed out, it has peremptorily refused to acknowledge Viscount St. ALBANS and Baron VERULAM, and knows only Lord BACON; which is as much as if a future generation should ignore the Earl of BEACONSFIELD and Viscount HUGHENDEN, and insist, to the horror of Garter-King-at-Arms, or whoever may be the proper person to be horrified, on speaking and writing of Lord DISRAELI. Sir ROBERT WALPOLE and PULTENEY have survived the titles of ORFORD and BATH; CARTERET remains CARTERET in spite of the GRANVILLE earldom; and SHELBURNE is SHELBURNE, notwithstanding the Marquisate of LANSDOWNE. On the other hand, HARLEY is indifferently HARLEY and OXFORD; BOLINGBROKE, thanks partly to POPE, is scarcely less familiar to posterity as St. JOHN than as BOLINGBROKE; and the elder PITT is as frequently CHATHAM as PITT. As a rule, a man will naturally be remembered and spoken of by the name which he has borne longest, and which is associated with his greatest achievements. Lord JOHN RUSSELL's work was almost done when he became Earl RUSSELL. This, indeed, he himself felt in the speech in which he bade farewell to his constituents of the City of London just before his elevation to the peerage; he said that he felt much as CHARLES V. must have done when he attended as chief mourner at his own symbolic funeral. Lord JOHN RUSSELL, indeed, at one time contemplated, as appears from Mr. WALPOLE's pages, associating, as Lord SALISBURY has done, and as CANNING for a time thought of doing, the Premiership with the office of Foreign Secretary, and leaving the Commons for the Lords, as CANNING did not think of doing. This was in the midst of his troubles, and those of the Court, with Lord PALMERSTON, during his first Administration. If this plan had been carried out, the course of events might have been different. The knot of rivalry between these two competitors for place and power, which was with much difficulty untied, might have been cut. The name of Earl RUSSELL might possibly have become as famous as that of Earl GREY, of whom no one speaks or thinks as Mr. GREY. The title and substance of Mr. SPENCER WALPOLE's biography might have been different. It would, no doubt, in that case have been, as it is now, an excellent biography.

The association of the names of RUSSELL and WALPOLE on the same title-page has a historic appropriateness. The descendant of the greatest of the House of Commons Whigs, of the inventor and ablest practitioner of the art of government by debate and Parliamentary management, has a sort of hereditary qualification for writing the life of the last of his political line. Mr. WALPOLE's lineage is indeed curiously crossed. He is the grandson, and has been the biographer, of SPENCER PERCEVAL, and he is the son of a Conservative statesman, now living in honoured retirement, whose uprightness and purity and scholarly cultivation recall the best traditions of Parliamentary life. But there has been a reversion to the Whiggism of the original stock. Mr. WALPOLE has other more positive qualifications than these sentimental ones for being the biographer of Lord JOHN RUSSELL. The historian of England, from the year 1815 to the Crimean War, he has a minute and full acquaintance with the events of the period which is covered by Lord JOHN RUSSELL's political life. The background of the picture was already filled in in his mind before he undertook the special task which he has successfully accomplished. Mr. WALPOLE's Life of Lord John Russell is of a high order of excellence. It is not, perhaps, quite of the highest order. It is a work of skill rather than of genius, of the artisan rather than of the artist. There are some biographies which, by charm of form and style, have taken a permanent place in literature, independent of the secondary interest attaching to their subject—such as, to confine ourselves to contemporary instances, CARLYLE's Sterling, and, perhaps, Mr. DISRAELI's Lord George Bentinck. There are others in which both sources of interest combine, as in Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN's Early History of Charles James Fox. If Sir GEORGE could have been contented for a few years, instead of only for a few months, with the pursuits of an English gentleman in exile from politics, and so restored to letters, if he had not suffered himself to be beckoned away by a meaner ambition to meaner things, we can conceive him writing a Life of Lord JOHN RUSSELL which would have taken its place side by side with his Lives of Fox and of MACAULAY. If, again, Mr. LECKY could have been released from the lien which the eighteenth century has upon his time and faculties, and handed for a time over to the nineteenth, we can imagine his producing work which would have joined the charm of personal portraiture—for which his intimate acquaintance with Lord RUSSELL well equipped him—with philosophic insight and grasp of political principles, and the mastery of a style tinged with the colours of imagination, but still transparent to the light, firm, yet flexible, to every movement of thought.

Though Mr. WALPOLE's Life of Lord JOHN is not the best of all conceivable biographies by the best of all conceivable biographers, it is a valuable and well-executed work, worthy of the author, and not unworthy of the subject. It was almost inevitable that it should be somewhat marred by the controversial character scarcely separable from it. Mr. WALPOLE has had to vindicate Lord JOHN from serious accusations of personal and self-seeking ambition, which subordinated good faith to his colleagues and the welfare of his country to his own advancement. We think he has done so successfully. But, in order to do so, he has had to go with much minuteness into rather paltry details. His pages are strewn with documents which might better have been banished to an appendix of pièces justificatives. They litter the ground in large blocks and masses, instead of being worked up into the building. A great part of the book—notably that portion of it which deals with Lord JOHN RUSSELL's retirement from office under Lord ABERDEEN's Government, his conduct at the Vienna Conference, his retention of his place in Lord PALMERSTON's Administration after the rejection of the plan of peace which he brought from Vienna—is rather the pleading of counsel for the defence than biography. Lord JOHN is not, we believe, chargeable with anything worse than infirmity of purpose in these transactions, with not knowing his own mind soon enough and acting upon it promptly enough. His proposal, in the early and disastrous stages of the Crimean War, that the dual government of the War Department should be abolished, by the merging of the offices of Secretary for War and Secretary at War, was sound, and was afterwards acted on; and, if he had resigned office when his advice was refused, he would have been clear in the eyes of the country and the end which he aimed at would have been gained. But he yielded, without any selfish motive, to the pressure put upon him to remain, and so timed his resignation as to suggest the suspicion that he deserted his colleagues in a moment of peril which he ought to have braved with them. He ought to have resigned when what he thought satisfactory proposals for peace were rejected by his colleagues; but he could not have done so, or so he fancied, without disclosing matters, affecting France, which he was bound in honour to keep to himself. He therefore remained in office and held his tongue, and the result was his almost ignominious expulsion from office when the part which he had played at Vienna became half-known. He bravely endured obloquy, not disclosing the whole truth, which would have to a great extent set him right, but as to which he deemed his lips to be in honour sealed. If he had left office earlier and held his tongue, there would have been surmise and suspicion, but he would have been free from the imputation of consenting to an unnecessary war.

On these points, which for a time weakened the public confidence, not merely in the statesmanlike capacity of Lord JOHN RUSSELL, but in his straightforwardness and integrity, Mr. WALPOLE puts his conduct in a new and better light. It relieves a character which, as it appears in these volumes, is singularly engaging and impressive, from the stains which imperfect information left upon it. Lord JOHN RUSSELL's title is vindicated to a high place, not only among English statesmen, but among English worthies. There was a certain mountain air breathing round him, thin and keen, perhaps, but pure and bracing, untainted by the exhalations which are given out on lower levels of character. There was a granite basis in his character on which the foot could firmly rest; and though the soil seemed bleak and bare and rugged, it was better than the shifting sand and treacherous swamp, often covered with luxuriant vegetation, which betray those who trust them. Lord JOHN was sometimes suspected of shiftiness and slyness. There is, as has been remarked, such a thing as the simplicity of knavery. The cheat is often the most credulous of men. There is, on the other hand, such a thing as the astuteness of simplicity, the self-complacency of an ingenuous mind in little artifices of the most transparent kind which deceive no one. It was the recognition of this side of Lord JOHN RUSSELL's character which led SYDNEY SMITH to say of him that if he once began to intrigue he was lost. He hid his designs in a speech as the conspirators in the Rovers hid theirs in a song. Perhaps the moral quality which stood him most in stead with his countrymen was his pluck and his love of combat. The impulse which led him when a schoolboy at Westminster to play truant from his writing lesson in order to go and see a prize-fight was that which led him when still a lad to the Duke of WELLINGTON's lines before Torres Vedras, and which later made him drink delight of battle in the windy halls of St. Stephen's. It was not the victorious cause or the beaten cause which pleased him, but the struggling cause. He rallied to the forlorn hope; and when his own fortunes were most desperate his courage was highest, his step lightest, his bearing most gallant. It was this unfailing courage, springing in part from consciousness of resources and in part supplying them, which made a public speaker who was rarely an orator always a consummate debater. Lord JOHN RUSSELL is one instance among many of the falsity of the doctrine that courage is a function of health, a result of the vigorous action of the heart, the consequence of the steady and adequate supply of blood to the brain. The infirm health from which he suffered through life is probably accountable for many of his mistakes. There is traceable in his public career, in his thoughts and actions, a want of sustained continuity. He was flighty and apparently capricious. The audacity which DANTON thought the first requisite in a statesman and the patience to which PITT gave the highest place may be useless without sound lungs and a good digestion. The physical basis of statesmanship was insufficient in Lord JOHN RUSSELL, and his projects were often like the walls which BALZAC built round his garden without foundations, and which the first gust of wind overthrew. No one was more ingenious than he, or more prolific in plans. The sketch of the Reform Bill which he drew up on a sheet of notepaper is only one of many projects which he drew up in the shape of Cabinet memoranda, schemes of national defence, outlines of foreign policy, and the like, with an Abbé SIEYÈS fertility. Many of the schemes to which later statesmanship has given effect were suggested long before by Lord JOHN RUSSELL, and overruled by the Cabinet. In 1848 he proposed a scheme, in principle similar to Mr. GLADSTONE's, for limiting the power of ejectment in Ireland, and giving security to the tenant. He anticipated Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's plan of Provincial Councils, and proposed, with a further access of unwisdom, as we deem it, to apply the same system to the Highlands and Lowlands of Scotland. But for opposition in his Cabinet many of the measures—politic or unpolitic, we are not speaking of that—which have made the fame of succeeding Liberal Governments might have been associated with his name. Of the beauty and charm of his private life and character, his sportiveness with his children, his harmless verses, his genuine but sober and rational piety, we have no space to speak. Many illustrations of them will be found in Mr. WALPOLE's volumes. His dying declaration that, in spite of all his mistakes, he had aimed at the public good, the rudest adversary will not question. If with him, as well as with others, the spirit of conflict sometimes obscured this aim, it was not the less truly there.

THE OPENING OF THE REICHSTAG.

WHILE the German EMPEROR has gone off on peaceful pleasuring, with a wedding and perhaps some little business thrown in, to give it an object, his representative in Berlin has read a Speech from the Throne which was nothing if not businesslike. The reported flatness of the proceedings illustrates not ill the intensely personal character which politics still have in Germany; but the actual hearers of a Royal Speech form in no country the really important portion of its audience. There is assuredly nothing in the Speech to allay the fears of those who look forward to a Battle of Armageddon, nor anything to disturb the forecasts of those who, while fearing nothing, anticipate not a few evil things. If there is no defiance in the Speech, there is a great deal about defence. There are references, of course, to that peculiar policy which will probably, as far as domestic affairs go, be the special point of Prince BISMARCK's history to which the historian will devote his attention—the combination, namely, of active measures against unauthorized Socialism with measures no less active for the propagation of the Socialism which is authorized. Attempts in this direction have, of course, been made elsewhere; but it was reserved for Prince BISMARCK to make a kind of régie of Socialism. There is, further, reference to the affairs of East Africa; and there is the announcement (which will bring a grim smile to English countenances) that “the costs of the expedition could not, for various reasons, be kept within the sum ‘made available.’” The occasions when the costs of such an expedition could be so kept, in all the ample experience of England, are uncommonly far to seek, and the Germans will find it the same. But all these things are uninteresting beside the fresh appeals for aid “to develop the efficiency of ‘the army and its readiness for action,’ of course only with a final regard to ‘the securing of peace,’ and with cheerful hopes that, ‘with God’s help’ (and the EMPEROR’s visits to friends), ‘peace will be maintained in the coming ‘year.’” Meanwhile Germany, wise in her generation, makes herself ready for battle.

It is not unnatural that the somewhat eccentric action of a junior member of the other great ruling House of Germany should have attracted attention in connexion with this very Speech. There is not a little oddity in the HAPSBURGS, and the Archduke JOHN has always had the reputation of possessing his full share of it, combined with a share at least as full of the remarkable, though intermittent, ability of the House. But his desire to unprince himself is said to be connected with despair or despondency at the present condition of the Austrian army; and it must also be remembered that no royal line in Europe has produced more soldiers of ability, if not always of good fortune, than that of HAPSBURG-LORRAINE. The matter is only important because, if the Archduke’s motives are correctly reported, and his judgment not over-estimated, a serious discouragement will have been given to those who attributed the repeated recent attempts to run down the Austrian army partly to Russian jealousy and boastfulness, partly to a merely mechanical reminiscence of the ill-luck of Austria in recent contests. It may be said safely and unhesitatingly that there is no army in Europe on the strength and efficiency of which the maintenance of the peace of Europe depends more, even if there be any on which it depends so much. No nation has better military material, nor has any a more plentiful supply of the class of officers which, as even tolerably sensible Democrats are beginning to discover and allow, it is almost impossible to replace by any other class. But, for this reason and that, mismanagement has been chronic in Austrian armies for centuries. It was hoped that considerable improvement had been made, and it would still be unwise to take what may be the crotchet of an individual as final evidence to the contrary. But it may be admitted that the symptom is not reassuring, especially when the other side of the Galician frontier already swarms with Russian soldiers like an anthill with ants, while reinforcements are constantly arriving.

A JUDICIAL ALLANTOPOLES.

TOM CANT, butcher, of Colchester, achieved unexpected success on Tuesday in the Bankruptcy Court of his native town. He succeeded madly, as the French say. Whether he obtained his discharge or not is a point of minor importance, on which such records as we have been able to consult are silent. But he procured from the Bench a recognition of his merits as a man of business, and a gratuitous advertisement of his wares such as his fondest imaginings can hardly have anticipated. Tom, it must be admitted, has entirely cleared his mind of the objectionable quality which his name connotes. He is a practical cynic, who believes that if you want a thing you should not only ask for it, but pay in advance. He wanted his discharge, he believed in the goodness of his pork sausages, and forthwith he sent some to the Judge. The practice is an old one—older than sausages, or Western civilization. From the days of CLODIUS to the days of PALMER accused persons have not hesitated to supplement the rectitude of conscious innocence by the persuasive offer of succulent morsels. PALMER, if we remember rightly, sent the Coroner a turbot, a brace of partridges, and a barrel of oysters. The Coroner ate them, and was severely censured by Lord CAMPBELL, who probably thought the transaction extravagant as well as corrupt. A certain judge, as the Greek ARNOLD describes the functionary who was pursued by a black hen, and who had an upper chamber whenever he stayed in town—a certain judge of the superior Courts in our own day received a present of game from an unknown source. He consumed it, and gave God thanks. Shortly afterwards he was favoured with a letter from the donor, suggesting that he should decide an election petition in favour of the sitting member. He swore, but not all the oaths in Christendom could help him to return those pheasants or those hares. As he did not happen to be one of the election judges, he had not even the barren satisfaction of declaring the seat vacant on account of bribery. Mr. SPEDDING defended BACON on the ground that, having taken gratification from both sides, he proceeded to determine the case by the principles of law or equity. According to this view, Magna Carta should provide only against undue preference in the sale of justice. But even Mr. SPEDDING’s theory, which was perhaps invented under stress of Baconian enthusiasm, would not have helped Judge ABDY of Colchester. For, in the first place, it does not appear that any one sent him sausages except TOM CANT; and, in the second place, few people would be at the expense of buying sausages for the sake of preventing the discharge of a gentleman in difficulties. A more eccentric piece of ill-nature it would indeed be difficult to conceive.

It might be supposed, by the loose and hasty thinker, that the judge would have returned the sausages, or given them to the poor, and either committed the sender for contempt or said nothing about the matter. But Judge ABDY has peculiar ideas of judicial dignity. He delivered an allocution which must have been impressive to hear, and which it would be sacrilegious to abbreviate. “Are you ‘the person who sent me some sausages?’” he exclaimed. “You really must not do it. I am afraid you did it in ‘view of the application. I thought it was a parcel from ‘a gentleman who sends me roses; and, when I found they ‘were sausages, I was obliged to take them, because I did ‘not know where to send them back. I must say that ‘they were extremely good; but you must not do it. You ‘really must not.’” Upon the consideration of this passage several reflections arise. There is the subaltern question of style, or, as some have propounded it, how to be vulgar without being witty. Then, again, a point might be taken as to how the judge identified the “person” before him with the sender of the sausages. Are all senders of sausages alike? Then it would be interesting to know whether the gentleman who sends Judge ABDY roses is also an uncertificated bankrupt or some one otherwise desiring the favour of the Court. The use of the word “must” is also very curious and singular. “I must say,” “you must ‘not do it.’” It cannot mean compulsion in both instances, because the Judge was clearly not obliged to say that the sausages were good. Does it, then, imply necessity in either? There are occasions when “must not” signifies rather less than this, as when the feminine Quaker, in the well-known story, observed “Thou must not make a practice of it.” Uttered by a great actor, the phrases “You must ‘not do it—and yet I must say they were very good—but ‘you must not do it’” would be most effective, though doubtless not in the way intended by Judge ABDY. We do not know whether Judge ABDY feels towards sausages as HURRELL FROUDE used to feel towards buttered toast. The saint succumbed when that esculent appeared, and sausages seem to be too much for the self-restraint of the learned person who settles the litigation of Colchester.

A DEATH AND A WEDDING.

THE announcement of the death of Dom LUIS, late King of Portugal and Algarve, and the approach of the wedding of the Duke of SPARTA, have during this week kept up the hackneyed mixture of passing and wedding bells in the parish of Europe. What is called the political significance of such events is always of a disputable and (as a popular, but not ignorant, writer once enraged those critics who hate to have to turn to a dictionary and are too ill educated to escape that necessity, by saying) "aleatory" character. But, such as it is, it attaches rather to the wedding than to the funeral. Dom LUIS of Portugal, though he had not had by any means a long life, had had a long reign, as reigns go, and, as reigns go in Southern Europe, a quiet one. He had had time, and had availed himself of it, to put Portugal on a level with Saxony, and above all other kingdoms, as having produced a Royal author who, if he did not produce literature of the very first class himself, at any rate occupied himself only with such. The Saxon monarch chose DANTE, the Portuguese SHAKESPEARE; we are not aware that there is, or has been, any crowned Homerist to make up the triad. In fact, the Portuguese sovereign had not much else to do. Once during the last thirty years Portugal has had an important internal disturbance—that brought about by the coup-d'état, revolt, rebellion, candidateship for the mayoralty of the palace, or whatever it may be called, of the Duke of SALDANHA in 1870. The blow was parried with sufficient adroitness by King LUIS, who gave way, only to get the better afterwards. Otherwise the internal politics of Portugal have attracted, and perhaps deserved, little notice from outside. The credit of the country, once deeply sunk and never very stable, has somewhat recovered of late years; but doctors differ as to the cause of the recovery, some assigning it to Stock Exchange devices, others to a solid prosperity. A considerable increase in manufacturing industry has also lately been noticed. But the part played by the reigning family in all these matters has not been very large. Indeed, in both the Peninsular kingdoms, which by so odd a coincidence were, within a few years, thrown under the distaff in the first generation of this century, constitutional government has done its best, or worst, to reduce the sovereign from the position of a captain whose orders are obeyed to that of a helmsman who can, indeed, run the ship on the rocks by his clumsiness or save her by his skill, so long as he is at the helm, but who cannot count upon the submission of the crew. And this would seem—whether in consequence of the difference of character between the dead MARIA DA GLORIA and the living Queen or ex-Queen ISABEL or not—to have been even more the case in Portugal than in Spain.

It is impossible that Portugal should not be a subject of interest, and not merely of sentimental interest, to Englishmen. The long period during which the greater Power safeguarded the lesser, while the lesser supplied the greater with that admirable liquor the consumption of which helped to produce our greatest statesmen, soldiers, and savants, cannot easily be forgotten, crowned as it was by the almost unparalleled relation of England to Portugal in the Peninsular War. Then, when their rulers ran away, when their armies ran away in a different sense likewise, when they lay a helpless prey to the spoiler, we took the Portuguese up in earnest. The obligation was, indeed, not wholly on their side; for the honour of providing a site for the lines of Torres Vedras was, it must be confessed, something balanced by the inconvenience of being made subject to invasion by Marshal MASSENA. But the Englishman may certainly say that he was bon prince to Portugal. He fought her battles, he paid for everything he himself took or spent, he lent her great sums of money (much of which has never been paid off till this day), he taught her sons, under BERESFORD and PACK, to become something more than decent soldiers, he gave her the glory of being the one kingdom in Continental Europe which, save for the briefest moment, made head continuously against NAPOLEON, and started the resistance which rolled the tyrant off his throne. M. CHERBULIEZ would, of course, account for what followed by the well-known and deplorable want of sympathy of the English character with other races—a want of sympathy which seems something to resemble that which exists, let us say, between Swiss and Frenchmen. Portugal had seen so much of England, and owed so much to her, that she began to dislike her. Others put the estrangement down to the Liberal craze which came upon England and made her force Liberal sovereigns on peoples who did not want them. It pleased Englishmen, not of one shade of politics only, to represent Dom MIGUEL as a mixture of brute and fool; some impartial historical students have difficulty in avoiding the conclusion that Portugal really preferred him. However this may be, things have notoriously for many years been becoming cooler and cooler between those who were once the fastest friends in the European family. Whether Dom CARLOS, who now succeeds, will be able or will be disposed to do anything to alter this remains to be seen. He would be a sanguine person who entertained high hopes in the matter. King CARLOS has married a daughter of the Count of PARIS, and every French Pretender knows that a slight put on England is a recommendation to Frenchmen. Moneyed men in Portugal (except part of the wine interest) want Protection to enable their new manufactures to compete with English trade, and the ancient pride of the nation revolts at the idea of handing over its shadowy sovereignty in Africa to English newcomers. This kind of international sulking seldom comes to any good end unless the stronger party either shakes the nonsense out of the weaker or coaxes it into sense again. Nowadays we call the former process "brutal" and the latter "degrading."

The marriage of the Duke of SPARTA with a German Princess has the possibilities of a larger political influence, but only the possibilities. An alliance nearer to England than one in which the daughter of an English Princess Royal marries the nephew of a Princess of Wales is not easily imaginable. But the modifications of constitutionalism on the one hand, and of the—at first sight—rather unconstitutional practice of supplying kingdoms and princedoms with foreign incumbents of their sovereign office at so much per head, have introduced strange changes in such matters. The kingdom of Greece is but just over the half-century in years, and that half-century has seen one dynasty upset, and another (unless rumour lies very much) thinking more than once of abdicating. The mischief of such arrangements is that the real relation of monarch and people can hardly be established by them. It has come nearest to establishment in Sweden, perhaps, but even there it is a little precarious. It is not merely that the "Supper of CANDIDE" has now nothing surprising about it, and that anybody could get together not only a small supper party of doubtful adventurers, but a large dinner party of authentic ex-holders of crowns, or claimants to them on the most undeniable title-deeds. The fault rather is that the new kind of king, even if he is prosperous and popular, stands towards his people in a quite different relation from the old. He is rather like a secretary of a public institution under whose care that institution has prospered, or a popular stationmaster, or a "powerful" curate. The sincerest efforts may be made to retain him in his situation, all men may say good things of him, slippers, teapots full of gold pieces, portraits of himself in oils by the best masters, or their equivalents, may positively rain on him. But the nation does not feel itself the king's chose, does not identify itself, its weal and woe, with his, would regard Moriamur pro rege nostro (all contention as to that contentious phrase being here waived) as mere unbusinesslike lunacy. It is, therefore, impossible to pretend any intense political interest in the coming alliance. Nevertheless, it is almost certainly intended as a buttress, slight in itself, but possibly useful, of the structure which, chiefly by one man's energy and foresight, has been built up in the middle of Europe against the levity of one end and the greed of the other. As such it is welcome enough, especially to a nation which can still send a fleet to the Piræus to fetch off hard-bested royalty, if it be necessary.

DOGS AND THEIR COMMENTATORS.

THE person using the rather clumsy signature "Dog-hater" has certainly "drawn," in a highly effective manner, a considerable company of those who write letters to newspapers. He wrote with his pen what a good number of persons habitually think in their minds. They are, for the most part, scattered individuals, and seldom express their "misocyny," as Miss FRANCES POWER COBBE calls it, articulately. They are rather to be pitied, because there are so many dogs about that it is inconvenient to hate them all. No one, therefore, should grudge "Dog-hater" the mild pleasure of having provoked a good number of antagonists to give themselves away in a picturesque and abject manner.

All the antics of the persons who think it sacrilege to dislike dogs pale into insignificance beside a contribution to the literature of dogs and muzzles which some anonymous person has given to the world, in pamphlet form, with engravings on wood. The pamphlet is called Hydrophobia of 1889; its Cause and Cure (London: W. ROBERTS). It is described on the title-page as "Written by a Dog with a Sore Nose." The greater part of the text, however, purports to be written by a man owning a dog; but occasionally, for a few sentences, the author has remembered his cunning device, and put his observations into the mouth of a supposed dog. The author, speaking in his own person, summarizes his account of the existing Muzzling Order in these words:—"Now the matter is this: The governing classes find every year that it is more difficult to govern the country, and, therefore, they must have resort to superstition, for rabies in dogs is nothing more than superstition." The dog, by the way, appears to be of a slightly different opinion; for he—at least it seems to be the dog—surmises that the early stages of diphtheria, especially when complicated with "anxious thoughts," is what "is called" by party feeling and party scientific men 'Hydrophobia.' There is certainly some difference between diphtheria and superstition; but it should be added to the credit of the man that the dog is not absolutely faithful to its theory of diphtheria, for it remarks on the same page that hydrophobia "is nothing more than breathing impure air."

These opinions of the author and his intelligent quadruped are further supported by anecdote. "It is not so long ago that an old lady died with the symptoms of hydrophobia, whom [sic] it was proved had never been bitten by any dog. It came out, she once had a pet dog; so the intelligent jury brought in their verdict that the lady had been licked by a dog, causing hydrophobia; and at the time of the trial of the Crofters in Edinburgh, one of the witnesses, when he came into Court, howled like a dog, and shortly after died;—" there is a little more, but after a line so strictly decasyllabic and in its matter so suggestive of "MAUD," it does not seem necessary to say more about the story than to point out that the Crofters' case and the old lady's case had nothing whatever to do with each other. The essay further contains a disquisition upon witchcraft, because all those persons who believe in rabies in man, or "hydrophobia in dogs, would believe in woman having the power of bewitching others, and bringing ill-fortune and disease upon them by their 'touch' or look." The author sees in the current apprehension of rabies, and some other circumstances, signs of a recrudescence of belief in witchcraft. It has been growing upon us. "Fifteen years ago England was in a much more advanced state as a great Power than it is now. Something had to be done to check the rising colossal thoughts of such men as CHARLES BRADLAUGH, and the Government had no other resource than their old game of superstition; and to encourage the Salvation Army through such despicable men as the late Mr. NEWDEGATE. . . ." Since 1874, therefore, superstition has increased among us, "and when witchery and hydrophobia have thoroughly grown into the minds of the millions, they will be nicely in the hands of the power who rules the wand." In order that there may be no mistake as to what wand-ruler it is that is gradually enslaving the millions by pretending to believe in rabies, there here follows a spirited woodcut of Lord SALISBURY, somewhat tightly draped in a wizard robe, waving a long wand, and wearing an oval Union Jack across his chest. Briefly, but earnestly, the dog—who has relieved the human author at some unspecified point—dwells on the powerful nature of superstitious motives. "Look again at the actor and the stage; how jealous the Dissenters are of the money which is spent by the people "in listening to a moral sermon, with sublime music and scene-shifting." The essay breaks off rather suddenly. The concluding sentence is:—"Most persons will accept of a pup-dog for their children to play with, not having to pay a tax till it is six months old, and by that time it is taken to a distance on purpose to be lost." We do not precisely understand how it helps to demonstrate the identity of rabies with superstition—or even with diphtheria.

CRETE AND ARMENIA.

THE political dissenter is rarely a man of much literature, and it is improbable that Messrs. WIGNER, OWEN, PATTISON, and the others who, in the name of the Baptist Union, have petitioned Lord SALISBURY on the subject of the Cretan "atrocities," know where the following words are to be found:—"They are not historians of an action, but lawyers of a party. They are retained by their principles and bribed by their interests. Their narrations are an opening of their cause: and in the front of their histories there ought to be written the prologue of a pleading, I am for the plaintiff, or I am for the defendant." But the reverend gentlemen would have done well to remember the words, and will do well to read and mark them before they again take for gospel the assertions of the Special Correspondent of the Daily News about Crete. Indeed, the Correspondent himself might upbraid them, for they credit him with "giving details of the horrible violation and mutilation of women of the island"—which, no doubt, he would have been very glad to give, but which he certainly did not, while even "details" are not evidence. The exaggeration (we use words carefully ourselves, and, therefore, we do not use a stronger term) as to the four regiments who were reported to be mutinying and chasing SHAKIR Pasha is another case in point. It may be said (and the ultra-guarded language of Mr. GLADSTONE himself at Southport is the best proof of it) that, up to the present time, we have no trustworthy details, and very few details at all, about any Cretan "atrocities," though, no doubt, the unwearying efforts of the atrocity-mongers have made SHAKIR's almost accomplished task somewhat more difficult, and have rendered actual bloodshed and suffering far more probable.

Turcophobe mendacity about Armenia takes a somewhat different form. In Crete it is a little monotonous, even the mutiny being a bright relief to the dull uniformity of invented or unproved outrage. The vicissitudes of the inquiry into MOUSSA Bey's misdeeds present better opportunities, and the newspaper people, spurred by these, show some ingenuity in devising perpetually different results, all of which can be equally adjusted to show the wickedness of the Turk. Impartial onlookers have always admitted that there is a danger of partiality in this case. The SULTAN is not the only person who has adopted the great principle of an English patriot, that "it is not well to discourage friends." It is odd that people who admire Mr. GLADSTONE for shutting his eyes, and do their best to shut their own, to the sun-clear evidence of Irish Nationalist crime, should be so angry with the SULTAN for not washing his hands at once of MOUSSA. MOUSSA is a much more respectable person than some of the advanced wing of the Parnellite party, for the simple reason he is more than half a barbarian, and they are censés to be civilized. But, if the SULTAN has any such weakness, and if he indulges it, he will commit a tremendous blunder. Exaggerated as the charges against the Kurds doubtless are, there is also no doubt that they are in part true, and that it is in the very highest degree unwise to give, in the most vulnerable side of the Empire, an excuse to an enemy who is only too willing to wound. The error of the Turkish Government in the matter seems, indeed, to be the error, not of tyrants, or ruffians, or bigots, but of people deficient in common sense and appreciation of the facts of life. If you are strong enough to bid foreigners to mind their own business when they make representations about the misgovernment of your subjects, it is a capital thing to do so. But if inquiries have to be granted, they should be full, free, and prompt, and every possible precaution should be taken to remove real causes of complaint. Invented causes it is, of course, impossible to remove; but they are almost harmless unless they can be mixed up with a little of the real thing. And that is why the real thing should be stamped out as soon as found. No service that MOUSSA can ever render the Porte will compensate for the harm done to it by his adoption of those twelfth- or thirteenth-century ways which during the nineteenth century are tolerable to Gladstonians only in their own friends.

THE CONSERVATISM OF CATS.

CATS are being exhibited at the Crystal Palace. It is not an emotional show. Mr. MAX MÜLLER tells a pretty anecdote of how his dachshund recognized him afar off at one of the canine exhibitions, and did his best to make up for the want of articulate language by affectionate demonstrations. Cats are noble animals, but not demonstrative. In an effusive age the cat remains calm, dignified, impassive, the Red Indian of the animal creation. The cat is not like the dog; it is melancholy to think what man has made of him and what he has made of man. Every vice of the age reflects itself in the modern dog. He is self-conscious, affected, communicative, gushing, the victim of ennui; he thirsts for excitement, for society, for public notice. From room to room he speeds, looking for that in which he finds most society and is most brought forward. He is vain of his accomplishments, and delights in begging, in refusing or accepting, bits of cake "from Mr. GLADSTONE," in "giving three cheers for the QUEEN," in saying "WILLIAM." Mr. ROMANES mentions a dog in Dumfries who could say "WILLIAM." Nobody ever heard of a cat who attempted anything of that sort. It is told of a dog, living in a small country house, that when the local magnate had other magnates staying with him, that dog would go away, and desert his master for the more diverting and distinguished society. The dog is all expression. He communicates every one of his numerous emotions. He is so vain that a large and, it must be admitted, handsome colley has been known to contemplate himself all day in a mirror. The dog must always be "in evidence." How much of his acknowledged gallantry in saving life and attacking robbers is due to a mere desire to see his name in the papers can never be certainly discovered. In fact, he is bitten with all the sentimentality and effusiveness of the period. Even his friends, even Miss FRANCES POWER COBBE, will admit, on reflection, that the dog has been thus degraded by associating with mankind. He is by way of being a philanthropist. "That dowg 'll speak to ony 'beggar," said a Lowland shepherd of his own hound, which had gone up and wagged his tail to a passing angler.

In contrast with all this demonstrative philanthropy consider the example of the cat. The cat has retenue. He has his hours of sportiveness, as MONTAIGNE observed; "thus 'freely speaketh MONTAIGNE about cats," says IZAAK WALTON. He will not disturb himself at other moments for anybody. The blandishments of strangers he neither shuns nor seeks—he endures them. He is not the victim of the craze for society. He suffices for himself. He is never bored with his own company. Of all animals he alone attains to the Contemplative Life. He regards the wheel of existence from without, like the BUDDHA. There is no pretence of sympathy about the cat. He lives "alone, aloft, sublime," in a wise passiveness. If you tread on a dog's tail by accident, he utters "the lyric cry," and then dissolves in the elegies of apology. The cat suffers and is silent, or firmly applies his claws without remark. He is excessively proud; and, when he is made the subject of conversation, will cast one glance of scorn and leave the room in which personalities are bandied. He disdains accomplishments, and it is a fact that cats are losing the art of purring. All expressions of emotion he scouts as frivolous and insincere, except, indeed, in the ambrosial night; when, free from the society of mankind, he pours forth his soul in strains of unpremeditated art. The paltry pay and paltry praise of humanity he despises, like EDGAR POE. He does not exhibit the pageant of his bleeding heart; he does not howl when people die, or explode in cries of delight when his master returns from a journey. With quiet courtesy he remains in his proper and comfortable place, only venturing into view when something he approves of, such as fish or game, makes its appearance. On the rights of property he is firm; if a strange cat enters his domain, he is up in claws to resist invasion. He is the reverse of the bandicoot, if that animal is correctly described by the poet as "a wildly sympathetic brute." It was for these qualities, probably, that the cat was worshipped by the ancient Egyptians.

It may be urged, on the other side, that a kitten has lately made the ascent of the Matterhorn. A party of climbers found him halfway up, and he was condescending enough to accompany them. But this was a kitten, and youth has its errors and excesses. The kitten must have been in bad company. But there was even in this young thing no ostentation. He set forth alone, and without announcing his ambitious intention. Had he succeeded, unaided and unroped, without a guide, he would never have swaggered about the performance. It is not impossible that he dreamed of opening a new field to feline industry—that of the Alpine guide. But this was a solitary instance. The cat is not ambitious. From the dawn of creation he knew his place, and he has kept it, practically untamed and unspoiled by man. Though he has many enemies, the sage will still prefer, in a future state of existence on earth, to be a comfortable and contemplative cat.

THE STATE OF IRELAND.

THERE is always plenty of good reading in Mr. BALFOUR's speeches, but there is one passage in his speech at Manchester which will have more interest for all to whom politics mean something more than mere platform wrangling than anything else that he said. Not, of course, that Mr. BALFOUR can avoid mingling in the mêlée of disputation, or that the part he plays in it is by any means a superfluous one. Well able as he is to handle the weapons of ridicule and rebuke, and easy as it would be for him to retort in kind, or rather in better kind, on the irrelevant abuse or pinchbeck epigram which form so much of the stuff of Gladstonian speeches, the CHIEF SECRETARY, nevertheless, abstains from doing so. He has evidently made it a rule never to enter into personal controversy, except with the object of exposing some "mendacious calumny" or other of Parnellite invention and Gladstonian adoption. To be sure, that is enough in itself to give him plenty of occupation, and indeed, were it not that Mr. BALFOUR acts on the wise plan of making a collection of these spurious coins, and nailing them to the counter in batches instead of singly, he would have to pass the greater part of his life on the platform. The work he has thus set himself is undoubtedly a necessary one, and he performed it at Manchester as usual in a thoroughly workmanlike manner. A particularly agreeable example of Mr. BALFOUR's style was his exposure of those profound Gladstonian jurists who had been protesting against the employment of "that old and rusty weapon furbished up anew for the purposes of 'tyranny,' the Act of EDWARD III., under which many persons in Ireland have been recently bound over to be of good behaviour. Little suspecting that this old and rusty weapon had been kept shining with all the polish of perpetual attrition, in the hands of English magistrates and justices of the peace from time immemorial, Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, a "gentleman who has a great passion for Parliamentary returns," applied to the Government for a return of the number of persons proceeded against under that statute—an application which has resulted in his being informed that they are to be numbered by thousands. So that Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE's return may be packed up in a neat parcel along with the famous return moved for by Sir WILFRID LAWSON, with the intention of showing that the increase of sentences on appeal was unprecedented, and with the result of showing that it was not at all uncommon; and the parcel may be inscribed with the words "The 'Fruits of Indiscreet Curiosity.'"

There is matter for pleasing reflection, too, in Mr. BALFOUR's remarks on Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN's lamentations over the state of County Donegal, and the mourner's unlucky ignorance of the responsibility therefor of the energetic Mr. KELLY, a gentleman whom Mr. GLADSTONE's mild Government deemed it necessary to imprison for six months without trial, but against whom the minions of the Oriental despotism under which the country now groans have obtained a conviction and sentence by regular process of law. We must, however, quit these not uninteresting though personal passages in Mr. BALFOUR's speech, to turn to that which is the true centre of interest from the political as distinguished from the polemical point of view. We mean, of course, the CHIEF SECRETARY's report of progress in Ireland. His report, it may be objected, was on this point sure to be, was bound to be, favourable; and that no doubt is true to the extent that any utterance on such a subject from a Minister in Mr. BALFOUR's position must necessarily be hopeful. Even if disappointed with the results of his policy, he would, of course, know that any avowal of his disappointment would tend to perpetuate it, and that the first step to success in almost anything is to appear confident of attaining it. But everybody, or every experienced student of political oratory, knows the ring of those cheerful commonplaces with which a Minister puts a good face on disappointment; and it is equally well known that, as a matter of prudence no less than of principle, no conscientious Minister ever goes beyond such commonplaces when he is inwardly dissatisfied with the state of affairs. He certainly does not use the language of Mr. BALFOUR's "perfectly clear and unequivocal answer," as he described it, to the question whether the policy that has been pursued in Ireland has been productive of the good results which had been hoped. "Every expectation," said the CHIEF SECRETARY, "which in my most sanguine moments I ever ventured to frame with regard to the results, the happy results, that might follow from a firm administration of the law in Ireland, and from the course of remedial legislation which we have begun, though we have not finished—every such expectation, I say, has been fulfilled, and more than fulfilled." The progress of Ireland, Mr. BALFOUR went on to say, had been steady and continuous; and he added the significant remark, for which we have no doubt he has derived plenty of warrant from his own observation, that even those who hold Home Rule opinions, "if they be men who are engaged in any business which requires the maintenance of public confidence, rejoice in their hearts, and sometimes venture to rejoice openly that the majesty of the law has been vindicated." Plenty of evidence to the same effect is within the reach of those who have not access to Mr. BALFOUR's special sources of information. One of the most noticeable proofs of improvement in Ireland is the difficulty which the agitators now experience in getting together any effective following. Audiences no doubt they can find easily enough, and will always be able to find easily enough in that country; but their hearers evidently listen now without being moved to any sort of action. It would even seem that they are not more than momentarily excited by the agitator's eloquence, and that the species of vague popular ferment which he found no difficulty in exciting some time ago, he now appears quite unable to raise. No doubt it would be a mistake to attach too much importance to this fact as evidence of a genuine change of Irish feeling; for of course it is due in some measure to a change in the attitude of the public on this side of St. George's Channel. The Irishman has throughout his history played persistently to the English gallery, and when the gallery has become indifferent the player naturally grows spiritless. The mere fact, however, of the subsidence of the agitation is the main thing. The cause of that subsidence is a secondary consideration, and indeed it would be enough in any case, so far as the Unionist contention is concerned, to have shown that the pretence of Irish discontent is abandoned as soon as the English public seems no longer capable of being taken in by it.

The conviction of the prisoner COLL of the minor offence of manslaughter for his share in the savage attack upon the ill-fated Inspector MARTIN is satisfactory in more ways than one. It showed, on the one hand, that the Maryborough jury was prepared, in defiance of the disgraceful hectoring of the Parnellite press, to do their duty fearlessly; and, on the other hand, that they were as ready as any English jury could possibly have been to give the prisoner the benefit of any reasonable doubt. As a matter of fact, indeed, we think it quite possible that twelve Englishmen, trying the case in an English assize court, might find more difficulty in seeing their way to an acquittal of COLL on the count for murder. That he was an active participator in the cowardly maltreatment of the deceased officer was proved beyond dispute, and there can be no doubt that his moral bloodguiltiness (to use a word which Mr. GLADSTONE seems now to have forgotten the meaning of) was little, if at all, less than that of the ruffians, whoever they were, who actually battered the unhappy man to death. Under such circumstances it is not always easy to get a jury to recognize the somewhat fine distinction between moral and legal responsibility. In COLL's case the distinction has been recognized, and that fact alone is a sufficient answer to the envenomed abuse which has been heaped upon the ATTORNEY-GENERAL in connexion with the stale and ridiculous charge of jury-packing. It is noticeable that this accusation has hitherto been heard only from the irresponsible scribes of the Parnellite persuasion, and has not as yet been re-echoed by any English politician who has had official acquaintance with the administration of the criminal law in Ireland. Probably, however, the silence in these quarters is only temporary. We fully expect before these trials are over to hear the cry against "jury-packing" taken up by Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN or Mr. MORLEY; though both of them must be perfectly well aware that at no trial held under their rule in Ireland was it ever found possible for the Crown to obtain an impartial and independent jury without a liberal exercise of the right of challenge. Much as they might have preferred in those days to impanel a jury against whom not even Parnellite malice could allege that their prejudices would predispose them to a conviction, Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN and Mr. MORLEY well knew that this was the only alternative to impanelling a jury who by their fears or their partisanship were not merely predisposed but pledged to an acquittal. Under these circumstances it would have been fully admitted in those days by either of the two Chief Secretaries in question that the Crown prosecutor would be wanting to his duty if he did not challenge every jurymen reasonably suspected of entering the box to register a foregone conclusion. But neither of these two eminent men will be able, we fear, to evade the duty of denouncing the system which they themselves administered, if orders to that effect are issued to them from the Parnellite headquarters.

INCOMPATIBLES IN THE COUNTY COUNCIL.

THE County Council was engaged on Tuesday—not for the first, and probably not for the last, time—in showing how hard it is to reconcile business and sentiment when money has to be spent in getting work done. Its task, from the business point of view, was a simple one enough. It had to decide whether it should accept two tenders recommended by one of its own Committees. The first, sent in by Messrs. W. BRASS & SON, London, was "for the execution of the works for the extension of Cane Hill Asylum for the sum of 79,763*l*." The second came from Mr. E. GABBUTT, of Liverpool, and was "for the execution of the work of erecting the superstructure of the Asylum at Claybury, for the sum of 337,945*l*." If the Council had thought only of business, its course would have been clear. On this supposition, its Committee would already have considered the solvency of these firms and the guarantees they offered. The Council would have had no more to do than to confirm the recommendation of the Committee. If, on the other hand, the Council wishes to make all London workmen happy, and intends to sink business, its course would be, we do not say so easy, but at least comparatively clear. It would have announced that it meant to have such and such amounts of work done for such and such high rates of pay—and then it might have set about bringing in the millennium at the expense of the ratepayers.

The County Council, however, took neither of these courses fully. It showed its wish both to consult the natural wish of ratepayers not to spend money, and also to satisfy the equally human liking of workmen for the enjoyment of regular work and high wages irrespective of the state of the market. The tender of Messrs. BRASS & SON was referred back to the Committee on the ground that this firm was able to offer good terms because it paid low wages. Mr. BURNS, who moved the amendment, made a host of allegations, which have since been denied by the contractors, and on the charges made by him the tender was, if not rejected, at least hung up for the present. So far the County Council would appear to have gone on the rule that business is not business. But then the tender of Mr. E. GABBUTT came on for consideration, and was opposed by Mr. BURNS on grounds quite consistent with his former amendment. He complained that Mr. GABBUTT is a Liverpool man, that he would employ Liverpool men, that the money paid him would go to Liverpool to the detriment of London workmen. In short, Mr. BURNS laid down the great and generally acceptable principle that the County Council should keep its own fish-guts for its own sea-mews. He met with a considerable amount of support. A friendly reporter credited Mr. D. H. MACFARLANE with the sensible remark that, if London work is kept for Londoners, country work will be kept for countrymen, which in conceivable circumstances might be awkward. Mr. D. H. MACFARLANE has written to deny that he deviated into business considerations to this extent. As a matter of fact, he asserted his belief that London money should be kept for London men. But the County Council had apparently had sufficient sentiment for one day, and accepted the Liverpool tender. It is to be noted that, whereas one of the charges made against Messrs. BRASS & SON was that their tender was too low, Mr. E. GABBUTT's was complained of for not being low enough. These two decisions, and the discussions which preceded them, make an appreciable addition to the already considerable mass of evidence we possess as to the value of the present County Council as an administrative body. They are utterly incoherent. It is surely unnecessary to insist on the character of some of the remarks made about the firm of Messrs. BRASS & SON. The immunity which his position gives a County Councillor will become an intolerable nuisance if his language is not to be restrained by some regard for courtesy. A more important consideration for ratepayers than the manners of the County Council is its method of doing business. What that is, the transactions of Tuesday show—or rather they show that it has no method at all. One considerable section of the Council is openly anxious to administer on the principle that all money raised in London should be spent primarily for the benefit of the London workmen alone, without the slightest regard for other ratepayers. They would sacrifice alike efficiency and economy for the sake of their clients. This section, indeed, by the sentiment or the incapacity of others, gets its way till it is checked for a moment by a reaction to common sense. Then it secures the upper hand again, and so the Council sways from side to side. The result of such confusion can only be in the long run the maximum of extravagance and inefficiency.

HOMERIC BLUNDERS.

IT has often been noticed that style is catching, and an Homeric critic may be expected, if he can do no better, to blunder on an Homeric scale. Mr. WHITE, the author of the unusually copious and minute Life of Homer which was noticed in the Saturday Review last week, points out to us that his critic has not failed in this portion of his duties. He makes Mr. WHITE speak of KLEANAX as the father, not the guardian, of HOMER's misguided mother, and of KRITHEIS, not PHEMIUS, as his schoolmaster. Mr. WHITE perfectly accurately gave those respectable persons their proper titles of relationship. By an error which may, perhaps, be called an Homeric slip of the pen, Mr. WHITE is made to say "300" years, when he really said 3,000. But nobody, we trust, could have been misled by this. Nobody could suppose that Mr. WHITE really meant to say that HOMER wrote his poems in 1589 A.D. Mr. WHITE explicitly remarks that HOMER died 2,842 years ago, so it is not in nature that he should have been so serus studiorum as to begin composing in 1589 A.D.

The third error, according to Mr. WHITE, is where the Saturday Review speaks of the "riddle of the fleas." "Fleas are not lobsters, damn their souls," says (we think) Sir JOSEPH BANKS. These Homeric insects, whereof the fishers kept what they could not catch, and threw away what they did capture, were not fleas either, says Mr. WHITE. Mr. WHITE calls them "sacred insects whose name, in this 'queer England of ours, it is not lawful to utter.' Does he mean lice? and if so, why does he not say so? The courtly LARCHER calls the insects vermine. "Après avoir 'long-temps balancé, si je ne proscrirois ce terme, j'ai 'pensé qu'on pouvoit recevoir dans une traduction une expression que l'usage ne permettroit pas dans un ouvrage 'original. Si par délicatesse on vient aussi à proscrire 'ces expressions dans les traductions, on n'aura plus que 'les équivalens." Well, the insects were not fleas. What they were may be gathered from the original, and, of course, absurdly apocryphal life of HOMER: καθήμενοι δὲ ἐν γῇ ἐφθερίζοντο.

We present Mr. WHITE with the accents; his Greek, as a rule, is, like that of ladies, "without the accents." So Mrs. BROWNING described the Greek of a sex now so learned. And now we hope we have done Mr. WHITE full justice. The truth is that Homeric scholars no longer look on the pseudo-Herodotean Life of HOMER as a book which concerns them more than the "History of Jack the Giant Killer." Neither the modern editions of HOMER nor of HERODOTUS include it, as a rule, and people are not expected to be interested in the statement that an Egyptian lady called PHANTASIA wrote the books from which HOMER procured the substance of the Iliad and the Odyssey. Thus it is difficult for the best-conducted pen not to stagger a little, "like drunken men," as Mr. WHITE says, in trying to understand an Homeric critic who seems to believe in the Herodotean Life, who calls Dr. HAYMAN "HAYSMAN," and who spells the name of the learned NITZSCH in a manner unprecedented among the learned. However, Mr. WHITE's Life of Homer can richly supply the reader with native curiosities, and we trust that nobody has accused him of not knowing all about the entomology of Arcadian vermin, and all that has been narrated concerning PHEMIUS, and KLEANAX, and the rest of them.

As Dr. GARNETT has lately been reconsidering the problem of Homeric translation, it may not be uninteresting to give an example of Mr. WHITE's performance. Of all translators he most reminds us of Dr. MAGINN:—

The quarrel of Ulysses
And Achilles, son of Thetis,
How once they quarrel'd at the feast
Of the immortal de'ties.

While 'Trides chuckled to himself,
"I wish they'd come to blows,"
And thus began, by Heaven's deep scheme,
Of Greece and Troy the woes.

FRAPPEZ TOUJOURS.

SOON after the Dockers' Strike came to an end Mr. GLADSTONE said a few words on the subject—a few words, but well worth considering and well worth remembering. In effect, they expressed the speaker's deep satisfaction that Labour had at last found a way of forcing its demands upon Capital. To his mind, one inference from the story of the London strike was clearly this:—In future, the working classes of this country intend "to make common cause" of the general desire for higher wages and shorter hours of work. "Labouring men," he said, "have learned to adjust the machinery by means of 'which Labour can act in the mass;' and the natural result of such an adjustment must be 'greater efficiency of the 'power of Labour in its competition with Capital.'" In Mr. GLADSTONE's opinion "the lesson had been learned 'from Ireland.'" Watching the operation of the Parnellite Leagues, the working classes had seen what might be done by "people in different parts of the country, who have no 'connexion with each other, in assisting for a common 'object what they believe may be vital to all."

Of course there was no originality in these observations, except in one particular. Till Mr. GLADSTONE spoke no one had ever suggested that resort to combination-strikes had been learned from Ireland; and we are at liberty to doubt whether that was precisely what Mr. GLADSTONE meant to insinuate. He has a great admiration for the processes—call them "extra legal," if you will—by which the Irish conspiracy has worked; and it is easier to believe that he wished to point them out to Mr. BURNS for imitation than that he intended to express the absurd opinion that Trades-Union combinations were never thought of till the Land League was founded. As for the rest, the prospect which Mr. GLADSTONE rejoiced in was no discovery of his own. It never occurred to anybody else that if society is likely to be disturbed by combination-strikes extending half over the country, the trick had been learned from Ireland. But it was obvious to all of us that labouring men were learning "to adjust the machinery by means of which Labour can 'act in the mass'; and that we, too, might presently see what could be done "by people in different parts of the 'country, who have no connexion with each other, in assist- 'ing for a common object what they believe may be vital 'to all."

Since the conclusion of the London strike, and even since Mr. GLADSTONE proclaimed a patronage which no doubt will become more marked as the time for the general election draws nigh, there has been an unending agitation for better wages and more leisure all through the country. We do not say that in every case, or even that in most cases, the agitation has been unreasonable. However that may be, there has been a good deal of compliance, though it must not be ascribed to one cause alone. No doubt the explanation of it is a sense of social terrorism on the one hand, and, on the other, ability to pay out more wages on account of general improvement in trade. So far, however, these strikes have not been worked on the combination system which peculiarly marked the Dock Strike, and which Mr. GLADSTONE recommends for general adoption. In spite of what is reported from Bristol, where the dockers are "out," of making "common cause" there has been little. It is more than likely, however, that, if this remark were addressed to Mr. BURNS, he would reply with a fervid exhortation to patience, and a promise that before long we should see what we should see. There can be no doubt that he is a shrewd and careful manager, though not unapt to blunder when he becomes excited. He has obtained enormous influence amongst working people; and he is evidently bent on establishing a Trades-Union Syndicate, which is not the less likely to succeed if it continues to receive the support of that distinguished economist Mr. GLADSTONE. Mr. BURNS has his plans, and his idea seems to be to found them on a basis of union amongst two great bodies of working-class people—the servants of the Post-Office, and the 360,000 men who are employed on the railways. He may not succeed in doing much with either; but, when the numbers and the particular employment of these two bodies of working-men are considered, it becomes manifest at once that no better choice could be made as a foundation for his and Mr. GLADSTONE's Labour League. On Sunday afternoon there was a meeting of some two thousand men—mostly railway servants—in Battersea Park, the business of the meeting being to support the newly-formed General Railway Workers Union. Mr. BURNS was there and said several impressive things. Experience had taught him, he remarked, that one and only one union for each trade was desirable; it was, indeed, the only principle upon which complete and thorough organization could be secured. Each union should control its own funds, elect, instruct, and dismiss its own officials. Then, when each class of workpeople had its union so constituted, they might all be federated under one committee of council; the business of which should be "to see how the "interests of Trade-Unionists, as Trade-Unionists, could "best be protected and permanently improved." Here is the scheme complete. This is how to adjust the machinery by means of which Labour can act in the mass upon any particular point. Establish a Union for every trade; delegate a member of every Trades-Union Committee to a federal Council; make it the business of this Council not only to protect the interests of Unionism generally, but to bring the whole weight of the federation to bear upon this or that order of employers, and it will be impossible for Capital to haggle much over what Mr. GLADSTONE calls "a fair principle of division of the fruits of labour." That principle will be settled by the Council; though not, Mr. BURNS would doubtless tell us, in such a way as to reduce Capital to downright despair. As to the means of compulsion, Mr. BURNS does not shrink from stating them quite frankly. There is no such Trades-Union Federation yet as he proposes; but he warns the Directors of the London, Brighton, and South-Coast Railway Company that, though they may reject their servants' petition for more rest and better wages to-day, they "will not reject it six months hence, "when the system is blocked, when financiers from the "City cannot go down to Brighton by the 5 o'clock express, "and when the traffic is dislocated." Give Mr. BURNS his Federation, and the railway system would be equally blocked, or postal delivery suspended, or the gas put out over an appointed area, if any considerable body of master barbers or bootmakers ventured on contumacy.

We are not to make up our minds yet awhile that these delightful plans will be carried out, or even that they will obtain any substantial footing. But it is evident that a sturdy attempt will be made to push them through; while, on the other hand, it is vain to suppose that the most convincing representations as to the utter ruin of trade thirty years hence will weigh much with the labourer of to-day. Undertake to show that it must be ruined three years hence, and he will listen to you, no doubt; but in nine cases out of ten he cares no more for the generations to come than for the generations that are gone. Still, he might hesitate if no mere economist, if no mere business pedant or political Conservative, but a great popular leader or two warned him against the prodigious destructive tyranny that Mr. BURNS proposes to create. But where is the great popular leader to tell the "workers" a little wholesome truth in this matter? One there is, who, believing himself the greatest, best, and wisest of all, is taken at his own valuation by tens of thousands of working-men; but he lends his word and his name to Mr. BURNS. He is foremost in exhorting them to "adjust the "machinery by which labour can act in the mass," and, when the machinery has been adjusted, to bring it to bear on obstinate employers after the fashion of the Irish Leagues in dealing with landlords. And none of Mr. GLADSTONE's friends have uttered a word against the tenor of his suggestions and his counsel.

THINGS COLONIAL AND INTERCOLONIAL.

IT is the good fortune of the Colonies, and notably of Australia, to enjoy a degree of quiet prosperity which does not supply much matter for comment. Their internal affairs we do not consider ourselves competent either to understand or control, and of foreign affairs they have very little. No doubt there are well-known exceptions to the rule; but it obtains none the less. Moreover, when their doings do touch us, it is apt to be in a way which it is melancholy to touch upon—and futile to complain of. We are interested, no doubt, in a passage of Victorian Parliamentary history lately reported. It does concern us that the already severe protective tariff of Victoria should be made more prohibitive than before. Makers of hats, whose goods are taxed on arriving at Melbourne, may be concerned to learn that the duty on each will be five shillings instead of four. Exporters of "quilts—sewn, cosies, and cushions," may be displeased to hear that their goods must pay thirty per cent. ad valorem duty, instead of the twenty which Mr. PATTERSON, Chief Commissioner of Customs, had proposed to impose on them. But, however little they may like this, they can hardly hope to do any good by making, or listening to, remarks about the policy which commends itself to the majority in Victoria. The colony has the right to impose a protective tariff if it pleases, and it does please. Protests are idle. A long experience has shown that the mind which comes spontaneously to the conclusion that it is better to have everything dear for the sake of the seller will never take in the propositions which appear self-evident to the mind which holds that, in the ideal state, everything should be cheap for the sake of the consumer. Neither do we know that there is much novelty in the spectacle presented by the Victorian Ministry, which brought in a tariff and then gave it up when the opposition looked too strong. Mr. ZOX, of Melbourne, who remarked that when a "Government "comes down with a policy it should be adhered to," laid down a doctrine occasionally heard of in the House of Commons in not altogether dissimilar circumstances. But the Ministry did not mean to come down.

The water difficulty which has arisen between New South Wales and Victoria is, as a political question, more remote from our experience. As a private quarrel it is common enough. Victoria has, in fact, been tapping the Murray for purposes of irrigation, which, as the Times Correspondent justly observes, not only means water, but a great deal of it. New South Wales, finding the industrious sister colony running away with its water, has protested. The quarrel is a pretty one. In those benighted times when the Colonial Office did not show a lively comprehension of Australian interests—partly, it may be, because there were no Australian interests in particular to know—the Murray was assigned to New South Wales. This monstrous blunder on the part of the Power without which there never would have been any New South Wales or Victoria to quarrel about water, or tax the produce of the nation which created them, is, it seems, the root of all the trouble. For, as the Murray runs through New South Wales, the "New South Walesers" hold that the water is theirs. But, as several of the affluents rise in Victoria, the Victorians tap them. Now the water which is tapped at the sources of the affluents cannot also run into the river. Further, the Murray is but a narrow river at all places, and in summer is apt to run underground, if it goes on running at all. When the Victorians take its supplies away for their own selfish purposes, there remains all the less for the New South Welshmen. These last protest and insist on getting their river back again. Here, as we have said, are the materials of a quarrel. As between private persons it would, we imagine, be held that the fault lies with Victoria. You must not go to the source of your neighbour's water-supply and drain it away, to the detriment of his mill and the diminution of his washing and drinking water. But there may be some difficulty in treating either New South Wales or Victoria as private persons. If the case comes, as apparently it will, before the Colonial Office or the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, it may be easy enough to decide that one party or other is in the right; but how is the award to be enforced? Can Victoria be compelled to destroy its irrigation works? and, if not, how is New South Wales to get back the water? Nations have fought on a smaller quarrel. Victoria and the neighbouring colony will probably not go so far as blows, but they may very conceivably come to more unfriendly words. Let us hope that it will go no further, and that nothing will happen to disturb the prosperity which has enabled Victorian workmen to subscribe 16,000*l.* in a few days to support a strike which might have brought more immigrants among them to compete for wages. This form of the interest they continue to take in the old country was at least more intelligent, and a hundred thousand times more mannerly, than the hissing at the QUEEN's name which disgraced the mass meeting of sympathy at Melbourne.

South Africa is a part of our colonial possessions which most assuredly secures abundant notice; and for the best of reasons—not the least of them being this, that it is precisely the portion of the Empire in which we have committed the most, and the most scandalous, blunders. According to reports, which appear to be not unfounded, we are about to be guilty of another. It is said that Swaziland is about to be handed over to the Boers. The first comment which a story of this sort suggests takes the form of the question, What conceivable reason can there be for handing Swaziland over to the Boers? There are considerations of honour and interest which forbid that it should be done. We have helped to disorganize the Swazi organization such as it is. Englishmen have formed a large part, or even the majority, of the adventurers who have swarmed into the country, have besotted its King with bad spirits, fomented its quarrels, and filched its substance. It will be a peculiar infamy if we now hand the unhappy people over to masters who regard them as immeasurably inferior to their cattle. Then it will be utterly disgraceful if, after allowing the Boers to impound a part of Zululand, we further permit them to seize this country. Again, it is not our interest to allow more of the country on the road to the Zambesi to pass under foreign control. The argument that Swaziland is surrounded by the Transvaal on three sides and is not immediately accessible from British territory is absurd. Its eastern border is Amatongaland, and it is perfectly competent for us to assume the protectorate of the Amatongas. They are willing that we should do so, and it is our interest to satisfy them, for their country lies on the coast, and is on the road to the interior which is being opened by the new African Company. It is no small consideration that Swaziland is well supplied with minerals and coals, which make it worth having. Finally, there is something in the fact that, according to the last reports, the English seem to be for the moment, at least, the ruling faction among the white adventurers who are scrambling for the country. But if all these and other reasons which could be alleged were wanting, there would still be a very satisfactory reason for not making the Boers this or any other present. It is contained, as we have already said, in the question, What are we to gain by such a piece of generosity? There is no reason whatever why we should give the Boers anything for nothing. There can hardly be any one who doubts that nothing is exactly the price we should receive for this gift, or for the Isle of Wight either. It is midsummer madness to believe that the Boers would attribute our concession to any motive but fear or weakness, or would take it in any other light than as an encouragement for further demands. The measure would, therefore, be barren of any good. If, again, it is supposed that the English immigration which is pouring into the Transvaal will shortly swamp the Boers, and so relieve us of their hostility, the concession is superfluous. An English majority would be, by position and race, friendly to the Empire, and it has no interest in pleasuring the Boer farmers. From any point of view, therefore, the concession is to be condemned, and we sincerely hope that nothing more will be heard of it, for the sake of the Ministry, in the first place, and then in the national interest.]

SOME SPEECHES OF THE WEEK.

IT would be absolutely impossible for us—even if there were the slightest reason for supposing it worth while to attempt—to keep pace with the political oratory of the week. The panting critic would toil after it in vain—that is to say, if he were unsophisticated enough to endeavour as a matter of supposed duty to catch it up. As it is, he will be quite content if he is a judicious person to “fall out”; and though perhaps he cannot exactly “jauk and let the ‘jaw go by’” altogether without note or comment, he will certainly exercise a very rigid parsimony in the selection of any specimens of it for remark. In fact, he must confine himself as far as possible to “business,” and search the speeches for any matter which is of other than a decorative or de-decorative character—for oratory, that is to say, which has some other object than that of showing what fine fellows the speaker and his party are, and what poor creatures the other fellows are. The application of such a rule will of course considerably lighten the critic's task. For, in the first place, it enables him to wash his hands of Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN and Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT—of Sir GEORGE, who apparently went to Fraserburgh to tell the Fraserburghers how shamefully Lord HARTINGTON had “surpassed the limits of political controversy” in remarking that Mr. GLADSTONE had broken up his party; and of Sir WILLIAM, who was invited to appear in his celebrated part of DEBORAH (with a song) before the National Liberal Club, and performed with his usual spirit. If we linger by his side for a moment longer, it is only to remark how delightful it is to hear Mr. GLADSTONE's somewhat Home Secretary talking of “WILLIAM O'BRIEN”—just as he will soon perhaps be prattling in the same familiar style of “PAT FORD” and “good old JOHN DEVOY.” We suppose Mr. O'BRIEN likes, or, at any rate, doesn't much mind, these endearments; but, we confess, we sometimes expect one of these gentlemen to turn upon Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT with the protest of the indignant advocate against the too elaborate civilities of a certain witness of doubtful reputation, “Don't ‘dear sir’ me, my good man; I hate these ‘sudden friendships.’”

There was a little, but very little, more in what Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN had to say to the Aberdonians, before whom he appeared in company with Mr. LABOUCHERE; but, unfortunately for him, his irrepressible companion's observations rather detracted from the effect of his own. Mr. LABOUCHERE is certainly not the most appropriate of speakers to “follow on the same side” when you are endeavouring to show that the policy of the Liberal party is one of genuine and spontaneous Liberalism, and not of Radicalism, forced down the reluctant Liberal throat. “With you, Mr. LABOUCHERE,” is not the most felicitous endorsement of a brief for the defence of the Gladstonians as against the charge of advocating and supporting “dangerous” and “extravagant fads.” In this case the junior, if, indeed, we may call him so, considerably hampered his leader in the construction of his argument, and promptly knocked the bottom out of it when it was completed. It would not, of course, do for Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN to admit, in Mr. LABOUCHERE's presence, that there was any large section of Liberals who “regarded the advanced programme of ‘the party with suspicion and alarm’”; and he was therefore shut up to the proof of the proposition that there was not, is not, nor ever could be, anything in that advanced programme which answered to the description of a “dangerous and extravagant fad.” With what success he attempted this the very nature of the enterprise is sufficient to declare; but had he been tenfold more successful than he was, Mr. LABOUCHERE would have taken the shine out of the success. “The Tories,” said that master of innocent malice, “asserted that the tail had now begun to wag the ‘Liberal dog.’” They said this because their creed was that “the people should sit still and be thankful for anything they could get, and not move at all themselves in the way of progress. But that was not the Radical creed. The ‘Radical creed was that the dog must wag the tail, and the ‘business of the tail was to see that the dog wagged in the ‘right direction.’” This is an unusual function for a tail, and one which, whatever may be the case in politics, has no analogue, that we are aware of, in animal life. The Radical who thus modestly disclaims through Mr. LABOUCHERE all pretensions to directing the Liberal party in any other sense than that it is not to stir a foot in any direction other than that which the aforesaid Radical presents to it, may, we think, be very well contented with the position.

Whether Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN and the other Front Bench gentlemen have as good reason to be contented with theirs it is not for us to say.

LORD SPENCER is one of those colleagues of Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN's in Mr. GLADSTONE's last Administration (which Sir GEORGE quitted for some reason or other which we cannot now recall) who prefer to talk about Irish rather than English politics. The taste, we cannot but think, is in Lord SPENCER's case a little morbid; but it is not without example in those forms of mental malady in which the sufferer's mind seems to brood perpetually over matters which one would have expected him to be more anxious than any one else in the world to forget. His remarks on the Home Rule scheme, and on the shape originally taken by it, contain, however, one point of considerable interest. Lord SPENCER, it appears, "full well remembers" that, when the subject of Home Rule was being first discussed, it was "taken as a matter of course among those whom he saw, and they were among the leaders of the party, that the Irish members should be retained. That was probably before the Cabinet was formed. It was only on discussion, and after hearing opinions from various people, that they were excluded as they were excluded by Mr. GLADSTONE's Bill." Lord SPENCER's account of what was "taken for granted" will, indeed, be a surprise to the public. For, if men were more sick of any one argument for Separation than of another, it was the argument that the concession of a separate Legislature to Ireland would set the English Parliament free to do its own work without let or hindrance from Irish obstruction. However, assuming Lord SPENCER's historical retrospect to be accurate, it presents us a very pleasing picture of the process by which Mr. GLADSTONE's "great scheme of constructive legislation" grew to that condition of final completeness which has since induced him to demolish it altogether, and to inform his countrymen that he is willing to rebuild it, if they like, on totally different lines. The process, it appears, was as follows:—First, Mr. GLADSTONE and his fellow-statesmen "took it for granted" that the Irish members ought to be retained. Then they had had "some discussion" and heard opinions; and thereupon they decided that the Irish members should be excluded. Then they had some more discussion, and heard some more opinions, and they came to the conclusion that the Irish members should be retained. And now we are all waiting to see whether, after more "discussion" with people who want, like Mr. MORLEY, to get rid of the Irish members, and more opinions from persons who, like Professor FREEMAN, are indisposed to restore the Heptarchy, Mr. GLADSTONE and the other statesmen will not come round yet again to the views embodied in the Home Rule theory that the Irish members ought to be excluded. Lord SPENCER had better not be too rash in committing himself to the defence of either position. Better were it to await the time when Mr. GLADSTONE may condescend to inform them which horse he means to ride. But that will not be, in all probability, till the very eve of the race.

MR. JOHN BALL.

IN MR. JOHN BALL we have lost one of the most active and successful pioneers of a branch of physical exploration, combined with healthful and fascinating adventure, which was in its infancy when he was in his youthful vigour. He lived to see it flourishing in every part of Europe, and it is hardly too much to say that this change was, in great part, due to his own labour and example. The development of mountaineering and scientific mountain topography within the last thirty or forty years, not one of the least remarkable developments of modern enterprise, must always be associated with the name of JOHN BALL. He was a mountaineer, and, what is more, a mountain traveller of wide and varied experience, long before the mountains of Europe had been opened to the general travelling public by high-roads, railways, well-appointed inns, trained guides, and all the luxurious apparatus now implied in the mention of Alpine excursions. It was in 1858 that Mr. JOHN BALL was elected to be the first President of the Alpine Club, as the person clearly indicated for that office by familiarity with the regions of the Club's operations. He was a searcher-out of nature, not a seeker of isolated difficulties to be overcome by feats of climbing; but his general knowledge of the great ranges, as it was then unequalled, has probably never yet been surpassed—if, indeed, it has been approached—among mountaineers of a newer generation. In the words of the late Mr. LONGMAN, himself one of the founders of the Club, Mr. BALL "possessed an extraordinary acquaintance with every portion of the Alpine chain, having crossed the main chain forty-eight times by thirty-two different passes, besides traversing nearly one hundred of the lateral passes. This extensive experience subsequently bore fruit in the Alpine Guide."

There is certainly no injustice to the living in doubting whether any one is left who can claim to fill Mr. BALL's place in this kind of encyclopædic Alpine wisdom; for we can hardly apply the name learning to an intimate knowledge derived from first-hand observation. Mr. TUCKETT, unlikely as he would be to make any such claim for himself, is probably the one on whom most mountaineers would fall. And the cause of Alpine exploration, as distinguished from (though by no means inconsistent with, and indeed including) the athletic recreation of climbing, is well represented by some who, though born in a younger generation than Mr. BALL's, began their training betimes in the old school. Mr. FRESHFIELD, we understand, has brought home a good account of work done in the Caucasus this summer, work of a kind thoroughly on the lines of the founders of the Alpine Club who still had the unconquered Alps of Switzerland before them. Mr. BALL's working days were over some time since, but his removal leaves a blank which will be felt wherever mountain exploration is pursued and honoured.

As to the Alpine Guide, it were superfluous to praise it. Rapid as are the changes in matter which guide-books ought to take note of, Mr. BALL's book, or rather series of books, contains so much that is of permanent scientific value that it must long be a classic in its department. At the same time, we would suggest to the Alpine Club that there could be no more fitting tribute to the memory of its first President than a new edition of his Guide, thoroughly revised in the spirit in which he would have revised it himself, and issued under the authority of the Club.

Mr. BALL's figure and manner will not easily be forgotten by those who knew him. He combined a presence both winning and dignified with the charm of old-fashioned courtesy, and was always ready with frank and generous approval for the triumphs of younger men in his old hunting-grounds. We do not think he ever became involved in a controversy; he certainly escaped the personal controversies from which the history of Alpine physics and of mountaineering has unhappily not been free. He leaves an example fit to be fully and sincerely commended to the lovers of the Alps who still rejoice in their youth.

TAUROMACHIE IN PARIS.

WHETHER the Moors did a good work when, as some authorities have it, they introduced bull-fighting into Spain about the middle of the eleventh century or not is a question upon which, no doubt, opinions are widely divergent. The young Spanish nobles took up the Moorish sport with an enthusiasm which soon made bull-fighting the national pastime of the Peninsula, and it remains to be seen whether the similar enthusiasm which even the curtailed performances of the Plaza de Toros in the Rue Pergolèse have elicited from the blasés Parisians may be taken to indicate the permanent adoption of the Spanish sport. Certainly it is evident that the builders of the colossal arena and the surrounding stables and corrals meant the buildings they erected to last longer than the season of the Great Exhibition of 1889. The sign-manual of the jerry-builder is conspicuous by its absence. The "museum," that faces the Rue Pergolèse, and through which one reaches the galleries above the corrals, is a great, lofty building, with a wide gallery running round the walls at the top of a broad staircase. Down below is the magnificent Court chariot, the panels emblazoned with coats of arms, in which the two caballeros en plaza make their first entry into the arena in the opening procession. In this detail the Parisians are more fortunate than the Spaniards; for it is only at the royal fêtes, given in Spain for either the marriage of the king or the birth of an heir to the throne, that the caballeros en plaza appear. They are always young men of good family, and may be said to be the representatives of the former days, when bull-fighting was the pastime of only the grands seigneurs. The Emperor Charles V. himself condescended to appear in the bull-ring on the occasion of the birth of his son Philip II.; and until the days of Louis XIV.'s grandson, the Duc d'Anjou, who set his face against bull-fighting, the sport had remained entirely in the hands of the nobility. But no amount of royal frowns were sufficient to displace bull-fighting in the affections of the people of Spain; and when the nobles gradually gave up the arena the "professionals" began to make their appearance therein. The greatest of these, whose names still live in the affections of their countrymen, were the two famous toreros of the last century, Francisco Romero and Castillares. The former of these was the first man who fought and killed the bull on foot; up to that time all the men in the ring were mounted. The particular style of fighting practised by Romero is still continued in the Ronda school, and is known as toreo fino, being distinguished by its elegance, quietness, and grace. The rival school of Seville was founded in 1830 by order of Ferdinand VII.

It is only on visiting a museum and corrals, such as those at the Rue Pergolèse, that a distinct idea can be obtained of the importance of the sport from the Spaniard's point of view, and of the consequent care and attention which is lavished upon every detail. The upper gallery of the great hall is adorned with trophies of banderillas, bunches of wide ribbons (the divisas or colours of the various breeders of fighting-bulls, which the bull wears on his shoulder when he arrives in the arena), the various dresses of the matadores, banderilleros, picadores, and chulos; the first glorious with gold embroidery of so heavy and valuable a description that 150*l.* is no uncommon price for a full matador costume. The banderilleros confine themselves to silver embroideries; the picadores are encased in thick yellow buckskin; while the chulos, the novices in the art of taurumachie, are only allowed to adorn their persons in sober brown with black embroideries. The heavy saddles, with their huge Moorish stirrups, the gay trappings of the mules employed to drag out the corpses of the horses and bulls, and many other minor accessories, all figure on the walls of the museum, where are also a number of copies after Goya's pictures celebrating the exploits in the bull-ring. Passing through another room one reaches the gallery of the first corral, and from this safe vantage point one looks down on a number of bulls wandering about the vast enclosure. And here one begins to realize how different is the popular ignorant idea of bull-fighting from the reality. The accepted idea amongst Northern nations is that any bull, no matter which, the first that "happens along," is caught and turned into the ring, there to be played with, tortured, and finally killed in a cruel and brutal manner. The reality is that no breeder of thoroughbred racers is more particular about the breeding and quality of his animals than the proprietor of a Spanish ganaderia. By no means is every bull fit to appear in the ring; and as every bull presented to the public not only bears his breeder's colours on his shoulder, but is branded on the flank with what may be termed the breeder's trade-mark, the ganadero knows that his reputation is at stake should the animals he provides be slow or cowardly. He, therefore, seldom fails to be present in person at the tienta, or trial, which is made every year on the yearling calves. These are tried singly in a courtyard against a man on horseback armed with a pole and aided by a man on foot with a cloak. This mimic trial of the ring suffices to show the mettle of the young bull. If he is prompt and furious in his attack on his enemies, he is accepted as a worthy descendant of his illustrious race; he is branded on the flank with his breeder's mark, and his right ear is slit. From that moment he is left to roam the great pastures at his own sweet will, never seeing a man except his own herdsmen, until four or five years old, when his speed and ferocity may be said to have attained their maximum. If in this first tienta he proves docile, easily mastered, and of an amiable disposition, he is speedily translated to the reward of his virtues through the medium of the butcher. In spite, however, of all the breeders' precautions to ensure the courage and ferocity of their bulls, it sometimes happens that disappointments take place, and that a bull will be so bewildered by the noise of the crowd, the sight of so many people, that, instead of his becoming more furious, he is simply dazed and stupid. When this occurs the rage of the public knows no bound; for a Spanish audience at a bull-fight is one of the most curiously impartial set of sightseers that it would be possible to find. They will be as ready to applaud a brave bull who sends the cuadrillas flying over the barrier, as they will be to hiss their best-beloved matador should he happen to drop the red muleta in the last supreme moment when he and the bull meet face to face. It is this very uncertainty in the method of the bull's attack which is the great danger to the matadores, and it is with the idea of learning the minds of their coming adversaries that they never fail to be present at the apartado, the choosing of the bulls on the morning of the bull-fight. These men have a theory that the bull's eyes magnify to a considerable extent, which consequently enables the toreros to avoid the charge by slipping the least possible bit to one side; and at the apartado the men study the eyes and action of the bulls more than anything else. Not long since in Spain a famous matador was with his brethren at the apartado before a bull-fight in which he was to take part. The eyes of one of the bulls attracted his attention, and, after studying the animal for a few minutes, he said to one of his companions:—"That bull sees true; and, if it comes to my turn to be his espada, he will kill me!"—a prophecy which proved exact.

In Paris, where the bull-fights, beautiful and enthralling as they are to the simple amateurs, are looked upon as the merest child's play by the great artists of the ring, these artists seldom give themselves the trouble to assist at the apartado; but to the ordinary stranger a visit to the corrals on the morning of the bull-fight is recommended, if he wants really to know more about taurumachie than the tinsel and glitter of the ring. Around each enclosure, under the network of low galleries which connect them, is a sort of narrow passage, separated from the enclosure by a strong brick wall, shoulder high. At close intervals in this wall are openings, just wide enough to admit a man; and that even in the corrals, where the animals are feeding peacefully, and in no way excited, it should be thought necessary to take such precautions for the safety of the few men who enter the corrals, and whom the bulls know by sight, gives one some idea of the danger so recognized. As soon as the bulls have been selected, six or eight in number, they are driven by the herdsmen on foot, and led by one or two of the tame oxen (the sheep-dogs to the fighting bulls) out of the last corral into a smaller covered one; from thence two or three will be induced to pass into the next compartment, and then they are separated and enclosed singly, each one in a sort of loose box into which the toreros and spectators look down from the narrow passages above. There is often much difficulty in inducing the bull to pass from one compartment to another, and then all sorts of expedients are resorted to. The enclosure is darkened in which he is, the next one flooded with daylight—a ruse that generally succeeds—and once he is through, the heavy doors, which are all opened and shut from the galleries above, close with a clang that makes toro wheel round and snort with bewildered rage and fury. His mona—the bunch of ribbons with the colours of his ganadero—is planted on his left shoulder, and he is passed from one box into another until he is left in one of the compartments or chiqueros of the toril, which opens on the ring. Here, in absolute darkness, he spends three or four hours, by which time the corrida begins, and the imprisoned bulls, their naturally amiable dispositions being aggravated by the captivity and darkness, are in the required state of frantic rage. When an animal thus trained from babyhood for fighting, as quick on his legs as a cat, as cunning as a fox, and with a strength which has become proverbial, is let loose in a ring, it is ridiculous to say, as many people do, that the odds are unequal and in favour of the men who meet him face to face. The sport of bull-fighting may have very many things to be said against it, especially amongst Northern races; but there can be no doubt that the nerve required to be a successful espada is of a rare and distinct quality that must be as finely tempered as a Toledo blade, and is one that merits the respect of all admirers of those somewhat rare qualities—courage and coolness and dexterity.

THE DECLINE OF COMEDY.

THE theatrical season has opened briskly enough; the doors of nearly every West-End theatre are open, and report speaks goldenly of the managerial profits; at any rate, the present autumn is as yet unmarked with any disastrous failure. It may be worth while now, while there is for the moment an abatement in the rapid succession of new plays and revivals, to glance at the various playbills and observe with what sort of fare theatrical caterers are supplying the demands of metropolitan playgoers. There are in all at the West End of London twenty-five theatres, a number now practically reduced to twenty-three, as the Olympic is closed for rebuilding and the Novelty is rarely opened for a regular dramatic season. Of these twenty-three houses, twenty-one either are now or will in a few days be open to the public; while the St. James's lacks a tenant until Mrs. Langtry occupies it, and the Vaudeville awaits Mr. Thorne's return from his country tour.

If we attempt a classification of the programmes of these twenty-one theatres from which fashionable London is this season to derive its amusement, we shall find serious "drama" and melodrama at seven houses—namely, Drury Lane, the Lyceum, Haymarket, Shaftesbury, Adelphi, Garrick, and Princess's; various forms of light musical entertainment (ranging from comic opera to burlesque) at seven others—the Prince of Wales's, Lyric, Gaiety, Savoy, Avenue, Opera Comique, and Royalty. "Farcical Comedy"—otherwise farce in three acts—constitutes the attraction at four theatres, the Strand, Comedy, Court, and Toole's; at the Globe a nondescript domestic drama, imported from America, which is scarcely worth the trouble of classification, has just been produced; while at the two remaining theatres, the Criterion and Terry's, are to be found the only plays in London to which it is in any way possible to apply the name of "Comedy."

"Comedy," indeed, is in a parlous state, and in speaking of "Comedy," let us say that we refer to the delineation of men and manners, amusing without extravagance, in which the present age of the drama (which we are told to consider a palmy one) is almost entirely deficient. Of twenty-one London theatres, but two are playing pieces which can by any possibility be called comedies, and of these, one, Robertson's Caste, is more than twenty years old, and in no way represents the productive power of the present day, while the other, Mr. Pinero's Sweet Lavender, though possessing much charm, is conceived and written in too essentially bourgeois a spirit to be wholly acceptable as the solitary specimen of what a living English dramatist can achieve in the field of pure comedy. The contemporary drama runs sorely into extremes, and appears to know no mean between a gloomy tale of crime or of vice, with Scotland Yard, either expressed or understood, for its deus ex machina, and the athletic and even acrobatic humours of farcical comedy. The historian of a future age who attempts to form a conception of us from a perusal of our contemporary drama would imagine that our knowledge of the humours of life was confined to chasing each other in and out of doors and windows, to concealment in silly and impossible hiding-places, and generally to a line of conduct which any average public-school boy would consider beneath him as childish and absurd.

In thus pleading for the dignity of Comedy we have no desire to judge the matter by too high a standard. There are those who, when they wish to pulverize a comic dramatist, proceed to place side by side with the dialogue of their victim a few quotations from The School for Scandal or She Stoops to Conquer. This is somewhat unfair; but, without expecting our playwrights to become at one bound Sheridans and Goldsmiths, there are other writers of plays comparison with whom would probably deeply offend the highly-paid dramatists of the day, of whose work we would gladly be reminded by them. To grumble because a fresh School for Scandal is not yearly added to the dramatic literature of the country would be unreasonable. Sheridan only wrote two wholly admirable comedies, Goldsmith only one, and one must go back over a century to reach them. But there are other plays, to which it is not so far a cry, for the like of which we may sigh in vain nowadays. Take the works of Robertson. When written, some quarter of a century ago, they incurred (notwithstanding, or perhaps we should say in consequence of, the favour with which they were received by the general public) the displeasure of the critical and the would-be critical, because they were not something they never pretended to be. They lacked robustness; they represented an ephemeral taste, they would never live, was the cry of their censors, one of whom, in epigrammatic vein, invented for them the title of the "teacup-and-saucer drama." Well; the work of Robertson, even that which he did for the old Prince of Wales's Theatre, which is undoubtedly his best, is by no means perfect; Caste alone is a thoroughly good play throughout; Ours and School are unequal in workmanship, at times excellent, at times taxing unduly the credulity of the listener, and prone to inopportune excursions into the realms of farce. Still, with all Robertson's faults, the lapse of twenty years has justified the verdict of the public rather than that of the critical few; and for this reason, that he was intensely human; his work goes straight to the heart; his types of character, his form of dialogue, are directly drawn from nature; to him, in fact, it was given to be in earnest without becoming gloomy, to be funny (farcically funny if you will) without descending to buffoonery. Messrs. Tom Taylor and Dubourg's New Men and Old Acres is another excellent comedy of a type our dramatists of to-day never attempt. Even Mr. Henry J. Byron, whom, perchance, the modern playwright regards with scorn as a concoctor of burlesque compounded of jingling rhymes and excruciating puns, wrote at least one play—Cyril's Success—which is conceived and executed in the true spirit of English comedy.

Now these plays—and we could multiply such instances at will—are by no means made of such enduring material as The School for Scandal and She Stoops to Conquer; still they give us something we never get from our living dramatists—a picture of the life of the day wherein pathos and humour are blended together, wherein the characters are recognizable types of flesh and blood, not fantoccini invented merely to embody some psychological crank of the author, or to perform those robust antics which until a recent date were only seen upon our stages at Christmas-time.

Is it too much to hope that the undeniable cleverness of many of our writers for the stage should not be above taking a lesson from the works of their immediate predecessors, and restoring to our playbills the almost obsolete name of "Comedy," which is nowadays seldom seen there, save in the composite form of "farcical comedy," "comedy-drama," and the like, wherein it is safe to predict that the prevailing element will not prove to be the "comedy," but that with which for the time being it is allied? We do not plead for the extinction of any form of theatrical entertainment now before the public. Let there even be burlesques in three acts if people can be found to sit them out; but we do plead, and that earnestly, for an occasional attempt to perpetuate the line of healthy English comedy unmixed with any alloy of farce, drama, or opera.

It would be unfair to conclude without acknowledging with satisfaction that a survey of this season's playbills shows a marked preponderance of original work over translations and adaptations in the London theatres; in only one instance is an important piece now before the public from a foreign source, and in that case the English adapter has so improved on his original as to invest his work with considerable claim to originality. Time was, and that not long ago, when to keep open some twenty London theatres with hardly any recourse to foreign authors or composers would have seemed an absolute impossibility; that the dramatic art of England should have made such progress in originality and independence is a most hopeful sign for the future, and encourages us to watch with increased interest the art work of the forthcoming dramatic season.

THE INDIA MUSEUM.

IT need not be regarded as surprising that Englishmen should usually be better acquainted with the museums of Paris and Italy than with those at home, for sight-seeing is a part of the business of travel. But museums are not maintained merely for the amusement of sight-seers, nor even as lounges for the British workman on strike. They are properly places for study. The collections in them are the raw material from which historians, artists, decorators, architects, anthropologists, and all sorts of workers can gather such knowledge and suggestion as may enable them to produce or interpret something which will tend to the benefit of the community.

The India Museum is a place of this kind. If properly developed and properly housed, it should be a representation in miniature of all that is finest and most notable in Indian civilization. The student should be able to find in it a complete historical collection of Indian art and antiquities. The architecture and sculpture of the various districts and races of India should be thoroughly represented by means of such original specimens as may be attainable (without damage to India), freely supplemented by models, casts, and reproductions of all sorts. There should be a large and well-arranged collection of permanent photographs, in which every ancient temple and building of importance should be thoroughly represented. The bulk of the Museum should be devoted to the products of industrial art, in which India has always occupied a foremost position. The finest specimens of Indian ornament should be secured and so displayed that the history of the ornament and the methods of manufacture should be, as far as possible, rendered evident to the eye. The history of Indian ornament is the most important in the world. India as a manufactory of beautiful things is probably as ancient as Chaldaea and Egypt. The processes of handicraft employed there to-day have had at least sixty centuries of trial. They should be studied and maintained; every hindrance should be put in the way of their destruction by the competition of Manchester and Birmingham. The India Museum should be their bulwark of defence and the monument of their excellence and worth. Instead of desiring to make India more and more the market for our rubbish, we should do better to discover what we can with advantage buy of her. The greatest benefit the rich can confer upon the poor is to purchase their good work and not to purchase the bad. The more we learn to buy the products of the ancient village industries of our great Eastern Empire, so much the more beneficial will our influence be upon the people of those villages. We can ruin India by setting up Art Schools of the South Kensington pattern all over the country, with payment by results and all the rest. We can cause her people to flourish exceedingly by raising our own taste to the level of that of the Indian peasantry, and buying the beautiful products, which, after six thousand years of practice, they know how to make better than any other people in the world. This work, most important both for India and for us, can only be accomplished by the India Museum. At present, in our ignorance and folly, we are discouraging the ancient handicrafts and, by Government interference, introducing machine manufactories to take their place. Piece goods of the ordinary type are being turned out in place of the beautiful old fabrics with which India used to supply the world. The effect of this is disastrous, both to India and to us. The effect of our present policy, if successful, would be to make India not a market for our goods, but a rival with us in every market in the world. The effect of a contrary policy, on the other hand, would be to make India complementary to ourselves. We might go on producing the useful and necessary machinery which Providence seems to have made us to make; India might supply us and the rest of the world with fabrics far more beautiful than any we can hope to produce in this sun-forsaken land. The richer India grew the more steel rails and freezing-machines, locomotive-engines, lightning-conductors, and telephones would she buy of us, the more of our ships would she fill with freight, the more of our commercial men would she employ to sell her goods to all parts of the world. She might be our biggest customer; we are making her our most dangerous rival.

The development of the India Museum is, therefore, a matter of practical importance to the great interests of India and England. Some such idea seems to have been grasped by its founders. Originally it was under the control of the Indian Government, and its cost was borne by Indian taxpayers. The expenditure on its behalf was continually increasing, but it was not wisely directed, and left little permanent results. The money was frittered away on exhibitions, instead of being devoted to the increase and study of the permanent collection. Such increase, moreover, as there was, was not accompanied by wise arrangement. Beautiful things, purchased or presented, were not made to tell their story. Historical completeness was not aimed at. In fact, the Museum became more and more a mere storehouse of curiosities, a chaos in which study was difficult or impossible, useless for any purpose except that of the mere preservation of certain objects against a better day. The Indian Government eventually grew tired of the whole thing, and got rid of it by a disastrous arrangement. It presented the antiquities to the British Museum, and the other collections to the Science and Art Department. The damage thus done is irreparable, for the industrial art collections are of little use unless they are accompanied by historical collections showing how the designs arose and developed.

In all museums it is a mistake to group the objects according to material or method of manufacture—textiles in one place, pottery in another; stonework here, wood-carving there. To only one possible arrangement can no valid objection be made, and that is arrangement in historical order. All products of a given date should be together. Only so can the virtues of a decorative style be appreciated. Imagine, for example, a miscellaneous collection of mediæval European works of art divided up according to the orthodox official manner—all the carved ivories together, all the terracottas together, and so forth. Such a collection would convey an entirely false impression. In a thirteenth-century ivory the figures would be seen under fine Gothic canopies. In the fourteenth century the architectural accessories would be found to be more elaborate. Later, all such appendages would disappear, and the nude human figure would be discovered. These changes, however, did not result from any development of ivory-carving as a separate art. They can only be explained and understood when the simultaneous developments of all the arts are grasped—developments which took place under the leadership, now of one art, now of another. If thirteenth-century ivories are grouped with specimens of architecture, painting, illumination, embroidery, goldsmith's work, and the like, all of the same date, it at once becomes possible to see how the ivory-carver has applied to his material those general principles of design which were abroad in his day. That is the lesson which it is worth an artist's while to learn. The present South Kensington system of grouping merely encourages a sort of aimless eclecticism, which is largely responsible for the pernicious and meaningless mingling of elements dragged from all manner of incompatible styles so common in the decorative design of the present day.

It follows, therefore, that the collections now housed in the India Museum need considerable increase before they can be of the full value to India and to us that they are capable of being. The Department of Antiquities, so ruinously destroyed by a stroke of the official pen, must be reconstituted by help of casts, reproductions, and the like, as well as may be. An excellent beginning in this respect has been made, and with the expenditure of incredibly little money. It is not too much to say that in no museum in England or abroad has so interesting and valuable a collection of things been brought together at so cheap a rate as the collection illustrative of Indian architecture in the first two halls of the India Museum.

It is stated that the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851 are going to diminish the area of land at the disposal of the India Museum, and especially that portion of it which is devoted to the architectural courts. The Commissioners are on their trial now before the bar of public opinion; they will do wisely to consider whether such action will not deal a heavy blow to the public interests of the Empire. They will, at all events, make no friends by the operation. It happens to be the case that it is exactly these architectural courts which need to be at once and permanently enlarged. Then only will it be possible so to arrange the wonderful collections now warehoused in the Museum that they may become a source of continually increasing utility both to the Empire from which they have come and to the nation to whose keeping they have been entrusted.

THE LEEDS FESTIVAL.

II.

THE performances on Friday, October 11, both in the morning and the evening, were by far the most interesting of the whole Festival; for at these two concerts were produced new works by the two native composers whose progress has for the last few years been watched with most interest by all who have the good of English music at heart. The high aims which both Dr. Parry and Professor Stanford have always set before them, the unflinching earnestness which has enabled them to resist all temptation to debase their art for the sake of mere gain, would have alone entitled any works from their pens to a respectful hearing, even if the former in Judith and the latter in The Revenge had not raised great expectations as to their future productions. That the Ode on St. Cecilia's Day and the Voyage of Maeldune have fully satisfied these is the highest praise which can be awarded them. In selecting for musical treatment the Ode which Pope wrote for one of the annual celebrations of St. Cecilia's Day, the composer has evidently been more influenced by the opportunities the words offer for variety of expression than by their poetical merit. Though the Ode contains much which is graceful, it bears throughout the stamp of the period at which it was written, and many of its phrases raise an involuntary smile where least intended. For this reason the choice was a dangerous one, and it speaks well for the strength of Dr. Parry's music that it is able successfully to tide over these weak places in the libretto. Nowhere is the composer's power more manifest than in the opening chorus, "Descend, ye Nine," where the changes in sentiment in the words are so frequent that the difficulty of duly expressing the poet's meaning, and at the same time of preventing the musical setting from appearing disconnected, seems at first sight insuperable. How Dr. Parry has done this it would be impossible to explain without musical quotations; but the result is a triumph of art, and is attained, moreover, by means which are apparently so simple that the number appears admirable alike for its tunefulness and spontaneity. Indeed, the consummate manner in which throughout the whole work the composer's wide erudition is employed, without the least parade or display of learning, shows more than anything that he has reached that stage at which his studies have become so thoroughly assimilated that what to others may seem mere hindrances to clear expression are with him the readiest means of enunciating his ideas. Though the Ode to St. Cecilia's Day contains numerous examples of the composer's mastery of the forms of musical science, yet his individuality is so strong that the music is never for a moment laboured, and there is no straining after mere effect or display. The style also is thoroughly English; in places recalling Purcell and Arne, yet never for a moment affectedly archaic, or such as could have been written by any but a composer thoroughly in sympathy with what is best in the latest developments of his art. As an instance of this happy combination of new and old, mention might be made of the scene for soprano solo and chorus, "But soon, too soon," in which the poet relates the story of the death of Orpheus; a scene which for melodic beauty and dramatic force is equal to anything of the kind produced for many years, while at the same time the means employed are such as the veriest purist could not find fault with. Equally good is the final solo and chorus, "Music the fiercest grief can charm," the climax to which is a magnificent piece of writing. It is almost needless to say that the work was a triumphant success, and at its close Dr. Parry was greeted with the heartiest applause heard throughout the Festival. The performance was excellent, the chorus singing throughout con amore. The soprano solos were admirably sung by Miss Macintyre; her delivery of the "Orpheus" scene especially being quite perfect. The remainder of the concert was devoted to Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, in which Señor Sarasate once more secured a familiar triumph, and to Beethoven's Choral Symphony, the solos in which were sung by Fräulein Fillunger, Miss Damian, and Messrs. McKay and Brereton. The performance was a fairly good one, though hardly up to the level which was to have been expected under the circumstances.

Professor Stanford's Voyage of Maeldune, which was the chief attraction of the concert on Friday evening, is a setting for chorus, soli, and orchestra of portions of one of Lord Tennyson's later poems, with which have been incorporated parts of The Sea Fairies, one of his earliest works. The book affords the composer an opportunity for picturesque writing of which he has not been slow to avail himself. In this respect Professor Stanford has never shown himself stronger. The series of pictures presented by the various isles is remarkable for the extraordinary variety of musical colouring with which the composer has treated them. From the Silent Isle,

Where a silent ocean always broke on a silent shore, with its delicately-written solo passages and accompaniment of muted strings, all through the various strange places which Maeldune and his followers visit, the interest is sustained by the wonderful diversity and ingenuity both of the orchestration and the vocal writing. It is difficult to signalize any of these scenes as more striking than the others, for they all of them are full of remarkable writing; but at a first hearing those which created the greatest impression were the Isle of Flowers, with its singularly graceful and beautiful melody; the Isle of Fire, in which the composer has succeeded in inventing an entirely new manner of describing (musically) a conflagration; and especially the lovely quartet in which the poet's description of the "Undersea Isle" is described. But the scene with the witches, and the final portion of the work are fully equal to these; indeed, it would be very difficult to point out weak places in any part of the score. The success which The Voyage of Maeldune achieved was striking, and the composer, who conducted in person, was greeted at its close with true Yorkshire warmth. The performance left but little to be desired. The solos were entrusted to Mme. Albani, Miss Hilda Wilson, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd and Barrington Foote; the chorus sang the difficult music allotted to them with plenty of spirit and enthusiasm. The beautiful orchestration, which is one of the most noticeable features of the work, was done ample justice to by the band. The second part of Friday evening's concert was devoted to a miscellaneous selection, which included Beethoven's Leonora (No. 3) Overture, the Scena, "Leise, leise," from Weber's Der Freischütz, sung by Mme. Albani, Wilbye's fine Madrigal, "Sweet honey-sucking bees," and Mendelssohn's music to A Midsummer Night's Dream. The latter was one of the best performances of the Festival. Sir Arthur Sullivan seemed more thoroughly in sympathy with the music than in more massive works, and the result was an admirable rendering of the charming composition. The singing of the Madrigal was not so satisfactory. The chorus was too large to do justice to all the delicate effects of light and shade which it demands, and the beautiful ending was spoiled by the introduction of an ill-advised rallentando.

The performance of Brahms's fine "German Requiem," which took place on Saturday morning, had been looked forward to with considerable interest, as the work had not previously been heard at Leeds, although it has for some years taken its place on a level with the greatest compositions of its kind. It is, therefore, all the more disappointing to be obliged to chronicle the fact that the performance was so much below the mark that it would have been better to have withdrawn the work altogether than to have done it in such a manner. From the outset it was evident that the music had been insufficiently rehearsed; and though in some numbers the chorus was better than in others, the false intonation, wrong notes, and want of attack were only too conspicuous throughout. The soprano part was to have been sung by Mme. Valleria, but her place was taken by Fräulein Fillunger, who sang as admirably as she always does. The baritone part was sung by Mr. Watkin Mills. In Mendelssohn's Lobgesang, which followed the "Requiem," the chorus were much more at home, and the performance was accordingly a great improvement on the first part of the concert, especially as the soprano music in it was sung by Mme. Albani, who replaced Mme. Valleria. With Saturday morning the Festival proper came to an end, but an extra concert was given on Saturday night, at which Sir Arthur Sullivan's Golden Legend and his music to Macbeth were given to a large and enthusiastic audience.

Looking at the Festival as a whole, it is evident that, if Leeds is to retain the supremacy for choral singing which it has hitherto done, more care must in future be taken in selecting voices, and all purely local considerations must be absolutely set on one side. Apart from the mere question of tone, the causes of the very great inequality in the performances are more difficult to determine. Certain mistakes, such as wrong notes and bad entries, must be laid to the door of the chorus master, though allowance must be made for the immense amount of unfamiliar music to be studied. It might be worth considering whether it would not be possible to do away with the arrangement by which the chorus is trained by one conductor and the performances are under the bâton of another. Such dual control must have a bad effect, however conscientiously and well both conductors work together. Though the Festival has witnessed the production of no works such as it is the fashion to call "epoch-making," yet it has added at least three compositions to the repertory of first-rate works by native composers, and as such, if for no other reason, it will be memorable.

THE ARMY AND THE WAY TO IT.

A SHORT time ago a distinguished general officer gave his views to the world upon the subject of the army as a profession. Thereupon a considerable discussion immediately arose upon the advantages and disadvantages of sending a young man into the army, and as to the amount of money upon which he could contrive to live when once he managed to secure a commission. The matter is, of course, one of very great interest, for in most families there is sure to be one son at least to whom the army is obviously the fittest career. But, as things stand, it is positive cruelty to send a lad into the service without giving him a sufficient allowance to meet the numerous calls upon his purse. How much assistance a young officer will require from home will naturally depend in a great measure upon the character of the regiment. In some corps the colonel will discourage unnecessary expense, do all he can to show that he disapproves of it, set the young man a good example himself, encourage the senior officers to do the same, and generally discharge those duties which usually devolve upon the head of a college. Regiments of this kind are well known, and a young man of limited means has only to select such a one. A military officer, like a naval officer, must live like a gentleman, of course. But in the army there is a very general disposition to make things easy for a poor man who has the courage not to be ashamed of his scanty means. There is no pressure to oblige him to drink champagne, or to hunt, or drive, or play cards, or to take part in those lesser excursions and amusements which fritter away far more money than is needed for the most liberal subscriptions towards the regular regimental hospitalities. If a young man is bent upon riotous living, he need not go into the army to gratify his tastes; and probably many more young fellows have come to trouble at Oxford and Cambridge, or in the first few years of their professional life, than in Her Majesty's service. We may also add that the military authorities have of late years done everything in their power to discourage high living among young officers. As for the exact amount required to supplement the pay which an officer receives on joining his regiment, the matter is one in which it is extremely difficult to lay down any hard or fixed line. None of us need to be told that it is impossible for a man to live in the Guards without a handsome private income, or that the cavalry is more expensive than the line, or that even in the line there are certain "crack" regiments in which it is out of the question for a poor man to hold his own. In every profession, and in every walk of life, we have to learn the wholesome lesson of cutting our coat according to our cloth. The mess expenses of a subaltern will come to about six or seven shillings a day, and his subscriptions to the band, to "guest nights," and to other regimental entertainments, will come to twenty-five pounds a year, or thereabouts. Then there is the renewal of his uniform, the pay of his regimental servant, his laundress (usually a soldier's wife, who contracts to do his washing for fifteen shillings a month), and other small incidental expenses. All else that a subaltern needs is pocket-money and the annual cost of his "mufti," or plain clothes, and in these, of course, everything will depend upon himself. If a subaltern receives an allowance of from one hundred and twenty to one hundred and fifty pounds a year in addition to his pay, he may consider himself extremely fortunate, for he will be able to live perfectly well within his income.

But this discussion sets us thinking of another question connected with the army which is, to our minds, of far greater importance—we refer to the examinations that the would-be officer has to pass before he can qualify for a commission, and the method in which he must be trained to pass those examinations. In these days no boy, unless he possesses exceptional talent, can pass for Woolwich or Sandhurst direct from his school. The examinations are competitive, and they are becoming every year more and more severe; and so it is that the young gentleman who is ambitious of carrying the Queen's sword must be sent to a "crammer" if he is ever to be in a position to gratify his laudable desires.

There are many reasons why the "cramming" system is undesirable. In the first place, the boy fresh from school, and probably scarcely yet seventeen years old, is brought in contact with men many years his seniors—officers studying for the Staff College and others—whose influence experience has proved to be in many cases highly detrimental. Then, too, the whole idea of "cramming" is completely rotten. The victim really learns nothing that is of lasting value. He is merely "coached" by an expert at the business with a view of his getting through a certain examination. All deep and thorough study of his subjects is ignored, the sole object being to furnish the crammed one with a parrot-like knowledge of all questions likely to be asked. And the "crammer" possessing an abnormally "prophetic soul" is the most successful in his craft. It seems to us to be little short of scandalous that, to undergo this process, a promising youth must of necessity be removed from school just at the time when the school is likely to do him some real good, and when he for his part can be of some service to it. And yet, as we have said before, if he is to get into the army, this must be his fate. Many youths somehow or other get through the ordeal. Others, we do not hesitate to say, are irretrievably ruined in brain, heart, mind, body, and soul.

And now the question naturally arises, What is to be the substitute for this state of things? We reply unhesitatingly as far as Sandhurst is concerned, go back to the old system. Let the candidate, as he used to do in the past, pass a qualifying examination, and let him receive his cadetship and afterwards his commission, as vacancies may arise. This is what used to happen, and when it was the rule it worked uncommonly well. A most promising field-officer of hussars, unhappily killed in the Soudan, passed last into Sandhurst, and last out of the Royal Military College, and this, too, when it was only necessary, to obtain a qualifying number of marks—fifteen hundred. In these days he could never have entered the army at all, except through the ranks. And yet he was a born cavalry leader and a most efficient officer in every way. Nor is this an isolated case. There are scores of such men whose proper places are usurped by those who are utterly unfit to fill them, but who have, nevertheless, been skilfully trained to satisfy the examiners. The amount of knowledge that they have managed to absorb is of about as much real use to them as is the Roman law to the average Bar-student, who makes haste to forget what his "Coach" has taught him as soon as he has passed his examination. We are confident that there are very few military men, whose opinion is worth having, who will venture to say that the British army is better officered than it was in the old days—in days in which, were the present regulations in force, in all probability many of the most brilliant leaders in the Peninsula, the Crimea, and the Indian Mutiny, nay even Wellington himself, would not have been permitted to serve their country.

A NEW NORWEGIAN ROAD.

IT was on a beautiful afternoon in August last that we found ourselves on the deck of the little Geiranger steamer moving across a sort of huge dripping-well towards Meraak, a spot we had not visited for six years. There lies its cluster of boat-sheds and dwelling-houses at the head of the black fjord, with its trim white church standing high above it, angel-like, in an act of benediction. And higher yet hover those well-remembered domes and peaks which seem to savagely defy the stranger to penetrate inland. But as we approach we find that six years have not left this well-hidden retreat wholly untouched by the "improving" hand of progress. That white house yonder, we are told, is a new hotel, which by its more conspicuous position and its gay colouring threatens to eclipse the plain, old-fashioned hostelry of our recollection. This, however, is a trifle compared with another novel feature. There lie at the head of the fjord two big excursion steamers, one of which is just now piping in doleful tones, while a little steam launch plies fussily between it and the shore. These, we hear, are excursion yachts that bring across the North Sea deckloads of picnickers for a week or so's cruising in the fjords. On landing, we find the little village overrun with the familiar "free-and-easy" tripper, idly clad in gaily-coloured flannel, "hooking" his female companion, and indulging in the customary holiday frolics. The jocund throng looks odd in its new surroundings. Can they, one wonders, be wholly untouched by the deep quietude of the place, only intensified by the murmur of the distant cataract, or by the majestic scenery that everywhere meets the eye? It must be so; for they are actually trying their clumsy horseplay upon those grave and dignified peasants who stand by, wondering at this unwonted mirth. They get for their pains a look which would tell them, could they fathom it, of something akin to horror. For the Norwegian peasant is not only a true gentleman himself, but has hitherto firmly believed in the good breeding of his English kinsmen. He cannot yet understand the juxtaposition of the English tongue and rude behaviour.

The new sight set us thinking. It is evident that Norway as a holiday resort is passing into a third phase of its development. Not many decades ago she was visited only by the keen and hardy lover lured to her domain by rumour of unexplored wildness or of adventurous sport. Then she was beset with a band of half-hearted, flippant admirers, who thought it vastly funny to sleep in a saeter, eat fladbrød, and otherwise play at leading the primitive life, and who shared their amusement with the less fortunate stayer-at-home by publishing, under some quaint title, the journal of their merry doings. This period also is now passing away. A far denser throng repairs to the picturesque Scandinavian coast—of such as make no pretence at desiring hardy exploit, but frankly demand the ease and comfort of modern travel. “Going to Norway” is rapidly losing all suggestion of adventure even for discreet spinsters and anxious mothers. Those steam-yachts lying out there mark the completion of the revolution.

But the outlook is not so very black even for old-fashioned persons like ourselves, who love retirement. There is a zigzag line climbing up above the village and losing itself in the inaccessibilities of the mountains. It is the new road that daringly scales these steep, rocky mountains to a height of 3,500 feet, and then joins itself at Grotlid to the old road that leads into the Gudbrandsdal, and so to Christiania. The road, we are told, is within a week or two of completion, and can even now be passed by carriage or stolkjaerre. Here, then, is a way of escape. Six years ago only a small piece of the road was built, and the pedestrian had a stiff climb to Grotlid. The new road will take us in about seven or eight hours to the quiet of the upland valley, where the air is dry and invigorating and the tripper will cease from troubling.

The next morning we were off at an early hour. The well-built, smooth-surfaced way winds up at a gentle and pretty even gradient. It is easy driving, but our pony thinks otherwise, and, turning his blinkerless eyes on us, plainly suggests a lightening of the load. So we leave him only the stolkjaerre and the baggage, and do the rest of the climb on foot. It is pleasanter so, for the pony keeps at the customary up-hill pace, and we have time to look about us and enjoy the view of the dark waters below us, walled in by lofty precipices, veined here and there by a white thread-like cataract. After a time the steady incline of the road gives a little, and we find ourselves in one of the greenest of upland valleys, well sprinkled with farms (gaards), and threaded by a serpentine stream, that looks as if it had been the model for the new road. Up new acclivities about the most ingenious windings, the road in one place passing over itself in a loop. Now the scene changes; the arm of the fjörd shrinks to a dark-blue eye, the mountain peaks, as seen from below, lose themselves in the loftier and ampler perspective. A saeter, with groups of warm-tinted cattle, marks the limit of human habitation. The bright green verdure soon begins to give place to the dark slate-coloured rock of the Blofjeld (Blue Mountain). The hard gneiss is polished smooth by the action of glaciers; and our Skydsgut points out to us some perfectly rounded basins in the gritty substance. Above us snow-fields and glaciers reveal themselves, wan and ghostly below their heavy cloud-canopy. The ascent becomes more easy; we are nearing the pass. The scene is as savage as Loch Coruisk itself; nothing but bare rock, dreary lakelet, and drearier snow-patch. One can see that this part of the road is only recently finished. Wheelbarrows, planks, and other apparatus of the navvy lie huddled up under the rocks at the side. The cunning horse stops, and again turning bids us mount. He doesn't like the cutting wind that drives through the gully of the pass, and he knows that shelter and rest are at hand. We must be near the highest point, for there stands proudly graven on the rock an inscription telling of the building of the road, with the dates of its beginning and its completion. After a short drive along fairly level ground we come on the magnificent Djupvand, whose waters seem to have taken a preternatural intensity of blue from the nearer sky. Six years have changed things here, too. Then there was but a miserable hut, where one could get nothing but a cup of coffee. Now, thanks to the enterprise of two women of the neighbourhood, a snug little chalet invites the weary and half-frozen traveller to warmth and an excellent repast. Comfort has spread even to this wild region. After an hour's rest we begin the easy descent to Grotlid, past a chain of lakes, each with its own hue, to the queen of them all, the Breidalsvand. The scenery rapidly changes again. A broad valley begins to form itself, strewn with picturesque boulders, on which are perched the bizarre imp-like forms of mountain birch. Between these stretch lovely blue lakelets set in boggy tracts of bright green and gold and red, for the dryness of the summer has brought on shrub and fern the brilliant autumn tint earlier than is usual. The sides of the valley are gently sloping mountains, their base fringed with a pale yellow by the reindeer moss that here abounds, and their rounded summits whitened by the purest snow. Here, we thought, were lovely groupings of colour for the artist; and there is the needed complement of life in the shape of a herd of cattle. But in the midst of this smooth progress and quiet enjoyment we are suddenly pulled up. There is a gap in the road, with only the under layer of big stones laid down, and ominous planks and heaps of stones. We descend, take off the cart fishing-rods and other loose articles, and anxiously watch our Skydsgut lead horse and vehicle across the ugly chasm. After a series of awful lurches and bumps, which make us shudder sympathetically with certain fragile treasures secreted in our portmanteaus, both horse and stolkjaerre land safely on the smooth road beyond. Three such ugly gaps having been duly weathered, we are able to mount again, and a short drive brings us to our destination.

We found the little station at Grotlid altered too, a considerable enlargement having taken place in anticipation of its important future. Here we were fortunate enough to meet the engineer of the road, Captain Rosenquist, whom with his family we had met on our last visit, and who tendered us a thoroughly Norwegian welcome. It was a rare pleasure in the cold evening to sit with our pipes over the hospitable hearth—the delightful “peis” which, alas! is all too rare in Norway—and hear the Captain discourse of the making of the road. It was, he told us, begun in January 1882. Its length is 40,360 metres (about 25 miles). The long time taken to complete it is due partly to the amount of blasting, but mainly to the circumstance that the work could only be carried on during two and a half summer months. The highest gradient (between Meraak and Djupvand) is about 1 in 12. This road—this was told us with special pride—had only cost eight kronor (about 9s.) per metre, and has been finished without any loss of life or serious accidents. The mining had been done by means of an electric current, a single machine firing simultaneously forty-two mines. Captain Rosenquist may well be proud of his engineering achievement, and disposed to content himself for the future with his less onerous military duties. To have planned and carried out a new road is one of the few unquestionable services to humanity. The new Geiranger road, moreover, will be one of the sights of Norway, making the much-frequented zigzag at Stalheim look small by comparison. It does not, of course, rise to the height of some of the Swiss roads; but, in respect of the mechanical difficulties overcome and of the quality of the scenery opened up, it will certainly take its place among the fine mountain roads of Europe. Its value depends on the circumstance that it offers a new and magnificent route from one of the most picturesque fjörds to Rösheim and the Iotunheim mountains, to the Dovrefjeld, to the Romsdal, and to Christiania itself.

We resolved to return the same way, so as to try the descent, and did not regret the decision. The meandering down at a gentle trot was delightful. It was an absorbing puzzle to make out the real course of the road amid the intricacies of curve that lay below us. Our delight was completed by the circumstance that we had a diminutive Skydsgut, wisely selected, perhaps, on the ground of light weight, who had never done the journey before. He gurgled over with laughing prattle the whole way, shouting inquiries about each new farm to a more experienced comrade who sat at the back of a cariole in front of us. His joyous wonder burst out into wild shouts as he saw the cunning windings of the road and the blue corner of the fjörd. The new road will help to take the Norwegian to the coast, and it may be speed him to the far-off Western country, where some relative or friend is pretty sure to have preceded him.

Each new road in Norway is a boon to the congested tourist world. It relieves the traffic and offers to the old-fashioned seeker of byways and sequestered nooks new opportunities. The need is great. The “tourist stream,” to use the Norwegian expression, has this year been greater than ever. The American has joined himself to the Britisher, and the German, loyally following his Emperor, has come in unwonted force. Next year the English tourist will be able to cross from Newcastle to Bergen thrice a week instead of once, and the opportunities from Hull are, we believe, to be increased also. A German doctor has recently been writing to a Berlin paper urging the advantages of Norway as a health resort, on the ground that it offers in close juxtaposition a marine and a mountain “kur.” The article closes with the magnanimous challenge, “Build railways and supply comfort, open up your country, and we shall not keep away.” Well may the Norwegian paper that quotes these lines indulge in a smile. The truth is, the Norwegians themselves travel in their country, and are doing so more and more. Naturally, therefore, they do not wish their land to be turned into another Switzerland. No, worthy Doctor, we agree with the Norwegians that railways can be postponed. More good roads like this Geiranger route, and more ample steamboat accommodation along the coast, are what is needed the better to disperse the crowd, or rather to give a ready way of escape for those who want to get out of the reach of Byer's Weekly News and all similar “comforts.” If to these are added a few good mountain stations, after the pattern of those on the Dovrefjeld, the worst of the pressure will be relieved. Happily Norway is large enough to offer retirement and delightful intercourse with its simple and worthy people in spite of a good many steam-yachts. There is, for example, the fine and unexplored province of Nordland, which rumour says the Tourist Club are thinking of opening up. So that, after all, there seems little immediate danger of the noisy excursionist driving quieter folk out of the country.

MR. MARKS'S BIRDS.

THE public is not often more legitimately entertained than by the collection of drawings and paintings of birds which Mr. H. Stacey Marks, R.A., is now exhibiting at the Fine Art Society's Gallery. These pictures are eminently amusing, fresh, and lively. Nothing exactly like them has been seen before. The colours are bright, and the drawing is quite correct enough for all ordinary purposes. The success of the collection, from a practical point of view, was instantly assured; and by the middle of the present week hardly one of the eighty or ninety examples remained unsold. This is all very satisfactory so far as it goes; but we hope we shall not be thought very disagreeable if we hint that it does not go quite far enough. Are these drawings presented to us as amusing bric-à-brac? If so, nothing could be better. Are they presented as fine art? Because, in that case, there is something to be said.

It is always pleasant to praise, and we will begin by dwelling on what there is in Mr. Marks's exhibition which we can commend almost without reserve. The rough sketches in water-colour—painted apparently at a sitting, with the living bird before the artist—are often excellently done. The modest drawing of the "Long-Billed Butcher Bird" (48) would have won the praise of Alexander Wilson. No work on the parrots but would be enriched by the five studies of "Macaws" (31), or by the drawing of the "Banksian Cockatoo" (17). These are washed in rapidly and cleverly, with a wet brush, and all that is essential in the plumage and habit of the bird has been caught. "A Night Heron" (61) is exquisitely painted; of the figures which are at all highly finished in Mr. Marks's collection this appears to us to be distinctly the best. Of but slightly less value are the groups of caique, touracou, conure, tanager, crested crane, and aracari (5 and 8). All these, in their rather humble way, are really artistic.

The next, and a little the less satisfactory, section of Mr. Marks's work consists of faithful studies of birds into which an element of intentional humour has been introduced. Of this class the most pleasing examples are the "Yellow-cheeked Amazon" (1), a parroquet with a wheedling, amatory smile; the "Guillemot" (4), sitting in a precarious and crazy position on its heels; the "Iceland Falcon" (12), which has puffed itself out into an absurd balloon of black and white feathers; the "Bampton Canaries" (37), with their silly little heads, conversing like a pair of foolish young mashers; and the "Bateleur Eagles" (44), who have quarrelled, and who glare vacantly out of the picture with wrath in their inflamed and scarlet faces. These the cynic may still do more than tolerate. But what we have no patience with are Mr. Marks's composed pictures. Here we see, piteously revealed to us by himself, how little of an artist he is. It is strange that his own limitations have not occurred to him as he hung these drawings side by side. It is strange that he could have placed his vigorous sketch of "Lear's Macaw" (22), which is a simple and competent piece of work, underneath the concentrated feebleness of "The Siesta" (19), a large expanse of jarring pinks and light greens which sets the teeth on edge. This picture is not merely shocking in colour, it is poor in execution. The flamingoes are fairly well drawn, but so painted that it would be impossible without previous knowledge to decide of what substance their plumage was formed. The birds might be modelled out of wet clay, so little has the airy elasticity and dry feathery character of the plumes been suggested. Another example of artistic futility is "By the Moonlit Shore (Jabirus)" (16), which really resembles, if we may be allowed to say so, one of those decorative panels which are manufactured in Italy to be sold in this country. Mr. Marks is not often so unfortunate as this; but he seldom really succeeds in anything more elaborate than a sketch from life. His largest picture at the Fine Art Society—the frieze of puffins called "Dominicans in Feathers" (36)—is very far from being painted in a masterly or interesting way. The light is monotonously distributed all over it, the brush-work conceals feebleness by smoothness, and the whole effect is one of insipidity. We like Mr. Marks's toucans and pelicans, his cockatoos and his vultures; but we like them as he saw them, not as he imagines them. We do not like him to make unconvincing compositions of "American Kestrels" (34) fighting, and, as for the vaunted "Love-Birds' Wedding" (6), it is simply a preparation for a childish chromolithograph, on a level with comic wall advertisements and humorous valentines. Mr. Marks's birds are either ornithological studies, the real merit of which consists in their fidelity, or they are very pretty and expensive toys. We do not see that there is anything else to be said about them.

Mr. Marks has written an interesting preface to his Catalogue, in which he makes some sensible and entertaining remarks about the lack of perception which people show. "I have often wondered," he says, "notwithstanding the general spread of education, at the singular ignorance of many of the visitors [at the Zoo] on the commonest matters of natural history. When I was drawing the Cassowary (42) a well-dressed girl of ten or twelve years cried out, 'O auntie! come and look at this peacock!' There appears to be a rooted conviction that all the animals at the Zoo, including the fish-eating seals, will eat bread, and that peppermint-drops and gingerbread-nuts are the daintiest delicacies that can be offered to the larger carnivora." The success of Mr. Marks's collection shows that, if the public knows little about birds, it wants to know more, and we hope it will encourage him to stick to what he says one of his brother Academicians calls his "poultry."

THE IRON TRADE.

AS coal and iron are the great instruments of modern production, their condition has come to be regarded as the best index to the economic state of the country. When manufactures generally are active the demand for both coal and iron must increase, and labour, therefore, must be in greater requisition. The present revival in trade was, in fact, heralded by augmented activity in the coal industry. For two years past the price of coal has been rising, the number of men employed in it has been increasing, and wages have been rapidly advancing. In some cases there have been strikes on a large scale before the demands of the men were conceded; but in very many instances the employers have given way without dispute. The iron industry, however, for a long time did not give evidence of increased activity. In 1886, indeed, the state of the trade was so bad that the manufacturers in Scotland agreed to reduce the output 25 per cent. Shortly after this the stock of pig iron in public stores in the Cleveland district, which is the largest producing district in the United Kingdom, began to decline. In 1886 the stock of pig iron in the public stores in Cleveland amounted to very nearly 730,000 tons, in 1887 that stock was reduced about 100,000 tons, the following year the reduction was as much as 200,000 tons, and during the current year there has been a further decrease of about 170,000 tons. In the three years so far, therefore, the total reduction has been about 470,000 tons. In other words, not only has the total production since 1886 been completely used up, but considerably more than half the surplus then existing has likewise been drawn upon. Strange to say, however, there was for a long time no reduction in the stocks in public stores in Scotland. On the contrary, between the beginning of 1885 and the beginning of the present year the stock in Scotland nearly doubled, being at the beginning of the current year nearly 1,030,000 tons. During the past few weeks, however, a reduction has been visible; but even now the stock is little under a million of tons. The vast accumulation in Scotland, in spite of the diminution in Cleveland, weighed so upon the market that prices continued to decline until nearly the end of last year. At one time last year the price of Scotch pig iron was as low as 37s. 1d. per ton, the lowest quotation for a quarter of a century. With the beginning of the present year, however, a rise set in. It was checked early in the summer. But within the last few weeks there has been a very active recovery, and at one time last week the price was as high as 55s. 10½d., being an advance of about 50 per cent. from the lowest price of last year, and the highest quotation since 1880. As long as there was no reduction in the Scotch stocks merchants doubted whether the improvement in Cleveland was more than temporary and accidental. They saw that there was no great increase in the foreign demand for British iron and steel, and they assumed, therefore, that the activity in Cleveland would not last very long. Therefore, they abstained from buying largely, contenting themselves with supplies sufficient for their immediate requirements. When at last, however, the Scotch stocks began to decrease, even though slightly, they judged it wise to purchase more freely, and as soon as the trade began to buy speculators thought they saw an opportunity to make money. They were eager to anticipate the trade demand, hoping that they would be able to sell to merchants at better quotations by-and-bye. The increased consumption of pig iron is the result of a greatly augmented demand for manufactured iron and steel, and the rise in prices of manufactured goods has been greater decidedly than that in pig iron. As a consequence of all this, there has sprung up during the past few weeks a considerable speculation in iron mining shares. Those shares are now not largely dealt in upon the London Stock Exchange; but on some of the provincial Stock Exchanges the business being done is very large, and the rise in prices is remarkable. Within twelve months many of those shares have doubled and even trebled in price.

What is most satisfactory in the recovery of this great industry is that it is mainly the result of improvement in the home trade of the country. There is some slight increase in the foreign demand; but it is slight compared with the augmented consumption at home. Shipbuilding, which during the three years that followed 1883 greatly fell off, has once more become active. Wear-and-tear, accidents and wrecks, and the growth of the international carrying trade, about 1887, caused a fresh demand for new shipping. Since then there has been a very satisfactory activity in the shipbuilding yards throughout the United Kingdom. At the same time there is no appearance of undue speculation as there was in the last period of active shipbuilding, and Government orders have lately given a new stimulus. At the same time the railway Companies are buying far more freely than they did during the recent period of depression. Then they were obliged to stint as much as possible their outlay for repairs, renewals, and improvements of all kinds; but now that their earnings are once more large they are not only making up for what was left undone in the past, they are making provision, too, for the future, when again there will be a decline in earnings. Moreover, the general manufacturing industry of the country is very active, and is consuming iron and steel in steadily increasing quantities. And lastly, the foreign and colonial loans and Companies which have been brought out in London in such great numbers of recent years have stimulated the industry. A very considerable proportion of the money raised has been spent upon railway construction and other industrial works, and has led, therefore, to a very largely increased demand for iron and steel manufactures. Regarding the foreign demand, there has been a falling off in American purchases since the excessive railway construction in the North-West and South-West came to an end. During the past year or two, indeed, the iron industry in the United States has been so depressed that it has not been profitable to import from Europe. But, on the other hand, the Continental demand has decidedly increased. There has been extraordinary activity in Germany more particularly, where the expenditure on naval and military works and railways is very large. The home production is quite insufficient to meet the demand, and the imports, consequently, from this country and Belgium are on a greatly increased scale. There is every reason to expect that the Continental demand will continue, and probably will increase rather than fall off, for some time to come. True, the rise of wages and of prices in the coal trade here at home has increased the cost of iron manufacture, and in the iron industry itself there has likewise been a considerable advance in wages, more particularly in the wages of the engineering branches of the trade. Consequently the recent rise in price has become a necessity, and there is little fear that the rise of price here will check the Continental demand, since the advance in wages and prices upon the Continent, and more especially in Germany, has been proportionately larger than here at home. It looks probable, too, that American purchases will increase in the immediate future. There has already been a rise in the price of pig-iron in the United States. Trade there is improving in all departments. The crops this year are unusually large, and, with the exception of wheat, they were also very good last year. Two good agricultural seasons in succession have stimulated industries of all kinds, and iron has naturally felt this stimulus. Besides, there is a probability that the expenditure on railways will be much larger in the immediate future than it has been in the immediate past. It is not likely, indeed, that we shall see a very great increase in the construction of new railways, for railway building has been overdone for some time past. But the growing prosperity of the South calls for an extension of the Southern railway system, and in the East, the Middle States, and the North-West and South-West the railway mileage is so immense that the mere demand for maintenance and renewal consumes an immense quantity of iron and steel. With regard to South America, it is to be presumed that the Argentine demand will fall off. But, on the other hand, we may reasonably expect a considerable increase in the Brazilian, Chilian, and Peruvian demand. So far, therefore, as the foreign trade is concerned, the likelihood is that we shall do more business in the immediate future than has been done in the past.

Here at home the prospects of trade generally are exceedingly good. There is every reason to hope that the revival will prove more lasting than any recovery since 1873. And, if general trade continues good, there are grounds for believing that the prosperity of the iron industry will be maintained. There are at the same time two dangers; one is that speculation may carry prices too high, and may thus defeat its own market. Hitherto speculators have been very prudent. But they have undoubtedly become more active during the past few weeks than they had been before, and it is possible at least that they may grow reckless. The other, and perhaps the more serious danger, is that the production may be unduly augmented. We have seen above that the recovery in the trade was made possible by the restriction of output to which the Scotch manufacturers agreed three years ago. They have so far abided by their agreement; but now that prices have so far risen they may be tempted to very largely increase the production. Before 1873 the producing capacity of this country was unduly stimulated. It was then the chief iron producer of the world, and as much of the capital needed for railway construction all over the world was obtained in London, a very large proportion of that money was employed in purchasing iron for the new railways. Since 1873, however, there has been an extraordinary development of the iron industry in foreign countries. The United States, Germany, Russia, Belgium, and France have all greatly increased their production. The development is a natural result of the growth of wealth in those countries, and, of course, it has been immensely aided by the protective tariffs imposed. We have, therefore, no longer the command of the world's market, and we are consequently not able in the best years to work to nearly the full extent of our capacity. On the contrary, we have every now and then to limit even our reduced production. If the production here at home, then, were to be increased very largely and very suddenly, not only would the rise in prices be checked, but probably there would follow a considerable fall. The cost of production, however has been so much increased by the advance in wages and the rise in the price of coal and coke, that the trade would become unprofitable if there were to be any considerable decline in prices. Of course, it is not desirable or expedient that the output should be unduly restricted. That would mean such an advance in prices that probably our foreign competitors would undersell us. What is to be hoped for is a gradual and prudent increase in production such as, while keeping pace with the growing consumption, will allow on the one hand of reasonable profits being earned, and will prevent on the other hand such an undue rise in price as may enable our foreign competitors to undersell us in the foreign market, and may check prosperity here at home. This, of course, is difficult, considering how much greater the productive capacity is than the actual production. But, unless it is accomplished in some way or other, the brighter future that now seems opening to the iron trade will again become overclouded.

THE CHOROLISTHA.

"MAY I have the pleasure of a dance?" "I can give you the next chorolistha but two." Will such an exchange of amenities as this ever arouse emotion in a male or female heart (or both) in an actual British ball-room? It is to be hoped not, because all change is hateful in itself, and for persons sound in head and limb the British ball-room does very well as it is. It is also to be hoped so, because Mr. Edward Scott, "Professor of dancing and scientific grace-culture," who has invented the chorolistha, and hopes to force it upon the dancing world, is the only man who has ever printed any sensible instructions on the subject of waltzing, and discourses upon the terpsichorean art with genuine enthusiasm and appreciation. As far as we know, Mr. Scott now makes his first appearance as a composer both of dancing and music.

To begin with, the name of his dance, if classical, is inconvenient. He derives it "from χορός, a dance, and δολισθάνω, to glide," and explains that, "in regard to sequence of steps and rhythm, the chorolistha is different from any other known dance." Naturally, if it was not, it would not be the chorolistha, but some other known dance. "By comparison, however, it may be said to combine something of the sprightliness of the polka with the elegance of the waltz; yet withal to possess a dignity and refinement belonging rather to movements that were in vogue when dancing was recognized and taught as one of the fine arts." Never having been privileged to dance the chorolistha, or see it danced, we cannot say what it feels or looks like; but, judging from Mr. Scott's verbal description, and from the time, it appears to be, as he says (only more elegantly), something between a waltz and a polka. The partners hold each other, it appears from the letter-press and also from the picture on the back, as if they were waltzing; the tune is in common time, and is one of those melodies that sounds rather hackneyed the first time it is heard. It resembles a slightly funereal polka—perhaps, something like the "grisly polka step" that the nephew of many uncles dances "all down the silent street," in Mr. Anstey's recitation—and is not altogether unlike the airs appropriate to a weird gambol called the polka mazurka, which was rather popular twenty-five years ago, and is still to be met with occasionally in old-fashioned ball-rooms. One of the advantages claimed by Mr. Scott for the child of his fancy is that it does not make the dancer giddy, because of a "prolonged glide, which causes the figure described in rotation to become elliptical rather than circular." It may well be so, because, as far as can be discerned from the description, the dancers turn one way round for one bar and the other for the next; but all such problems will be solved by the first people who habitually dance chorolisthas. The question whether a new dance will ever become fashionable is as difficult to answer beforehand as the question whether the 17. shares of a new gold mining Company will ever sell for 20/. As far as concerns Mr. Scott personally, we wish him well; but, on principle, the blood of martyrs ought to be exacted before young men and women of the world consent to learn a new round dance.

NATIONAL SCHOOL OF COOKERY.

THE new buildings of the National Training School of Cookery in the Buckingham Palace Road were opened to the public, last Tuesday, very appropriately by an excellent luncheon, which was cooked on the premises and by the superintendents and pupils, and certainly was a warrant that the public restaurant, which will be opened in a few weeks, may possibly prove to be one of the most successful in London. The premises are large and spacious, and the kitchens are supplied with all the latest novelties. The building, which was designed by Mr. Purdon Clarke, is in that peculiar style of architecture which is a sort of a cross between the Dutch of Amsterdam and the Elizabethan, and which is popularly known as "Queen Anne." Mrs. Clarke, the lady superintendent, whose energy is so well known in connexion with the cheap dinners during the successive exhibitions at South Kensington, managed to save a considerable sum of money for the Committee during those halcyon days, with which they have been enabled to erect the present commodious structure, where ladies and servants can be properly educated in that most necessary of domestic arts—gastronomy. The lecture-halls, of which there are two, and in which what are known as "demonstrations" take place, are already crowded daily by a number of ladies eager to be initiated in the mysteries of how sauces should be made and soups concocted, jellies rendered stiff and shapely, hares jugged, and sundry odds and ends of meat and poultry manufactured into dishes with elaborate French names. There is a tendency all over the country just now to graft on to plain English cooking a sort of nondescript cuisine popularly known as "entrées." And we trust that the National School of Cookery will not neglect the good, old-fashioned plain English cookery of our ancestors, which, unfortunately, since the introduction of the all-prevalent gas-stove, has become more or less a thing of the past; for sound, wholesome English roast beef refuses to be "done" in a gas-oven, and there is as great a difference between the parboiled roast beefs and muttons of our restaurants and the succulent dishes thereof which so rejoiced the hearts of our forebears as there is between night and day; and the same may be said of the roasting and preparing of poultry and game—an art, by the way, in which English cooks of the past excelled—for there can be no comparing an English capon prepared after the fashion of a well-conditioned country-house kitchen and that multitudinous-legged fowl who generally brings the table d'hôte of France to a close, and flourishes on the menu as "poulet au cresson." Mrs. Clarke and her lady teachers, cooks, and pupils, we are assured, have determined to study hygienic cookery; and it may perhaps interest them to know, if they are not aware of the fact, that the leading scientists of the day have condemned dish-covers, as causing the almost instantaneous decomposition of the viands beneath them, owing to the confined and hot moisture. They are utterly abolished from Bignon's, at the instance of great authorities. Be this as it may—and we only give it on hearsay report—there can be no question as to the importance of the School of Cookery, if it performs its mission, as a national institution of the highest importance, and it has the best wishes of all lovers of well-prepared and wholesome food.

CATS AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE "coming-of-age" show of the National Cat Club, which has been held at the Crystal Palace this week, may be said to have been remarkable more for its feline curiosities than for any extraordinary beauty on the part of the exhibits. The Persian and Angora cats left a good deal to be desired, and, on the whole, the short-haired cats shown were far finer animals than their long-haired relations. The black Persians, in particular, were poor in number and quality, which may, perhaps, be accounted for by the fact that they are no longer as "fashionable" as their "chinchilla" or "blue" brethren. In the class for the latter uncanny-looking animals, Mrs. H. B. Thompson took the first prize with her "Winks," a winner of many prizes during its four-and-a-half years of existence, but to our mind not an altogether satisfactory cat, owing to its "blue" colour having a yellowish tinge through it. The class for pure white Persians was a good one, and Miss L. Abbott's "Beauty," which took the first prize, was a superb cat, of extraordinary size for its age of eleven months. Perhaps the fact of its being born on "India's coral strand," at Bombay, may have accelerated its growth. In Class 24, for "blue or silver tabby, with or without white," Miss F. Moore took not only first prize with "Felix," but also the special prize for the best long-haired cat in the Show; to both of which awards we take decided exception, as to our mind "Felix" was handicapped by an ugly head and an inferior coat, and altogether was not to be compared to Mrs. T. Fry's "Billy," in the same class, who, though a winner of upwards of thirty prizes in less than two years, was entirely passed over at the Show this week. A most beautiful and remarkable cat was the first prize in Class 25, Miss D. B. Gresham's "Donovan," only seven months old, with a coat like that of a Russian black fox, dark smoke-colour underneath, with black tips to the hairs, a peculiarity which we do not remember having ever seen on a cat before. There were two classes of Manx cats, with three entries in the one and two in the other, which no doubt simplified the judges' task considerably. The special prize for the best short-haired cat in the Show went to Mr. K. Hutchinson's red-tabby "May Queen," as well as the first prize in Class 13. One of the curiosities of the Show were the three tortoiseshell tom-cats, whose rarity may be judged from the fact that in the twenty other Shows held by the National Cat Club before this one, only one other male tortoiseshell has been exhibited. Indeed, so rare was this colour amongst the feline male sex, that a good many years ago a large prize was, we believe, offered for a specimen; and it is, therefore, to a certain degree comprehensible that Mr. T. Huntley, the proud owner of the first prize in the male tortoiseshell class, should price his cat, "Tote," at 200*l.* In Class 8 were two cats worthy of remark, the first and second prize-winners. Both were short-haired cats, the first, Mrs. Herring's "Roguey," a pure blue Russian cat of lively and playful demeanour. The second, a Siamese cat, "Banglempoo," belonged to Mr. H. A. Badman. The latter was a very peculiar-looking animal with a smooth fawn-coloured coat, dark brown ears and nose, and blue eyes. It looked as if it must have some relationship to the Lemur tribe. Another odd cat was Mrs. Mowser's Abyssinian cat, "Tomee," with a coat much resembling that of the Suricates and Ichneumons at the Zoological Gardens. Mr. Venables deserves praise for the careful housing of the cats in the padlocked cages of galvanized iron. That the appetites of the exhibits did not suffer from their enforced confinement may be judged from the fact that it was found necessary to provide no less than eighty gallons of milk and over three hundredweight of meat for their consumption during the Show.

MONEY MATTERS.

AS the week draws to a close the bill-brokers and discount-houses, who lately were so confident that the great financial houses would keep the money market easy, are beginning to doubt whether they have not been too sanguine. And in consequence there is a decided, though only a small, advance in the rate of discount in the open market. At the present time the receipts of revenue at the Bank of England are about a million a week, and those receipts are passed from the control of the other banks to that of the Bank of England. Further, within the next fortnight from half a million to three-quarters of a million in gold will have to be sent from London to Scotland. And, over and above all this, gold shipments to Brazil have begun again. On Wednesday and Thursday of this week they amounted to 342,000*l.*, and it is said that as much more will be sent very shortly. It is very profitable at present to send gold from this country to Rio, and therefore, over and above what is required by the new banks that are being started, the metal is being shipped, for the sake of the profit, by financial houses. Then gold is going in smaller amounts to South Africa, and it is beginning to be feared that a drain for New York may spring up. Altogether, therefore, it looks as if we were about to see a revival of apprehensions in the money market.

There is a struggle going on just now between the Mint and the bullion-brokers. For months past the Mint has been buying silver very largely. According to the City, it has bought about a million's worth. Of course this has raised the price of the metal. Last week it advanced to 43*½* per ounce, a quotation not reached before since November of last year. The authorities of the Mint rightly or wrongly believe that an attempt is being made to make them pay more than the real market value, and they stopped buying for some days. The price in consequence fell half a farthing per oz. But when they began buying again at the beginning of this week there was a rise of twice as much, or a farthing per oz. The Mint has again stopped buying, but the price is steady. It remains to be seen whether the belief of the Mint authorities is well founded, or whether the production of silver has been so reduced by the continuous fall in the price that the available supply in the London market at present is so small that any considerable further demand causes a considerable rise in price.

Operators on the Stock Exchange are for the moment waiting upon events. The Czar's visit to Berlin has come off, and the speech from the throne in the German Parliament is very peaceful. But nothing has come of either event. It is feared that the Liquidation on the Berlin Bourse which is about to begin will be a difficult one. Speculation has been carried too far and money is scarce. It is hoped, nevertheless, that all the money wanted will be supplied, and that, in some way or other, the operators in difficulties will be helped over for the time being at all events. Still speculators like to be sure that nothing serious will happen before they increase their risks. Here in London, too, operators are beginning to fear that we are about to have another money scare. It may not last very long or do much harm, but it for all that may for a few days knock down prices. Above all, the situation in the Argentine Republic is disquieting. For months past a crisis has seemed imminent, but by some means it has been postponed. The public is not reassured. It fears that the agony is only being prolonged, and it dreads that when the crisis comes it will be all the more severe for the delay. Lastly, drought in the Transvaal has threatened to deprive the mines of the water they require, and temporarily at least has depressed the market. Therefore, operators are looking for some leader bold enough to take the initiative, and powerful enough to move the markets. From Paris the lead was expected. The money market there is abundantly supplied, and the great banks are known to have entered into important engagements that require stronger and more active markets. But the Paris operators have not as yet, at all events, moved effectively.

Meantime new Companies are coming out here in immense numbers, and most of them are being floated with success. The promoters take care, of course, to ensure that they are underwritten before they are offered for subscription. And they thus ensure themselves against serious loss. That they are able to get them underwritten affords the clearest proof that the public generally expects speculation to be carried much farther, and to continue for a considerable time yet. The expectation is based upon the flourishing state of trade, not only all over the United Kingdom, but on the Continent and in America. Good trade gives larger profits, out of which to make investments, and, therefore, little real difficulty is encountered in getting Companies underwritten. Every now and then, however, there is no real occasion for underwriting. The public becomes eager to subscribe, and there is a literal scramble for application forms. The latest example occurred on Thursday when the Exploration Company, Limited, was brought out. Messrs. Smith, Payne's bank, where applications were received, was besieged long before the doors were open. A body of policemen had to be called in to keep order, or the struggling crowd would have injured one another, and damaged the premises. At the Company's offices also, and at those of the Company's brokers, the services of policemen had to be secured. Before the Company was brought out, the ordinary shares were at a premium of two, and the founders' shares were quoted about 300.

The new system of founders' shares gives to promoters means of attracting underwriters. Usually one founder's share is offered to any one who will underwrite a considerable number of ordinary shares. And the inducement, as we have said, proves sufficient. Bearing in mind that founders' shares are usually of the nominal value of 1*l.* or 10*l.*, and that they in most cases take half the profits after the ordinary shareholders receive a specified percentage, it will show how much these shares have struck the fancy of the public, when we state that in one Company the founders' shares are quoted at 7,000*l.*, in another at 2,000*l.*, in another at 1,900*l.*, in another at 1,750*l.*, and in a fifth at 1,250*l.* In two cases the quotation is from 600*l.* to 700*l.*, in three cases from 300*l.* to 400*l.*, in two cases from 250*l.* to 300*l.*, and in two other cases from 140*l.* to 200*l.*

DOM LUIS I.

THE ceremonious words addressed by Queen Dona Maria Pia of Portugal to her son Dom Carlos after she had, according to an ancient Portuguese custom, shut the eyes of her dead husband, "The King is dead; long live the King!" closed rather dramatically a long reign of over twenty-eight years. When, in 1861, Dom Luis ascended the throne, his brother, the youthful King Dom Pedro V., had just died of typhus fever at the Palace of the Necessidades; whilst his younger brothers, Dom Ferdinand and Dom João, having contracted the same malady, were sinking fast. By a curious coincidence, nearly thirty years later the surviving brother, the Duke of Coimbra, died a few hours before the King, both Royal brothers being fatally stricken at the same time. His Majesty, however, had been long suffering, and a fatal termination of his malady was expected any day during the last four or five years. He was, indeed, so ill when his youngest brother expired that it is doubtful if he was ever made aware of the sad fact. Dom Luis was a man of considerable attainments and natural ability, and few sovereigns in modern times have enjoyed greater or more deserved popularity. A fairly long service in the navy when he was Infant had made him acquainted with many countries, and had considerably widened his views. Again, his father Dom Ferdinand of Saxe-Coburg, King Consort of Maria II., possessed exceptional ability and taste. He directed his son's education, and, above all, his artistic culture. If we compare Dom Luis with the majority of his predecessors, we find him standing out in very favourable prominence, for nothing can be imagined less intellectual or more bigoted than the Portuguese sovereigns and their Court, from Dom Sebastian of romantic fame to Dom Pedro IV., the grandfather of the late King. Beckford, who lived a good deal in Portugal in the last half of the eighteenth century, has described the Court as "insufferably dull when it was not insupportably vicious." Dull the Court of Portugal has remained, but its moral tone has under Dom Luis and Dona Maria Pia been excellent. His Majesty thoroughly understood his duties as a constitutional monarch, and although he invariably took the lead in all intellectual movements, he carefully abstained from interference in politics, except on one occasion, when he very nearly came to grief. In 1869 he strongly backed the Left in the Cortes to obtain the passing of a Bill for the sale of the considerable property still possessed by the Church after the confiscation of the lands and chattels of the enormously rich monasteries and nunneries suppressed in 1833. In this measure he was ably supported by many politicians; but Lisbon, especially, came close on witnessing some most ugly scenes. Whether an impoverished Church is to be desired in a country the inhabitants of which refuse to belong to any other than the Roman Catholic religion, or else become blatant and exceedingly frivolous Free-thinkers, remains to be seen. Hitherto it has not been pre-eminently successful, and an impoverished clergy has had a hard struggle for existence, and the spread of that peculiar kind of noisy atheism which has gained so much ground under the present Republic in France is giving serious alarm to the best thinkers among the Portuguese. Very skilful was Dom Luis in pioneering himself through the shoals created for him by General Prim, when that hot-headed personage was active in Spanish politics, and Queen Isabel II. of Spain was residing comfortably at the Palais de Castille on the Champs-Élysées, in what she was pleased to call her "charming exile." It was then proposed that Spain should be annexed to Portugal and formed into one kingdom under the Portuguese dynasty. Dom Pedro very wittily recalled to the Commission which was sent to make this proposal to him the famous story of the man who tried to sit down between two stools and fell to the ground in consequence. He had no intention, he said, to follow his example. Between these two events, and his occasional visits to Paris, London, and Turin, sometimes with and sometimes without the Queen, the late King's life was, for a sovereign, one of the quietest imaginable. However, he has witnessed great changes in his two capitals. Lisbon and Oporto, formerly the two dirtiest cities in Europe, are now about the cleanest. Tramways have succeeded amazingly well in Portugal, and Cintra and Lisbon are now connected by one of those unpicturesque means of communication which are the delight of the rising generation of citizens, who look upon "O tram!" as a sort of incarnation of that big word they so dearly love—Progress. The electric light, too, has been introduced all over the capital. The railway is still, however, a stumbling-block, for it has a tendency to progress in Portugal more slowly than in any part of the known globe unless it be Northern Spain. Education has spread with great success, and it is difficult to find a Portuguese now under thirty who cannot read and write. Blessed with a perfect climate, lovely scenery, and many interesting old cities, Portugal is perhaps the country to be most envied in Europe. It has so many fewer troubles, and goes on its onward march very slowly, but surely; and Dom Carlos has but to follow the pacific and dolce far niente policy of his father to live and reign a happy and prosperous monarch. King Luis made many efforts to elevate the intellectual status of his subjects, but this was almost beyond his power. The Portuguese, a brave and sensible people, have produced fewer poets and artists than any other nation; and although they were very proud that their King should have translated Hamlet and Richard III. into excellent Portuguese verse, as a rule they contented themselves with admiring the costly binding in which the Royal version of the masterpieces of the Bard of Avon were produced instead of perusing the text. The majority preferred, and still prefer, Frou-Frou, and the last Parisian sensation by Sardou or Meilhac, to Shakspeare. King Luis will be sincerely mourned, and a kindly people will sympathize keenly with his gentle widow, the youngest daughter of Victor Emmanuel, Dona Maria Pia, a lady who has endeared herself singularly to her subjects. The new Queen is a daughter of the Count of Paris, and has already, as Duchess of Braganza, made herself popular.

PAR NOBILE FRATRUM.

[Mr. Barnum, who chances to be at Southport just now, is currently reported to be casting longing glances upon Cambridge Hall, where to-morrow Mr. Gladstone is to address the Lancashire Liberals.—Daily News.]

WHO could doubt your "longing glances"?
Surely it is plain to all
What might urge you to advances
For the hire of Cambridge Hall.

Not the grand accommodation
You would for your wonders win,
But the Unparalleled Sensation
With the hall itself "thrown in."

Yes, my Barnum! Even so men
Balked of their grand coup may be—
Yes, Napoleon of showmen,
You have missed your destiny!

Had the laggard Fates but brought you
Some days more "before the fair,"
Had some prescient instinct taught you
What a chance lay waiting there;

Had your stars but favoured—darn 'em!
You had made an earlier start,
And the Transatlantic Barnum
Bagged his English counterpart.

Ah! what day of radiant glory!
Ah! what hour of swelling pride!
Had you told, with him, your story
On one platform, side by side.

Saying:—"Fooldom's vast abysses
I have dropped my plummet through
In America; and this is
He who plumbs its depths with you.

"I exhibited the Mermaid,
Now, alas! laid on the shelf;
He has quite an equal stir made
With that nondescript—himself.

"I have brought you over Jumbo;
He provides you, it is clear,
With an ever-present Mumbo-
Jumbo for your worship here.

"Neither ever found resist him
Barriers to his march sublime;
Each has deeply traced his 'system'
On the records of his time.

"Both are certain of survival
Evermore on history's page;
None can say which noble rival
Likeliest is to name the age.

"Brothers kept too long asunder,
Potentates of kindred stuff,
Hail us, lords of gaping Wonder!
Crown us, kings of blague and puff!"

Thus would you have told your story,
Doubtless, in two nations' ears;
Thus illumined with your glory
Two awe-stricken hemispheres;

Had not stars unfriendly—darn 'em!

Ordering you too late a start,
Made the Transatlantic Barnum
Miss his English counterpart.

Yes, O Yankee Gl-dst-ne! so men
Balked of their grand coup may be—
Yes, Napoleon of showmen!
You have missed your destiny.

REVIEWS.

THE WINNING OF THE WEST.*

PERSONAL experience of a ranchman's life in the Far West has given Mr. Roosevelt a peculiar interest in the deeds of the men who extended the American frontier from the Alleghanies to the Mississippi. His Hunting Trips of a Ranchman is no doubt familiar to many of our readers, and those who know it will turn to his two new volumes with pleasurable anticipation. They will certainly not be disappointed. The story which he has to tell is full of adventure, and he tells it with abundant animation, and, though he is perhaps rather too diffuse, with considerable skill as regards both the treatment of his materials and the arrangement of his matter. His picture would not have been less effective if he had here and there refrained from elaborating details. Still it is excellent as it is, and such as we think that no one else could have set before us. He has gone to original sources for his facts, and exposes the errors of two or three popular American historians less industrious or less critical than himself. His narrative is prefaced by some admirable chapters on the characteristics of the French inhabitants of the Ohio Valley, of the Indians of the Appalachian Confederacies to the south of the Tennessee, and of the Algonquin tribes which lay between the Ohio and the Great Lakes, and of the frontier-folk, or backwoodsmen, "the vanguard of the army of fighting settlers, who with axe and rifle won their way from the Alleghanies to the Rio Grande and the Pacific." Independently of the picturesque and stirring incidents which they present, the exploits of these men are well worthy of the attention of the American historian, for they may almost be said to have laid the foundation of the greatness of the American people, inasmuch as they saved them from being cooped in between the mountains and the sea. While the actual cession of the Western territory was brought about by diplomacy, the land had already been won during the progress of the Revolutionary war.

The men who accomplished this work were not generally descendants of the early colonists; they were, as is pointed out here, for the most part the representatives of the Irish Presbyterians who came over to Philadelphia and Charleston after the beginning of the eighteenth century, and finally settled in the western portions of Virginia and the Carolinas. Along with these, however, there was, of course, a considerable admixture of men of English descent from the eastern colonies, together with a considerable number of Germans, some Dutch, and a good many French Huguenots. Colonizing and fighting independently of State help, and usually with little concert between themselves, these men won for their people the lands which now form the States of Kentucky, Illinois, and Tennessee. They were men of extraordinary courage and self-reliance, able and willing to endure extreme privations, and to pass their lives in the midst of terrible dangers. Strong, active, and keen of sight, they possessed all the qualifications necessary for tracking game and carrying on war in a wild country. While they were generally thrifty and industrious, they were also fierce, boastful, and quarrelsome. The cruelty of the Indians—a revolting subject which Mr. Roosevelt necessarily treats at some length, though not without a laudable reticence—was, of course, unmatched among the whites, yet it was the cruelty of men who knew no better, while the ferocity of the Presbyterian backwoodsman was the outcome of a partial abandonment of the restraints of civilization and Christianity. An enemy's scalp was prized as highly in his cabin as in an Indian's hut, and, as may be seen by an instance quoted here, a man of the better class among them would write a letter to his wife full of expressions of a not unrefined affection, and would end it by telling her that he was bringing home a scalp. War between the backwoodsmen and the Indians was carried on in a ferocious fashion on both sides, and, though the worst excesses of the Americans were "the misdeeds of a few uncontrollable spirits," they seldom excited any marks of disapproval on the part of the more respectable settlers. For many acts of violence and bloodshed committed by them there was, as Mr. Roosevelt urges, considerable excuse; men whose wives and children had been tortured to death by the Indians are not to be judged severely if they took a heavy vengeance. On the Indian side the war was by no means unprovoked. In correcting the follies of sentimental historians on this matter, Mr. Roosevelt once or twice leans too much in the other direction. The fact that "the Indians had no ownership of the land in the way in which we understand the term" has nothing to do with the question.

Although the land on which the settlements were formed was not private property, and was, indeed, in some cases claimed by different tribes, yet not the less did the Indian see his ancient hunting-grounds on which he and his people mainly depended for sustenance taken from him and made the exclusive property of the stranger. Mr. Roosevelt puts the matter in its only true light when he says that the struggle could not have been avoided. A stronger people found it necessary to their welfare to take the lands of a weaker and savage race for themselves, to settle upon them and cultivate them, and they accordingly took them. No one who is not given over to sentimentality can doubt that they were right. On the other hand, the Indians were sorely provoked, and, as will be learnt from these volumes, were often cruelly wronged. The first attempt to extend the frontier westwards, which was destined to have permanent results, was made in Kentucky by the famous hunter Daniel Boone, about whom we have many interesting particulars. At one time he was "absolutely alone in the wilderness for three months without salt, sugar, or flour, and without the companionship of so much as a horse or dog." While he and other hunters were exploring Kentucky a settlement was formed, in 1769, on the Watauga, in the present State of Tennessee, chiefly under the leadership of James Robertson, a man of remarkable natural abilities, though of no education, and John Sevier, the son of a Huguenot gentleman. In the course of a pleasant account of this settlement Mr. Roosevelt gives the only sign of being affected by the mania for finding primitive institutions in America; he calls a little Committee elected by the settlers to carry on the actual business of government a "Witana-gemot" (sic). His comparison is as unfortunate as his spelling. The importance of Lord Dunmore's war is well marked. As regards its cause, we are told that the "chief offence of the whites was that they trespassed upon uninhabited lands, which they proceeded forthwith to cultivate," and that in the frequent outrages which had taken place on the Border they were "more often sinned against than sinning." It would, perhaps, be a fairer way of stating the case to say that the war was caused by the appropriation, in defiance of treaties, of the hunting-grounds of the Indians for "tomahawk improvements"—a matter about which Virginia and Pennsylvania nearly came to blows. It was opened by a deed of horrible treachery and bloodshed on the part of some of the backwoodsmen. The war cowed the Northern Indians, and consequently enabled the work of settlement to proceed uninterruptedly in Kentucky during the early years of the war with Great Britain. The new communities gathered strength, and the Americans made further advances into other wild lands and into territory held by the British.

Mr. Roosevelt says a good deal about the base conduct of the English in employing Indians in the War of Independence; it must, he declares in one place, "ever rest a dark stain on their national history." Of course it is contrary to the usages of modern warfare to set a savage people to attack a civilized enemy, and a considerable party in the English Parliament protested vehemently against the proceeding. But will Americans kindly look at home? Mr. Roosevelt owns that his own people are not quite clear in this matter, but passes lightly over the unpleasant subject. It is a matter of fact that repeated efforts were made, with the full approval of Congress, to engage the services of Indian auxiliaries, and these efforts evidently did not shock educated Americans in the way that the employment of Indians in the war shocked a large number of Englishmen both in and out of Parliament. Nor is this strange; for the colonists had certainly shown no objection to profit by the help of the Indians—when they could get it—in the war with the French. In truth, the Indians were certain to join one side or the other; both the English and the Americans tried to engage them, and the English succeeded in doing so. During the first year of the war Kentucky was settled mainly through Boone's exertions; it was preserved by Clark, a young Virginian of great military capacity, who in 1777 determined to defend it by carrying the war into the country north of Ohio. Mr. Roosevelt gives a picturesque account of the surprise of Kaskaskia:—

Inside the fort the lights were lit, and through the windows came the sounds of violins. The officers of the post had given a ball, and the mirth-loving Creoles, young men and girls, were dancing and revelling within, while the sentinels had left their posts. One of his captives showed Clark a postern-gate by the river-side, and through this he entered the fort, having placed his men round about at the entrance. Advancing to the great hall where the revel was held, he leaned silently with folded arms against the doorpost, looking at the dancers. An Indian, lying on the floor of the entry, gazed intently on the stranger's face as the light from the torches within flickered across it, and suddenly sprang to his feet, uttering the unearthly war-whoop. Instantly the dancing ceased; the women screamed, while the men ran towards the door. But Clark, standing unmoved, and with unchanged face, grimly bade them continue their dancing, but to remember that they now danced under Virginia and not Great Britain.—Vol. ii. p. 45.

Clark followed up his success by taking the British post of Vincennes, and before long, unaided as he was by the central authority, conquered the whole of the Illinois territory. His conquest overawed the Indians and strengthened and encouraged the Kentucky settlers, though they were still perpetually harassed by the Indians and were often in much danger. He formed a plan for attacking Detroit, but it was brought to nothing by jealousies and bickerings between Virginia and Pennsylvania, and between the backwoodsmen themselves. The notable battle of King's Mountain is admirably described. Cornwallis, triumphant in the three southern provinces, had marched northward with his main army, leaving Colonel Ferguson to secure his conquests. Ferguson reduced South Carolina, and was threatening North Carolina, when, at the call of McDowell, the commander of the Whig militia in the district, the mountaineers of the Watauga or Holston Settlements gathered to oppose him. Their victory at King's Mountain, in South Carolina, changed the whole aspect of affairs in the South. While they were thus facing the enemy, Robertson, the chief founder of their settlements, was engaged in planting a new colony further west on the great bend of the Cumberland river. The solitary journey which he made to Kentucky to get ammunition for the new settlers was a feat which could only have been performed by a man of extraordinary endurance and courage. On his return he successfully defended his colony against the Indians, and showed considerable skill as a civil as well as a military leader. Mr. Roosevelt's concluding chapter on "What the Westerners had done" by the end of the Revolutionary War contains a capital summary of his narrative, and some noteworthy remarks on the characteristics and circumstances of the new communities. As we did not find out his very helpful maps until we had read a large part of his book, we warn our readers to look for them at the end of each volume.

* The Winning of the West. By Theodore Roosevelt. Vols. I. and II. From the Alleghanies to Mississippi. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1889.

THE BLUE FAIRY-BOOK.*

EVERY generation ought to have a Fairy-Book of its own; not that alterations are required—God forbid!—but that much childhood, and that not the worst, is extremely destructive of its treasures; so that, if those treasures were not renewed, some of the most precious literature in the world would run the risk of being, even as the "Pastissier François," the exclusive possession of persons with money more certainly predicable of them than brains. There must have been Fairy-Books in the course of the last thirty years—indeed, we have seen some. But the last that you could really recommend to a friend was published some time (we think) in the forties, and was very fat, very square, and rather small in size. We have not seen it for many years; may it be blessed with as many blessings as there have been hours in them!

It would appear, however, that the absence of proper Fairy-Books has had (happily) the same effect on Mr. Andrew Lang as (teste Wolfram von Eschenbach) the omissions of Chretien de Troyes had on the Mrs. Harris of the Graal legend, the Provençal Guyot, or Kyot. Daz mac wol zörnen Kyôt. "This made Kyot in a great rage." Kyot wrote, if he did, a large poem. Mr. Lang has not exactly written, but collected, a large book; the only fault to find by a chartered fault-finder is that the print is a little small. True, the eyes of forty-year are not the eyes of ten or twelve; but, as far as we remember, the eyes of ten or twelve were more leniently treated than this, and if they had not been the eyes of forty-year would probably have been worse than they are. Still the exiguity of the letter affords room for more of the subject, and that is always a gain. Also there are "cuts"—generally good cuts—and gilt edges (which is necessary for the young), and a very superior witch, with moon and stars, on the cover, and everything that can reasonably be expected.

The contents are worthy of the care taken with them by their editor and a bevy of contributresses—Mrs. Alfred Hunt, Miss Sylvia and Miss Violet Hunt, Miss Minnie Wright, and Miss May Kendall. As marshalled thus they consist partly of old matter and partly of new—that is to say, of matter newly presented with the freedom of the miscellaneous Fairy-Book. Those stories which had the immense good luck to be crystallized just at the right time and in the right manner by Perrault are here in early versions from him. Mme. d'Aulnoy is well sampled, though we own to a rebellious and revolutionary desire that "The Yellow Dwarf" had lost his rights of citizenship. This ugly legend has always seemed to us a spot and blemish on its company. It is contrary to all principle for the good Mermaid to have been defeated as she was, and for the "Fairy of the Desert" to have, without any reason assigned, taken part against those who wished to consult her. Moreover the story is ill-told, and we believe it does gross injustice to the Yellow Dwarf—all the more that Bellissima is the least interesting of all fairy-tale heroines, and the King of the Gold Mines a stupid young chuckle-head. However this is not Mr. Lang's fault, or Miss Minnie Wright's. A contingent has been drawn from Grimm, and we need not say a stout contingent too, with the immortal "Little Tailor" and the young man who did not know how to shudder at generals. The "Cabinet des Fées" furnishes not a few, most of which will, or at least may, be novel. But the newest new comers in a book of the kind have yet to be mentioned. The Norse collections of Asbjørnsen and Moe have supplied several which are interesting and curiously different in tone, not only from the English and French classics, but even from the Grimm tales, to which they come nearest. "East of the Sun, West of the Moon," has little more than part of its framework in common with Mr. William Morris's delightful poem, and combines therewith a Cupid-and-Psyche-like central incident, some machinery recalling that of Andersen's "Garden of Paradise," and a rather grotesque conclusion. "The Master-Maid" is very Grimmish and pleasing; also here may you discover "Why the Sea is Salt," and read an agreeable legend of a male Cinderella in "The Princess on the Glass Hill." To these add two specimens of the Scotch tale, "The Red Etin" and "The Black Bull of Norway"; one experiment by Mr. Lang himself, "The Terrible Head," a fairytalizing of the story of Perseus; some "condensations" from Gulliver and the Arabian Nights; with a few of the old "Nursery" tales, such as "Whittington" and "Jack the Giant-killer." Mr. Lang complains of the difficulty of getting a good version of these chap-book stories, and the complaint is justified. A very well-known student and reproducer of old English literature once excited lively hopes among his subscribers by promising them early seventeenth, if not sixteenth, century versions of them. But he proved to be faithless and mansworn, alleging the impossibility of finding early copies. How little old the accepted versions are may be seen from the reference to "The Royal Academy of Arts" (unless, indeed, this be a waggishness of Mr. Lang's) in the present "Whittington."

This makes beyond all question an excellent bill of fare, objections to which can only be made with the proviso that the dinner as it stands is excellent. On some grounds we might have preferred the omission of the "condensations" from Gulliver and the Arabian Nights, both of them books which children ought to read as wholes. "To be acquainted with you, sir, must be a pleasure in whatever company you choose to appear" may a man justly say (slightly altering his Grace of Hamilton's words) to Captain Lemuel, to that admirable gentleman Prince Ahmed, who had luck equal to his deserts and deserts equal to his luck, and even to Master Aladdin, of whom not quite so much can be said as far as the deserts go. There is no Wonder-book that these persons would not adorn, and none that can show more excellent matter. But the separation of them from their proper "surroundings" may perhaps encourage the detestable neglect of classics as classics and wholes which is too common nowadays. Youth is a light if not a holy thing, and even if it chanced upon the precious Nights, and happened to open one already read tale, it might chance to say "Oh, I've read that!" and turn away. As for Gulliver, there is another objection, that Swift is too great an artist for it to be safe or right to meddle in any way with his own presentment of his own masterpieces. Mr. Lang's "Terrible Head" (the only possible objection to which title is that it suggests the morning after a feast) is, on the other hand, a most excellent experiment. The throwing of Greek märchen into recognized märchen form has, indeed, been tried before, notably by Kingsley. But in most of these former trials the attempt to moralize has too often mastered the adapters. Mr. Lang has not succumbed to this evil lust, and we should have been glad of more specimens. Also we should have liked to see, in the place of the "condensations," some more of the old favourites, such as the "Seven Champions" (it is quite ghastly to find how ignorant the present generation is of the "Seven Champions"), "Valentine and Orson," and so forth. But, after all, any one can refashion a book according to his own fancy, and the process is something idle and also something ungrateful. The actual collection is unrivalled in one point—the number of different styles which it exhibits. The opening tale, the "Bronze Ring" (said to be Minor-Asiatic), a curious and interesting medley of the Youngest-Brother motive and of Aladdin, strikes of itself this note of variety, which is kept up throughout both in individual tales and in the juxtaposition of the contents.

Of the delightfulness of those contents in general it should be necessary to say very little. Perhaps the best thing we can say is that, though hardly a page in the book is new to us, it has given us two evenings' reading of the most satisfactory character. For this kind of stuff has the peculiar charm which belongs only to the very finest literature, and to certain matter which is not, at least designedly, literature at all. Let us take two examples as opposite as possible. One is from the baldest and weakest of all the versions—that of "Jack the Giant-killer." It runs: "Jack having hitherto been successful in all his undertakings, resolved not to be idle in future: he therefore furnished himself with a horse, a cap of knowledge, a sword of sharpness, shoes of swiftness, and an invisible coat, the better to perform the wonderful enterprises that lay before him." Can anything be nicer than this? There is no nasty modern attempt to explain how and where these wonderful things were "furnished." The chronicler mentions the furniture just as he might have mentioned a Gladstone-bag, rug-straps, a hat-box, and a hansom cab—as things attainable round the world in all civilized communities. To take a very different example—one of the most delightful of all—"Beauty and the Beast." When the clock rouses Beauty by "calling her name softly twelve times," when she "sees herself reflected on every side, and thinks she has never seen so charming a room," when "wax-candles in diamond and ruby candlesticks begin to light themselves" everywhere, is this mere childish exaggeration? Not at all. It is the protest of literature, of art, though in the simplest forms of both, against a dull and stupid Naturalism. With that protest you cannot soak the human mind too early or too thoroughly, that so it may be warned beforehand against sciolism and das Gemeine. A good stock of fairy-tales will carry a man, provided he has a tolerably stout heart and not too stupid a head, through anything. He never knows whether the fairy Paribanou will not take it into her head to be one who dignabitur cubili even his insignificant self, whether the bronze ring or the shabby old lamp will not make him an Aladdin; whether the stratagem of the leathern bag will not come to his thoughts in time to rid him of the Welsh giant; whether the fiery cats and dogs will not turn out to be beasts easily mastered by help of a "carving-bench" and knife. Fata (and fata means fairy, though Virgil did not know it) viam invenient is his motto. And, even if the way never opens to any good purpose, if Beauty never appears (he must be an uncommonly unlucky Beast if she never does), at any rate he has these happier things to fall back upon, and to console himself with, in the impregnable seclusion of fantastic memory.

* The Blue Fairy-Book. Edited by Andrew Lang. London: Longmans & Co. 1889.

HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES.*

THE first edition of Haydn appeared forty-eight years ago. The late Mr. Joseph Haydn continued to edit and revise it until 1855, when it had gone through six editions. Mr. Vincent corrected the seventh, and has since, he tells us, thoroughly renovated the book, "by revision and correction and copious additions," so that, as he adds, "little of the original work remains." There are few books more often referred to in any literary workshop, and few more useful. It stands, in fact, without a rival, and is so good—we regret to say it—that it should be a great deal better. In making a careful examination of this new issue we must not be understood as wishing in any way to depreciate a most valuable publication, and cannot do better than take Mr. Vincent's own "three heads" as our guide. We may test the "copious additions" first, and here we can only stand amazed at the care and industry with which recent events have been chronicled. The battle of Toski, and all the events which led to it, are entered up; the opening of the Savoy Hotel, the Maybrick trial, the latest Parnellite imprisonment, the invention of carbodynamite, and the journey of the Shah of Persia, are among the latest additions. Of course, events so old as the celebration of the Queen's Jubilee, the early vagaries of the London County Council, and the annexation of Socotra are to be found under their respective heads. In this department, if there is a fault to be found, it is that the entries are, if anything, too copious; but as the volume has not yet grown to an unmanageable size, this may well be passed over. In fact, for any event which has happened, here or elsewhere, within the last twenty years or so this Dictionary is marvellously exact and full. We may say the same for all dates back to the beginning of the sixteenth century at least, although a few minutes' examination will show that it is in recent and contemporary history that Mr. Vincent is strongest. We find, for example, both "Sepoy" and "Spahi" in their respective places, though Mr. Vincent does not note the identity of the names, giving the former to Hindostanee, and "Spahi," apparently, to Turkish, although it is far more probable that both are Arabic. This is not a matter of much consequence, and has nothing to do with chronology. So, too, we find the modern signification of "Separatist" duly given with its date, as well as the date of an obscure religious movement of the same name. Dr. Kenealy's Englishman is mentioned, and so is the extinction of the Examiner in 1881. The chronology of Irish history is admirable for the last two or even three centuries, but is more than vague in the mediæval and ancient periods.

This brings us to the second and third points in Mr. Vincent's preface. He asserts that by revision and correction little of the original work remains. A copy of the fifth edition is before us, the last but one which Haydn himself corrected. Many people are familiar with the curious chronology of forty years ago, and know where to look for the choicest flowers. Here, however, we may take one or two passages as far apart as possible. Under "Universities" Haydn assigns doubtfully the year 626 as the foundation of Cambridge, and more positively 900. Oxford was founded in 886. Wishing to correct our views by the light of the present year, we consult Mr. Vincent's new volume. Here is the entry about Cambridge:—"Cambridge, began about 635 (?); revived, 1109." This is surprising enough, but we turn to the sister University. Under "Oxford" we are referred to a separate notice, which begins as follows:—"An academy here is described as ancient by Pope Martin II. in a deed 802. Alfred founded the schools about 879." A few entries like these are calculated to shake our faith in Mr. Vincent's knowledge, not so much of mediæval history as of modern research. We look at "Guilds"—a word prudently avoided by Haydn. Mr. Vincent informs us that the London guilds "became Livery Companies in the fourteenth century." This provokes us to look for some further London entries. True, the early history of London is not very clear, but a great deal has been done of late to clear it, and we expect a book of this kind to have the latest light on such a subject. We look in the old edition, and find that Haydn, as was to be expected, made, under the heading of "Common Council," at least two mistakes. He says its "formation commenced about 1208," and goes on to confound it with the Folk Mote, a totally different body. We look at Mr. Vincent's volume to obtain more exact information, and find that he has simply repeated Haydn's words, adding some notes, not corrections, of his own. This discovery stimulates us to further research under "London." Haydn tells us that London was enlarged by the Romans in A.D. 49; that it was walled in and a palace built in 306; that it was made a bishop's See, and Restitutus appointed first bishop, in 514; that Theonius was the second and St. Melitus the third bishop. There are some further entries of a similar character; and we may stop at the date 1242, when, we learn, aldermen were appointed with important privileges. At the foot of the page are some notes quoted from a writer named Leigh. Leigh is apparently unmentioned by Lowndes; but he may have been a London authority in 1851. We now turn to Mr. Vincent's edition. Here we find 179 as the date of "Theanus," and Restitutus omitted; 306 is repeated as the date of the walls, though in a foot-note 379 is offered as an alternative; the appointment of aldermen in 1242 is repeated; and the mysterious Leigh is quoted as before. This is discouraging; but, after all, London chronology is a little difficult, and we had better look for a subject of a different character. The name of the Pyramids attracts attention, and we read that "the first building commenced, it is supposed, about 1500 B.C. The greatest is said to have been erected by Cheops, 1082 B.C.; but earlier dates are assigned." We had imagined that every learned individual, every school-boy, by this time knew that in 1500 B.C. the eighteenth dynasty was on the Egyptian throne; that in 1082 B.C. Egypt was under the rule of the dynasty of Sheshork or Shishak, while Cheops belonged to the fourth dynasty. But Mr. Vincent shuts his eyes to all the researches of M. Maspero, the late Mariette, Mr. Petrie, Sir Erasmus Wilson, Miss Edwards, and the dozens of other writers of the day who have published works which are not in the least recondite on the subject. He quotes three authorities, Belzoni, Vyse, and Mr. Piazz Smyth. Our experience of Mr. Vincent on Pyramids tempts us to enquire further what he has to say about early Egyptian chronology, the more so as we remember an exceedingly amusing passage on the subject in Haydn's edition, in which a knowledge of Egypt, its kings and gods, is displayed which proves that in 1851 we had not advanced beyond the level of Milton with his "Isis and Orus and the dog Anubis." Haydn begins with Mizraim, who built Memphis B.C. 2188. His authority for this statement is "Blair." We are unacquainted with the name of Blair as an Egyptologist. But to continue. Athotes invented hieroglyphics in 2122; and Busiris built Thebes in 2111. This last statement has the name of "Usher" appended to it. Can this have been intended for the great Archbishop Ussher, whose chronological scheme is somewhat out of date now? Further on we are told about Osymandyas, who flourished in 2100, which would be about the time of the twelfth dynasty. Although, as we have seen, Athotes invented hieroglyphics, Memnon, in 1822, invented the Egyptian letters. Lastly, not to quote too much from this wonderfully superannuated system, we may look at the notice of Thuoris, "the Proteus of the Greeks, who had the faculty of assuming whatever form he pleased, as of a lion, a dragon, a tree, water, fire," and who reigned in 1189. Of this remarkable potentate Haydn adds a cautious note culled from the before-mentioned Blair:—"These fictions were probably intended to mark the profound policy of this king, who was eminent for his wisdom, by which his dominion flourished."

We may now turn to the pages of Mr. Vincent, remembering that, absurd and even childish as some of Haydn's entries are, they really represented the state of knowledge of Egyptology forty years ago. There are things just as silly in Wilkinson and in Sharpe. Since then, of course, Birch in England, Brugsch and Wiedemann in Germany, De Rougé and Chabas in France, to mention only a few names, have given us clear chronological tables, and have showed us that it is possible to date approximately, but still with due regard to succession, every Pharaoh, from the time of Aahmes down. In a Dictionary of Dates we naturally expect some kind of synopsis of the systems of these authorities—such a synopsis as is to be found in Murray and in Baedeker, and other not very rare books. What is our surprise to find that Mr. Vincent's knowledge of Egyptian chronology varies hardly at all from that of Mr. Haydn. He begins—this is a fact which any one may verify who will look at p. 294 of this nineteenth edition—with "Mizraim, the son of Ham, the second son of Noah, 2188 B.C.," and we have the quotations from Blair as before; and the date of Athotes, who invented hieroglyphics; of Busiris, of Osymandyas, and of Memnon, who invented Egyptian characters. The notice of Thuoris is somewhat abbreviated, and there are a few other minor alterations; but the Egyptian chronology which was bad enough in a book of this kind even so far back as 1851 is actually offered to us, mainly unchanged, in 1889. Our judgment upon this nineteenth edition must unfortunately be that it is useful for contemporary history, not quite so useful for dates two hundred years old, and absolutely misleading, not to say ridiculous, for ancient chronology. In order to give the book the fairest trial possible, we have taken our examples from subjects as widely apart as possible. We cannot but fear that Mr. Vincent has been so busy with what is going on around him that he has forgotten to fulfil the promise of his preface. Not only does a great quantity of the original work remain, but a great quantity which is ludicrously inaccurate and ignorant in the present year of grace.

REMINISCENCES OF A LITERARY AND CLERICAL LIFE.*

THE anonymous writer of these "Recollections" has collected materials in the course of a rambling life for a couple of

* Haydn's Dictionary of Dates and Universal Information relating to all Ages and Nations. Nineteenth edition, containing the History of the World to the Autumn of 1889. By Benjamin Vincent. London: Ward & Lock. 1889.

* Reminiscences of a Literary and Clerical Life. By the Author of "Three-cornered Essays" &c. London: Ward & Downey. 1889.

entertaining and instructive volumes. The arrangement, or rather the disarrangement, of their very miscellaneous contents necessarily compels a desultory notice. He has known many celebrated men, and he tells not a few amusing stories. But in his first volume he scarcely does himself justice. To tell the truth, some of the anecdotes rather reminded us of Captain Sumph's reminiscences of "poor Byron" at Mr. Bungay's famous dinner in Paternoster Row; and some of his impressions of foreign travel are more true than original. It is indisputable, for example, that the Rhine scenery is less sublime than that of Switzerland, and it had struck us before that the visits of English tourists were not unprofitable to the hotel-keepers in the Confederation. But as we said, in spinning out some of the earlier chapters with remarks of the kind, he has hardly been fair to himself. The book gets better and better as we read on, and the second volume is decidedly superior to the first. He always writes brightly, even on serious subjects, and he has much to say about clerical work in London and the country; about hospitals, charities, and the condition of the poor in crowded city parishes as well as in rural districts. He seems to have had somewhat exceptional experiences. Thanks to the delicate constitution, which doubtless he considered anything rather than a blessing, he has been a rolling stone, although a busy man. He has been always, as the Americans say, recuperating the health which refused to be permanently established on any terms. Just as he was getting into the swing of good work the doctors would send him away for change of climate. So he has been serving as curate or incumbent and inhaling the fresh sea-breezes in a variety of southern parishes and popular health-resorts. He has spent a good deal of time abroad; he has made many flying trips besides to the Continent; and he boasts that he has gone abroad with a conscience void of offence, since he knows picturesque England far better than most other men. Moreover, as he has had neither the luck nor the health to get and hold a snug living, he has had to eke out a limited income by his pen; which explains the literary side of the Recollections, as in the course of his labours as a literary "casual" he has come in contact with editors, more or less distinguished, publishers, and fellow-authors.

The Recollections are carried back to those of his father and uncle, and some of these are not the least piquant or suggestive. His father used to repeat a curious dialogue illustrative of the old school of orthodox scholasticism. An inquisitive boy demanded, "Pray, Mr. Simon, what became of Socrates and Plato and Cicero, and all the virtuous heathen?" "All gone to Hell, boy, for the glory of God," was the summary and unhesitating solution of the difficulty. He had an uncle who perhaps made one of the most profitable speculations on record, even in the good old days of purchased offices and pensions. He had bought for 1,000*l.* his place as Registrar in Chancery. He drew the emoluments for fifty years, retired upon full pay, and lived five-and-twenty years longer in the enjoyment of it. But the old official, with all his experience, was weak enough to be once let in for a Chancery suit. Lord Eldon was naturally astounded to see him in the court as a suitor. "Is it possible," he asked with melancholy astonishment, "that you can yourself be one of the parties in this cause?" And the Registrar was compelled to acknowledge, coram publico, "I am grieved and ashamed, my Lord, that such is the case." Judgment in due course was given against him, and he may have consoled himself with the reflection that it served him right. The old Registrar had been an acquaintance of John Newton, who, having led a wild and wicked life in his youth, and having been a dealer in "black ivory" on the Slave Coast, declared himself afterwards, with better reason than John Bunyan, to have been one of the vilest of sinners. Certainly his subsequent career proved the sincerity of his penitence. He became a burning and a shining light, and ladies in especial fluttered round him like the moths round a lamp in West Africa. He preached to the last; but in his old age he would often come to a pause in the middle of the sermon. He had a servant stationed behind him in the pulpit to remind him of the point at which he had broken off. He gave breakfasts, like Rogers and Lord Houghton and other illustrious men of letters, though, as may be supposed, in a different style and to very different company. The guests were admirers and worshippers, who literally hung upon his lips, and when the lips were seen to move or when a sound proceeded from them an anxious whisper circulated, "What did he say?" "He only cleared his throat" was latterly too often the unsatisfactory answer.

The author's first clerical charge was not remunerative. The most virulent Dissenter could not have asserted that he was likely to fatten on its loaves and fishes. The stipend was ten shillings, and the vicar owed him the money. The vicar does not appear to have overworked himself, though the field of what should have been his labours carried a heavy crop ripe for the harvest. In answer to a question of the new curate he estimated the number of his parishioners at about eight thousand. A census chanced to be taken immediately afterwards, and it turned out that the population was exactly the double of that. With an unpaid professional income of ten shillings the young curate naturally tried to supplement it and sought to turn his pen to profitable account. He gives a humorous account of various of his earlier experiences. He had offered a paper on some ecclesiastical subject to the editor of a religious serial. The editor handed it back with a light-hearted and friendly apology. "No, my dear sir, this sort of paper will never do. It has not got the light touch." "Now here," he went on, taking up a rival periodical, "we have an article of the right kind. If you could only write like this fellow it might do." "This fellow," as it happened, was the rejected contributor, and the editor, with the unblushing coolness of his craft, is said to have at once accepted the contribution. There are queer and somewhat satirical stories of his many medical consultations. He had a feeble chest or lungs, and the pessimist doctors would insist on condemning him as hopelessly consumptive. One of those who hesitated over the case hastened to apologize for presuming to differ from so many eminent authorities. After giving some faint gleams of hope, he went on:—"Not that I for a moment mean to assert that you are not in a consumption. Very likely you are." The author was ready enough to seek fine air and sunshine by way of remedies, but he objected to the cod-liver oil which was invariably prescribed. But tastes differ, as he discovered when he once asked a consumptive friend to lunch. Being facetious, like Dominie Sampson, he said he was sorry he had no wine, and could only offer cod-liver oil. "Nothing I like better," exclaimed the jovial guest; and "there he sat, after lunch, sipping his cod-liver oil as contentedly as I have seen people take their '34 port." At St. Leonard's he made the acquaintance of another clerical eccentric. The two invalids had seen a good deal of each other, of course talking over their symptoms and prospects. But gradually the stranger's face came to wear scowls instead of smiles. "One day he approached me with the air of a man unmasking a hypocrite, and said in a withering tone of voice, 'You're not in a consumption,' and turned on his heel and contemptuously left me." That patient acted conscientiously up to his principles, like Mr. Weller's acquaintance who blew out his brains after the surfeit of forbidden crumpets, for he went and died immediately afterwards.

If space admitted, we should gladly touch on the graver aspects of the author's observations on prisons and hospitals, which are well deserving of attention. He shows that, on the whole, there has been a remarkable and very steady improvement in prison discipline, though probably the problem will never be satisfactorily solved of meting out punishment fairly in equal proportions to the different classes of offenders. He was curious to see the unfortunate nobleman, who, after laying the unlucky Tichborne family under relentless contribution, was serving out his well-merited sentence at Dartmoor. He saw the gang in which Orton was at work, but could not distinguish the culprit. Regular life and the daily spell of hard labour had trained down that portly form into the semblance of normal humanity. He has much to say in praise of the general management of hospitals, and the care bestowed on the patients by the nurses and medical attendants. He mentions, by the way, when speaking of his visits to the Consumption Hospital at Brompton, that one of the wards bears the name of Whyte-Melville. It appears that the brilliant novelist, with unostentatious generosity, had endowed it out of his literary gains; a fact which throws a light on the serious and religious tone of some of the scenes in his later books. A propos of missions, the writer has much to tell of his friend Bishop Hannington, who crowned a career of good works by winning the crown of martyrdom. A year before that he had the remarkable escape which puts the saint and martyr in a very comical light. One day, when taking his walk abroad in the jungles, he saw a pretty little creature, which came fawning up to him like a puppy. He picked it up and began to fondle it. Whereupon some natives who were with him howled and bolted. Knowing what was likely to follow, the panic-stricken niggers were hardly to be blamed. The good missionary had taken a lion's whelp to his bosom, and the infuriated parents made their appearance on the scene. The Bishop showed equal pluck and presence of mind. Dropping the cub, he put up his umbrella, and gallantly charged the lion and lioness, dancing and yelling as if he had been one of the unconverted pagans celebrating some diabolical rite. Terror at the hideous sight and sounds got the better of paternal and maternal affection, and "the great cats turned tail and rushed back to their lair in the forest." We cannot profess to enter on the numerous reminiscences of men who, though perhaps less deserving of fame, are better known than the admirable African Bishop. But we may say that, unavoidably, we have left unnoticed what are perhaps the most interesting chapters in the book.

STAGELAND.*

STAGELAND, by Jerome K. Jerome, is only a trifle, but a merry and witty trifle. Stageland, as most of our readers are aware, is situated on the north-eastern littoral of Bohemia, and by some publicists is called Scribia, after its first discoverer, M. Scribe. In this work the characteristics of its leading inhabitants are described, as are also its ethics, laws, language, costume, and modes of thought. The subject has already been touched upon by Thackeray in "A Night's Pleasure," but we do not find the archetypes of Frank Nightrake and Bob FitzOffley in Mr.

* Stageland: Curious Habits and Customs of its Inhabitants. Described by Jerome K. Jerome. Author of "Idle Thoughts of an Idle Fellow" &c. Drawn by J. Bernard Partridge. Second edition. London: Chatto & Windus. 1889.

Jerome's gallery of portraits, nor even "that impossible valet of English comedy, whom any gentleman would turn out of doors before he could get through half a length of the dialogue assigned to him." Nor do we find the village innkeeper, the white-haired villager, the good young man, Cousin Jack (of the mercantile marine), the old family servant, the gipsy woman, the choleric Major (in undress uniform), the Jew, the wicked squire and the "instruments of his purpose," the smuggler ("once on board the lugger, and then—!"), and many other familiar faces. Mr. Jerome, wisely perhaps, confines his observations to a few leading types, such as "the hero," "the villain" (the central pivot of all melodrama), "the comic man," &c. His description of the hero's incapacity for keeping out of hot water is delicious, and we quite agree that, if the heroine married the villain and went to live somewhere abroad well out of the way of the comic man, she would be much happier than the hero is ever likely to make her:—

The stage hero [remarks Mr. Jerome] never talks in a simple, straightforward way, like a mere ordinary mortal.

"You will write to me when you are away, Dear, won't you?" says the heroine.

A mere human being would reply:

"Why, of course I shall, Ducky, every day."

But the stage hero is a superior creature. He says:

"Dost see yonder star, Sweet?"

She looks up, and owns that she does see yonder star; and then off he starts and drives on about that star for full five minutes, and says that he will cease to write to her when that pale star has fallen from its place amidst the firmament of Heaven.

We cannot resist quoting the following "points of Stage law," being the only ones, the author assures us, as to which he is at all clear:—

That if a man dies without leaving a will, then all his property goes to the nearest villain.

But that if a man dies, and leaves a will, then all his property goes to whoever can get possession of that will.

That the accidental loss of a three-and-sixpenny copy of a marriage certificate annuls the marriage.

That the evidence of one prejudiced witness, of shady antecedents, is quite sufficient to convict the most stainless and irreproachable gentleman of crimes for the committal of which he could have no possible motive. But that this evidence may be rebutted, years afterwards, and the conviction quashed without further trial, by the unsupported statement of the comic man.

That, if A forges B's name to a cheque, then the law of the land is that B shall be sentenced to ten years' penal servitude.

That ten minutes' notice is all that is required to foreclose a mortgage.

That all trials of criminal cases take place in the front parlour of the victim's house, the villain acting as counsel, judge, and jury rolled into one, and a couple of policemen being told off to follow his instructions.

The descriptions of "The Lawyer," "The Adventuress," and, above all, "The Villain," are capital; and so are the illustrations. We recommend Stageland to all who love the country where, as one of its poets tells us, lovers go in fours,

Mistress and master, man and maid;
Where people listen at the doors,
Or 'neath a table's friendly shade;
And comic Irishmen in scores
Roam o'er the scenes all undismayed.

A land where virtue in distress
Owes much to uncles in disguise;
Where British sailors freely bless
Their limbs, their timbers, and their eyes;
And where the villain doth confess
Conveniently before he dies.

A land of lovers false and gay,
A land where people dread a "curse";
A land of letters gone astray,
Or intercepted, which is worse;
Where weddings false fond maids betray,
And all the babes are changed at nurse.

THREE MEDICAL BOOKS.*

IN writing a treatise for the instruction of mothers as to the proper means for keeping their children in health Dr. Starr has undertaken a task of the highest responsibility. Few women will read more than one such book, hence it is essential that it should be free from error. Such being the case, we think a somewhat detailed criticism of this work due to our readers. The first chapter contains a description of the features of health, and the most common and easily recognized symptoms of a departure from the normal condition. It is thoughtful and well written, but the difficulty of setting down in black and white an exact analysis of the numerous, and often fleeting, indications of the various diseases and disorders to which children are subject is very great. In the second chapter the situation, size, lighting, furnishing, heating, ventilation, and cleaning of the day and night nurseries are considered. Most of the remarks on these subjects are judicious, but there are one or two to which we must take exception. In our opinion a ten, not an eight, feet cube

* Hygiene of the Nursery. By Louis Starr, M.D. London: H. K. Lewis.

Notes on Medical Education. By Sir James Sawyer, Knt., M.D. London: Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.

Address to Medical Graduates of the University of Edinburgh. By Alexander Crum Brown, M.D. Edinburgh: David Douglas.

should be considered the minimum size admissible in a room for a single child. Unless the nursery be unusually spacious we look upon gas as a highly objectionable mode of lighting it, both on account of the impurities it throws into the air and the great heat it evolves. On the subject of furnishing we do not agree with Dr. Starr in thinking the most satisfactory decoration of the nursery walls can be carried out by putting up "a few highly-coloured striking prints." The child's education in art cannot begin too early, and it would be a pity that the refining effect of the beautifully illustrated books for children, which are now so numerous, should be marred by doubtful taste in their daily surroundings. In recommending that a few plants, a bird, or a globe of fish should be placed in the day-nursery we are entirely at one with the author. We think that the temperature advised for this room—namely, 68° to 70° F.—too high, and that from 63° to 66° would be a better range for both day and night nursery. The characteristics which are desirable in the nursemaid are well set forth in the third chapter. We look upon the directions for clothing children, in the next chapter, as most excellent. There is, however, a curious though unimportant error on p. 97, where a plate, on the following page, of the sole of the left foot is spoken of as a tracing of the right. We do not think, with the author, that the heel of the shoe should be made decidedly thicker than the sole as soon as a child begins to walk. Chapter V., on exercise and amusements, is admirable as far as the former is concerned, but the latter receives scant notice; indeed, there is not much advice beyond a somewhat unnecessary protest against bicycles and roller-skates. In the sixth chapter the hours which should be devoted to sleep are mentioned, and the little bed with its proper furniture and surroundings is carefully described. Chapter VII., on bathing and washing, leaves nothing to be desired. In Chapters VIII. and IX. the natural and artificial methods of feeding infants are intelligently and completely discussed, as also the dietary of older children. In the last chapter, headed Emergencies, instructions are given for the guidance of parents in case of accident or sudden illness. The guardian of the child would be justified in acting without skilled advice in a few of the circumstances here mentioned, but in the majority it would be wiser to consult a medical man. It is suggested, in the paragraph on convulsions, that bromide of potassium should be administered; we do not think this drug should be prescribed except by a medical man, or occupy a place in the family medicine chest. The assertion in the note on p. 244 that "heat and cold act in the same way upon the blood-vessels, contracting them and preventing the transudation of blood," is apt to be misleading. It should be explained that the water must be very hot, for warm water dilates the blood-vessels.

The subjects which are ordinarily considered in introductory addresses at medical schools are worn somewhat threadbare. Having regard to the number which are delivered each succeeding October, and the limited range of topics suitable for discussion on these occasions, this is not a matter for surprise. On this account we think that the republication of such addresses, unless they contain something novel and original, is to be deprecated. We fear that Sir James Sawyer's notes on medical education cannot be held to possess either novelty or originality. The address delivered in 1879 opens with a eulogy of the Birmingham Medical School and its founder. We do not doubt that it is well deserved, but that it is of much interest outside that flourishing town. The remainder of it consists of advice, excellent for medical students, but not adapted to the requirements of the general reader. The other two addresses are much in the same style—wholly unobjectionable, displaying much good feeling and considerable literary knowledge, but forming, with the first, a whole which is scarcely of sufficient importance to merit the dignity of forming a book.

Dr. A. Crum Brown's address to the medical graduates of Edinburgh is open to similar criticism. It is, however, published in the less pretentious form of a paper-covered pamphlet. Its morals and manner are unexceptionable, and we trust that its sentiments were as fully appreciated by Dr. Brown's hearers as they deserve. We cannot, however, see that it is more worthy of publication than an ordinary sermon or good after-dinner speech.

LIFE-SAVING APPLIANCES AT SEA.*

A SHORT Explanatory Commentary on the Merchant Shipping (Life-saving Appliances) Act is an unpretending little brochure intended for the use of shipowners in calculating the number of extra boats and "buoyant apparatus" which the law will insist upon all vessels being provided with after the 30th of March, 1890. It may be news to some of our readers that, after that date, every one who goes to sea in a British merchant ship will have a life-belt provided for him, and also, if he ventures out of fresh or smooth water, a place in a boat or on some "buoyant apparatus" sufficient to support him. The intention of the Act is that no vessel shall proceed to sea without sufficient boats to contain all the souls on board of her; and this provision we cannot but think a very praiseworthy one, though we anticipate considerable friction when it is first attempted to be carried out. Beyond the great steamship Companies, few shipowners as yet seem even aware of the existence of the Act; and as most seafarers feel as much contempt as Rob Roy himself for "a twallegged creature that goes about on the quay plaguing folk about permits, and cockits, and dockits, and a' that vexatious trade," we can hardly expect that so sweeping a measure can be put in force without some trouble at the outset. When, however, the public discovers that, if its ship sinks under it at sea, it has a legal right to something to float upon, we think that the officials may, at any rate, count upon its sympathy. It is strange, however, to observe how apathetic people seem about disasters at sea. The breaking of the axle of a London omnibus or a block on the Metropolitan Railway will interest thousands who are quite unmoved when they read of scores of people drowning off the North Foreland for want of proper life-saving apparatus; and it is hard to help people who do not seem to care to help themselves.

* A Short Explanatory Commentary on the Merchant Shipping (Life-saving Appliances) Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 24). By F. W. Brewster, M.A. Published by "The New Patent Buoyancy and Unsinkable Boat Co.," Greenwich.

Coming to details, we find two classes of lifeboat, (A) and (B), the (A) variety consisting of a properly constructed Life Boat of wood or metal fitted inside with at least $1\frac{1}{2}$ cubic feet of strong buoyant compartments (such that the water cannot find its way into them) to every 10 feet of the boat's capacity. These boats are deemed fit to carry one adult person to every 10 feet of their cubic capacity.

The (B) variety consists of a properly constructed Life Boat of wood or metal fitted outside with at least $\frac{3}{4}$ cubic foot of buoyancy apparatus to every 10 feet of the boat's cubic capacity, and fitted inside with sufficient buoyancy apparatus to make up the total buoyancy apparatus to $1\frac{1}{2}$ cubic feet to every 10 feet of the boat's capacity.

By "outside buoyancy" is understood "that which is external of the usual lines of any particular form of boat, and therefore is of the nature of an excrescence."

These boats are deemed fit to carry one person to every 8 feet of their cubic capacity, and have exactly the same outfit as the (A) variety.

Now, as Mr. Brewster points out, these paragraphs will clearly lead all shipowners to adopt the (B) variety; for, not only will the outside buoyancy—carried in the form of a rubber or wale running the length of the gunwale, and stuffed with cork, &c.—make it the better sea-boat of the two, but, as both boats have the same amount of buoyancy, what owner will not prefer the cheaper form, in which each person, instead of $1\frac{1}{2}$ cubic feet of buoyancy, will have only $1\frac{1}{5}$ cubic feet allotted to him? The (B) variety is the better sea-boat of the two; but surely she should not be allowed to carry over twenty per cent. more people. But this is but a slight flaw in the Act, compared with the rule for boats of the (D) variety, where the number of people to be carried is, again, twenty per cent. more than the (A) variety, and they do not have any buoyancy at all provided for them. Lord Byron tells us that "a tight boat will live in a rough sea Except with breakers underneath her lee"; and this fact seems to be all that some of the passengers or crew will have to trust to when abandoning their vessel; for, as "no ship," we are repeatedly reminded, "is obliged to carry more boats than will accommodate all on board of her," it follows that, in the last resort, a certain number of persons would have to make use of the (D) variety boats (of which two are allowed to be carried), and the occupants of these boats would consequently have a far worse chance of saving their lives than any of the others, and this for no better reason than that the lighter a boat is the less trouble she is to get up to her davits.

There is another very unsatisfactory paragraph in the Act—that, namely, on p. 8, in the Rules for Class VI.—a class, our readers may be reminded, which includes all the Dover and Folkestone packets:—

(b) They shall also carry other boats, approved buoyant apparatus (Rule 9, p. 10), [and] [or] approved life-belts (Rule 10, p. 10), sufficient (with the boats) to keep afloat all the persons on board the ship.

The or here seems to leave it optional whether this additional provision shall consist of anything more than life-belts, in which case there would be no buoyant deck-fittings at all, and perhaps only two boats for several hundred persons. Moreover, in Class VII. it is distinctly allowable to carry belts instead of buoyant apparatus; while in this same class sailing-packets seem to have been lost sight of altogether.

As far as the provisions of the Act relate to boats, the defects which we find in it are of a comparatively unimportant character; but when "buoyant apparatus," as it is officially termed, is counted upon as an equivalent for boat accommodation, we cannot help picturing to ourselves the scene on a Channel boat when the bulk of the passengers would have to trust to these contrivances. If there were any sea running, none but the strongest men could get upon these deck seats, rafts, &c., and none even of them could long remain upon them alive. The sufferings of the two poor men who were picked up a few weeks ago off the Isle of Man, one of whom died in the very act of being rescued, show us what fate is in store for those adrift on "buoyant apparatus," even in well-frequented waters, in summer weather, and within a few miles of land. The provision of a life-belt for every person on the ship is undoubtedly an excellent one, and will help to save the lives of those who may accidentally fall into the water; but, unless they are speedily picked up, they will in most cases succumb to cold and exhaustion before many hours have passed, whether they be floating in life-belts or clinging to buoyant makeshifts of any description. We could have wished, therefore, that the Act had been of an even more sweeping character; as it is, however, it goes far further than could have been expected. Those who wish for a concise and intelligible commentary on the text of the Act will do well to consult Mr. Brewster's little pamphlet.

CHEAP FICTION.*

"ANYBODY," said a wise, but savage, Innominate, "can write a shilling dreadful, but it takes an idiot to read one." It would be unfair to recall the name of the work which suggested this shocking reflection, and it would also be superfluous. Comparisons, again, are mostly odious, and there is no particular purpose to be served by contrasting nothing with nothing—the book of which we prefer that the name shall be untold and such desperate nonsense as The Professor's Last Experiment, the one virtue of which is that, being the dream of an anti-vivisectionist, it is not inscribed to Miss Cobbe. It tells the story of a son of the planet Mars. This gentleman is despatched by his fellow-Marsmen (who have attained a high degree of culture) to explore the earth, and place them in communication with the human race. He succeeds in traversing space and in effecting a landing somewhere in England, and he is presently discovered and hospitably entertained by a clergyman. After some months of communion, his host reveals the fact of the Marsman's existence to the Royal Society, and requests that learned body to send down a number of experts, to the end that his guest may be examined, and steps be taken to demonstrate the correctness of the theory of a plurality of worlds. Unfortunately for science, however, the Marsman attracts the attention of the notorious Professor Altenstein, who contrives to lure the stranger (who is winged, and downy all over) away to London, to shut him up in his own house, and by means of drugs and terrific scientific appliances to keep him there for five or six years, during which time he makes him the subject of continued study, exhibits him now and then (under the influence of soporifics) as a novel and dreadful species of ape, and ends by dissecting out his pinions, and sending his electrical car (in which he had made his journey through space) to an eminent firm of coach-builders, "to be left till called for." As the Marsman is a man of his hands, and is possessed of strange and deadly secrets, his capture and detention are not accomplished without a good deal of rather obscure intrigue, and the suppression by the Herr Professor of several objectionable persons. Among them is his own niece, who tries to save his visitor from the pleasures of vivisection, and whom he finds it convenient to shut up in a madhouse. To say that, when last we hear of her she is on her way to the planet Mars, is to tell as much of the rest of the story as is desirable and more (it may be) than is necessary.

Mr. Colmache's Under Spell of the Dark Powers is much better fun than The Professor's Last Experiment—is, indeed, quite cleverly invented and by no means ill-written, and, being merely a good old-fashioned tale of the good old-fashioned D—l, may be cordially recommended to those (if any such there be) for whom that sort of thing hath charms. There is a ghost in it as well; but the ghost has nothing to do with the tragedy at the end, which is all the work of the Gates of Machecoul, a pair of portals in hammered iron, produced, long ages ago, under the personal supervision of the Evil One. The purpose of the Fiend (who took the artist away with him) was one of general damnation; but (it is scarce necessary to state) he was foiled by an artful priest, and the miracle of iron-work, in whose production he had deigned to assist, became in course of time a simple work of art. As such it was sold to an eminent antiquary, Sir Walter Worledge, of Graywood Abbey, and with its transfer to England its power of working mischief was renewed. What happened, and how its devilish quality had leave to operate, we do not propose to tell. It must suffice to say that the story is quite well told, that the characters are quite practical and useful, and that some pages of the book—as, for instance, those in which the narrator sets forth his experience of Breton life and manners—are very readable, apart from the pleasant piece of fiction whose interest they serve to quicken and sustain.

In Monkey Mephisto our swift scene flies to modern Paris. Raymond the painter has a lovely daughter. There is a mystery about her birth, but Villon, the Wicked Nobleman, loves her, and to clear up that mystery is for him mere child's play. Having cleared it up, he behaves in the most ungentlemanlike way; indeed, he goes so far as to tell Raymond that either Helen (her name is Helen) must be his or he will blaze abroad her secret to the whole of Paris. Fortunately, Helen has bestowed her young affections upon Somebody Else, and, as Villon insists upon playing the fool, and publishing the fact of an engagement that does not exist, it is arranged that he and Somebody Else shall fight a duel. That duel (it is needless to add) is never fought. Villon has been intriguing against Raymond with a magnificent opera singer, the celebrated Féralte; and when Féralte (who is in love with Raymond, but is vexed with him because he wants to leave

* The Professor's Last Experiment. By Stanley and Ritson Stewart. London: Swan Sonnenschein.

Under Spell of the Dark Powers. By G. A. Colmache. London: Ward.

Monkey Mephisto. By Henry Murray. London: Dicks.

The Hunting of the "Hydra". By Henry Frith. London: Routledge.

off sack and live cleanly) comes to find that she has been made the catspaw of this bold, bad man, she pays him a visit, and strikes him down with a family dagger. That night, though, she had to create a part in a new opera; and, finding her indiscretion public property, and that she is "wanted" by the police, she stabs herself before the fall of the curtain. So Helen and Somebody Else were married; and Raymond lived respectable ever after; and Mr. Murray was able to write Monkey Mephisto, which is sold for a shilling, and may (considered as literature) be worth as much as a farthing.

The theme of The Hunting of the "Hydra" is pirates. True it is that they are neither very picturesque nor very lifelike; but enfin—they are pirates, and that makes them interesting, if not altogether irresistible. They haunt the Indian Ocean, and they ply their heroic trade in prahus; but they sail under the Jolly Roger, they make their captives walk the plank, they give a good deal of trouble, and in the end they are hanged at the yardarm, as many gentlemen of fortune were before them; so that, although the manner in which their works and ways is narrated is scrambling, and the adventurers by whom they are pursued are so pictured as to be impossible out of the pages of a book for boys, one reads of them with a certain pleasure, and takes leave of them with a certain regret. It is not for nothing, indeed, that Bartholomew Sharpe, and Kidd, and Roberts have been. The writer of literature for the young has only to work in a pirate, and his book is safe. For the ghosts of these great sea-artists command good fortune.

MR. LOWELL ON IZAAK WALTON.*

IS Mr. Lowell an angler? It seems that he is not very fond of the craft; perhaps, like Sir Walter Scott in his later years, he is

No Fisher,
But a well-wisher
To the game.

At all events, Mr. Lowell has written a biographical introduction to a pretty edition of Walton and Cotton, in two volumes, without criticizing Izaak as a fisherman. The book was printed in America, at the Cambridge University Press; and the type and paper are excellent. Mr. Lowell speaks of the dangers of illustration; there is one ghastly tailpiece here, at the end of Walton's preface. Two repulsive logger-headed boys, like Walton's logger-headed chub, are looking over what may be a fly-book. This monstrosity is not due to an American pencil, but to Kenny Meadows. Most of the illustrations, except the red-brown etchings, are old friends; but the fish, by Cooper, Smith, Lance, and their contemporaries, are excellent. Some of Major's editions we prefer to this for handiness; and that of Sir H. Nicolas, with Stothard's plates, and the elaborate Life, is excellent. But the American edition is very desirable, in spite of its mysterious remark that Sir Henry Wotton was educated "at Winchester School in New Oxford." "And in New, Oxford," may have been intended; but it is wiser to say "New College."

Mr. Lowell's Introduction is, of course, to this edition what old Oliver Henley's oil of ivy-berries was to his worms in salmon-fishing. This magic it is that takes the purchaser, in spite of Mr. Lowell's indifference to Walton's pastime. He speaks of "a certain artificial fly, made by a handsome woman, and with a fine hand." Walton, of course, was talking about an artificial minnow, not a fly, sewn in coloured silks, and the parent of all our phantoms and angels. Why, when Mr. Lowell wants to cite Walton's "own words," he should write,

Linger long days by Swaynham brook,
when Walton really wrote

Loiter long days by Shawford brook, does not now appear (xxxviii. and 132). We really ought to verify our references in this world of Maya and illusion. From Mr. Lowell, then, we cannot expect a discussion of Walton's merits as an angler. He was a confirmed bottom-fisher; probably he is Wotton's friend, attentive of his trembling quill, while Wotton himself was casting the fly. His advice to let only the fly touch the water may be a counsel of perfection; we should like to see Izaak trying it, except by dipping or dabbing. Indeed, by quoting Thomas Barker (1651), Walton practically admits that his knowledge is at second-hand, and by his alliance with Cotton that he is no great clerk in the nobler branches of the art. Richard Franck, of the Northern Memoirs and Contemplative Angler, clearly regards Walton as a pottering old creature. Franck had met him and argued with him; but, as Franck was a Cromwellian soldier, the pair were not likely to understand each other.

There is not much use in criticizing Mr. Lowell for what he has not cared to do. He does not censure Walton's perfunctory remarks on salmon, and his indifference to the use of a reel, a mysterious machine in his innocent eyes. Mr. Lowell is concerned with Walton as a man and a writer, not as a fisher. It is a great pleasure to study Mr. Lowell's pleasure in Walton, now happily removed by two hundred years from the Paul Prys of modern biography. "Malice domestic, treason, interviews, nothing can touch him further. The sanctities of his life, at least, cannot be hawked about the streets or capitalized in posters as a whet to the latest edition of the Peeping Tom." No biographer can smother him between two octavos. He was twenty-two when Shakspeare died, and he might have read Absalom and Achitophel. He knew Ben Jonson; and called Drayton his friend. He passed through the Revolution, and, according to Anthony Wood, found London "dangerous for honest men," in 1643. Mr. Lowell does not mention that, after Worcester, "the trusty hands" of Izaak carried a jewel of Charles II. to Colonel Blague, then in the Tower, who escaped with it. Nicolas gives the story from Ashmole's History of the Order of the Garter; Ashmole had it from Blague and Walton, "a man well known and as well beloved of all good men." We rather regret Mr. Lowell's omission of Walton in the part of D'Artagnan, carrying Royal jewels across the disturbed country, and dealing with imprisoned Royalists. It is as germane to the matter as a brief but trenchant reference to the affairs of an island "famous for its verdure and its wrongs." In the dubious matter of Kenna and Chlora, Mr. Lowell does not hold that Walton, like Edgar Poe, made verses for one lady and used them again for another. Certainly Chlora is a very queer anagram of Rachel—the name of the first Mrs. Walton. We prefer to believe that Walton used Chlora, in early editions, as a mere empty pastoral name, and changed it to Kenna, later, as a post-humous tribute to his second wife. Mr. Lowell laughs at Mr. Major for trying to prove, by the smallness of Walton's shop, the greatness of his trade—a wholesale affair. Certainly Walton's house is not called a shop in contemporary documents, as Nicolas observes. The point is uninteresting, except that some may marvel how a very "small" tradesman came to be so very intimate with the higher clergy. Probably he made their acquaintance through being Donne's "convert," as he says, in St. Dunstan's, though it is difficult to believe that Walton needed much "converting." He is of the people whom Plato speaks of as being born good. About his style Mr. Lowell remarks that it is less artless than it seems. The sentence "These hymns are now lost to us, but doubtless they were such as they two now sing in heaven," is not a piece of unpremeditated art. "On the inside cover of his Eusebius Walton has written three attempts at this sentence, each of them very far from the concise beauty to which he at last constrained himself." We presume that this Eusebius is in the Cathedral Library of Salisbury, at least Nicolas mentions it among Walton's books there. We give the various attempts at the passage quoted by Mr. Lowell:—

Twenty eight himns and psalms which was his holy recreation the latter part of his life and is now his employment in heaven, where he makes new ditties in praise of that god in 3 persons to whome be glory.

And his better part is now in heaven doing that which was most of his employment on earth magnifying the mercies and making himns and singing them, to that god to whome be honour and glorie.

In heaven where his employment is to sing such himns as he made on earth, in praise of that god to whom be honour and glory.

This clearly proves that Izaak's beauties did not come without labour.

It is noted that, in writing about an author, the critic is apt to be affected by his style. In this interesting essay Mr. Lowell himself writes with a quaintness which we have not observed in his other studies. For example:—"Walton had not the strong passions which poets break to the light harness of verse, and indeed they and longevity such as his are foaled by dams of very different race." If this means that poets, having strong passions, are shortlived, we may point to Sophocles, Landor, Victor Hugo, not to speak of the chief or only honours of contemporary song. But we are not certain that we do take the meaning of Mr. Lowell's curious phrase. Cotton, according to Mr. Lowell, was "an excellent poet, and a thorough master of succulently idiomatic English." The same praise may be given to Cotton's critic, but in this essay Mr. Lowell does occasionally surprise us by reminding us of modern "stylists" too fond of artificiality and research in language. Perhaps it is hard to read Walton much without catching his undeniable love of a curious word, an unexpected turn. By way of a fairer example of Mr. Lowell's manner, we quote a passage on Walton's piety, its happiness, and its charm:—

Length of days is one of the blessings of the Old Testament, and surely it might be added to the Beatitudes of the New, when, as with Walton, it meant only a longer ripening, a more abundant leisure to look backwards without self-reproach, and forwards with an assured gratitude to God for a future goodness like the past. There is, perhaps, if we condescend to a purely utilitarian view, no stronger argument for belief in a personal Deity than that it makes possible this ennobling sense of gratitude; and in a time when such possibility has been so largely analysed and refined away, Walton's habitual recognition of so direct and conscious an obligation that he cannot resist the interjectional expression of it is a chief cause of the solace and refreshment we feel in reading him. As we read we inhale an odor from the leaves as if flowers from the garden of childhood had been pressed between them, and for a moment, by the sweet sophistry of association, we stand again among them where they grew. Here is in-contaminate piety, wholesome as bread. It is a gush of involuntary emotion like that first sincere and precious juice which their own weight forces from the grapes. A fine morning, a meadow flushed with primroses, are not only good in themselves, but sweeter and better because they give him occasion to be thankful for them. We may be wiser, but it may be doubted whether we are so happy, in our self-reliant orphanhood. He had two pleasures where we have but one, and that one doubtfully now that the shadow of the metaphysic cloud has darkened nature.

On Thealma and Clearchus (1683) we are happy to be in agreement with Mr. Lowell. John Chalkhill is, practically, Izaak

* The Complete Angler. With an Introduction by James Russell Lowell. London Macmillan & Co. 1889.

Walton. The very references to angling in the poem, though Mr. Lowell does not say so, seem to us Waltonian. In his edition of 1820 (with a frontispiece by the abominable Wainwright, the poisoner), Mr. Samuel Weller Singer expresses the same opinion. The language, as Mr. Lowell points out, is not of Spenser's time, yet Walton says that his Jon Chalkhill knew Spenser. "The invariable use of the possessive its and the elision of the e in the past participle would be conclusive." "I am convinced," Mr. Lowell declares, "that Thealma and Clearchus, whoever may have sketched it, is mainly Walton's as it now stands, and I believe it to be the work of his middle or later life." If Walton was the author, Mr. Lowell "does not think the artifice very culpable." There could not be a more harmless supercherie. All the conclusion of Mr. Lowell's essay on Walton's humour, piety, and love of nature is delightful, ending with the happy quotation, Fortunate senex, ergo tua rura manebunt.

So, even if Izaak fished with a fly like that of his friend, which Cotton "hung in his parlour window to laugh at," farewell to him, for an old man truly fortunate.

NEW PRINTS.

THERE is now on view at the Galleries of Messrs. Boussod, Valadon, & Co., in New Bond Street, a new etching by M. F. Gaulet, of the "Église de Gréville," by François Millet. This is a picture of exceptional interest. It was found, as will be remembered, in Millet's studio after his death, and it was one of a few works which he was so fond of that he had not been able to persuade himself to part from them. The "Église de Gréville" was painted, we believe, in 1872. It was secured for the Luxembourg, where it now rests. The parish church of Gréville holds a prominent place in the annals of Millet's life. Gruchy, the hamlet where he was born, is in the commune of Gréville, and there the artist was baptized. In his autobiographical notes he speaks of his being taken there as a child, and of his admiration of its "great windows with their lozenge-shaped leads." He has taken his view from outside the low churchyard wall, so that a corner of the characteristic Norman sea is visible in the canvas, and the eye perceives that the church and village are on the top of a cliff. The building itself is one of those low, straggling churches, so common in La Manche, the broad nave and squat tower of which give the edifice a look of clinging to the ground lest it should be blown out to sea. M. Gaulet has translated this interesting example with a great deal of skill, keeping the general key soft and light; the sky is delicate and large. A little more atmosphere is wanted, perhaps, in the treatment of the yew-tree at the back of the church; but, on the whole, the etching is remarkably successful in the relation of its tones.

We do not recall the precise title of the "Village on the Oise," by Daubigny, which M. Greux has etched on a large plate with considerable success. Daubigny would paint the Oise, and his good pictures of it are not more numerous than his bad ones. This particular example, which is in the Exposition Universelle, is excellent. It has less than usual, or M. Greux has taken the liberty of improving it, of Daubigny's smear, his gross evidence of the passage of the brush unrevised. On the other hand, it has the charm of his composition. M. Greux is not to be confounded with the veteran Gustave Greux, who was so widely known in this country through his etched plates for Lièvre's Works of Art in the Collections of England. He bids fair, however, to become as distinguished; he etched the "Semeur" of Millet which enjoyed so much success last year. He is, we believe, one of the staff of engravers and etchers employed at the Asnières ateliers.

The same publishers have added a number of examples to their attractive series of "Miniature Engravings." The new plates comprise works by Kaemmerer, Bouguereau, Fildes, Bayard, Mlle. Fournier and Geoffroy. These little "engravings," as they are called, seem to be really autotypes or goupilgravures, done by process. They are not serious, but they are very pretty and amusing. Messrs. Boussod, Valadon, & Co. are on the point of publishing an édition de luxe of three of Lord Tennyson's poems, "To E. L.," "The Palace of Art," and "The Daisy," with twenty-five illustrations by E. L. himself, who, as everybody knows, or ought to know, was not merely the laureate of nonsense, but a very refined and talented artist, with an adoration of Tennyson which almost amounted to deification. The drawings are reproduced in goupilgravure, and are really charming. During his lifetime Edward Lear, we believe, never succeeded in finding a publisher who would bring out these illustrations as he desired. He is justified after his decease.

CHRISTMAS BOOKS.

I.

AMONGST the new books specially intended for our adventure-loving boys, Blown to Bits: a Tale of the Malay Archipelago, by R. M. Ballantyne (London: Nisbet & Co.), ought to please any youth who not only craves for excitement, but likes to have his wildest imaginations satisfied. He will find in Blown to Bits the finest of hairbreadth escapes, the most herculean of feats. A German Professor who joins a party of travellers buries himself in a hole he makes in the ground, determined to shoot a tiger or die. The tiger comes out, stands over the Professor's hiding-place, and is shot dead. The Professor is not hurt; but he stands every chance of being suffocated, as the tiger falls across the mouth of his enemy's hiding-place. However, on the Professor shouting out, in answer to his friends' question "Where are you?" "Here onder zee tigre! Kweek, I am suffocat," this remarkable feat was performed. "Instantly Van der Kemp seized the animal by the tail, and, with a force worthy of Hercules, heaved it aside as if it had been a dead cat, revealing the man of science underneath, alive and well, but dishevelled, scratched, and soiled; also as deaf as a doorpost." Another astonishing trial of strength is described in the death of a "huge python" which was discovered coiled up in the thatch of a hut in which the travellers had spent the night. "We must get him out of that," remarked Van der Kemp as he quietly made a noose with a piece of rattan, and fastened it to the end of a long pole. With the latter he poked the creature up, and, when it had uncoiled sufficiently, he slipped the noose deftly over its head. 'Clear out, friends,' he said, looking round. All obeyed with uncommon promptitude, except the Professor, who valiantly stood his ground. Van der Kemp pulled the python violently down to the ground, where it started a tremendous scuffle among the chairs and posts. The hermit kept its head off with the pole, and sought to catch its tail, but failed twice. Seeing this, the Professor caught the tail as it whipped against his legs, and springing down the steps so violently that he snapped the cord by which the hermit held it, and drew the creature straight out—a thick monster, full twelve feet long, and capable of swallowing a dog or a child. 'Out of zee way!' shouted the Professor, making a wild effort to swing the python against a tree; but the tail slipped from his grasp, the Professor fell, and the snake went crashing against a log, under which it took refuge. Nigel, who was nearest it, sprang forward, fortunately caught its tail, and, swinging it and himself round with such force that it could not coil up at all, dashed it against a tree. Before it could recover from the shock, Moses had caught up a hatchet and cut its head off with one blow. The tail wriggled for a few seconds, and the head gaped once or twice, as if in mild surprise at so sudden a finale." The Professor's comment on this exciting scene is as good as any we can give—"Zat is strainch—very strainch." The descriptions of the islands in the Malay Archipelago are better illustrated by the letterpress than the drawings; and there is a wonderful description of the volcanic eruption in Krakatoa in 1883, which must interest any reader of Blown to Bits. The romantic element in the story is prettily introduced; and, if some of the instances seem very far-fetched—notably the extraordinary coincidence of a canoe containing the travellers, amongst whom is the son of a certain captain owning a vessel called the Sunshine, being hurled by a great wave during the eruption in Krakatoa on to the deck of the Sunshine—no doubt our boys' imaginations will be able to soar to them.

The Romance of the Forests, by Ascott R. Hope (London: John Hogg), is, to quote the author's own words, "an entertaining miscellany for all tastes." Truly, as he says, "the forest is the natural home for romance"; and in his book we have it in great variety. There are the old English forest legends; legends of German forests, amongst the more romantic of which is "Eginhard and Emma"; and, going on to Switzerland, we have "A True Romance of the Trient," where the woodcutter's life is described. Some of the stories of hermits are very interesting. Then we come to thrilling and horrible tales of the Backwoods, "The Red Men and the White Men." Then beautiful descriptions of the tropical forests, curious accounts of the wild men of the woods, and vivid ones of the destruction of the forests. Altogether, we can recommend The Romance of the Forests as an interesting book for old and young.

In Our Stories, by Ascott R. Hope (London: Biggs & Debenham), we find a collection of tales principally relating to school-life, which contain, not only amusing incidents, but good moral lessons, put in the form of personal experiences, which must appeal to a boy's heart, instead of setting him against what he is pleased to call "sentimental" or "religious bosh." The first story, "Our First Pipe," is a true and vivid description of the pleasure, pain, and subsequent consequences of the schoolboy's first pipe on the sly. "My First Scrape" is one which will prove no inducement to its ambitious reader to go and do likewise; and "My Last Scrape" will touch and stir all the good feelings in any boy whose love for his mother rules the greater part of his life. The other stories, "My Foreign Friend," "Our Holiday Tour," "The Greatest Trouble of My Life," "Our Serenade," "Our Volunteers," and "My Deed of Darkness," will all in their turn prove interesting, touching, and exciting.

Lil, by the author of Tip-Cat and Pen (London: Smith & Innes), is a pretty story of a girl who, when she was thirteen, slipped downstairs and injured her spine, thereby becoming an invalid for life; but, luckily for her five brothers and their great boy friend, an invalid whose life consists in being their helper and their sympathetic friend in all their joys and troubles. Her horror of being "a proper invalid"—which she describes as a person "speaking in a very gentle voice, reading good books, wearing a knitted shawl, and using Eau-de-Cologne"—is very pathetic. "I can't bear to be sympathized with. I'm not a bit like Mrs. Wyatt and never shall be. It doesn't make my head ache a bit when there's a noise, and I hate people speaking in whispers," she tells her father. The father is, of course, a widower—fathers generally are in stories nowadays describing home life. The love story which comes into Lil's life, not affecting herself personally, but which she enters into as affecting those near and dear to her, is a pretty romantic element in the book which will be specially pleasing to girls.

Ada Norman's Trials and Difficulties, by M. Seymour (London: Hogg), is another story which will be attractive to girls. It begins with Ada Norman's leave-taking of her school and first introduction to her aunt and cousin, with whom she is going to live. She is an orphan and dependent on her uncle and aunt for a home. Here her trials and difficulties begin, and "It was just when she was feeling most weary and most heartless that a friendly smile and a friendly voice came to help her out of the depth of her discouragement—such voice and smile belonging to a silver-haired old lady who was the nearest neighbour of the Doctor's family." This old lady becomes her firm friend, and when Ada's uncle dies and Ada has to get employment for her living soothes and encourages her. Ada's trials and difficulties continue many and great until she becomes governess to a little girl whose mother died when she was born, and whose father and maiden aunt are kind, good people who appreciate Ada and make her life a happy one. She finally leaves them to take care of her kind old friend until she dies. The book ends up happily with Ada's marriage.

Laurel Crowns; or, Griselda's Aim: a Story for Brothers and Sisters, by Emma Marshall (London: Nisbet & Co.) The principal characters in this story are members of two families—Blunts and Carringtons—neighbours in a small village near London. It is needless to say that in both families the mother is dead. Why cannot we have interesting stories about children without depriving them of their maternal parent? However, Sir Thomas Blunt has married again, and his second wife is the typical, selfish, self-indulgent stepmother, who, though not unkind, takes no trouble for her stepchildren, so that the Carringtons, who have a good father and kind cousin to look after them, are far better looked after and a far more united and happy family than their neighbours. The story keeps up its interest all through, and its vicissitudes are depicted simply and touchingly without harrowing children's feelings too deeply. It introduces, too, the Missions to Seamen in a way that must make the more serious reader feel the good of this noble work, and, finally, everything is brought to a happy conclusion, such as young people love—for as long as "everything ends happily" they do not mind having a good cry in the course of their book.

Prince Vance: the Story of a Prince with a Court in his Box, by Eleanor Putnam and Arlo Bates (London: Smith & Innes), carries one back to the old fairy-tale days. The art of writing fairy-tales seemed in a great measure to have died out, and it is refreshing to be reminded, as in Prince Vance, that it still exists. It is impossible to give an adequate sketch of such a tale. We can only advise our children whose spirit of imagination has been allowed scope to read it. The illustrations by Frank Myrick add much to the attraction of the book. They are fantastically designed and cleverly executed.

Amongst the numerous books written for younger children, Ismay Thorn's Max or Baby: the Story of a Very Little Boy (London: Blackie & Son) comes first. "Max" or "Baby," as he chooses to be called, is a most fascinating little person of four, who, when we are introduced to him, is much puzzled as to what the doctor can mean by saying his father is overdone and wants rest and country air. His mother's explanation, on the question being suddenly put to her by Baby "What is overdone?" puzzles him still more. "Like the mutton at dinner, or your rice-pudding sometimes." "But what does it look like zen?" "Oh, all black and burnt." Baby next appeals to one of his sisters. "Farver isn't all black and burnt, is he?" "Why no, of course not." "Doctor did say zat farver was looking pale and ill, and overdone, and muvver says overdone means black and burnt." Baby has a decided character of his own, and expresses his opinions with more firmness than politeness. He by turns amuses and amazes his grandfather, with whom he and his sisters go to stay whilst their overworked father is abroad with their mother. He is prompt not only to pick up ideas, but to act upon them. He hears that his father wants money to enable him to stay abroad longer. On happening to go for a walk in the garden with his grandfather, he listens to a conversation between him and the gardener, and discovers that one way of getting money is to sell flowers and fruit at the railway station. Then follows an amusing, but touching, account of Baby's immediately acting on this discovery, how he engages his small sister's help, how between them, having found a large, empty basket, "they filled it with more zeal than discretion," and finally, unseen by any one, went off to try and find the railway station. What with losing their way, and what with the heaviness of the basket, the poor little things got overweighted with their cares and were beginning to break down, when a kind and wise friend luckily came in sight, and, easily persuading the children to give up their laudable intention, took them home. "Max or Baby's" sayings and doings are so cleverly and amusingly told, that older people than the young children for whom they are set forth must enjoy them.

Paul's Friend: a Story for Children and the Childlike, by Stella Austin (London: Smith & Innes), introduces us to two little children, twins, called Paul and Paulina, who have not only that rare happiness in story-books of having a father and mother alive, but of their being all that is kind and good. Consequently the children are happy and good and wise. Even being told by his father that they are so poor they must give up their beautiful house and all the delights of it does not affect the boy in any way except to enable him to remark:—"If we have not got our garden and park, we have God's part of the world. . . . I like God's part of the world that belongs to everybody." Indeed, from the way in which he receives the news his father dreaded to tell, he proves himself "a philosopher as well as a Radical." There are pretty descriptions of the leave-taking between the children and their friends—both people and animals; but we are not introduced to "Paul's Friend" until they are settled in France. He is a man who avoids all his fellow-creatures, who is hard and tyrannical, who shows no mercy, and who has no heart. The children burst in upon him suddenly in his lonely house when rushing after a favourite dog who had escaped from them in pursuit of a cat. The gentleman begins by resenting the intrusion, but by degrees becomes very fond of Paul, who by his gentleness and goodness brings about a reunion of friends, and happiness to those he loves best. There is so much sentiment nowadays mixed up in our children's books, that it is a relief when we can pronounce it as healthy sentiment without morbidity—as is certainly the case in Paul's Friend.

In Exiled; or, when Great-Grandmother was Young, by Catharine Mary Mactorley (London: John Hogg), we have a sketch of an English girl's school and home life in those days—not so very different from ours, after all. The interest of the book chiefly consists in the introduction into it of a French Marquis and his daughter, who had escaped from France just before the Revolution and taking of the Bastille. How the poor little French girl, who had to work for her living, was snubbed by the English school-girls to whom she taught French, how eventually she unconsciously taught "our great-grandmother" the virtues of unselfishness and kind thoughts for others, is all well put before one in this little book.

We Four Children, by M. A. Hoyer (London: John Hogg), is a story of four children who start what they call a "literary and scientific Society" amongst themselves, which is to meet once a week. It is, fortunately for the children, joined by an uncle, who contributes to its amusement by telling original stories. There are few children who will not understand and sympathize with the difficulties as well as interests which beset this little Society.

We have also received The Ups and Downs of a Sixpence; or, Guess the many Curious Places I've been in, by M. Seymour; Noël and Geoff; or, Three Christmas Days, by Frances Armstrong, and Dolly's Adventures; or, Happy Days at Cranberry, by Yvonne (London: John Hogg), pretty harmless little stories for children, without much in them.

We cannot imagine a much greater treat as a Christmas present for our little ones than Golden Days and Silver Eves, designs by Maude Goodman, Alice Havers, Fannie Moody, and Marcella Walker. Poems, by Arthur E. Scanes and Helen Marion Burnside (London: Raphael Tuck & Sons). We are told that the pictures, which are all of them clever and artistic, have been designed at the London studios, and printed at the Fine Art Works in Germany. They certainly do all credit to the designers and printers. The poetry and illustrations on each month in the year which compose part of this fascinating book are alike charming.

The Prince of Nursery Playmates, "containing seventy-four nursery rhymes and nursery songs, illustrated with two hundred and seventeen pictures in oil-colours by the first artists" (London: Sampson Low, Marston, Searle, & Rivington), and Old Mother Goose's Rhymes and Tales, illustrated by Constance Haslewood (Frederick Warne & Co.), are collections of all the well-known nursery rhymes and tales, put into an attractive form for the children of the present day, whose tastes in literature of all kinds are so much consulted and administered to.

The Royal Progress of King Pepito, by Beatrice T. Cresswell, illustrated by Kate Greenaway; A House to Let, by Mrs. Molesworth; The Zoo (Second Series), by the Rev. J. G. Wood, illustrated by Harrison Weir; Short Tales for Little Folk, by Frances Epps, C. Selby Lowndes, and others (London: S.C.P.K.), are all good specimens of children's books, and The Golden Sunshine Story Book, by Muriel Evelyn, "with many pretty pictures" (London: Ward, Lock, & Co.), is a capital book for children just beginning to read.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

TO notice a German book under the head of French Literature may seem anomalous; but it is not really more anomalous than noticing a history of French literature under the head of German. Herr Birch-Hirschfeld (1) is already known as a student of some parts of early French literature, and now he seems to have undertaken a regular history of the later part from and including the Renaissance. The part before us, extending from the beginning to about the middle of the sixteenth century, is a clear and sufficiently erudite summary of existing knowledge on the subject, furnished with notes which, useful as they are, would have been perhaps better redacted into the form of a bibliographical index, well printed in (thank heaven!) Roman type, and exhibiting that competent study of the subject which one expects from a German. Much further than this we cannot at present go, for Herr Birch-Hirschfeld has other Germanisms which are not so desirable. It may, perhaps, be said without arrogance that literary criticism, pure and simple, is not the strongest point of the German literary character, and without impoliteness that confident dogmatism too often takes its place. We are unable to find any other epithet than bête for the positive statement, in reference to Rabelais, that "die später (1564) erschienene Fortsetzung des Romans hat er nicht geschrieben." No doubt a positive assertion on the other side would be almost as foolish; no doubt the authorship of the last Book is one of those questions on which wise men will perpetually agree to differ and lovers of literature will perpetually delight to argue each his own side. But Herr Birch-Hirschfeld certainly has the learning, and ought to have the sense, to be aware that positive evidence sufficient to settle the matter of fact there is none, and he should have the modesty to admit that on the question of opinion persons at least his own equals in competence think that Rabelais did write, though he may not finally have revised, it. A positive assertion, as if the writer had in his breeches-pocket a document signed François Rabelais, and saying, "I did not write the last Book," is silly, is rude, and is—German.

(1) Geschichte der französischen Literatur seit Anfang des xvi. Jahrhunderts. Von Adolf Birch-Hirschfeld. Stuttgart: Cotta.

Madame d'Épône (2) is a very curious example of that radical difference of sentiment which never can get itself adjusted between the two nations of France and England. The heroine is the second in order of a remarkable quaternity of great-grand-mamma, grandmamma, mamma, and little daughter, of whom the youngest is very young and the eldest by no means old. She has been ill-treated and deserted by her husband; and her daughter (number three) has married an excellent, but not absolutely wise, gentleman, whom she is supposed to adore. To them enter le séducteur, Vincent de Mottelon. "Le séducteur" is as contemptible a person as your professional lady-killer usually is—that is to say, he is a person who, putting all moralities out of the question, forgets the elementary truth that, falling, or imagining yourself to fall, deliberately in love with anybody is no fun at all. Next to the less common, but not unknown, proceeding of buying a ream of paper, mending a pen, and then sitting down to write an epic poem also deliberately, this has always seemed to us the ne plus ultra of human folly, for the winds of Venus blow where they list and nowhere else. However, Berthe de Rollo is a little fool, and without ceasing to love her husband or going very far, permits Vincent to go some way. The catastrophe is only avoided by a fantastic and unnecessary piece of devotion of Mme. d'Épône, who, being still young and handsome, goes to the rendezvous which Vincent has appointed for her daughter, and is found there by her son-in-law. We do not say that very great art might not make the situation effective; but here, though the book is not ill-written, that is not done. And then the way in which the assignation is asked for! This dragon, who lives only to chase the helpless marquée, actually puts a note in the case of one of a parcel of books which he sends to his proposed victim. Why any schoolboy might know better!

There is always considerable talent in M. Louis Létang's work, the chief drawback to it being his adoption of the modern fancy of writing by "episodes," which involves irritating references to some other book. Madame de Villemor (3) opens very well with a quiet, but exact and interesting, sketch of a little girl's life in Dauphiné. Afterwards the tale grows more animated, and we have Italian princes, a diamond room, wicked Russians, and we know not what else. So the book appeals to more tastes than one. Whether a similarly double aim had anything to do with M. Lomon's (4) adoption of his title, we cannot say. The "love," however, is only "not fit to be named" in appearance, not in reality, though the lover is not a good man. He, in consequence of an accident at sea, rather cleverly described, finds himself at liberty to exchange with the smallest possible risk of detection, and also without much injury to any one, the position of a ruined and resourceless gambler for that of a prosperous ex-merchant with fifty thousand pounds. Unluckily one part of his inheritance is a daughter, and in after years he falls in love with her. The situation, though with risky possibilities, is not offensively carried out, and there is a good deal of interest in the book, though it sometimes grazes the preposterous.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

SO determined has been the praise of modern science, and so prodigal the incense of flattery offered to its prophets and priests, that Mr. Samuel Laing's Problems of the Future (Chapman & Hall) seems a trifling addition to the burden. The first portion of this glib and rather smartly-written summary of scientific progress is one prolonged pæan on the discoveries of science. In the interests of "the semi-scientific reader" Mr. Laing reviews the scientific field to date. His popular views of the triumphs of Darwin and his followers are well suited to the audience he addresses. The antiquity of man, the Glacial Period, the duration of solar heat, the composition of the universe, animal magnetism and spiritualism, and our old friend, still invisible and undiscoverable, the Missing Link—these are some of the problems presented. Treating these Mr. Laing is exceedingly at his ease. He passes from one to another of these mighty themes with a sure-footed pertinacity and a fearless confidence that will certainly favourably impress the average reader, who is of loose reading habit and does not so much as think of thinking. The profit of it all is hard to discern. For example, Mr. Laing wrestles with the Glacialists, and prefers the estimate of an observer on the Mersey to Professor Prestwich's 20,000 years. The truth is, in these matters you are invited to make a choice, the more plausible the better, the data for either estimate being alike meagre and inconclusive. And so it is with the geological "idea of cataclysms," which Mr. Laing asserts is now "completely exploded," while on another page he refers to the authentic record of the upheaval "by the shock of a single earthquake" of the Pacific coast of South America to the extent of five or six feet for some six hundred miles. Is not this something of a cataclysm? And what warrant has he or any one else that the like has not happened repeatedly, or that volcanic eruptions infinitely more extensive than that of Krakatao have not occurred and may not be repeated? Then with regard to the "missing link," after remarking that the truth or falsehood of Darwin's theory of natural selection and the survival of the fittest was staked on the discovery of missing links, Mr. Laing observes "the case was almost similar to that of the truth of Halley's calculation as to the orbit of his comet, being staked on its return at the predicted period." There may be much virtue in the "almost," but a falser or more misleading analogy could scarcely be conceived. At present no one has ventured to predict where the missing links—their name should be legion—that connect man with his arboreal ancestors are to be found. Mr. Laing does, indeed, hint that some day there may be discovered in the Miocene or Eocene formations "some missing link"—only one, be it marked; ready made, it would seem, like a museum specimen—"bearing the same relation to man as the Hipparion and its ancestors do to the horse." Despite this insignificant hiatus in the evolutionary evidence, Mr. Laing derives much consolation, at a cheap rate, too, from the results arrived at by distinguished comparative anatomists in the study of man and the anthropoid apes. He thinks that "all, or nearly all," of man's "higher intellectual or moral qualities" appear in animals "in a rudimentary state," though this amazing statement is substantiated only by citing the arithmetical powers of "Sally" at the Zoo and Sir John Lubbock's dog, and by contrasting the gorilla in his forest, living "respectably with a single wife and family," with certain husbands and parents "of our Upper Ten who figure in the Divorce Courts." Even this pleasant report of the excellent gorilla is based merely on "accounts of travellers." Between a young negro and a young chimpanzee the difference is not very great, says Mr. Laing; and this may be true to the superficial eye or to the prying anatomist. Yet there is the insuperable fact that the one remains a chimpanzee and the other grows to be a man. Of course something may be done, as Mr. Laing suggests, for the anthropoid apes; and now that Equatorial Africa is being opened, it is to be hoped that Mr. Laing may persuade some "scientist" to attempt the experiment of selective breeding. Let him go to school with the chimpanzee and the rest, and see if he can produce Sir Oran Haut-ton.

Those who enjoyed the fancy and humour of Mr. T. E. Brown's Fo'sle Yarns will find much to their liking in The Manx Witch, and other Poems (Macmillan & Co.) Mr. Brown tells a story, as a story should be told in verse, with simple force and directness. When he digresses, as in "The Manx Witch," the digressions are admirably characteristic of the narrator, who is a sailor, and not altogether acclimatized to life among the Isle of Man miners. Tom Baynes proves his powers once more in the dramatic story of the courtship of pretty Nussy by Jack and Harry, their jealousies and quarrel, the evil-working of the Witch, and her horrible fate. The characters of the two men—the victorious Jack and his "dooiney-molla," or chief backer and commender to the beloved—are vigorously drawn, and charming are the pictures of the "sooreyin," or courting, in the sweet spring weather. The manner of it is graphically painted. With Nussy at the window, Jack would mount on the shoulders of Harry, who was nothing but "sempertizin":—

"Get down," says Nussy, "don't ye see That Harry is tired?"—"Not me! not me!"
And just like a mason with his hod,
As stiff—and beggin for the love of God
They'd go on; and gevvin a surt of a coo—
"Aw keep it up! aw do! aw do!"

The poem is remarkable for its terse and strong emotional power. The irregular rhymed metre is fluent yet nervous, and the dialect is nothing to boggle at. Of the remaining poems we like best "Peggy's Wedding," though readers who abhor dialect may prefer the sentiment and pathos of "Mary Quayle," a tragedy of desertion and death.

My Mistress the Empress Eugénie (Dean & Son), an "Authorized translation" from the French of Mme. Carrette, is a tedious

(2) Madame d'Épône. Par Brada. Paris: Plon.

(3) Madame de Villemor. Par Louis Létang. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

(4) Amour sans nom. Par C. Lomon. Paris: Plon.

volume of gossip, not very well done into English, and by no means a model of literary arrangement. The devotion and loyalty of the writer are qualities more pleasantly apparent than any power of observation or delineation. We can hardly believe that Mme. Carotte wrote of "Louis XIV (sic) and Marie Antoinette," or that an unpleasant passage of her recollections (p. 182) takes an equally disagreeable form in the original.

Stray Leaves of Literature, by Frederick Saunders (Elliot Stock), though apparently a book that is intended for book-lovers, is scarcely worthy of more than a cursory inspection. There are among its contents papers on old books, ballads, and songs, the survival of books, and so forth; but these attractive themes produce little but platitude and slovenly writing. Mr. Saunders subjects the poets, by the way, to cruel treatment. He misquotes and misrepresents Coleridge's exquisite music thus:—

Many a hidden brook, in this leafy month of June,
To the sleeping woods all night singeth a quiet tune.

He audaciously calls this "Coleridge's couplet." Of Mr. Saunders and the ballad we have, indeed, too much when we find Peacock's "War Song of Dinas Vawr" referred to, without acknowledgment, as "This rollicking Welsh ballad," and as "an illustration of the utter absence of pathos," arranged in couplets, as in the Coleridgean extract, with five misprints.

The annual volume of Atalanta (Hatchards) is one of the most comely of illustrated magazines, and one to be commended to all who are in search of a gift-book that is certain to please and to profit young people. The illustrations are varied and good, especially the Goupil plates and the reproduction in colour after Bastien Lepage that forms the frontispiece. The fiction, verse, essays, the contributions to the Atalanta Scholarship and Reading Union, and the papers on artistic themes, are all interesting and readable.

Amabel Jenner's Half-hour Plays (Smith & Innes) is a capital collection of dramas for juveniles, founded on old fairy-tales, and ought to prove as popular as the Terra-Cotta Plays of last season. Intelligent children should readily play with excellent effect, either at village entertainments or in the drawing-room, "Jack and the Beanstalk," "The Snow Queen," "Silverlocks," and the rest. The scenery is not indicated, and is not necessary. For costume the directions will, if followed, cause a run on "Kate Greenway dresses."

The Rev. John Macgowan tells "the story of the Army Mission" of the London Missionary Society in an interesting and fluent narrative, under the objectionable title, Church or Confession, Which? (London Missionary Society). When taste and grammar protest, it may be feared that the reader may go further, and turn altogether from a harmless and fair-minded chronicle.

Whether Sir William Harcourt's benevolent legislation has tended to thin rabbits to any great extent we cannot say, but Major Morant's Profitable Rabbit-Farming (L. Upcott Gill) goes far to persuade us there are not enough rabbits in the country. Major Morant points the way to successful farming of rabbits in hutches in the open, and shows how the operation may pay the farmer.

We have received Dr. Arnold of Rugby, by Rose E. Selfe, a well-written biographical sketch in "The World's Workers" series (Cassell & Co.); Autumn Leaves, a poem by E. J. Naish (St. Ives: Jarman & Gregory), and Mr. Hugh Callendar's Primer and Reading Practice of Cursive Shorthand, "Cambridge System" (C. J. Clay & Sons).

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we cannot return rejected Communications; and to this rule we can make no exception, even if stamps for return of MS. are sent. The Editor must also entirely decline to enter into correspondence with the writers of MSS. sent in and not acknowledged.

ADVERTISEMENTS intended for the SATURDAY REVIEW should be addressed to the MANAGER of the ADVERTISEMENT DEPARTMENT at the OFFICE, 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON. A printed Scale of Charges can be obtained on application.

THE UNITED STATES.

The Annual Subscription to the SATURDAY REVIEW, including postage to any part of the United States, is £1 10s. 4d. or $7 39, and may be forwarded direct to the Publisher, Mr. WILLIAM BOYCE, at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, or to Mr. B. F. STEVENS, American Agency, 4 Trafalgar Square, London. International Money Orders can be sent from any office in the United States, and Subscriptions, payable in advance, may commence at any time.

The SATURDAY REVIEW is duly registered for transmission abroad.

The SATURDAY REVIEW may be had in Paris every Saturday from Veuve J. BOYVEAU, 22 Rue de la Banque (near the Bourse); also at Le KIOSQUE DUPERRON, Boulevard des Capucines, and Le KIOSQUE MICHEL, Boulevard des Capucines, by whom also Subscriptions will be received.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW may likewise be obtained in Paris every Saturday of Messrs. GALIGNANI, 224 Rue de Rivoli.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW Bill of Contents will be forwarded every Friday Evening by post, prepaid, to any Newsagent in Town or Country on application to the Publisher.

Nearly all the back Numbers of the SATURDAY REVIEW may be obtained through any Bookseller, or of the Publisher, at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 1,774, OCTOBER 26, 1889:

An Un-manifest Manifesto.The Censorship of Music-Halls.Lord John Russell. The Opening of the Reichstag.A Judicial Allantopoles. A Death and a Wedding.Dogs and their Commentators. Cræte and Armenia.The Conservatism of Cats. The State of Ireland.Incompatibles in the County Council. Homeric Blunders.Frappez Toujours. Things Colonial and Intercolonial.Some Speeches of the Week.Mr. John Ball.Tauromachie in Paris.The Decline of Comedy. The India Museum.The Leeds Festival—II. The Army and the Way to it.A New Norwegian Road. Mr Marks's Birds.The Iron Trade. The Chorolistha.National School of Cookery. Cats at the Crystal Palace.Money Matters. Dom Luis I.Par Nobile Fratrum.The Winning of the West.The Blue Fairy-Book. Haydn's Dictionary of Dates.Reminiscences of a Literary and Clerical Life.Stageland. Three Medical Books. Cheap Fiction.Life-Saving Appliances at Sea.Mr. Lowell on Izaak Walton. New Prints.Christmas Books—I. French Literature.New Books and Reprints.

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

DRURY LANE (The National Theatre).—AUGUSTUS HARRIS, Sole Lessee and Manager.—Every Evening at 8, THE ROYAL OAK, Misses Winifred, Emery, Neilson, Grey, Atherton, and Fanny Brough; Messrs. Henry Neville, Arthur Daere, Lablache, Loraine, Dobell, Lyons, Thomas, Stephens, and Harry Nicholls, &c. At 7.20, THE OPERA CLOAK.

LYCEUM.—THE DEAD HEART.—Every Evening at Eight o'clock. THE DEAD HEART: Mr. Henry Irving, Mr. Bancroft, Mr. Arthur Stirling, Mr. Righton, Miss Kate Phillips, and Miss Ellen Terry. Box Office (Mr. J. Hurst) open daily 10 to 5. Seats also booked by letter or telegram. Carriages at 11.—LYCEUM.

LYRIC.—Sole Proprietor and Manager, HENRY J. LESLIE. Every Evening, at 8.30, DORIS: (Last weeks) Mesdames Marie Tempest, Alice Barnett, Harriet Coveney, Hettie Lund, and Amy F. Augarde; Messrs. Ben Davies, C. Hayden Coffin, Furneaux Cooke, John Le Hay, W. T. Hemsley, Frank M. Wood, and Arthur Williams. Preceded at 7.40 by LOVE'S TRICKERY.

ROYAL AQUARIUM.—The most fashionable, popular, and select of Entertainments in London. Twice daily at 3 and 8. Unrivalled Variety Entertainment, in addition to the Cannibals from Tierra del Fuego, Beckwith's Swimming Performance, Frank P. Slavin, the Champion of Australia, &c. &c. at intervals during the day. Open 12, close 11.30.

CRYSTAL PALACE SATURDAY CONCERT.—Saturday, October 26th, at Three. Vocalist: Mme. Elvira Gambogi; Pianoforte, Señor Albeniz (his first appearance at the Crystal Palace). The Crystal Palace Orchestra. Conductor, Mr. AUGUST MANN. Programme will include:—Overture, "Coriolan" (Beethoven); Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra (Schumann); Symphony in B flat (Op. 60); Dr. Bernhard Scholz (first time in England); Solos for Pianoforte (Albeniz)—(a) Sevillana, (b) Cotillon Valse, (c) Impromptu. Concert Overture, "The Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" (Mendelssohn).

ARTS and CRAFTS EXHIBITION SOCIETY.—The NEW GALLERY, Regent Street.—SECOND EXHIBITION NOW OPEN, Ten to Six. Admission, 1s. WALTER CRANE, President. ERNEST RADFORD, Secretary.

GROSVENOR GALLERY, New Bond Street, W.

THE SECOND PASTEL EXHIBITION IS NOW OPEN.

Admission, 1s.—Ten to Six.

SCOTTISH PROVIDENT INSTITUTION

No. 6 ST. ANDREW SQUARE, EDINBURGH.

RESULTS for 1888.

NEW ASSURANCES COMPLETED £1,163,000.

Being for the 15th year in succession above a million.

PREMIUMS IN YEAR £558,875.

TOTAL INCOME £855,886.

CLAIMS (including Bonuses*) £328,530.

* Averaging 49½ per cent. on Policies Participating.

REALISED FUNDS, £6,516,468

(the Increase in year being £401,212).

PREMIUM FOR £100 AT DEATH: With Profits.

Age next Birthday	Payable during Life	Limited to 21 Payments
25	£1 18 0	£2 12 6
30*	2 1 6	2 15 4
35	2 6 10	3 0 2
40†	2 14 9	3 7 5
45	3 5 9	3 17 6
50	4 1 7	4 12 1

* A man of 30 may secure £1,000 at death by the yearly payment of £20 15s., which generally assures £800 only.

Or he may secure £1,000 by twenty-one yearly payments of £27 13s. 4d.—being thus free of payment after age 50.

† At 40 the Premium ceasing at 60 is, for £1,000, £33 14s. 2d.—about the same as most Offices require during the whole of life. Before these Premiums have ceased the Policy will have shared in at least one division of profits. To Professional Men and others, whose income is dependent on continuance of health, this limited payment system is specially recommended.

Subject, by special Acts of Parliament (1848 and 1884), to the jurisdiction of the English and Irish Courts.

Copies of Annual Report containing Tables of Rates and Full Information may be had.

COMBINES THE ADVANTAGES OF

Mutual Assurance with Moderate Premiums.

THE PREMIUMS are so moderate that an Assurance of £1,200 or £1,250 is generally secured from the first for a yearly payment which elsewhere assures (with profits) £1,000 only—equivalent to an immediate Bonus of 20 to 25 per cent.

The WHOLE PROFITS go to the Policyholders, on a system at once safe and equitable,—no share being given to those by whose early death there is a loss. On this principle large additions have been, and will be, made to the Policies of those who live to participate, notwithstanding the lowness of the premiums.

The SURPLUS at last Investigation was £1,051,035, of which £350,345 was reserved for future participation. The number who shared was 9,384. First shares were (with a few unimportant exceptions) from 18 or 20 to 34 per cent., according to age and class. Other policies were increased 50 and 80 per cent.

The SOCIETY has taken a leading part in the REMOVAL OF FORFEITURES.

POLICIES, as a rule, are WORLD-WIDE, and free from Restrictions on Residence after five years—provided the Assured has attained age 30.

Surrender Values compare favourably with other first-class Offices.

June 1889.

JAMES WATSON, Manager.

BRANCH OFFICES:

GLASGOW, 29 St. Vincent Place.
 ABERDEEN, 259 Union Street
 BRISTOL, 31 Clare Street
 LIVERPOOL, 25 Castle Street.
 NEWCASTLE, 3 Queen Street.

DUBLIN OFFICE: 16 College Green.
 BIRMINGHAM, 95 Colmore Row.
 LEEDS, Royal Exchange.
 MANCHESTER, 10 Albert Square.
 BELFAST, 23 Donegall Place.

Secretary in London—J. MUIR LEITCH,

OFFICE, 17 KING WILLIAM STREET, E.O.

THE GROSVENOR GALLERIES,

135 NEW BOND STREET, W.

These well-known Galleries can accommodate Fifteen Hundred Persons, and may be engaged for

PRIVATE "AT HOMES," SOIRÉES,
 CONVERSAZIONI, BANQUETS, &c. &c.

The PASTEL EXHIBITION opened on the 15th inst.

THE ELECTRIC LIGHT THROUGHOUT.

Applications should be made to the GENERAL MANAGER.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXHIBITION, 1889.

MUSGRAVE'S NEW PATENT "ULSTER" STOVES.

EFFICIENT AND RELIABLE HEATERS.
 WILL BURN THE ENTIRE WINTER WITHOUT RELIGHTING.
 FREE FROM DUST AND ALL UNPLEASANT SMELL.
 EASILY FIXED, EASILY MANAGED, ABSOLUTELY SAFE.

One Hundred Designs and Sizes. Delivered free.

ILLUSTRATED PRICED CATALOGUES and ESTIMATES FREE.

MUSGRAVE & CO., LIMITED, 97 NEW BOND STREET, LONDON;
 40 DEANSGATE, MANCHESTER; 240 RUE DE RIVOLI, PARIS;
 ANN STREET IRONWORKS, BELFAST.

"GOOD NIGHT!"

DON'T FORGET TO USE

THOMPSON'S CORN PLASTER.—THOMPSON'S NEW
 FRENCH CORN PLASTER effectually cures Corns, Bunions, Enlarged Toe Joints, Chilblains, &c. It is thin as silk, and comfortable to the foot. Packets, 1s. 1½d. each, post free, from sole Proprietor. M. F. THOMPSON, Homœopathic Chemist, 17 GORDON STREET, Glasgow, and 97 Prince's Street, Edinburgh.
 ASK FOR THOMPSON'S PLASTER, AND TAKE NO SUBSTITUTE.

ILFRACOMBE.—ILFRACOMBE HOTEL. Thoroughly furnished, equipped, and decorated. 250 Rooms. Eight Lawn-Tennis Courts, Large Swimming Bath, Private Baths. Descriptive Tariff of Manager.

SCHWEITZER'S

C O C C O A T I N A.

GUARANTEED PURE SOLUBLE COCOA.

This Old-established Article retains its position as "the finest Cocoa in the market." It is unequalled in purity and flavour, bears the strictest Chemical test, and keeps in all Climates.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS AND ECONOMICAL.

VAN HOUTEN'S COCOA.

PURE—SOLUBLE.
 BEST & GOES FARTHEST.
 EASILY DIGESTED.
 MADE INSTANTLY.

"Once used, always used—its PURITY is beyond question."
Health.

"It is admirable—flavour perfect—and so PURE."
British Medical Journal.

C. J. VAN HOUTEN & ZOON,
 WEESP, HOLLAND.

FRY'S

Lancet—"Pure, and very soluble."Medical Times—"Eminently suitable for Invalids."

PURE CONCENTRATED

Sir C. A. CAMERON, President of the Royal
 College of Surgeons, Ireland—"I have never tasted Cocoa that I like so well."

COCOA.

THE FLYING J PEN.

The DELIGHT of all WRITERS. A Fountain Pen without complications. A Superior J Pen which will write over 100 words with one dip of ink.

6d. and 1s. per Box. Sample box, 1s. 1d. by post.

MACNIVEN & CAMERON, WAVERLEY WORKS, BLAIR STREET,
 EDINBURGH. (Established 1770.)

EDUCATIONAL.

THE MASON COLLEGE, BIRMINGHAM.

PROFESSORSHIP OF THE FRENCH LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE.

The COUNCIL invite applications for the above PROFESSORSHIP, vacant by the death of Professor E. LOREILLE, B. ès-L., Paris. The stipend will be £200 per annum, plus one-half of the Fees from Day Students, and the whole of the Fees from Evening Students.

Applications, accompanied by ten copies of Testimonials, should be sent to the undersigned not later than November 30, 1889.

The successful candidate will be expected to enter upon his duties on January 21, 1890.

Candidates are especially requested to abstain from canvassing.

Further particulars may be obtained from

GEO. H. MORLEY, Secretary.

ST. CLARE COLLEGE, WALMER, KENT.

Head-Master—The Rev. E. D'AUQUIER, M.A. Clare College, Camb. One of the Examiners to the Irish Board of Intermediate Education, late Head-Master of South-Eastern College, Ramsgate, with a staff of Assistant Masters (Graduates). The College is situated in a delightful spot, close to the sea, and contains teaching and boarding accommodation, chapel, sanatorium, infirmary, playroom, laundry, gymnasium, tuckshop, workshop, &c., 14 acres of well-timbered and beautiful grounds, cycle path, cricket and football fields, tennis-courts, &c., sea-bathing and boating.

The school year is divided into three terms; each term consists of about thirteen weeks. Inclusive fees, Eighty Guineas per annum. Exhibitions and Scholarships, of £10, £15, and £21, are annually thrown open for competition.

For further information, apply to the HEAD-MASTER.

STATE EXAMINATIONS. — Record of SUCCESSFUL PUPILS from GARRICK CHAMBERS.

INDIAN CIVIL SERVICE (1867-89), 117 out of 466 Pupils have passed.

CEYLON CIVIL SERVICE (1876-89) 29 out of 43 Pupils have passed; the First Place having been gained on 10 occasions.

SANDHURST, WOOLWICH, &c. (1876-89), 115 out of 147 Pupils have passed.

STUDENT INTERPRETERSHIPS and INDIAN FORESTS (1877-89), 20 out of 31 Pupils have passed; the First Place having been gained on 7 occasions.

HOME CIVIL SERVICE, 127 Pupils have passed, as under-mentioned (the First Place having been gained on 40 occasions):—

8 for the Treasury.	5 for India Office.
26 for Foreign Office.	9 for Home Office.
8 for War Office.	2 for Colonial Office.
4 for the Admiralty.	6 House of Lords' Office.
18 House of Commons' Office,	3 Board of Trade.
2 British Museum.	4 Duchy of Lancaster.
10 Secretary's Department of Post	2 Record Office.
Office.	6 Probate Office.
2 Local Government Board.	12 other Departments.

In addition to the above, 95 have passed into the DIPLOMATIC SERVICE, CONSULAR SERVICE, &c.

Between July, 1887, and September, 1889, 53 Pupils (out of a complement of 75) have been declared successful in the various sections. Only Pupils who have passed DIRECT from Garrick Chambers are included in these lists, which may be had, together with all particulars in regard to periods of work, Staff of Lecturers, &c., on application to Mr. SCOONES, Garrick Chambers, Garrick Street, London.

THE Misses S. and R. ALLEN-OLNEY (formerly Head-

Mistresses respectively of Blackheath and South Hampstead High Schools), residing in the healthy suburb of Hampstead, receive a few YOUNG LADIES to board and educate. The arrangements are those of a refined home. Large playground and full-sized tennis-court. Preparation for University examinations and degrees. Reference kindly permitted to parents of present and former pupils. —41 Belsize Park Gardens, London, N.W.

THE Rev. W. ALMACK, M.A., BRUCE CASTLE, near

TOTTENHAM, prepares PUPILS wanting special help for the Universities, Army, Legal or Medical Preliminaries, or the ordinary requirements of business life. Excellent house in Park of 20 acres, containing Cricket and Football grounds. References, the Head-Masters of Charterhouse, Cheltenham, and Marlborough.

BELL FARM, CLEWER HILL, WINDSOR.

BOYS prepared for ETON and other PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—Address Miss HIBBARD.

PRÉ SCILLA, LAUSANNE.—Miss WILLS, late Head-

Mistress of the Norwich High School, has a very comfortable English HOME for Elder GIRLS. Garden and full-sized Tennis-court. Numbers limited. Subjects taken:—French, German, Italian, Music, Singing, and Painting.

MR. W. P. FRITH, R.A., has VACANCIES, at his new Studios, for TWO PUPILS. A separate Class for Ladies.—Address, ASHENHURST, Sydenham Rise, Forest Hill.

TO PARENTS and GUARDIANS.—There are good openings for YOUNG MEN knowing CHEMISTRY and BREWING. Chemistry, either alone or in connexion with Brewing, may be learnt under the personal supervision of Messrs. GILLMAN & SPENCER at the large Labor-atories and the Brewery attached to "the London School of Brewing and Chemistry." Each Pupil receives individual attention and practical training.—For particulars and terms apply, SECRETARY, Castle Brewery, 21 St. George's Road, S.E.

P. and O. MAIL STEAMERS FROM LONDON TO

BOMBAY, GIBRALTAR, MALTA, BRINDISI, every week.

EGYPT, ADEN, and MADRAS via BOMBAY

CALCUTTA, MADRAS, COLOMBO, CHINA, STRAITS) every alternate week.

and JAPAN, AUSTRALIA, NEW ZEALAND and TAS-

MANIA, ALEXANDRIA, and NAPLES

CHEAP RETURN TICKETS.

For particulars apply at the Company's Offices, 122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., and 25 Cock-sour Street, London, S.W.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS'

UPRIGHT IRON GRAND PIANOFORTES.

Prices from 40 Guineas upwards.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Pianoforte Makers by Special Appointment to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales, 1889.—18, 20, and 22 Wigmore Street, W. Lists free.

MEL ROSA, the CERTAIN SAFE CURE for COUGHS,

Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, Hooping Cough, Hoarseness, Incipient Consumption, &c. In Bottles, post free, 1s. 11d. and 2s. 9d. Prepared only by the Proprietor, HERBERT POTTER, Chemist, M.P.S., Sutton, Surrey.

NOTE.—Insist on being supplied with Potter's "Mel Rosa."

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL, Strand, W.C. — The

COUNCIL earnestly appeal for DONATIONS and ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS. £20,000 required for new Nursing Establishment, enlargement of Medical School, the Convalescent Home, and current expenses. Bankers: Messrs. Drummond.

ARTHUR E. READE, Secretary.

ROYAL ALFRED AGED MERCHANT SEAMEN'S

INSTITUTION. Opened in 1867.

THE HOME, BELVEDERE, KENT.

Pensioners at all Ports of the United Kingdom.

Annual Disbursements, £6,000. Annual Subscriptions, £1,800.

Number of Inmates, 100. Out-Pensioners, 200.

Patron—Rear-Admiral H.R.H. THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH, K.G.

Chairman—Admiral Sir F. LEOPOLD MCCLINTOCK, F.R.S.

Deputy-Chairman—Captain DAVID MAINLAND, F.R.G.S.

The object of this Charity is to give a Home or a Pension to the Merchant Sailor when Old, Destitute, and Friendless.

800 Old Sailors, out of 1,700 Applicants, have enjoyed the benefits of this Charity; but from want of funds the Committee are unable to admit hundreds of necessitous and worthy Candidates, who for Forty years have been at Sea as Sea man, Mate, or Master.

Subscriptions and Donations are urgently needed to reduce this heavy list and to relieve many from destitution.

Bankers—Messrs. WILLIAMS, DEACON, & CO.

Office: 58 Fenchurch Street, London, E.C.

W. E. DENNY, Secretary.

LIFE ASSURANCES, &c.

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY.

Established 1836.
LONDON—1 MOORGATE STREET, E.C. ABERDEEN—1 UNION TERRACE.
INCOME and FUNDS (1888).

Fire Premiums	£615,000
Life Premiums	203,000
Interest	149,000
Accumulated Funds	£3,581,000

ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH LAW

LIFE ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION (Established 1839).

12 Waterloo Place, London. 120 Princes Street, Edinburgh.

Whole Life Bonuses never less than £1 10s. per cent. per annum.

Annuities. Loans. Liberal Conditions.

ARTHUR JACKSON, General Manager } 12 Waterloo Place,
FRANCIS E. COLENSO, F.I.A., Actuary } London.

CITY OFFICE—11 LUDGATE HILL, E.C.

JOHN MUNRO, City Secretary.

PHENIX FIRE OFFICE,

LOMBARD STREET and CHARING CROSS, LONDON.—Established 1782.

Moderate Rates. Absolute Security.

Liberal Loss Settlements. Prompt payment of Claims.

W. C. MACDONALD } Joint Secretaries.
F. B. MACDONALD }

Losses paid over £17,000,000.

IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Established 1803.—1 OLD BROAD STREET, E.C.; and 22 PALL MALL, S.W.

Subscribed Capital, £1,200,000. Paid-up, £300,000. Total Invested Funds, over £1,600,000.

E. COZENS SMITH, General Manager.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane.

THREE per CENT. INTEREST on DEPOSITS repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS when not drawn below £100. The Bank undertakes, free of charge, the Custody of Securities and Valuables; the Collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Shares, and Annuities. Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued. THE BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK.

ISSUE OF £371,320.

(Authorized by the Sheffield Corporation Acts, 1883 and 1889.)

The CORPORATION of SHEFFIELD give NOTICE that they are prepared to receive applications for the above sum of SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK.

Minimum price of Issue £100 per cent.

Interest payable half-yearly, on March 1 and September 1, at the Sheffield and Hallamshire Bank, Sheffield, or by their London Agents, Messrs. GLYN, MILLS, CURRIE, & CO., 67 Lombard Street.

No sum less than £50 of Stock will be allotted, and any amount in excess of that sum must be a multiple of £10.

Under the Trust Investment Act, 1889, recently passed, this Stock is an available investment for every Trustee who is not expressly forbidden by the instrument creating his trust to invest in Corporation Stock.

Forms of Prospectus, &c., and all information required, will be supplied by

Borough Accountant's Office,
Bridge Street, Sheffield,
August 16, 1889.

W. FISHER TASKER, Registrar.

DINNEFORD'S MAGNESIA.

This pure Solution is the best remedy for Acidity of the Stomach, Heartburn, Headache, Gout, and Indigestion.

DINNEFORD'S MAGNESIA.

The safest and most gentle Aperient for delicate constitutions, Ladies, Children, and Infants.

180 Bond Street, London; and all Chemists.

THE GREATEST of all PIANOFORTES.

THE STEINWAY PIANOFORTES, New York & London.

Steinway Hall, LOWER SEYMOUR STREET, Portman Square, London, W.

BOOKS, &c.

Just published.

No. 488 (OCTOBER 22) of

SOTHERAN'S PRICE CURRENT of LITERATURE,

Containing Collections of Works on

INDIAN and ASIATIC SUBJECTS, and in FRENCH LITERATURE, and a large number of the BEST EDITIONS of STANDARD ENGLISH WORKS, Historical, Philosophical, and Miscellaneous, from recently purchased Private Libraries.

A copy gratis and post free on application.

136 STRAND, W.C., AND 36 PICCADILLY, W., LONDON.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the 1s.—HATCHARDS, 187 Piccadilly,

London. All the New and Standard Books, Bibles, Prayers, Church Services, &c. Post Orders promptly executed. Libraries arranged and catalogued.

GOVERNMENT MAPS.—NOTICE.

EDWARD STANFORD, sole Official Agent for the Sale of the Ordnance and Geological Survey Maps in England and Wales, begs to remind the public that his new premises, 26 and 27 Cockspur Street, Charing Cross, S.W., afford every facility for the inspection and purchase of the various Maps published by order of H.M. Government, stock being kept on the premises. A résumé of the state of the various surveys corrected up to September 15th can be sent gratis and post free, or the Official Catalogue to January 1st, 1889, post free on receipt of 2s.

Admiralty Charts, Indian Government Maps, and all the best Foreign Maps, are also kept in stock. Estimates for Drawing, Colouring, Lithographing, Engraving, Printing, or Mounting Maps, &c. can be prepared at short notice. EDWARD STANFORD's many copyright Maps are available for Authors and Publishers as illustrations for books, &c., and New Printing Machinery has recently been erected to facilitate geographical work of all kinds.

Please note sole address—EDWARD STANFORD, 26 and 27 COCKSPUR STREET, Charing Cross, London, S.W., Sole Agent in England and Wales for the Sale of Ordnance and Geological Survey Maps.

Now ready, demy 8vo. with Portraits, 10s. 6d.

THROUGH THE IVORY GATE: Studies in Psychology and History. By WILLIAM W. JRELAND, M.D. Edin., formerly of H.M. Indian Army. Corresponding Member of the Psychiatric Society of St. Petersburg, and of the New York Medico-Legal Society.

BELL & BRADFUTE, Edinburgh. SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, & Co., London.

Just published, with Illustrations and Maps, price 31s. 6d.

A HISTORY of the ANCIENT TOWN and MANOR of BASINGSTOKE, in the County of Southampton; with a Brief Account of the Siege of Basing House, A.D. 1643-1645. By FRANCIS JOSEPH BAIGENT and JAMES ELWIN MILLARD.

Basingstoke: C. J. JACOB. London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, & Co.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LIMITED,

30 to 34 NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.;
241 BROMPTON ROAD, SOUTH KENSINGTON, S.W.;
AND 2 KING STREET, CHEAPSIDE, E.C.

I FOR THE CIRCULATION OF BOOKS.

SUBSCRIPTION from £1 1s. per annum.
Prospectuses and Monthly Lists Gratis.

II FOR THE SALE OF BOOKS.

Second-hand Copies of all the best Books of past Seasons,
at greatly Reduced Prices.
Lists with Prices Gratis.

III FOR THE BINDING OF BOOKS.

On the Premises by the best Workmen.
List of Bound Books Gratis.

N.B.—All Lists and Prospectuses Gratis and
Postage Free to any Address.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY,

30 to 34 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

NOW READY AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS'.

Handsomely bound, cloth gilt, crown 8vo. 6s.

THE AUTHORISED TRANSLATION OF MADAME CARETTE'S GREAT
AND POPULAR WORK,

"Souvenirs intimes de la Cour des Tuileries."

MY MISTRESS, the EMPRESS EUGÉNIE;

Or, Court Life at the Tuileries.

LONDON: DEAN & SON, 160A FLEET STREET, E.C.

NOW READY.

NEW VOLUME OF THE LOTOS SERIES.

Pott 8vo. uniformly bound in two styles: (1) cloth, gilt back and edges;
(2) half-parchment, cloth sides, gilt top, uncut, each 3s. 6d.

With Illustrations and Portrait of the Author.

THE LIGHT OF ASIA;

Or, the Great Renunciation.

Being the Life and Teaching of Gautama, Prince of India and Founder of Buddhism.

TOLD IN VERSE BY AN INDIAN BUDDHIST.

By Sir EDWIN ARNOLD, M.A., K.C.I.E., C.S.I.

Large Paper Edition, numbered, price 12s. 6d. to Subscribers.

Times.—"The most sympathetic account ever published in Europe of the life and teaching of the Sakya Saint, Prince Gautama Siddhartha, the Lord Buddha."

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES:—"It is a work of great beauty. It tells a story of intense interest, which never flags for a moment; its descriptions are drawn by the hand of a master with the eye of a poet and the familiarity of an expert with the objects described. . . . It is full of variety, now picturesque, now pathetic, now rising into the noblest realms of thought and aspiration; it finds language penetrating, fluent, elevated, impassioned, musical always, to clothe its varied thoughts and sentiments."

Morning Post.—"Not the least of his merits is that he writes such pure and delicious English. . . . 'The Light of Asia' is a noble and worthy poem."

* * * A Prospectus of the previous Volumes of the Lotos Series post free on application.

LONDON: TRÜBNER & CO., LUDGATE HILL.

A NOVEL COMMENDED by Mr. GLADSTONE and by Dr. GEORGE MACDONALD.
FOR the RIGHT. Now ready, New Cheap Edition. 3s. 6d.

GEORGE MACDONALD:—"I have seldom, if ever, read a work of fiction which moved me with so much admiration."

LONDON: JAMES CLARKE & CO., 13 and 14 Fleet Street, E.C.

Thirtieth Thousand, price 2s. 6d.

THE HISTORY of the PIANOFORTE. By EDGAR BRINSMEAD.

LONDON: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, E.C.; and
JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, 18, 20, and 22 Wigmore Street, W.

STAMMERERS and STUTTERERS should read a book by a gentleman who cured himself after suffering nearly forty years.

Post free for 13 stamps, from

Mr. B. BEASLEY, Sherwood, Willesden Lane, Brondesbury, London;
and Brompton Park, Huntingdon.

On Tuesday, October 29, in 1 vol. demy 8vo. 10s. 6d.

THE LOG of the "NEREIA": a Relation of a Recent Yachting Voyage from England to the Levant; with an Account of Algeria, Malta, Syria, and Egypt. Dedicated to Captain Weenie, by THOMAS GIBSON BOWLES, R.N.R.

LONDON: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, & CO., 4 Stationers' Hall Court.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW sent by post at following rates
per annum, paid in advance:

Any part of the United Kingdom	£1	8	2
India and China	1	12	6
Other British Colonies, Europe, Egypt, and America	1	10	6

STEEL & JONES, 4 Spring Gardens, London, S.W.

JAMES NISBET & CO.'S NEW WORKS.

THE WITNESS of the WORLD to CHRIST. By the Rev.
W. A. MATHEWS, M.A., Hon. Canon of Carlisle, Author of "The National Church of a Christian Nation" &c. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

WORD STUDIES in the NEW TESTAMENT. By MARVIN
R. VINCENT, D.D., Professor of Sacred Literature in Union Theological Seminary,
New York. Vol. I. The Synoptic Gospels, Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles of St.
Peter, James, and Jude. Demy 8vo. 16s.
Vol. II. The Writings of St. John:—The Gospel, The Epistles, The Apocalypse.
8vo. 16s.

VOX DEI; or, the Doctrine of the Spirit, as it is set forth in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments. By the Rev. R. A. REDFORD, M.A., LL.B.
Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

THE TESTIMONY of JUSTIN MARTYR to EARLY CHRISTIANITY. By GEORGE T. PURVES, D.D. Medium 8vo. 7s. 6d.

AGNOSTIC FALLACIES. By the Rev. J. REID HOWATT,
Author of "The Churchette," "Black Diamonds," &c. Crown 8vo. 1s. 6d.

ALEXANDER BALFOUR. A Memoir. By the Rev. R. H.
LUNDIE, M.A. New and Cheaper Edition. Small crown 8vo. with Portrait, 2s. 6d.

SELF-DISCIPLINE. A Memoir of Percy Clabon Glover, M.A., Worcester College, Oxford. By his Father, the Rev. RICHARD GLOVER, M.A., Author of "The Golden Decade of a Favoured Town" &c. Post 8vo. with Portrait, 4s. 6d.

THE LIFE and LETTERS of MRS. SEWELL. By Mrs.
BAYLY. With Portraits of Mrs. and Miss Anna Sewell. Fourth Edition. Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

COTTAGE LECTURES; or, Short Readings for Mothers'
Meetings. Ten Lectures on Health, and How to Keep it. By AGNES C. MAITLAND.
Small crown 8vo. 1s. 6d.

PARABLES in SONG; and other Pieces. By ISA GILLON
FERGUSON. Small crown 8vo. 2s.

WHERE the DEW FALLS in LONDON. A Story of a Sanctuary. By SARAH DODDNEY, Author of "The Heart's Desire," "The Strength of her Youth," &c. Crown 8vo. with Illustrations, 2s. 6d.

NONE of SELF and ALL of THEE. A Tale of Indian Life.
By S. S. HEWLETT, Author of "Daughters of the King" &c. Fep. 4to. with 14 illustrations, 5s.

A NEW EDITION OF THE

POETICAL WORKS of FRANCES RIDLEY HAVERGAL.
1 vol. extra crown 8vo. Roxburghe binding, gilt top, 7s. 6d.

HYMNS of OUR PILGRIMAGE. By the Rev. JOHN BROWNLIE,
Small crown 8vo. 2s.

THE MASTER'S SMILE; and other Poems. By CECILIA
HAVERGAL GRANT. Super-royal 32mo. gilt edges, 1s. 6d.

HELPFUL THOUGHTS for OUR YOUNG WORKING
SISTERS. By ONE WHO IS STEPPING WESTWARD. 16mo. 1s. 6d.

BIBLE PLANTS and ANIMALS. Containing Illustrations of over 1,000 Passages of Scripture from the Works of Travellers and other sources. By ALFRED E. KNIGHT. Crown 8vo. with 30 Illustrations, 2s. 6d.

LONDON: JAMES NISBET & CO., 21 BERNERS STREET, W.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S LIST.

Part I. now ready, price 10s. 6d.

THE CENTURY DICTIONARY: an Encyclopædic Lexicon of the English Language. Profusely Illustrated. In Twenty-four Monthly Parts, each 10s. 6d.

The Parts will be strongly bound in flexible cloth, which will bear constant use, and will form a complete working edition of the book, in twenty-four thin, flexible volumes. They will be issued so rapidly that the Dictionary will soon be a usable part of the library of any subscriber.

Square imperial 16mo. cloth, 6s.

HOW MEN PROPOSE: the Fateful Question and its Answer.
Love Scenes from Popular Works of Fiction. Collected by AGNES STEVENS. Presentation Edition, cloth elegant, in Box, 7s. 6d.

Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

LIGHT and SHADOW: a Novel. By EDWARD GARNETT,
Author of "The Paradox Club."

Now ready, the TWENTY-FIRST VOLUME of
"THE STORY OF THE NATIONS."

EARLY BRITAIN. By Professor A. J. CHURCH, Author of "Carthage," &c. 8vo. Illustrated, and furnished with Maps and Index, cloth, 5s.; gilt edges, 5s. 6d.; red tops, 5s.

Square imperial 16mo. cloth, 6s.

IN THOUGHTLAND and in DREAMLAND. By ELSA
D'ESTERRE-KEELING, Author of "Three Sisters," "Bib and Tucker," &c. Presentation Edition (uniform with the above), in Box, 7s. 6d.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE.

NEW VOLUMES ARE COMMENCED WITH THE NOVEMBER PARTS.

ST. NICHOLAS MAGAZINE.

Price 1s. Monthly.

The NOVEMBER Part contains:—

FOOTBALL IN AMERICA. Illustrated.
THE PRINCE AND THE BREWER'S SON. Illustrated.
A RACE FOR LIFE.
THE MONTH BEFORE CHRISTMAS.
JACK-IN-THE-PULPIT—LETTER BOX—RIDDLE BOX.
&c. &c.

With this Part ST. NICHOLAS is Enlarged by the Addition of Eight Pages, and the Magazine is printed in a new and clearer-faced Type. During the year there will be Four important Serial Stories by well-known Authors, and also Notable Papers on Athletics and Out-door Sports, as well as a multitude of occasional Papers, Stories, Illustrated Articles of Character and Adventure, Suggestive Talks on Natural History, Scientific Subjects, &c.
The Price remains the same.

Now ready.

VOLUME XVI. (in Two Parts), November 1888—October 1889. Handsomely bound in red and gold, price 16s.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Price 1s. 4d. Monthly.

The NOVEMBER Contents include:—

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY of JOSEPH JEFFERSON ("Rip Van Winkle"). Illustrated
I.—VII.
MY SEVENTY-FIRST YEAR. By WATT WHITMAN.
A CONNECTICUT YANKEE IN KING ARTHUR'S COURT. By MARK TWAIN.
Illustrated.
"FRIEND OLIVIA." By AMELIA E. BARR, Author of "Jan Vedder's Wife" &c. I.—II.
&c. &c.

The Volume for 1889-90 will contain, in addition, "The Merry Chanter," in Four Parts, by Frank R. Stockton; Letters from Japan, by John La Farge; and the Gold Hunters of California, being Personal Narratives of most Romantic Interest.

Besides the above Special Features, there will be valuable Contributions, in Prose and Verse, by Mark Twain, Edmund Gosse, H. H. Boyesen, Henry James, Edw. Eggleston, &c. &c.

Now ready.

VOLS. XVII. and XVIII., November 1888—October 1889. Bound in green cloth, gilt lettered, each 10s. 6d.

LONDON: T. FISHER UNWIN, 26 PATERNOSTER SQUARE, E.C.

HURST & BLACKETT'S NEW NOVELS.

A HAPPY WOOLING. By H. CLIFFE HALLIDAY.
2 vols.

A HARDY NORSEMAN. By EDNA LYALL,
Author of "Donovan," "We Two," &c. 3 vols.

MY LORD OTHELLO. By HENRY CRESSWELL,
Author of "A Modern Greek Heroine," "A Willy Widow," &c. 3 vols.

GEOFF. By GERTRUDE FORDE, Author of "In
the Old Palazzo," "Driven before the Storm," &c. 3 vols.

THE FREAKS of LADY FORTUNE. By
MAY CROMMELIN, Author of "Queenie," "Orange Lily," &c. 2 vols.

THE TREE of KNOWLEDGE. By G. M.
ROBINS, Author of "Keep my Secret," "A False Position," &c. 3 vols.

LONDON: HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED,
13 GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET.

Price 1s.

THE TEMPLE BAR MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS FOR NOVEMBER, 1889:

1. SIR CHARLES DANVERS. By the Author of "The Danvers Jewels." Chaps. 25-27.
2. SOUVENIRS ET PORTRAITS.
3. THE LITTLE SOLDIER.
4. CENTENARIANISM.
5. A LONDON STORY.
6. THOMAS POOLE.
7. A FIGHT FOR LIFE.
8. THE FIRST VOYAGE.
9. ARMINELL. By the Author of "John Herring" &c. Chaps. 46-50.
10. ROMANCE OF HISTORY.—VI. TAMERLANE.
11. PAUL'S SISTER. By the Author of "The Rose Garden." Chaps. 28-30.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.

ILLUSTRATED, PRICE ONE SHILLING.

THE

NEWBERY HOUSE MAGAZINE.

A Monthly Review and Family Magazine for
Churchmen and Churchwomen.

CONTENTS OF No. 5 FOR NOVEMBER.

- THE PETERBOROUGH EIRENICON, AND "AN OLD SOLDIER." By the Rev. R. F. LITTLEDALE, D.C.L.
- WITH SOME CLERICAL AND LAY OPINIONS ON THE PROPOSAL OF THE DEAN OF PETERBOROUGH. By the Very Revs. the Deans of DURHAM, NORWICH, ROCHESTER, LICHFIELD, CANONS DUCKWORTH, TUGWELL, Lords GRIMTHORPE, NELSON, &c.
- A CISTERCIAN MONASTERY IN THE TWELFTH CENTURY. By the Rev. S. J. EALES, D.C.L.
- CHURCH PLATE. Part I. Illustrated. By the Rev. C. R. MANSING, M.A.
- THE STRIKE. By the Rev. F. ARNOLD, M.A.
- WINCHESTER COLLEGE. Part II. (Illustrated.) By H. J. HARDY, M.A.
- SOME CELEBRATED AUTOGRAPHS.—ARCHBISHOP LAUD, BISHOP JUXON, &c. Concluded. By ESMÉ STUART.
- A VENETIAN ROMEO AND JULIET. By Mme. LINDA VILLARI.
- SWEET CONTENT. A Story for Children. Illustrated by Wm. Rainey. By Mrs. L. MOLESWORTH.
- HYMNS FOR THE FEAST OF ALL SAINTS. By W. CHATTERTON DIX.
- SERMON OUTLINES FOR NOVEMBER.—INSTRUCTIONS ON THE CREED—POETRY AND MUSIC—PAGES FOR THE YOUNG—JAPANESE STORY—BIBLICAL QUESTIONS—EDITOR'S LETTER. I.—REVIEWS AND CORRESPONDENCE—CALENDAR, &c. &c.

GRIFFITH, FARRAN, OKEDEN, & WELSH, NEWBERY HOUSE, LONDON.

MONTHLY, PRICE SIXPENCE.

ATALANTA.

Edited by L. T. MEADE and JOHN C. STAPLES.

CONTENTS OF THE NOVEMBER NUMBER.

- FRONTISPIECE.—PALAZZO DUCALE, VENICE. From the Picture by CLARA MONTALBA, R.W.S.
- OF CELIA'S ROSE. Poem. ELLA FULLER MAITLAND.
- A ROUGH SHAKING. Serial Story. Chaps. III.—V. GEORGE MACDONALD.
- RECOLLECTIONS OF VENICE. LADY LINDSAY. With Illustrations by Clara Montalba, R.W.S.
- VERY YOUNG. Serial Story. Chap. II. JEAN INGELOW.
- DE PROFUNDIS. Poem. KATHARINE TYNAN.
- HOW AN AMERICAN GIRL BECAME A JOURNALIST. SARA JEANNETTE DUNCAN.
- WEDNESDAY, THE TENTH: A Tale of the South Pacific. Serial Story. Chaps. III., IV. GRANT ALLEN.
- OLD-FASHIONED GIRLS.—OLIVIA AND SOPHIA PRIMROSE. Edited by L. T. MEADE. With Illustrations by Gordon Browne.
- THE BROWN OWL. L. T. MEADE.
- OCCUPATIONS. SARAH TYTLER.
- "ATALANTA" SCHOLARSHIP AND READING UNION.—II. FRANCIS BACON. AGNES M. CLERKE.

LONDON: HATCHARDS, 187 PICCADILLY, W.

PALAIS DES ARTS LIBÉRAUX, PARIS EXHIBITION;
Wayside Notes in East Anglia; A. A. Silver Medal Drawings, &c. For Illustrations, as above, also articles on Concrete Flooring; Siemens's Gas-aided Domestic Fires, &c. &c., see THE BUILDER of October 26. 4d.; by post, 4½d. Annual Subscription, 19s.
Office: 46 Catherine Street, London, W.C.

NOW READY, PRICE ONE SHILLING.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

NOVEMBER NUMBER.

CONTENTS:

- A CENTURY OF HAMLET. LAURENCE HUTTON. 20 Illustrations. From a Painting by Thomas Sully, by permission of the Players' Club; from Old Prints, by permission of Messrs. J. H. V. Arnold and Thos. J. McKee; and from Photographs by Sarony.
- THE MEXICAN ARMY. THOMAS A. JANVIER. 15 Illustrations. From Paintings and Drawings by Frederic Remington.
- THE RIVER DUDDON—THE STEPPING-STONES. A Sonnet. WILLIAM WORDSWORTH. With 2 Illustrations. Drawn by Alfred Parsons.
- YORK. RICHARD WHEATLEY. 18 Illustrations. Drawn by Joseph Pennell.
- AT GRANDE ANSE. LAFADIO HEARN. 5 Illustrations. From Photographs and Drawings by Harry Fenn.
- "PARTHENIA." A Story. LUCY C. LILLIE. With 2 Illustrations. Drawn by Rosina Emmet Sherwood.
- BIRD NOTES. W. HAMILTON GIBSON. 8 Illustrations. Drawn by W. Hamilton Gibson.
- A LITTLE JOURNEY IN THE WORLD. A Novel. CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER. (Conclusion.)
- THE REPUBLIC OF COLOMBIA. Hon. RICARDO BECERRA.
- THE BUILDING OF THE CATHEDRAL AT CHARTRES. CHARLES ELIOT NORTON. 6 Illustrations. From Photographs and Drawings by Hughson Hawley. &c. &c.

Nearly Eighty Illustrations:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON, SEARLE, & RIVINGTON, LIMITED,
ST. DUNSTON'S HOUSE, FETTER LANE, LONDON.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 889. NOVEMBER, 1889. 2s. 6d.

CONTENTS:

- MASTER OF HIS FATE. Chaps. V., VI. By J. MACLAREN COBBAN.
- DIARY OF AN IDLE DOCTOR. By AXEL MUNTHE.
- EDWARD FITZGERALD: AN AFTERMATH. By FRANCIS HINDES GROOME.
- NOTES FOR AN UNSENTIMENTAL JOURNEY.
- ONE WORD. By WALLACE BRUCE.
- THE BURMAH-SIAM CHINA. RAILWAY. By HOLT S. HALLETT.
- THE UNIVERSITY EXTENSION. By E. M. JOHNSTONE.
- THE HUNTER IN THE HIMALAYAS.
- DEFENCE OF THE BRITISH MERCANTILE MARINE IN WAR-TIME. By Wm. C. CRUTCHLEY, Lt. R.N.R.
- LADY BABY. Chaps. XXXVII., XXXVIII.
- THE OLD SALOON.
- WHAT THE FRENCH ELECTIONS MEAN.
- MORE ABOUT THE LEPERS AT THE CAPE.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

Price One Shilling.

TALES FROM "BLACKWOOD."

THIRD SERIES.—No. V.

CONTENTS:—A SINGULAR CASE. By F. S. DELLENBAUGH—PENTOCK. By Miss MARIAN BRADLEY.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

NOW READY, price One Shilling.

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE.

NOVEMBER, 1889.

CONTENTS:

- EMIN PASHA—GOVERNOR OF THE EQUATORIAL PROVINCES. From a Drawing by J. Reich. Frontispiece.
- WHERE EMIN IS. Illustrations by Herbert Denman, J. Reich, M. J. Burns, V. Pérard, and W. C. Fidler. Col. H. G. PROUT (Baroud Bey).
- MORT'S DIGNITAS. RICHARD E. BURTON.
- THE EFFECT ON AMERICAN COMMERCE OF AN ANGLO-CONTINENTAL WAR. J. RUSSELL SOLEY, U.S. Navy.
- A STUDENT OF SALAMANCA. Illustrations from Photographs and from Drawings. WILLIAM HENRY BISHOP.
- AN ASPIRATION. ANDREW LANG.
- IN THE VALLEY. Chapters VIII.—XI. (Begun in September—to be continued.) Illustrations by Howard Pyle. HAROLD FREDERIC.
- ELECTRICITY IN RELATION TO THE HUMAN BODY. M. ALLAN STARR, M.D.
- A NEW FIELD OF HONOUR. With Illustrations. JAMES E. PILCHER, Capt. Medical Department, U.S.A.
- "I AM THE BEGINNING AND THE END." Mrs. JAMES T. FIELDS.
- GOETHE'S HOUSE AT WEIMAR. Illustrations from Photographs and from Drawings by Harry Fenn. OSCAR BROWNING.
- A PROBLEM IN PORTRAITURE. ARLO BATES.
- MARIE BASHKIRTSEFF. JOSEPHINE LAZARUS.

On November 25 will be published the CHRISTMAS NUMBER of SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE: it will have a special attractiveness and beauty, and its contents will be of unusual variety. The Illustrations will be more numerous than ever before, being upwards of Seventy in number.

FREDERICK WARNE & CO., 15 BEDFORD STREET, STRAND, LONDON.

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.'S LIST.

Demy 8vo. 21s.

THE ICE AGE in NORTH AMERICA and its BEARINGS upon the ANTIQUITY of MAN. By G. FREDERICK WRIGHT, D.D., LL.D., F.G.S.A. With an Appendix on "The Probable Cause of Glaciation," by WARREN UPHAM, F.G.S.A. With many New Maps and Illustrations.

Demy 8vo. 16s.

MARTIN LUTHER and the REFORMATION in GERMANY until the CLOSE of the DIET of WORMS. By the late CHARLES BEARD, B.A., LL.D. Edited by J. FREDERICK SMITH.

New and Revised Edition. Fcp. 8vo. 5s.

ENGLISH PAST and PRESENT. By R. C. TRENCH, D.D., Archbishop. Fourteenth Edition. Revised by the Rev. A. L. MAYHEW.

Demy 8vo. 12s.

MISCELLANIES. Vol. III. — ESSAYS, TRACTS, or ADDRESSES, Political and Social. By Professor F. W. NEWMAN.

2 vols. crown 8vo. 21s.

A MATCH PAIR. A Novel. By AMES SAVILE.

Crown 8vo. paper covers, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d.

ANDREWLINA. A Novel. By J. S. FLETCHER, Author of "Across the Breakers," "Old Latimer's Legacy," &c.

Crown 8vo. 5s.

THE DEAD SAILOR; and other Stories. By Sir J. C. ROBINSON.

CONTENTS:—The Dead Sailor—Don Ignacio Giron—St. Margaret's Pearls—A Ghost's Redemption.

Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

IN CAP and GOWN. Three Centuries of Cambridge Wit. Edited, with an Introduction, by CHARLES WHIBLEY, sometime Scholar of Jesus College, Cambridge.

Crown 8vo. 5s.

BALLADS of the NORTH; and other Poems. By H. E. HAMILTON KING, Author of "The Disciples," "Aspromonte," "A Book of Dreams," &c.

Elzevir 8vo. 5s.

VERSES WRITTEN in INDIA. By Sir ALFRED LYALL.

LONDON: 1 PATERNOSTER SQUARE.

Now ready, price 2s. 6d.; cloth gilt, gilt edges, 5s.

(Uniform with the Lives and Works of Sir F. Leighton, Sir J. E. Millais, L. Alma Tadema, J. L. E. Meissonier, J. C. Hook.)

THE ART ANNUAL 1889.

Being the CHRISTMAS NUMBER of the ART JOURNAL,

CONSISTING OF

THE LIFE AND WORK OF ROSA BONHEUR,
By RENÉ PEYROL.

With Three Full-page Etchings and Engravings, entitled "THE HORSE FAIR," "THE RESTING PLACE OF THE DEER," and "THE SHEPHERD," and over Thirty Illustrations in the Text.

LONDON: J. S. VIRTUE & CO., LIMITED, 26 IVY LANE.

Just published, Second Edition, Revised. 2 vols. demy 8vo. 32s.

THE HISTORY of the ENGLISH CONSTI-

TUTION. By Dr. RUDOLPH GNEIST, Professor of Law in the University of Berlin. Translated by PHILIP A. ASHWORTH, of the Inner Temple, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

* * * This Edition contains additional chapters on the Parliaments of the Nineteenth Century down to the Third Reform Bill (1884-85), with an important Note giving the Author's views on the Irish question, and a New and Copious Index.

"No foreigner has done more than Professor Gneist to examine and make clear the history and nature of the English Constitution. . . . He discusses such vital questions as 'Whither are we drifting?' 'How far do recent changes in the franchise accord with the old spirit of the Constitution?' 'What is in store for us with democracy supreme?' On such questions as these the opinion of a foreigner, who is a scholar, but no bookworm, and has sedulously studied our institutions, is certainly much more weighty than that of most Englishmen. . . . At this time these volumes are especially instructive. They cast light on almost all the great questions of current politics."—Times.

LONDON: WM. CLOWES & SONS, LIMITED, 27 FLEET STREET.

TO TRAVELLERS IN INDIA.

WHITWORTH'S ANGLO-INDIAN DICTIONARY:

A Glossary of Colloquial and Official Terms;

Of the names of Divinities, Festivals, Religions, and Sects; of Races, Tribes, and Languages; of Castes and Occupations; of the different Eras and Systems of Chronology; of Seasons, Crops, and Land Tenures, and generally of all Indian terms used in English, and of English words peculiarly used in India. Price 12s.

"Well designed, well printed, and handy."—Saturday Review.

LONDON: KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & CO.'S LIST.

NEW EDITION. WITH A PREFATORY ESSAY ON THE POSITION AND PROSPECTS OF POETRY.

THE HUMAN TRAGEDY. By ALFRED AUSTIN. With a Prefatory Essay on the Position and Prospects of Poetry. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

New Novels.

BY W. CLARK RUSSELL.

MAROONED. By W. CLARK RUSSELL, Author of "The Wreck of the Grosvenor" &c. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d. The Academy says:—"Marooned" is a story full of incident and interest. It is written in good stirring English. The scenes at sea are as vivid and realistic as such scenes always are in Mr. Clark Russell's books."

BY BRET HARTE.

THE HERITAGE of DEDLOW MARSH; and other Tales. By BRET HARTE, Author of "Cressy." 2 vols. Globe 8vo. 12s.

BY CHARLOTTE M. YONGE.

A REPUTED CHANGELING; or, Three Seventh Years Two Centuries Ago. By CHARLOTTE M. YONGE. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 12s.

The Athenæum says:—"It is a brightly written and ingeniously constructed story." The St. James's Gazette says:—"A Reputed Changeling" is a sketch of English Court society in the latter days of the Stuarts, and the idea is prettily carried out."

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE,

No. 361, for NOVEMBER, price 1s., contains:—

1. KIRSTEEN. By Mrs. OLIPHANT. Chapters 10-13.
2. JAMES HOGG. By GEORGE SAINTSBURY.
3. DANTE.
4. THE GARDENS OF POMPEII. By Mrs. LECKY.
5. SETTLING IN CANADA. By the Rev. A. J. CHURCH.
6. DICK.
7. ETON FIFTY YEARS AGO. By C. T. BUCKLAND.
8. THE BALLAD OF THE KING'S MERCY. By YUSSUF.
9. LEAVES FROM A NOTE-BOOK.

THE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE

For NOVEMBER, Profusely Illustrated, price 6d.; by post, 8d., contains:—

1. ST. HELENA'S VISION OF THE INVENTION OF THE CROSS. After PAOLO VERONESE. Frontispiece.
2. THE SEVEN SLEEPERS OF EPHEBUS. By LEWIS MORRIS.
3. MARGARET OF SCOTLAND. By Mrs. OLIPHANT. Illustrated.
4. MY JOURNEY TO TEXAS. By ARTHUR PATERSON.
5. THE DOCKERS' STORY. By BENJAMIN TILLET.
6. CRACOW. By ADAM GIEGUD. Illustrated.
7. HOW HAPPY COULD I BE WITH EITHER. By JOHN GAY. Illustrated by Hugh Thomson.
8. BOMBAY. By WALTER FREWEN LORD.
9. ST. MICHAEL'S. By Prof. T. E. THORPE. Illustrated.
10. THE RING OF AMASIS. Chaps. III. and IV. By the EARL OF LYTTON.
11. NOVEMBER. A Decorated Page. By HEYWOOD SUMNER.

* * * A New Volume of THE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE began with the October number.

Ask your Bookseller for a Prospectus.

MACMILLAN & CO., BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

CHAPMAN & HALL'S NEW BOOKS.

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW

For NOVEMBER.

Edited by FRANK HARRIS.

WILKIE COLLINS. By ALGERNON C. SWINBURNE.
SCIENCE AND THE REVOLUTION. By W. H. MALLOCK.
OUR DRAMATISTS. By GEORGE MOORE.
A REPUBLIC IN EXTREMIS. By W. H. HURLBERT.
THE ARMED STRENGTH OF GERMANY. With Map. By Major A. M. MURRAY, R.A.
THE BRITISH SOUTH AFRICA COMPANY. By Miss F. L. SHAW.
PORTUGUESE FOLKLORE. By OSWALD CRAWFORD.
POLITICAL PRINCIPLES. By FREDERICK GREENWOOD.
THE ORGANIZATION OF WORKING WOMEN. By Miss CLEMENTINA BLACK.
A MODERN CORRESPONDENCE.
RUSSIAN CHARACTERISTICS. Part III. By E. B. LANIN.

PROBLEMS of the FUTURE and ESSAYS.

By SAMUEL LAING, Author of "Modern Science and Modern Thought." Demy 8vo. 3s. 6d. [Second Edition in the press.]

BEHIND the SCENES of the COMÉDIE

FRANÇAISE, and OTHER RECOLLECTIONS. By ARSENE HOUSSEY. Translated and Edited, with Notes, by ALBERT D. VANDAM. Demy 8vo. 14s.

THE TRIUMPH of MANHOOD: a Novel.

By Mrs. LEIGHTON. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

[Next week.]

A CENTURY of REVOLUTION. By W. S.

LILLY. Demy 8vo. 12s.

THE VICTORIES of the BRITISH ARMY in the PENINSULA and the SOUTH of FRANCE from 1808 to 1814. An Epitome of Napier's "History of the Peninsular War," and Gurwood's "Collection of the Duke of Wellington's Despatches." By ROBERT O'BRYNE, F.R.G.S. Crown 8vo. [Next week.]

LONDON: CHAPMAN & HALL, LIMITED.

MESSRS. WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS'

NEW BOOKS.

DEDICATED TO H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES.

This day is published.

HINDU-KOH:

Wanderings and Wild Sport on and Beyond the Himalayas.

By Major-General DONALD MACINTYRE, V.C.

Late Prince of Wales' Own Goorkhas; Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society.

8vo. with numerous Illustrations, 21s.

This day is published.

SCENES from a SILENT WORLD; or,

Prisons and their Inmates. By FRANCIS SCOUGAL. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"Gives some startling pictures of prison life."—Scotsman.

"Introduces us into facts of prison life stranger than fiction."—Rock.

"The author writes with much pathetic power."—St. James's Gazette.

"Bears the unmistakable impress of fresh observation, and provides the reader with some amusing stories."—Daily News.

On Thursday, October 31, will be published.

DODO and I. A Novel. By Captain ANDREW

HAGGARD. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

This day is published.

SORDELLO: an Outline Analysis of Mr.

Browning's Poem. By JEANIE MORISON, Author of "The Purpose of the Ages," "Ane Book of Ballades," &c. Crown 8vo. 3s.

TWO NEW NOVELS, AT ALL LIBRARIES.

ANOTHER SUCH VICTORY. By ANNETTE

LYSTER, Author of "A Leal Light Heart," "Two Old Maids," "Dr. L'Estrange," "North Wind and Sunshine," &c. &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo. price 25s. 6d. [This day.]

BARBARA ALLAN, the Provost's Daughter.

By ROBERT CLELAND, Author of "Inchbracken," "True to a Type," "A Rich Man's Relatives." 2 vols. crown 8vo. 17s.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

SMITH, ELDER, & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "VICE VERSÂ."

Now ready, at all the Libraries, 3 vols. post 8vo.

THE PARIAH.

By F. ANSTEY,

Author of "Vice Versâ," "The Giant's Robe," "A Fallen Idol," &c.

NEW EDITION of the POETICAL WORKS

OF

ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.

TO BE COMPLETED IN SIX MONTHLY VOLUMES.
Small crown 8vo. 5s. each.

This Edition will be uniform with the recently published Edition of Mr. Robert Browning's Works. It will contain several Portraits of Mrs. Browning at different periods of life, and a few Illustrations.

There will also be a Large-paper Edition of 125 Copies, printed on Hand-made Paper. This Edition will only be supplied through Booksellers.

Volume I. with a Portrait of Mrs. Browning at the age of Nine and a Woodcut Illustration of Coxhoe Hall, the Birthplace of Mrs. Browning, is ready this day.

POCKET EDITION OF MRS. GASKELL'S WORKS.

To be completed in Eight Monthly Volumes, bound in cloth, with cut or uncut edges, price 1s. 6d. per vol.

Vol. II., NORTH and SOUTH, is ready this day.

NEW NATURAL HISTORY VOLUME.

Ready this day, crown 8vo. 5s.

WOODLAND, MOOR, and STREAM; being

the Notes of a Naturalist.

Now ready (Sixpence), New Series, No. 77.

THE CORNHILL MAGAZINE

For NOVEMBER.

Containing "THE BURNT MILLION," by JAMES PAYN, Author of "By Proxy" &c. &c. Chaps. 18-21—"AMONG THE CIDER-MAKERS"—"MADE-MOISELLE," by Mrs. OLIPHANT. Part I. Chaps. 1-4—"THE BRONZE AXE"—"SOME ROYAL PARKS"—"HER DREAM," and "THE SILVER LOCKET."

* * * CATALOGUE post free on application.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

EDWARD STANFORD'S LIST.

Just published.

CHARTS of the CONSTELLATIONS, from the North Pole to between 35 and 40 Degrees of South Declination. By ARTHUR COTTAM, F.R.A.S. 36 Charts, each 30 by 22 inches, printed on drawing paper, and supplied in a Portfolio. Price £2 net per Set. After the first 200 are sold, the price will be raised to £3 3s.

With one exception (Hydra) each Constellation is shown complete on a single Chart, and the Scale (one-third of an inch to a degree of a great circle) is much larger than that of any Modern Star Maps. (Detailed Prospectus, with Specimen Chart, free on application.)

Now ready, at all the Libraries and Booksellers'.

THE NEW FAR WEST and the OLD FAR

EAST: an Account of Recent Travel and Observation along the Line of the Canadian Pacific and Manitoba and North-Western Railway, thence to Japan, China, Ceylon, &c. By W. HENRY BARNEY, Author of "Life and Labour in the Far, Far West." Demy 8vo. cloth, with 3 Maps and 8 Page Illustrations, 12s.

LETTERS on INFANTRY. By Prince KRAFT

ZU HOHENLOHE INGELFINGEN. Translated by Lieut.-Colonel N. L. WALFORD, R.A. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

LETTERS on CAVALRY. With 3 Folding

Plans of Battles. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

The above are uniform in size and style with the recently published "Letters on Artillery" from the same pen, and combined with that Work form a very complete account of the operations of troops of the three arms in recent warfare.

MATHEMATICAL EXAMINATION PA-

PERS, set for the Militia Further and Sandhurst Entrance Examinations, 1885-89. With Answers. By W. F. AUSTIN and J. V. ELSDEN, B.Sc. Demy 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED AND ENLARGED.

STANFORD'S LONDON ATLAS of UNI-

VERSAL GEOGRAPHY. 4to. Edition, containing 46 Coloured Maps, drawn and engraved in the highest style of Art, and showing the latest Changes in Political Boundaries, and, so far as possible, the Physical Features of all the Countries of the World. Half-morocco, cloth sides, gilt edges, 30s. Size, when shut, 15 by 12½ in. [Shortly.]

A TRIP THROUGH the EASTERN CAU-

CASUS; being an Account of a Recent Run from Tiflis through the Shin Pass, and back by a less frequented Route, and including a Visit to Derbend, and an Exploration of the Great Wall, with Sketches of the Peoples of Daghestan, their Customs and Languages. By the Hon. JOHN ABERCROMBY. Demy 8vo. with Maps and Illustrations. [Shortly.]

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

AN ATLAS of TWELVE MAPS of INDIA;

accompanied with Tables and Notes. By TRELAWEY SAUNDERS, Geographical Assistant at the India Office (retired). Large folio, half-buckram, £3 3s. net.

"We congratulate Mr. Saunders not merely on having rendered a lasting service to the administration of India and to the scientific study of that country, but on having produced the only work with which English cartography can confront the masters of the art in Germany, Switzerland, and France."

Manchester Guardian.

STELLAR EVOLUTION and its RELA-

TIONS to GEOLOGICAL TIME. By JAMES CROLL, LL.D., F.R.S. Large post 8vo. cloth, 5s.

"All men of science who pay due heed to the ultimate principles to which they are perforce brought in the course of their researches will find this work deserving a thorough scrutiny. Mr. Croll has swept away a cloud which seemed at one time likely to obscure the general significance of evolution."—Chemical News.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.—Uniform in Size.

CLIMATE and TIME in their GEOLOGICAL

RELATIONS: a Theory of Secular Changes of the Earth's Climate. Large post 8vo. with Illustrations, cloth, 10s. 6d.

DISCUSSIONS on CLIMATE and COSMO-

LOGY. Large post 8vo. with an Illustrative Chart, cloth, 6s.

SEAS and SKIES in MANY LATITUDES; or, Wanderings in Search of Weather. By the Hon. RALPH ABERCROMBY, Author of "Principles of Forecasting," "Weather," in the "International Scientific Series," &c. Demy 8vo. with 3 Maps, 9 Photographs, and 33 Woodcuts by Pritchett, Whympers, Cooper, &c., cloth extra, 18s.

"An important contribution to meteorology as well as to travel.... The illustrations are of great interest."—Times.

A CENTURY of CONTINENTAL HISTORY,

1780-1880. By J. H. ROSE, M.A., formerly Classical Scholar of Christ's College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo. 420 pp. with 3 Maps, and 5 Plans of Battles in the text, cloth, 6s.

"The book is written from a popular standpoint, but it admirably fulfils its author's intentions; and we certainly know of no work in the same compass which gives anything like as clear, concise, and well-arranged information concerning the march of political affairs in Europe during a century which has been crowded with epoch-making events."—Leeds Mercury.

LETTERS on ARTILLERY. By Prince

KRAFT ZU HOHENLOHE INGELFINGEN. Translated by Major N. L. WALFORD, R.A. Crown 8vo. cloth, with 6 Folding Plates, 7s. 6d.

"Under an assumed controversial form, these 'Letters' are distinctly authoritative—as might, indeed, be expected from such a master of the art; and, under the heads of apparently discursive dissertations, they collect all the decisions afforded by hard experience as to the value of current, and in many cases rather conflicting, theories concerning the true part of artillery in war."—Saturday Review.

LONDON: EDWARD STANFORD,

26 AND 27 COCKSPUR STREET, CHARING CROSS, S.W.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

With Portraits. 2 vols. 8vo. 36s.

THE LIFE OF LORD JOHN RUSSELL.

By SPENCER WALPOLE,

Author of "A History of England from 1815."

THE TIMES.—"A great career, a character of marked eminence and individuality, an abundance of novel and authentic material, all treated with sound judgment and approved literary skill by a writer singularly well qualified to handle so congenial a theme—here we have an assemblage of attractive qualities which are as certain, as they are entitled, to secure a wide popularity for 'The Life of Lord John Russell.'"

With Illustrations, Maps, Appendices, and an Index. 1 vol. 8vo. 21s.

RUSSIA IN CENTRAL ASIA
IN 1889,

AND THE

ANGLO-RUSSIAN QUESTION.

By the Hon. GEORGE N. CURZON, M.P.

Fellow of All Souls' College, Oxford.

THE TIMES.—"This is a volume of great and varied interest..... Without being an extreme partisan, Mr. Curzon has enunciated clear views worthy of the consideration of English statesmen on the many questions that present themselves in connexion with the position of affairs in Central Asia..... The book will, of course, be read by every one desirous of keeping himself abreast of a topic which is repeatedly undergoing change and which attracts daily increasing attention."

CARDINAL LAVIGERIE and the AFRICAN
SLAVE TRADE. Edited by RICHARD F. CLARKE, S.J., Trinity College, Oxford. 1 vol. 8vo. 14s.The HISTORY of PHENICIA. By GEORGE
RAWLINSON, M.A., Canon of Canterbury, &c., Author of "The History of Ancient Egypt" &c. With 2 Maps, 10 Plates, and 122 Illustrations in the Text. 1 vol. 8vo. 21s.WATTS' DICTIONARY of CHEMISTRY.
Revised and entirely Rewritten, by H. FORSTER MORLEY, M.A., D.Sc., and M. M. PARTISON MUIR, M.A., F.R.S.E., assisted by Eminent Contributors. (To be published in 4 vols.) 8vo. Vols. I. and II. Two GUINEAS each.HANDBOOK of COMMERCIAL GEOGRA-PHY. By G. G. CHISHOLM, M.A., B.Sc. With 29 Maps. 8vo. 16s.

"No better text-book of the subject could be had for such institutes as deal with commercial geography, or for private individuals desirous of obtaining a general knowledge of the subject. Taking the book as a whole, probably no handbook of commercial geography in any language is equal to it."

Proceedings of the Royal Geographical Society.

B.C. 1887: A Ramble in British Columbia.

By J. A. LEES and W. J. CLUTTERBUCK, Authors of "Three in Norway." With Map and 75 Illustrations from Sketches and Photographs by the Authors. New and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

HISTORICAL REVIEW of the LEGISLA-TIVE SYSTEMS OPERATIVE in IRELAND, from the Invasion of Henry the Second to the Union (1172-1800). By the Right Hon. J. T. BALL, LL.D. D.C.L. New Edition, Revised throughout and Enlarged. 8vo. 6s.WILD DARRIE: a Story. By CHRISTIE MURRAY and HENRY HERMAN. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

"Will be heartily welcomed by every one who can appreciate good, wholesome fiction..... The heroine is finely drawn. There is nothing mawkish in the sentiment that surrounds her; on the contrary, there is a fine, healthy, manly tone in the book from first to last."—Scotsman.

The EDINBURGH REVIEW, No. 348.

CONTENTS:

1. OXFORD AND ITS PROFESSORS.
2. THE CONQUEST OF ALGERIA.
3. THE ORIGIN OF INTELLECT.
4. EAST AFRICA.
5. FARRAR'S LIVES OF THE FATHERS.
6. THE PRINCES OF THE HOUSE OF CONDÉ.
7. RECENT DISCOVERIES IN ROME.
8. THE INTERNAL ECONOMY OF RUSSIA.
9. MAITLAND OF LETHINGTON AND MARY STUART.
10. LOCAL GOVERNMENT, HOME RULE, AND NEW LIBERALISM.

No. 85, 8vo. price Sixpence.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE.—NOVEMBER.

CONTENTS:

- | | |
|--|--|
| THE BELL OF ST. PAUL'S. Part II. Chaps. 27-30. By WALTER BESANT. | EARLY DAYS IN SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA. By HORACE HUTCHINSON. |
| SOME INDIAN INSECTS. By C. T. BUCKLAND, F.Z.S. | FEAR AND HATE. By MAY KENDALL. |
| THE WEIRD OF THE WALFORDS. By Mrs. ALFRED BALDWIN. | MRS. FENTON: a Sketch. By W. E. NORRIS. Chaps. 10-12. |
| | AT THE SIGN OF THE SHIP. By ANDREW LANG. |

London: LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO.

MESSRS. BELL'S NEW BOOKS.

Japanese vellum, Square fcp. 8vo. 4s. 6d.

CATULLUS. A Revised Text, with Annotations and Introduction. By J. P. POSTGATE, M.A., Litt.D., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, Professor of Comparative Philology at University College, London.

Demy 8vo. with numerous Maps, Plans, &c., 14s.

MOROCCO: Journeys to the Kingdom of Fez, and to the Court of Mulai Hassan. With Itineraries constructed by the Author, and a Bibliography of Morocco from 1844 to 1887. By H. M. P. DE LA MARTINIÈRE, F.R.G.S., Member of the Geographical Society of France, and the Topographical Society of France. With a Preface by Lieut.-Colonel TROTTER, 93rd Highlanders.

"He had exceptional opportunities of making himself acquainted with the facts of social life in Morocco; and in simple, graphic, and clever narrative he describes exactly what he saw."—Nature.

Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged, crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

THE WORKING AND MANAGEMENT OF AN ENGLISH RAILWAY.

By GEORGE FINDLAY, Lieut.-Colonel Engineer and Railway Volunteer Staff Corps, Assoc. Inst. C.E., General Manager of the London and North-Western Railway. With numerous Illustrations.

"This is a delightful book."—Engineer.
 "Mr. Findlay's book displays so much knowledge and ability that it well deserves to rank as a standard work on the subject."—Nature.
 "A very interesting work throughout..... To all railway shareholders we commend the chapter upon 'Management.'"—Railway Engineer.
 "Mr. Findlay has provided a lucid account of the methods by which the vast system of communication is maintained in England."—Morning Post.

Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d.

CHESS STUDIES and END GAMES. In

Two Parts:—Part I. CHESS STUDIES. Part II. MISCELLANEOUS END GAMES. By B. HORWITZ and J. KLING. Second Edition, Revised by the Rev. W. WAYTE, M.A., late Fellow of King's College, Cambridge.

BOHN'S STANDARD LIBRARY.

NEW VOLUMES.

ARTHUR YOUNG'S TRAVELS in FRANCE

during the YEARS 1787, 1788, 1789. With an Introduction, Biographical Sketch, and Notes by M. BETHAM-EDWARDS. With Portrait. 3s. 6d.

"No better editor for it could have been found than Miss Betham-Edwards, whose intimate knowledge of the present condition of rural France has enabled her to draw a series of most instructive contrasts in her introduction."—Academy.
 "It is a work which ought to be made more easily accessible than it has hitherto been, not only because of its own value, which is considerable, but because of the frequency and manner of its appearance as an authority in works on the Revolution."—Saturday Review.

"Sure to secure a wide circulation."—Daily News.

THE WORKS of FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS.

Whiston's Translation, thoroughly Revised by Rev. A. R. SHILLETO, M.A. With Topographical and Geographical Notes by Sir C. W. WILSON, K.C.M.G. Vols. I., II., and III., containing the Life of Josephus and Antiquities of the Jews. Each 3s. 6d.

BOHN'S CLASSICAL LIBRARY.

NEW VOLUMES.

"THE ARGONAUTICA" of APOLLONIUS

RHODIUS. Translated into English Prose by E. P. COLERIDGE, B.A.

SENECA'S MINOR ESSAYS and on CLEMENCY. Translated by AUREY STEWART, M.A., formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge.

"Mr. Stewart's excellent version."—Athenaeum.
 "The translation is a capital instance of the combination of readability and scholarship."—Saturday Review.

NOTE.—The following are the only Authorised and Unabridged Editions of WEBSTER'S DICTIONARY. No other editions published in England contain the Derivations and Etymological Notes of Dr. Mahn, who devoted five years to the Revision of this portion of the work.

WEBSTER'S GUINEA DICTIONARY of the ENGLISH LANGUAGE. Including Scientific, Technical, and Biblical Words and Terms, with their Significations, Pronunciations, Alternative Spellings, Derivations, Synonyms, and numerous illustrative Quotations. New Edition (1880), with Supplement of over 4,600 new words and meanings. 1 vol. of 1628 pages, with 3000 Illustrations. 4to. cloth, 21s.; half-calf, 30s.; calf or half-russia, 31s. 6d.; russia, 40s.

WEBSTER'S COMPLETE DICTIONARY

Containing all that appears in the "Guinea Dictionary," with various valuable literary Appendices, with 70 extra pages of Illustrations grouped and classified, rendering the work a Complete Literary and Scientific Reference-Book. New Edition, with New Biographical Appendix, containing over 9,700 names. 1 vol. (1,919 pages), 4to. cloth, 31s. 6d.; half-calf, 40s.; calf or half-russia, 42s.; russia, £2 10s.

Prospectuses, with specimen pages, sent post free on application.

"Certainly the best practical English Dictionary extant."

Quarterly Review, Oct. 1873.

* * * A NEW and COMPLETE CATALOGUE of Works published by Messrs. BELL will be sent post free on application.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, YORK STREET,
COVENT GARDEN.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON'S LIST.

NEW WORKS NOW READY.

MEMOIR of EDWARD ASKEW SOTHERN
("Lord Dundreary"). By T. EDGAR PEMBERTON. 1 vol. demy 8vo. with Portraits and Facsimiles, 16s.

IN an ENCHANTED ISLAND: a VISIT to CYPRUS in 1889. By W. H. MALLOCK, Author of "Is Life Worth Living?" &c. 1 vol. demy 8vo. with Frontispiece, 12s.

THE ROOF of FRANCE. By M. B. BETHAM EDWARDS, Author of "Kitty." 1 vol. demy 8vo. 12s.

THE LIFE and LETTERS of MARY WOLLSTONECRAFT SHELLEY. By Mrs. JULIAN MARSHALL. 2 vols. demy 8vo. with Portraits and Facsimiles, 30s.

FURTHER RECOLLECTIONS of MR. THOMAS ADOLPHUS TROLLOPE. Forming a Third Volume of "What I Remember." Demy 8vo. with a Frontispiece, 15s.

LETTERS from HELL. With a Preface by GEORGE MACDONALD, LL.D. New and Cheaper Edition. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

NEW NOVELS NOW READY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DANVERS' JEWELS."
SIR CHARLES DANVERS.
2 vols. crown 8vo.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE ROSE GARDEN."
PAUL'S SISTER.
3 vols. crown 8vo.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DR. EDITH ROMNEY."
HER OWN COUNSEL.
3 vols. crown 8vo.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GODFREY HELSTONE."
DIANA.
3 vols. crown 8vo.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "WORTH WAITING FOR."
THE SCOTTS OF BESTMINSTER.
3 vols. crown 8vo.

BY GEILLES HERRING AND MARTIN ROSS.
AN IRISH COUSIN.
Second Edition. 2 vols. crown 8vo.

BENTLEY'S FAVOURITE NOVELS.

Each work can be had separately, price 6s. of all Booksellers in Town or Country.

By RHODA BROUGHTON.

Cometh up as a Flower.
Good-bye, Sweetheart.
Joan. | Nancy.
Not Wisely but Too Well.
Red as a Rose is She.
Second Thoughts.
Belinda.
Doctor Cupid.

By Mrs. ALEXANDER.

The Wooing o't.
Which Shall It Be?
Her Dearest Foe.
Look Before You Leap.
The Admiral's Ward.
The Executor.
The Freres.

By ROSA N. CAREY.

Only the Governess.
Queenie's Whim.
Nellie's Memories.
Barbara Heathcote's Trial.
Not Like Other Girls.
Robert Ord's Atonement.
Uncle Max.
Wee Wifie.
Wooded and Married.

By ANTHONY TROLLOPE.

The Three Clerks.

By FLORENCE MONTGOMERY.

Misunderstood.
Seaforth.
Thrown Together.

By Mrs. ANNIE EDWARDES.

Leah: a Woman of Fashion.
Ought We to Visit Her?
A Ballroom Repentance.
A Girton Girl.

By J. SHERIDAN LE FANU.

Uncle Silas.
In a Glass Darkly.
The House by the Churchyard.

By W. E. NORRIS.

The Rogue.
Thirlby Hall.
A Bachelor's Blunder.
Major and Minor.

By E. WERNER.

Fickle Fortune.
No Surrender.
Success: and How he Won It.
Under a Charm.

By CHARLES READE.

A Perilous Secret.

By Hon. LEWIS WINGFIELD.

Lady Grizel.

By MARCUS CLARKE.

For the Term of His Natural Life.

By HAWLEY SMART.

Breezie Langton.

By HECTOR MALOT.

No Relations.

By MARIE CORELLI.

A Romance of Two Worlds.
Vendetta!
Thelma.

By Mrs. NOTLEY.

Olive Varcoe.

By FRANCES M. PEARD.

Near Neighbours.

By JESSIE FOTHERGILL.

The First Violin.
Borderland.
Healey. | Kith and Kin.
Probation.

By HELEN MATHERS.

Comin' thro' the Rye.
Sam's Sweetheart.

By Mrs. PARR.

Adam and Eve.
Dorothy Fox.

By Baroness TAUTPHÆUS.

The Initials.
Quits!

ANONYMOUS.

The Last of the Cavaliers.

By Mrs. RIDDELL.

George Geith of Fen Court.
Susan Drummond.
Berna Boyle.

By Lady G. FULLERTON.

Ellen Middleton.
Ladybird.
Too Strange Not to be True.

By JANE AUSTEN.

(The only complete Edition, besides the Steventon Edition upon hand-made paper.)

Emma.
Lady Susan, and The Watsons.
Mansfield Park.
Northanger Abbey, and Persuasion.
Pride and Prejudice.
Sense and Sensibility.

LONDON: RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET,
PUBLISHERS IN ORDINARY TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF
POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,775, Vol. 68.

November 2, 1889.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

MEMORY AND IMAGINATION.

A FEW years before his death Lord RUSSELL received a call from an old friend of his who was engaged on the biography of a statesman with whom Lord RUSSELL had been closely associated early in his political life. He conversed freely with his visitor, and was copious in interesting anecdote, of which his friend took mental notes, congratulating himself on materials for an attractive chapter. Lord RUSSELL, however, wound up the interview with a characteristic caution:—"If you think of publishing what I have told you," he said, "I would advise you to verify it by other testimony. Consult So-and-so. I am conscious that my memory is not what it was, and I may have confused persons and things." A similar confession, marked by the ingenuous candour which in all his personal relations belonged to Lord RUSSELL, is found in the preface to his Recollections and Suggestions. He had intended, he there says, to enlarge the reminiscences which he had published in a former work. But, when he had proceeded some way in his task, he found that his memory of the past was not so lively as it had been some years before, and he renounced the attempt. Mr. GLADSTONE some time ago spoke, with a natural pathos to which the sympathy of his audience responded, of his own memory as overburdened with the events of a long life. Mr. GLADSTONE has found relief in calling in the aid of another faculty. He has summoned Imagination to assist Memory in bearing the load to which the latter alone is unequal, and in some of his narratives appears to rely on the former faculty almost exclusively. We do not in the slightest degree question Mr. GLADSTONE's good faith. In one of his essays Mr. BAGEHOT has insisted very strangely that belief is an affair of the emotions rather than of the intellect, that conviction is a passion rather than a judgment. An enthusiastic girl believes with an intensity which a careful weighing of evidence cannot produce, and on no evidence at all, circumstantial narratives which tend to the glorification of the hero of her worship or to the discredit of the object of her aversion. She embraces an entire scheme of theology, of which she understands nothing, with an ardour that the deepest divine may envy.

Mr. GLADSTONE illustrates the doctrine. He believes implicitly because he feels strongly and conceives vividly. He is capable of constructing narratives of the past in order to justify his position in the present, with which imagination has a good deal more to do than memory, and of giving them to the world with a good faith which defies the almanack and the Annual Register. An instance has occurred this week. Mr. CHARLES M. CLEERY, of Lowell (Mass.), appears to have accused Mr. GLADSTONE, in the Morning Mail of that town, of working for party ends in his agitation for Home Rule. Mr. GLADSTONE has replied with a brevity and succinctness unusual to him, and imposed upon him presumably by the limited space offered by an international postcard. If Mr. GLADSTONE had simply denied the accusation, there would have been nothing for it but an acquiescence as grave as possible, unaccompanied by play of face or shrug of shoulders. But Mr. GLADSTONE has not been content with giving his conclusion; he has given his reasons—which are three, and which it is not presumptuous to canvass. "On the dissolution of 1885, I used every effort, public and private, to induce the Tories to take up Home Rule, and promised them my support. Only on their refusal did it become the cause of the 'Liberals.'" Whatever Mr. GLADSTONE's private action may have been on the dissolution of 1885, he certainly did not take any public steps of the kind which he now supposes himself to have taken. The question of Home Rule was raised on the Liberal side only by statements such as that of Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT—that the Liberal party and leaders were the only men who could be trusted to resist Mr. PARNELL, and who would decline to submit themselves to the culinary process which he described in language borrowed from Prince BISMARCK. Mr. GLADSTONE's Midlothian address contained an obscure paragraph about local government in Ireland, so worded as to command the assent of Lord HARTINGTON and Mr. GOSCHEN. The Liberal party was divided, not on the question of Home Rule, but on the respective merits of the authorized and the unauthorized programme. The Irish vote was given with unanimity to the Conservatives, because while Mr. GLADSTONE and his colleagues were pledged to the continuance of coercion in a mitigated form, Lord SALISBURY's Government were, as it was believed, disposed to try the experiment of doing without it.

The steps which Mr. GLADSTONE certainly did not take on the dissolution of 1885 he may possibly have taken, and probably, nay, almost certainly did take, after the General Election of 1885. That election left Mr. GLADSTONE in a minority of four votes as against the Ministerial and Parnellite forces taken together. If he could gain over the Parnellites without detaching any of his supporters he would have a majority of about eighty votes. It was then that Mr. GLADSTONE's conversion to Home Rule was first covertly hinted at. Disclosures of his intentions were made in the party newspapers—most clearly in a journal not unconnected with the constituency which Mr. HERBERT GLADSTONE represented. Slips of note-paper, it is said, each headed with the intimation "My father thinks," were handed about, collectively embodying the Home Rule scheme much in the form which it took in the Bill of 1886. In the meantime, Lord SALISBURY, on the strength of a misunderstood sentence in a speech in South Wales, was supposed not to be wholly disinclined to a scheme of Federal Home Rule. Lord CARNARVON had had a ghostly sort of meeting with Mr. PARNELL in an empty house in Grosvenor Square. In these circumstances there was no time to be lost. Mr. GLADSTONE's private intimation of his readiness to support the Government of the day in a measure of Home Rule was the necessary preliminary of his taking up the measure as leader of the Opposition. It was the equivalent of Miss SALLY BRASS's reminder to the Marchioness: "You can't say that you were not asked." The subtle self-deception by which Mr. GLADSTONE transfers to the period immediately following the dissolution the private manœuvres and the public declarations which followed the general election, is unconsciously inspired by the aim to remove from them the character of factious intrigue which assignment to their proper place and circumstances brands upon them.

Mr. GLADSTONE alleges, in the second place, that he has always discouraged the promotion of party ties with the Nationalists. Again we take his word for it. But this only shows how slight is his influence over what was once his party. The repeated visits of Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE to Ireland, the mission of that noble lady and that eminent statesman, Mr. STANSFELD and Lady SANDHURST—the distribution of the parts is immaterial—the presence of Mr. CHILDERS and Mr. WILLIAM O'BRIEN on the same platform, the public embracings of Lord SPENCER and Mr. PARNELL, are, it would seem, disapproved by Mr. GLADSTONE. His third statement, that Home Rule "will practically take away from the Liberals a large number of votes usually given them in ordinary British politics," means necessarily one of three things: either (1) that the Irish members will not be retained at Westminster, and that Mr. MORLEY and Mr. FREEMAN are right, and Lord SPENCER and Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT are wrong, in their interpretation of Mr. GLADSTONE's intentions; or (2) that, being retained, they will remain in permanent secession, as a protest against their inclusion, and with a view to its annulment; or (3) that they will act and vote with the Tories—as, indeed, they are likely enough to do on most questions of education, social reform, and foreign policy. In any case, Mr. GLADSTONE proclaims that Home Rule will weaken, in British politics, the force of that Liberal party which in 1885 he declared he remained in public life simply for the purpose of strengthening, as the most potent instrument of progress and improvement. This is no concern of ours; our notions of progress and improvement may not be his; but we commend his candid confession to English Radicals and Nonconformists.

GREECE AND CRETE.

THE Greek wedding appears to have gone off very well; and certainly no country, not even one of much greater importance, could expect a more brilliant array of royal personages and personages connected with royalty, a more formidable array of ships of war, to be present at such a ceremony. One country, indeed, which used (no one quite knows why) to be ostentatiously, if not very effectually, philhellene, was not very importantly represented. But France could hardly be expected to appear in great force at an entertainment where the German EMPEROR's sister was the central figure and the German EMPEROR the most exalted guest in nominal rank. Consolation has been provided to Gallic sensitiveness by a speech of the Greek Minister in France and to Gallic common sense by the knowledge that France, not England, is furnishing Greece with ironclads of the very newest box-of-machinery pattern. Greece has some good sailors, and if she will make a wise use of them and can afford them, nobody will grudge her ironclads. It may be hoped that one of the effects of the new alliance will be that she will make a good use of them. Her dynastic connexions are such as to make very happily for strengthening the position of not contemptible, but also not aggressive, neutrality which it is best for her to assume in the Levant; and the fact that a pull one way is compensated by a pull the other way may, and it is to be hoped will, prevent her from pursuing that other career of removing her neighbour's landmarks, and jealously quarrelling with rival removers of them, which a certain section of her politicians at home and her self-styled friends abroad would have her pursue. The rejoicings of the week have notably lessened for the moment the cry for such a policy; but M. TRICOUPIIS will, no doubt, have his hands full when the reaction from this excitement comes.

We regret very much to see that those who, without a shadow of evidence, brought accusations against SHAKIR Pasha's administration in Crete have endeavoured, not merely to evade the force of Lord SALISBURY's reply to the Baptist ministers, but to repeat allegations which they have been in vain challenged to substantiate. Such conduct goes far to confirm the unpleasant suspicion that the original charges were made, not in good faith, but in reckless dishonesty. It was pointed out here that the loose and exaggerated gossip on which the Baptist ministers founded their complaint did not itself, on the widest construction, justify the complaints which they made; and Lord SALISBURY has only made this exposure more clear by pointing out that "violation of women" has not been the subject even of any trustworthy or circumstantial report, much less of any evidence. Our Turcophobes, from Mr. GLADSTONE downwards, seem to have determined to illustrate, each in his own person as a corporation sole, the fable of the Three Black Crows. First, they rake up loose gossip and take it for proved fact. Then they describe the fact in terms which the gossip itself does not justify. Then they embroider on their own descriptions, and out of somebody's story that he saw a prisoner on a road, who looked exhausted and used violent language, conjure up a whole Sack-of-Magdeburg and Spanish-Fury rolled into one. The faint attempt at argument which sometimes accompanies this bluster ignores altogether the fact that there are European Consuls in Crete, and that not only have these Consuls either failed to hear of or actually denied, after investigation, the rumours of serious "atrocities," but those of them who represent Powers either distinctly unfriendly to Turkey or professedly friendly to the so-called Christians of Crete have been unable to furnish to those who sympathize with them any proofs, or even any sober accounts, of "atrocities" at all. It may be merely stupidity which fails to see the inevitable conclusion from this; but it must be something worse which first assumes that unproved things exist and then violently blames the QUEEN's Government for not preventing or punishing what, so far as the QUEEN's Government has been able to ascertain, has no existence. It is said that the refugees at Athens (most of them, be it remembered, insurgents, not against Turkey, but, as Mr. GOSCHEN well pointed out on Tuesday, against Cretan Home Rule) have drawn up a list of outrages. The sooner that list is published and looked into the better.

THE BYWAYS OF THE LAW.

THE experience of Mr. TULLIVER induced him to form the opinion that rats, weevils, and lawyers were made by Old HARRY. In these enlightened days it is the intense respectability of the ordinary solicitor which first "leaps to the eyes" of those who behold or consult him. It is impossible not to feel a swelling sense of gratitude to Mr. HENRY FLETCHER VALLANCE, lately of Doctors' Commons and Chancery Lane, for having revived in the flesh a type of lawyer now mostly confined to farces. Mr. VALLANCE did not even exclaim, after approved theatrical precedent, "Where shall we all go to?" He simply wished to go to his mine in Algeria, if he has a mine in Algeria—for all his words are clouded with a doubt—in company with a gentleman who had stolen some bonds! The Incorporated Law Society is compelled in the performance of its duties to investigate some very shady places and transactions. But it cannot have often encountered a queerer specimen of the professional half-world than Mr. VALLANCE. It is said that in Chicago prisoners' counsel have exceeded their functions, if not their instructions, by endeavouring to tamper with the jury. Mr. VALLANCE's services were urgently required and freely rendered before matters had reached that comparatively ripe stage. JOHN ROBERT OLIVER Ross stole some bonds and concealed the loss. Their books his employers proceeded to balance, while he went and called upon Mr. VALLANCE. Mr. VALLANCE entreated him not to be silly, but pack up his trunk, and be off to Chili. "In Chili," says he, "you've a safe position. With her we've no Treaty of Extradition. The climate is lovely; the life is not hard; you may snap your fingers at Scotland Yard." But it is time that we should leave the poetry of the Master's Report and descend to the style which creeps along the ground. Ross, who was a solicitor's clerk, and supplemented his salary in the manner already described, had a confederate in his brother-in-law, JOHN BRUCE, and BRUCE was an intimate friend of VALLANCE ("their ancestors having been," doubtless, "acquainted," as the Prince said to General CAMPBELL, in the thirteenth century). Why these two rogues should have wanted a third is a question not easy to answer. Perhaps, like many rogues, they were also fools. At all events, they were soon caught, and have paid and are paying the penalty of their misdeeds. The only information for which they asked VALLANCE he was unable to give them without assistance. He visited two police-courts to ascertain what are the countries with which England has no Extradition Treaty. Perhaps he thought, like the Spectator and the late Mr. PIGOTT, that there was none with Spain.

First they tried the Lambeth Police Court, these dismally stupid conspirators, and from it they were sent to Bow Street, where such things are conventionally supposed to be understood. The Chief Clerk at Bow Street, not being an idiot, suspected that the strangers who wanted to know where a criminal would be most likely to be found were not quite so anxious to promote the ends of justice as they professed to be. He, therefore, gave as little information as he could, and only mentioned Chili. Why he should have given any information at all is not obvious. It was not his business. The proper way to recover a fugitive thief is to put a warrant in the hands of the police, who are bound to execute it, if they can. It surely cannot be the fact that a swindler has only to call in Bow Street and ask where he had better go. The criminal classes may, however, be invited to consider with some attention the powers of foreign Governments. It is quite true that in England an Act of Parliament is necessary to authorize the surrender of a foreigner to the agents of his State, and that the Extradition Acts only apply to those States with which we have treaties. But on the Continent and, for all Mr. VALLANCE knows, in South America things are very different. Not only the despotic Emperor of Russia, but the free Republic of France, can order an alien to leave their territories either with or without the escort of the local police. In such cases a treaty makes compulsory that which before was optional; but it does not, as in England, create the right besides the duty. The Divisional Court which struck Mr. VALLANCE off the rolls had an easy task. His representation that he took fifty pounds to get Ross where extradition was unknown, because Ross wanted to escape from his wife, is distinctly thin. It must be admitted that, having taken Ross to Bruges, which is not in Chili, nor yet in Algeria, VALLANCE came home and gave information against him for the sake of the reward. But two blacks do not make a white, and VALLANCE's treachery to his friend was an insufficient reason for keeping him on the Roll of Solicitors. The sort of business he carries on should be conducted strictly upon his personal responsibility.

ELECTIONS.

ALTHOUGH the Brighton election is now a week old, it is hardly possible to pass without comment, at the earliest occasion when comment is possible, so extraordinary a rebuff to the boastful jubilation of Gladstonians last week over preceding successes of theirs. And an additional reason for such comment may be found in the inability of the sufferers themselves to keep silence. Their lamentations and their explanations are, indeed, intelligible enough. In no recent election has so heavy a blow been dealt to the defeated party. Peterborough was merely the reversion of a constituency to its old love; Elgin and Nairn merely a fresh pledge of affection in a little warmer terms; while in North Bucks the successful candidate could only muster a very small part of his own former majority. But Brighton seems to exist for the purpose, among other things, of warning political parties at once of the folly of outré conduct and of the necessity of work. In 1880 two practically safe seats were lost to the Tories by boasting and idleness; in 1889 boasting accompanied, not by idleness, but by very hard work, and by the prestige of a run of luck, has inflicted on the Gladstonian Liberals a defeat much heavier, when all things are considered, than their defeats either in 1885 or in 1886. If their candidate on the present occasion was weak, they at least cannot say so; for it was their contention that he was "a splendid candidate." If he had a more than dubious record, he presented himself with ample certificates of discharge from the heads of his present party. If he had had rather too much political experience, his opponent had had little or none. No wonder that even the least sanguine Gladstonians expected a vastly diminished Tory majority; while not a few sanguine Gladstonians openly hinted at a possible win. And what happened was this. So far from bringing off their favourite "as in 1885," the Gladstonians only succeeded in getting beaten by a majority 400 heavier than that which beat them on that occasion. So far from being a real improvement on 1886, the actual majority was within more than three-fourths of that obtained in 1886 by two popular sitting members over a candidate who never had any chance at all, and in the full flush of the just indignation against Mr. GLADSTONE's Bill. Turn the figures where you like and how you like, no other result than discomfiture is possible for Gladstonians, unless some be hardy enough to confine their attempts to the majority, and even then to neglect the respective totals, of 1886. Mr. LODER polled more votes than Sir WILLIAM MARRIOTT in the hard fight of 1885. Sir ROBERT PEEL could not reach the poll of the then Liberal candidates. The now seated Tory member mustered twelve hundred more than came to the Tory flag in the contest of 1886. And yet everything had been done that could be done, even to the heroic and possibly unfortunate measure of "turning on" Mr. GLADSTONE himself for the Southport speech. It is agreed that Sir ROBERT PEEL, though he hardly improved his position with sober students of politics, was very successful in his personal canvass. His supporters were never weary of telling the world during that canvass how the railway men (some twelfth of the whole constituency) were going straight for PEEL, how the profligate machinations of the Primrose Dames were being counteracted by the chaste appeals of Liberal women, how the great heart of Brighton was shaken by the idea that an Irish peasant is not allowed to cheat his landlord, starve his neighbours, and reduce policemen's heads to marmalade with impunity. And the end of it all was what has been said, a defeat by a majority so crushing that Mr. LODER could have spared votes enough to win the three seats of Elgin, Peterborough, and North Bucks twice over, and yet have come in. It is not even necessary to be sorry for the defeated candidate. Sir ROBERT PEEL's antecedents warrant the supposition that, in any case, his next political appearance would be anti-Gladstonian, and this little contretemps will make the probably inevitable gyration easier to him.

Yet, gratifying as the result of the contest is, mere exultation over it as a victory would be equally silly and ignoble. What it is neither silly nor ignoble to rejoice over is, that the victory was won in the right way, and by the means which ought to win us other victories. There was, indeed, a very little delay in the selection of the candidate, and it has been whispered that organization on the Ministerial side was at first found a very little rusty. But the lesson of three defeats had been well learnt, and was applied promptly and vigorously. For each of the three mishaps which caused such wild delight to the Gladstonians, there was a more than sufficient reason. At Peterborough there was the excessive delay in the selection of a candidate, ending in the selection of one who had no special acquaintance with the constituency to fight a prepared and organized party. In Elgin and Nairn it was the selection of a candidate whose occupation, if not his person, was obnoxious to very large classes of the electors, and who represented the smaller instead of the larger portion of two allied parties, never very easy to get to work together. In North Bucks (as has become more evident than ever since the election) it was the unfortunate business—adroitly seized on by Mr. HUBBARD's opponents, and worked up with their usual unscrupulousness, though Mr. HUBBARD had nothing whatever to do with it—of the "Twynford allotments"—a business which, we say in passing, does strangely little credit to any persons concerned in it, whether they be labourers, landowners, Guardians, officious but well-intentioned meddlers from outside, or officious but by no means well-intending political wire-pullers. At Brighton a good candidate was chosen—the Gladstonian objection to Mr. LODER's youth is rather amusing, considering the hymns of praise which have been sung for ten years or so over the (it is true in some cases now rather elderly) babes and sucklings of the Eighty Club. Birmingham was met by Birmingham et demi in the matter of organization. The necessary speeches and letters, which seem to produce nowadays an effect so great and so surprising to those who are apt to form their political opinions for themselves, and not to take them from Mr. A or Lord B, were duly forthcoming. His Majesty the independent voter received with gracious acceptance that tribute of attentions which has succeeded the tribute of 5*l.* notes. Nothing seems to have been forgotten, and therefore everything was won.

Let us most heartily hope that no weariness of well-doing will succeed this good deed. The Conservative organizers and the Brighton Tories have shown that "TODGERS's can do it when it chooses"; it remains that "TODGERS's" should go on choosing. Never—never any more until our summers have deceased—will it be safe, if it is even possible, to lapse into the easy-going electioneering of not so many years ago; while so long as the Conservative-Liberal alliance lasts against the Gladstonian revolutionaries the management of elections will be naturally more difficult than ever. That they can be won, won against "splendid candidates," hard work, and divers advantages, and won by thumping majorities, Sleaford some time ago and Brighton now have shown just as clearly as Elgin and Nairn, North Bucks and Peterborough showed that they can be lost by slackness and blunders. But one election which has not been much referred to shall add something to this lesson of ours. The Gladstonians have crowed and crowed, we think legitimately enough, over the unopposed return of Mr. LENG at Dundee. We are aware that even among strenuous and able electioneers there is difference of opinion on the point; but we are ourselves all but certain that no seat, however apparently hopeless, should ever be left uncontested. That you cannot win a seat if you don't compete for it is, no doubt, something of a truism, though not perhaps quite so great a one as it looks. But it seems to be constantly forgotten that the loss of a seat in this manner has a specially bad effect on contests elsewhere. Nothing gives a greater feeling of that strength which comes from seeming to be strong than the ability to frighten the enemy out of the field without fighting. That there ought to be a fight for every seat, that there ought to be, if not an actual "understudy" for every holder or recognized candidate for a seat, at any rate an ample supply of sufficiently various candidates to fit most unexpected vacancies at the disposal of the party managers, that these managers cannot possibly take too much pains to keep themselves thoroughly informed of local feeling in every borough and county division, and that every fight should be fought as if each individual vote decided the winning or losing of the seat—these are the not very recondite or novel, but, we are persuaded, the sole true and valid, maxims for successful electioneering. Politics at such high pressure may seem to some people a game not worth the candle; but, if it be so, they must lay their account with losing, for politics is a game from which no one can in reality stand out.

RELICS OF WAR.

SOME visitors to Edinburgh this week may have been less amused by the Art Congress than interested in the Naval and Military Exhibition—the very best of the kind that has been seen for years. It is the historical and sentimental aspect of the Exhibition that is most alluring; for here are the old swords that were drawn in so many causes, fortunate or forlorn; the dirks that did so much secret service, the pennons of the Border wars, the brodered gauntlets that the DOUGLAS won from the PERCY—a whole treasure, in short, of romantic relics. The show of weapons begins with elf-shots, flint arrow-heads, hammers, axes; then come Roman blades of bronze and the camp kettles of the legions, and then the swords of historic Scotland—the true double-handed claymore, and the basket-hilted blade which in later times usurped the name of "the big sword." Mr. CRAIG BROWN, the historian of the Forest, exhibits a sword left by an officer of MONTROSE's army in a cottage near the field of Philiphaugh. LESLIE, coming through the mist on the Linglea hill, did not leave this unlucky leader even time to belt his blade about him. Here are Jacobite broadswords, with "God save King JAMES the VIII." etched on the steel; swords worn "when all was done that man can do, and all was done in vain." The same weapon is inscribed "Prosperity to Schotland, and No Union," showing the desire, revived by Mr. GLADSTONE, to eat your cake and have it. But this sword did not cut that cake. The so-called Deuchar sword of Harlaw (1410) was no more drawn at Harlaw, we fancy, than at Roncevaux, and might almost as well be called Durandal at once. It belongs to a much later period than Harlaw. Most of these arms are marked "ANDREA FERRARA," though that maker can scarcely have turned so many out of his forges as Scotch tradition fondly ascribes to him. An interesting sword is that which broke in the hand of Sir THOMAS HAY, of Park, when he fell at Preston Pans across the body of Colonel GARDINER. Yet more moving is the basket-hilted broadsword of ROB ROY—a very well-balanced and serviceable tool in a strong hand, though a little heavy on a hanging guard. Beside it is the weapon with which ALISTAIR MACIAN, son of MACDONALD of Glencoe, cut his way through the English troops at the massacre. Next comes the plain, unadorned cut-and-thrust rapier which DUNDEE was waving at Killiecrankie when the silver bullet struck him. It came into the hands of the Rev. DAVID LINDSAY, minister of Cockpen, who held it in great reverence, and it now belongs to Mr. TYTLER, of Woodhouselee. There are plenty of swords from Falkirk and Culloden, and Covenanting blades from Drumclog; and there is a FERRARA rapier—an extremely long and awkward toasting-iron it is. DUGALD DALGETTY's own blade is here, or something very like it, the sword of VEITCH, of Dawick, with portraits of CHARLES I. and GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS. Perhaps the motto, "Constant and True," would scarcely have become the heir of Drumthwhacket. Prince CHARLES's target, made in France, is a very queer Frenchified modification of a Highland shield; it is now the property of CLUNY MACPHERSON. The younger MACPHERSON of Cluny carried a charmed blade through the Indian Mutiny; it is exhibited here, a "medicine" sword—the wearer is never wounded. King PADELLA's objection to this class of weapon as unsportsmanlike is well known to students of history. This sword was in the ARGYLL family before CLUNY's people got it.

The pistols and muskets are interesting, because the series shows the whole process of evolution from match-locks through wheel-locks, snap-haunches, and flints, to the percussion-cap and the modern breech-loader. The amount of intricate mechanism in the wheel-locks and snap-haunches is extraordinary, and must have been bewildering. The gun with which BOTHWELLHAUGH shot the Regent (1571) is exhibited here "with a modern lock," and a modern stock and barrel too, in the opinion of some critics. Indeed, the weapon really seems much later than the date assigned. Here, less apocryphal we trust, are Colonel GARDINER's pistols from Preston Pans, and here is a genuine and most interesting ancient claymore, of the fifteenth century, with a Celtic pattern on the ivory grip. GORDON's sword is here, but of course it is not, as the label declares, the sword he wore at Khartoum. A Soudanese cross-hilted sword is not of the Crusading period, as the Catalogue absurdly states, but has a European blade, probably German and of the last century. There is, indeed, a good deal of mythology in the collection. But there is no doubt about the immense heavy sabre with which Sergeant EWART, of the Scots Greys, took the French eagle at Waterloo. He cut the bearer of the eagle through the head, parried a lance thrown at him by a lancer in Homeric style, and cut him, with an upstroke, from the chin to the brain. A foot soldier fired at EWART, missed, and thrust at him with the bayonet. EWART parried, and cut him through the head; his genius favouring the upper guard, like that of ALAN BRECK. The General then told EWART he had done enough for one day, and sent him to the rear with the captured eagle. This sabre occupies, and we think deserves, the place of honour. The eagle was flown at Jena, Austerlitz, Eylau, and Friedland before EWART came across it with that prodigious blade of his, and clipped its wings. As useful a weapon is that of McLACHLAN, of Auchintroig. When the colours of the 20th were taken at Minden, he cleared his way to them and recaptured them, for which he got his company. The 20th was KINGSLEY's regiment; it was nearly annihilated at Minden; an order was issued that it should cease to do duty, but, at the petition of the survivors, it "at its own request resumed duty as part of the line." There is here a Turkish sabre from Acre. When found after the siege the owner's hand was still clinging to the hilt!

Besides English arms there are many from all quarters of the world. The Assam dirk, a very broad-bladed and short weapon with a bone handle, is exactly the same as a dagger from Lamu, near Zanzibar. Either the dirk is wrongly described in the Catalogue, or there must be some rude factory which supplies East Africa and Assam. A weapon more "home-made" looking, untanned sheath and all, cannot be imagined. From the Soudan wars comes a brass axe, with so large a circular opening in the metal that any one may understand ODYSSEUS's feat of shooting "through the axes." The Egyptian shipwrights, on the tombs of Sakkarah, used axes exaggerated from this pattern. (DUEMICHEN, Fleet of an Egyptian Queen, Plate XXI.) Other axes equally capable of being shot through are figured on the metopes of Selinus. It is impossible even to hint at all the relics in the Exhibition; but here, to conclude, is the uniform of the heroic Ettrick Shepherd, which the martial JAMES wore as a member of the Border Bowmen, perhaps during the False Alarm.

The whole show is excellently arranged, and the Catalogue is "as interesting as a novel," more interesting than nine-tenths of novels.

MR. GLADSTONE ON PROGRESS.

IT will generally be admitted by Mr. GLADSTONE's foes, as well as by his friends, that he has as good a claim as most of our statesmen to "open" such an institution as that which he opened on Saturday last. He has always shown a genuine and generally a well-directed interest in literature, and few people could deliver a more interesting or appropriate speech on such an occasion than he. No man has a greater command of illustration and application, while not many can have experienced more often and more thoroughly the advantages of "Reading and Recreation" (the technical purposes of the Saltney Institute) as carrying out the generous toast of the commercial traveller, "doubling joy and dividing sorrow." And, if the many excellent discourses which have been delivered on the subject of late years seemed to Mr. GLADSTONE to have hackneyed it too much, no one could have deflected the topic more ingeniously and yet appropriately than Mr. GLADSTONE himself. The "uses" of the text are infinite; and not merely the most dexterous platform speaker of the age, but any fairly skilled practitioner in public speaking, could have chosen from them at his pleasure.

Mr. GLADSTONE, however—and, perhaps, it is one of the secrets of his success, for the god of his special idolatry, the demos, is a god who, unlike some others, can be propitiated by much speaking—has always been more or less, and has of late been conspicuously, given to enforcing his particular political doctrine of the moment in season and out of season. As the Chevalier STRONG, in his graceful compliments to Mr. PENDENNIS on his approaching marriage, took the liberty to point out that there was no requisite for a happy domestic life more important than good sherry, which his own connexion with the Duke of GARBANZOS fortunately enabled him to supply, so does Mr. GLADSTONE improve the text of the Saltney Reading and Recreation Rooms to urge the remembrance of the wicked way in which the classes used to oppress the masses, the virtues of revolutionary France, the importance of studying (in his sense) the history of Ireland, and so forth. It is due to the Saltney people to say that they were in no way to blame for this. Their address was a little florid and flattering, and now that they have got a library, it will be well for them to verify their references. The reference to any passage where "the grand PENELOPE" is called a model "of perfect wifedom and pure womanhood" will be welcome. We can only think of the Laureate's ISABEL, who was the flower "of perfect wifedom and pure lowlihead." But if their quotations were vague they entirely shunned politics. Mr. GLADSTONE, on the other hand, started off at score to glorify progress, and especially the progress of the working classes. Thankfulness, as Mr. GLADSTONE justly urged, is one of the noblest of virtues; but there is a particular kind of thankfulness which always includes the parenthesis "No thanks to you for it"; and this would seem to be the particular variety which Mr. GLADSTONE is anxious to inculcate. There are thousands of schools and libraries now; but Mr. GLADSTONE is bound to state that not so long ago the bad "classes" were in doubt whether a working-man ought to be educated at all. You can send a letter now for a penny, but Mr. GLADSTONE recalls with alacrity and shame the time when "the poor" paid sixpences and shillings; while "the rich" paid nothing, owing to franking. The working-man is much less taxed than he was; and Mr. GLADSTONE's joy over this circumstance is heightened by the recollection that the object of the taxation formerly was "to increase the landlord's rent." And so on, and so on. Never, perhaps, was a hymn of thanks associated in so curious a fashion with an incantation of hatred. There seems to run through the speech a sort of devil's Benedicite—"Blessed be light taxes; but the greed of the classes endureth for ever. Blessed be easy postage; but the rich used to post for nothing," and so on. Whether this sort of thing is worthy of a statesman in Mr. GLADSTONE's position must be left, we suppose, to individual opinion to decide; but we should hardly have thought so. Perhaps, however, he is of the mind of the unutterably silly person who comforted himself and his friends last Monday in the columns of the Daily News by remarking that Peterborough, North Bucks, &c., were won by "the people of Great Britain and Ireland," and Brighton by "members of the Stock Exchange and the adherents of the aristocracy." Such a party may naturally produce such a leader.

There is, however, one sentence in Mr. GLADSTONE's address which requires a different style of handling. It is known that, partly from blind animosity to anything done by Lord SALISBURY's Government, partly from susceptibility to the flattery of certain Frenchmen, partly, perhaps, from an actual growth of sympathy with the revolutionary sentiment, Mr. GLADSTONE's admiration for France has blossomed lately into a new efflorescence. But even Mr. GLADSTONE has never been betrayed by his personal sympathies into so outrageous a statement (even it be only a statement of opinion) as the following:—"The French as a nation are extremely friendly to us, and desire to be united to us in bonds of brotherhood." We cannot mince words about such a statement as this. It is simply untrue. That Mr. GLADSTONE believes it to be true is quite possible—there is, it is well known, no limit to his power of believing what he wishes. But we do not believe it to be possible to find twelve honest and intelligent Englishmen well acquainted with France who will accept Mr. GLADSTONE's view; and, if it were possible to find them, we should be forced to disable their judgment. Every witness of competence during the last three-quarters of a century gives the lie direct to Mr. GLADSTONE's assertion. Every reference at the present time to England in French books, in French newspapers, in French public speaking, almost, we may say, in French private conversation, echoes in reality the denial, whether it be in appearance friendly or hostile. There are individual Frenchmen who actually like England and understand Englishmen, though there are not many of them. There is a larger number who are not ill-willers to, though not exactly in sympathy with, us. But the nation as a nation dislikes, distrusts, and misunderstands English ways, grudges English success, rejoices at English discomfiture. In this JOHNSTONE and MAXWELL, Boulangist and Republican, Royalist and Bonapartist, Clerical and Freethinker, agree. It is of all things the sentiment which divides Frenchmen least. It is the one to which a French statesman may most safely appeal. It shows itself at times even in those Frenchmen who have acquired better knowledge and more liberal sentiments. As a sentiment we are neither condemning nor accusing it. Many competent authorities, from Mr. THACKERAY to Mr. HAMERTON, have shown how it exists, and that it exists partly owing to historical causes and partly, no doubt, owing to faults in the English quite as great as any faults in the French character. With that side of the question we are not concerned. What we are concerned with is the fact of the existence of the sentiment which Mr. GLADSTONE denies, the fact of the utter non-existence, the dangerous and deluding falsity of the sentiment which Mr. GLADSTONE attributes. THACKERAY's "My dear sir, they hate us," is as true as on the day when it was written; and nothing but Mr. GLADSTONE's superhuman power of averting his eyes from fact could blind him to the truth. The sentiment is not, indeed, of the acrid character of French hate for Germany, but it is deeper-seated. Its existence can induce no sensible politician to take an opposite side to France in politics out of revenge, and it need not prevent the existence of an entente, not exactly cordiale, but reaching the point of a fair modus vivendi such as has prevailed for many years past. But if any politician, on the other hand, is given over to such strong delusion as to believe in the "extreme friendship," the "brotherly" yearnings of the French nation for the English nation, he can only act on that belief with the certainty of the disaster which invariably follows denial of fact and assertion of falsehood.

GUNS AND SHIPS.

WE do not propose to do more for the moment than notice the continued existence of that controversy as to the value of our naval ordnance which has gone on for so long—now dying down, and now again reviving, but never coming to a settlement. If there were no other reason for merely skirting it, an excellent one could be found in the utterly contradictory character of the available evidence. On the 25th of this month, for instance, we find one "Correspondent of the Times" writing to assert, in good round terms, that our guns are badly constructed, of bad metal, and backing the charge up with such figures as these:—"Without going into details, it is sufficient to state that at the works of one firm alone one 105-ton gun, one 12-inch gun, two 10-inch and two 8-inch guns have had to be condemned while undergoing proof; and, reticent as the authorities have been on the subject, there is not much doubt that both the 111-ton guns of HER MAJESTY's ship Victoria are practically hors de combat. If such a number of guns have collapsed after a few rounds, what may we expect with rapid and continued firing in action?" What, indeed? But a few days later comes another correspondent of the Times, and contradicts the first flatly, declaring that our guns are subjected to such severe trials that it is a wonder any of them survive, and yet wondrous few fail. As for the Victoria's guns, there has been gross exaggeration. Only one of them is bent—a mere nothing, which, were it ten times as great as it is, could be got over by allowance in firing. Plainly there must be a great deal of ignorance or dishonesty on one side or the other here. In the absence of controlling evidence we shall not undertake to decide the great debate.

In the meantime we are the more disposed to leave the gun question alone because there is another, much more intelligible to the layman, which is very fit for preliminary settlement. It is briefly, whether we are not simply trying the impossible with our ships, machines, and guns altogether. The quality of metal and the exact effect of kinks in guns must needs be left to founders and gunners to settle. But any man of average intelligence can come to a rational conclusion on such points as whether, if you have a gun which cannot be worked without the use of a long chain of complicated machinery, it is not extremely likely to be thrown out of gear at sea and in action; whether, if your weapon is so potent that it knocks you to pieces in the use, it is not likely to prove as dangerous to yourself as to the enemy, or more so; and whether, if you are entirely dependent on mechanical devices which may be twisted, unshipped, or otherwise damaged by the straining of your vessel and the shock of your guns, you are not very likely to be paralysed in battle by your own exertions. These are matters which it requires no very elaborate technical training to understand. On every one of them Admiral SCOTT answers in the affirmative in the Times of Tuesday. Twenty-nine hydraulic machines, he points out, are needed to work the 111- or 67-ton gun. The failure of any one of them might paralyse the gun, and they cannot be replaced by manual labour. As for the effect of these big guns on the ships which use them, Admiral SCOTT points out that whenever they are fired they start everything, smash the bulkheads, and make the decks gape, so that, when the vessel is steaming against a moderate sea, "the mess-deck is always afloat." To illustrate, too, the unquestionable truth that one blunder breeds a thousand, we have, in order to use these kicking monsters, been compelled to so build our ships that they are as near as may be unseaworthy. The guns must be so mounted as to be fired over the deck from a central position, which means that the vessel must have a low free-board, which again means that she will ship everything which comes in her way higher than the wake of a duck. "When," for instance, "the Collingwood was off St. Kilda during the last manœuvres, the waves rose so high as to cover her foremost barbette, and drench her bridges above it, and, rushing aft, to swamp her ward-room and cabins." It does not need a storm to set these ships awash. The merest capful of wind which would not trouble a North Sea fisherman can do it. The chain of folly is complete. The bad gun—and its size makes it bad, whatever its metal may be—has led directly to the bad ship. It is surely time that we gave up these wild plunging experiments, and took a space to think out the necessary conditions of war, and the limitations of human nature, before wasting more money on vessels which are very likely to be a repetition or an exaggeration of what we have already.

BISHOP AND BOANERGES.

THE cheerful exclamation of youth, "Well done our side," has seldom been more in place than in reference to certain recent utterances of the Bishop of PETERBOROUGH, and certain comments thereon of a much-advertised and much self-advertising light of Nonconformity who is called the Rev. HUGH PRICE HUGHES. These two deliverances can hardly be called a debate, for the Bishop did not invite Mr. HUGHES's participation in his Diocesan Conference; but they bore on the same subject. In Dr. MAGEE's own words there was a refreshing gust of that curiously sturdy and at the same time curiously unphilistine common sense which has often distinguished his speeches. Ranters and canters have of course howled over his statement that it is not for the State as a State to act upon the principles of the Sermon on the Mount—a statement, one might have thought, clearly enough and sufficiently enough demonstrable out of the words of the Scriptures themselves. The Bishop was bolder and more original when, descending from generalities as to which none but idiots or hypocrites disagree, he came to the particular subject of gambling. Except on the subject of drink, no such arrant rubbish is usually talked anywhere as on this, and the Bishop swept all this rubbish into the dustbin, appropriately laying it down that the State may have no business to interfere with a thing per se wrong, and much business to interfere with a thing not per se wrong, and that betting as betting could not be called a sin. And then Dr. MAGEE (who, be it understood, was not defending gambling in the least, but, on the contrary, denouncing it) made one of those scores off the sillier kind of cleric which have so endeared him to his brethren. A reverend Canon had defined betting as a "waste of money," and the Bishop asked whether this applied to the winner. In short, Dr. MAGEE talked as we should have expected him to talk, and as an Anglican prelate ought to talk, not paltering in the least with irreligion or with immorality, but showing a clear perception of the difference between counsels of perfection and the duty of common life, between the function of the Church and the function of the State, between ethics and politics on the one side and ethics and religion on the other.

